2. Sources of the book.—In its present form the Book of Ezra-Nehemiah is, as has been pointed out, the work of the Chronicler. The compilation, however, embraces older material. The most important parts of this latter are undoubtedly the autobiographical sections, which have been taken partly from Ezra's, partly from Nehemiah's, personal memoirs.

(a) Extracts from Ezra's memoirs embodied in the Book of Ezra.—The long passage Ezr 7¹⁷-9¹⁸ (except 8⁴, 20) is generally admitted to be an authentic extract from Ezra's memoirs. The abrupt break which takes place at 9¹⁸ must be due to a compiler. 'The events of the next thirteen years were clearly of too dismal a character to make it desirable to perpetuate the memory of them' (Cornill). [It is probable that an even larger excerpt from these memoirs is to be seen in Neh 9¹-10⁴⁰.]

It seems probable that these memoirs were not used by the Chronicler in their original form, but in a form adapted and arranged by a later hand, to which Ezr 10 is due. This latter narrative is of first-rate importance and rests upon extremely good information. It was probably written by the same hand that composed the main part of Nch 8-10 (see NEHEMIAH [BOOK OF], § 2).

The Imperial firman—an Aramaic document (7¹²⁻²⁵)—the essential authenticity of which has now been made certain—is an extract from the memoirs preserved in the same compiler's work, from which Ezr 2 (= Neh 7⁷⁻⁷³) was also derived. The introductory verses (7¹⁻¹¹) are apparently the work of the Chronicler.

(b) Other sources of the book.—The other most important source used by the Chronicler was an Aramaic one, written, perhaps, about B.C. 450, which contained a history of the building of the Temple, the city walls, etc., and cited original documents. From this authority come Ezr 4¹⁻²² 5¹-6¹⁸ (cited verbally).

The Chronicler, however, partly misunderstood his Aramaic source. He has misconceived 4⁸, and assigned a false position to the document embodied in 4⁷⁻²².

(c) Passages written by the Chronicler.—The following passages bear clear marks of being the actual composition of the Chronicler: Ezr 1. 32-47 4²³ 6¹⁸-7¹¹ 8²⁵, 20.

3. Separation of Ezra from Chronicles.—It would appear that after the great work of the Chronicler had been completed (1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah), the part which contained narratives of otherwise unrecorded events was first received into the Canon. Hence, in the Jewish Canon, Ezra-Nehemiah precedes the Books of Chronicles. In the process of separation certain verses are repeated (Ezr 1¹⁻² = 2 Ch 36²², 22); v. 22 seems to have been added in 2 Ch 36 to avoid a dismal ending (v. 21).

For the historical value of the book cf. what is said under NEHEMIAH [BOOK OF], § 3.

FABLE.—For the definition of a fable, as distinct from parable, allegory, etc., see Trench, Parables, p. 2 ff. Its main feature is the introduction of beasts or plants as speaking and reasoning, and its object is moral instruction. As it moves on ground common to man and lower creatures, its teaching can never rise to a high spiritual level. Worldly prudence in some form is its usual note, or it attacks human folly and frailty, sometimes in a spirit of bitter cynicism. Hence it has only a small place in the Bible. See PARABLE.

1. In OT.—There are two fables in the OT, though the word is not used; it is perhaps significant that neither is in any sense a message from God. (1) Jotham's fable of the trees choosing their king illustrates the folly of the men of Shechem (Jg 9⁸). (2) Jehoash's fable of the thistle and the cedar (2 K 14⁹) is his rebuke of Amaziah's presumption—a rebuke in itself full of haughty contempt, however well grounded. Ezk 17¹⁻¹⁰ is not a fable, but an allegory. In Bar 3²² 'authors of fables' occurs in the list of wise men of the earth who have not yet found Wisdom. Sir 13¹⁷ would seem to be a reference to Æsop's fables; so Mt 7¹⁵. This type of literature was freely used by later Jewish teachers, and Æsop's and other fables are frequently found in the Talmud.

2. In NT.—'Fable' occurs in a different sense. It is used to translate the Gr. 'myth,' which has lost its better sense as an allegorical vehicle for truth, whether growing naturally or deliberately invented, as in Plato's Republic, and has come to mean a deluding fiction of a more or less extravagant character. The 'cunningly devised fables' of 2 P 1¹⁶ are apparently attempts to allegorize the Gospel history, and the belief in the Second Advent. The word occurs four times in the Pastoral Epp., with a more definite reference to a type of false teaching actually in vogue at Ephesus and in Crete. These fables are connected with 'endless genealogies which minister questionings' (1 Ti 1⁴); they are described as 'profane and old wives' fables' (4⁷), and contrasted with 'sound doctrine' (2 Ti 4⁴). They are 'Jewish,' 'the commandments of men' (Tit 1¹⁴), and the 'genealogies' are connected with 'fightings about law' (3⁹). The exact nature of the teaching referred to is disputed, but the following points are fairly established. (a) The references do not point to 2nd century Gnosticism, which was strongly anti-Jewish, but to an earlier and less developed form, such as is necessarily implied in the more elaborate systems. The heresies combated are no indication of the late date of these Epistles. (b) The heresy may be called Gnostic by anticipation, and apparently arose from a mixture of Oriental and Jewish elements (perhaps Essene). Its views on the sinfulness of matter led on the one hand to an extreme asceticism (1 Ti 4³), on the other to unbridled licence (Tit 1¹⁶, 1¹⁸). (c) There is much evidence connecting this type of teaching with Asia Minor—Col., Tit., Rev., Ignatian Letters, and the career of Cerinthus. Ramsay points out that Phrygia was a favourable soil, the Jews there being particularly lax. (d) The fables may be specially the speculations about aëons and emanations, orders of angels, and intermediary beings, which are characteristic of all forms of Gnosticism; the passages are so applied by 2nd cent. Fathers. But we are also reminded of the legendary and allegorical embellishments of the narratives of the OT, which were so popular with the Jewish Rabbis. Semi-Christian teachers may have borrowed their methods, and the word 'myth' would be specially applicable to the product.

FACE is used freely of animals, as well as of men; also of the surface of the wilderness (Ex 16¹), of the earth, of the waters or deep, of the sky. It is used of the front of a house (Ezk 41¹⁴), of a porch (40¹⁵ 41²²), of a throne (Job 26⁹). Covering the face in 2 S 19⁴ is a sign of mourning (cf. covering the head); it is also a mark of reverence (Ex 3⁶, 1 K 19¹⁵, Is 6⁹). In Gn 24⁴⁶ it indicates modesty. Otherwise it is used simply of blindfolding, literal (Mk 14⁶⁴), or metaphorical (Job 9³¹). To fall on the face is the customary Eastern obeisance, whether to man or to God. Spitting in the face is the climax of contempt (Nu 12¹⁴, Dt 25⁹, Mt 26⁶⁷). The Oriental will say, 'I spit in your face,' while he actually spits on the ground. The face naturally expresses various emotions,—fear, sorrow, shame, or joy. The 'fallen face' (Gn 4⁸) is used of displeasure; 'hardening the face' of obstinate sin (Pr 21²⁹, Jer 5⁵). The face was 'disfigured' in fasting (Mt 6¹⁶). It may be the expression of favour, particularly of God to man (Nu 6², Ps 31¹⁶), or conversely of man turning his face to God (Jer 27³²); or of disfavour, as in the phrase 'to set the face against' (Ps 34¹⁸, Jer 21¹⁰, and often in Ezk.), or 'to hide the face.' [N.B. In Ps 51⁹ the phrase is used differently, meaning to forget or ignore, cf. Ps 90⁹.] Closely related are the usages connected with 'beholding the face.' This meant to be admitted to the presence of a potentate, king, or god (Gn 33¹⁰ 43³, 2 K 25¹⁹, Est 1¹⁴ 4¹¹, 1¹⁸; cf. 'angel(s) of the face or presence,' Is 63⁹, 2 K 19¹⁷, Rev 8², and often in apocalyptic literature). So 'to look upon the face' is to accept (Ps 84⁹), 'to turn away the face' is to reject (Ps 132¹⁰, 1 K 2¹⁶ RVm). To 'behold the face' of God may be used either literally of appearing before His presence in the sanctuary or elsewhere (Gn 32³⁰ 'Peniel is 'the face of God'), Ex 33¹¹, Ps 42³; the 'shewbread' is 'the bread of the face or presence'), or with a more spiritual reference to the inward reality of communion which lies behind (Ps 17¹⁵); so 'seeking the face' of God (Ps 24⁸ 27⁸). On the other hand, in 2 K 14⁸ 'see face to face' is used in a sinister sense of meeting in battle.

The Heb. word for 'face' is used very freely, both alone and in many prepositional phrases, as an idiomatic periphrasis, e.g. 'honour the face of the old man' (Lv 19³²), 'grind the face of the poor' (Is 3¹⁵), or the common phrase 'before my face' (Dt 8²⁹, Mk 1²), or 'before the face of Israel' (Ex 14²²). Many of these usages are disguised in our versions, not being in accordance with English idioms; the pronoun is substituted, or 'presence,' 'countenance' are used, 'face' being often indicated in AVm or RVm (Gn 12⁹, 1 K 2¹⁴); so in the phrase 'respect persons' (Dt 1¹⁷). On the other hand, 'face' is wrongly given for 'eye' in AV of 1 K 20²⁴, 4¹, where 'ashes on face' should be 'headband over eye'; in 2 K 9³⁰, Jer 4²⁰, the reference is to painting the eye; in Gn 24⁴⁷ RV substitutes 'nose,' in Ezk 38¹⁸ 'nostrils.'

FAITH.—Noun for believe, having in early Eng. ousted 'belief' (wh. see) from its ethical uses. By this severance of noun and vb. (so in Lat. fides—credere, French foi—croire) Eng. suffers in comparison with German (Glaube—glauben) and Greek (pistis—pisteuō). But 'faith' has a noble pedigree; coming from the Latin fides, through Norman-French, it connotes the sense of personal honour and of the mutual loyalty attaching to the pledged word.

1. In OT.—This word, the normal NT expression for the religious bond, is found but twice in the OT (EV)—in Dt 32²⁰, signifying steadfastness, fidelity; and in Hab 2⁴, where a slightly different noun from the same Heb. stem (contained in amen and denoting what is firm, reliable), may carry a meaning identical with the above—the 'just shall live by his faithfulness' (RVm). The original term has no other sense than 'faithfulness' or 'truth' elsewhere—so in Ps 37³ (RV) 96¹³, Dt 32⁴ (RV), Is 11⁵ etc.; the context in Hab., however, lends to it a pregnant emphasis, suggesting, besides the temper of steadfastness, its manifestation in steadfast adherence to Jehovah's word; under the circumstances, passive fidelity becomes active faith—'the righteous' Israel 'shall live' not by way of reward for his loyalty, but by virtue of holding fast to Jehovah's living word (cf. 1¹³). If so, St. Paul has done no violence to the text in Ro 1¹⁷, Gal 3¹¹. The corresponding vb. (from the root amen: in active and passive, to rely on, and to have reliance or be reliable) occurs above 20 times with God, His character, word, or messengers, for object. More than half these examples (in Ex., Dt., Ps.) refer to faith or unbelief in the mission of Moses and Jehovah's redemptive acts at the foundation of the national Covenant. The same vb. supplies two of Isaiah's watchwords, in 7⁹ and 28¹⁵. The former sentence is an untranslatable epigram—'If you will not hold fast, you shall have no holdfast!'. 'No fealty, no safety!'; the latter leads us into the heart of OT faith, the collective trust of Israel in Jehovah as her Rock of foundation and salvation, which, as Isaiah declared (in 8¹³⁻¹⁵), must serve also for 'a stone of stumbling and rock of offence' to the unfaithful. This combination of passages is twice made in the NT (Ro 9³³ and 1 P 2⁸⁻⁹), since the new house of God built of Christian believers rests on the foundation laid in Zion, viz. the character and promise of the 'immutable, to whom now as then faith securely binds His people. In Hab 1⁸ (cited Ac 13⁴¹) Israel's unbelief in threatened judgment, in Is 53¹ (Jn 12³⁸, Ro 10¹⁶) her unbelief in the promised salvation, coming through Jehovah's humiliated Servant, are charged upon her as a fatal blindness. Thus the cardinal import of faith is marked at salient points of Israelite history, which NT interpreters seized with a sure instinct. At the head of the OT sayings on this subject stands Gn 15^a, the text on which St. Paul founded his doctrine of justification by faith (see Ro 4^a, Gal 3^a; also Ja 2^a); 'and Abraham believed Jehovah, and he counted it to him for righteousness' (JE)—a crucial passage in Jewish controversy. St. Paul recognized in Abraham the exemplar of personal religion, antedating the legal system—the faith of the man who stands in direct heart-relationship to God. Gn 15^a supplies the key to his character and historical position: his heart's trustful response to Jehovah's promise made Abraham all that he has become to Israel and humanity; and 'the men of faith' are his children (Gal 3^{a-8}). Only here, however, and in Hab 2^a, along with two or three passages in the Psalms (27¹³ 116¹⁰—quoted 2 Co 4¹³, and possibly 119⁶⁶), does faith ipso nomine (or 'believe') assume the personal value which is of its essence in the NT. The difference in expression between the OT and NT in this respect discloses a deep-lying difference of religious experience. The national redemption of Israel (from Egypt) lay entirely on the plane of history, and was therefore to be 'remembered'; whereas the death and rising of our Lord, while equally historical, belong to the spiritual and eternal, and are to be 'believed.' Under the Old Covenant the people formed the religious unit; the relations of the individual Israelite to Jehovah were mediated through the sacred institutions, and the Law demanded outward obedience rather than inner faith—hearing the voice of Jehovah, 'keeping his statutes,' 'walking in his way'; so (in the language of Gal 3²³) the age of faith was not yet. Besides this, the Israelite revelation was consciously defective and preparatory, 'the law made nothing perfect'; when St. Paul would express to his fellow-countrymen in a word what was most precious to himself and them, he speaks not of 'the faith' but 'the hope of Israel' (Ac 28²⁰ etc.), and the writer of He 11 defines the faith of his OT heroes as 'the assurance of things hoped for'; accordingly, Hebrew terms giving to faith the aspect of expectation—trusting, waiting, looking for Jehovah—are much commoner than those containing the word 'believe.' Again, the fact that oppression and suffering entered so largely into the life of OT believers has coloured their confessions in psalm and prophecy; instead of believing in Jehovah, they speak of cleaving to Him, taking refuge under His wings, making Him a shield, a tower, etc. In all this the liveliness of Eastern sentiment and imagination comes into play; and while faith seldom figures under the bare abstract term, it is to be recognized in manifold concrete action and in dress of varied hue. Under the Old Covenant, as under the New, faith 'wrought by love' (Dt 6^a, Ps 116¹ etc., Lv 19¹⁸ etc.), while it inspired hope.

2. In NT.—The NT use of pistis, pisteuō, is based on that of common Greek, where persuasion is the radical idea of the word. From this sprang two principal notions, meeting in the NT conception: (a) the ethical notion of confidence, trust in a person, his word, promise, etc., and then mutual trust, or the expression thereof in troth or pledge—a usage with only a casual religious application in non-Biblical Greek; and (b) the intellectual notion of conviction, belief (in distinction from knowledge), covering all the shades of meaning from practical assurance down to conjecture, but always connoting sincerity, a belief held in good faith. The use of 'faith' in Mt 23²³ belongs to OT phraseology (see Dt 32²⁰, quoted above); also in Ro 3^a, Gal 5²², pistis is understood to mean good faith, fidelity (RV 'faithfulness'), as often in classical Greek. In sense (b) pistis came into the language of theology, the gods being referred (e.g. by Plutarch as a religious philosopher) to the province of faith, since they are beyond the reach of sense-perception and logical demonstration.

(1) In this way faith came to signify the religious faculty in the broadest sense,—a generalization foreign to the OT. Philo Judæus, the philosopher of Judaism, thus employs the term; quoting Gn 15^a, he takes Abraham for the embodiment of faith so understood, viewing it as the crown of human character, 'the queen of the virtues'; for faith is, with Philo, a steady intuition of Divine things, transcending sense and logic; it is, in fact, the highest knowledge, the consummation of reason. This large Hellenistic meaning is conspicuous in He 11^b, 6^{a-27} etc., and appears in St. Paul (2 Co 4¹⁴ 5⁷ 'by faith not by appearance'). There is nothing distinctively Christian about faith understood in the bare significance of 'seeing the invisible'—'the demons believe, and shudder'; the belief that contains no more is the 'dead faith,' which condemns instead of justifying (Ja 2¹⁴⁻²⁶). As St. James and St. Paul both saw from different standpoints, Abraham, beyond the 'belief that God is,' recognized what God is and yielded Him a loyal trust, which carried the whole man with it and determined character and action; his faith included sense (a) of pisteuō (which lies in the Heb. vb. 'believe') along with (b). In this combination lies the rich and powerful import of NT 'believing': it is a spiritual apprehension joined with personal affiance; the recognition of truth in, and the plighting of troth with, the Unseen; in this twofold sense, 'with the heart (the entire inner self) man believeth unto righteousness' (Ro 10¹⁰). Those penetrated by the spirit of the OT could not use the word pistis in relation to God without attaching to it, besides the rational idea of supersensible apprehension, the warmer consciousness of moral trust and fidelity native to it already in human relationships.

(2) Contact with Jesus Christ gave to the word a greatly increased use and heightened potency. 'Believing' meant to Christ's disciples more than hitherto, since they had Him to believe in; and 'believers,' 'they that had believed,' became a standing name for the followers of Christ (Ac 2^a, Ro 10^a, 1 Co 14²², Mk 16¹⁷). A special endowment of this power given to some in the Church seems to be intended by the 'faith' of 1 Co 12⁹ (cf. Mt 17²⁰, Lk 17⁶). Faith was our Lord's chief and incessant demand from men; He preaches, He works 'powers,' to elicit and direct it—the 'miracle-faith' attracted by 'signs and wonders' being a stepping-stone to faith in the Person and doctrine of God's Messenger. The bodily cures and spiritual blessings Jesus distributes are conditioned upon this one thing—'Only believe!' 'All things are possible to him that believeth.' There was a faith in Jesus, real so far as it went but not sufficient for true discipleship, since it attached itself to His power and failed to recognize His character and spiritual aims (see Jn 2²³, 4¹⁸ 6⁶⁸ 7³¹ 8³⁰, 11⁴ 12¹⁸ 14¹¹), which Jesus rejected and affronted; akin to this, in a more active sense, is the faith that 'calls' Him 'Lord' and 'removes mountains' in His name, but does not in love do the Father's will, which He must disown (Mt 7²¹, 1 Co 13^a). Following the Baptist, Jesus sets out with the summons, 'Repent, and believe the good news' that 'the kingdom of God is at hand' (Mk 1¹⁵); like Moses, He expects Israel to recognize His mission as from God, showing 'signs' to prove this (see Jn 2¹¹, 3^a etc.; cf. Ac 2^a, He 4^a). As His teaching advanced, it appeared that He required an unparalleled faith in Himself along with His message, that the Kingdom of God He speaks of centres in His Person, that in fact He is 'the word' of God He brings, He is the light and life whose coming He announces, 'the bread from heaven' that He has to give to a famished world (Jn 6³², 8¹² 11² 14^a etc.). For those 'who received him,' who 'believed on his name' in this complete sense, faith acquired a scope undreamed of before; it signified the unique attachment which gathered round the Person of Jesus—a human trust, in its purity and intensity such as no other man had ever elicited, which grew up into and identified itself with its possessor's belief in God, transforming the latter in doing so, and which drew the whole being of the believer into the will and life of his Master. When Thomas hails Jesus as 'My Lord and my God!' he 'has believed'; this process is complete in the mind of the slowest disciple; the two faiths are now welded inseparably; the Son is known through the Father, and the Father through the Son, and Thomas gives full assent to both in one. As Jesus was exalted, God in the same degree became nearer to these men, and their faith in God became richer in contents and firmer in grasp. So sure and direct was the communion with the Father opened by Jesus to His brethren, that the word 'faith,' as commonly used, failed to express it: 'Henceforth ye know (the Father), and have seen him,' said Jesus (Jn 14⁷); and St. John, using the vb. 'believe' more than any one, employs the noun 'faith' but once in Gospel and Epp. (1 Jn 5⁴)—'knowing God, the Father,' etc., is, for him, the Christian distinction. Their Lord's departure, and the shock and trial of His death, were needful to perfect His disciples' faith (Jn 16⁷), removing its earthly supports and breaking its links with all materialistic Messianism. As Jesus 'goes to the Father,' they realize that He and the Father 'are one'; their faith rests no longer, in any degree, on 'a Christ after the flesh'; they are ready to receive, and to work in, the power of the Spirit whom He sends to them 'from the Father.' Jesus is henceforth identified with the spiritual and eternal order; to the faith which thus acknowledges Him He gives the benediction, 'Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed' (Jn 20⁹; cf. 1 P 1¹⁸). To define this specific faith a new grammatical construction appears in NT Greek: one does not simply believe Jesus, or believe on Him, one believes into or unto Him, or His name (which contains the import of His person and offices)—so in Mt 18⁸, and continually in Jn. (21¹, 23 31⁸, 36 43⁹ 62⁹, 26 73¹, 93¹, 115¹, 123¹, 141¹, 12 17²⁰ etc.; also in Paul)—which signifies so believing in Him as to 'come to Him' realizing what He is. By a variety of prepositional constructions, the Greek tongue, imperfectly followed in such refinements by our own, strives to represent the variety of attitude and bearing in which faith stands towards its Object. That the mission of Jesus Christ was an appeal for faith, with His own Person as its chief ground and matter, is strikingly stated in Jn 20³¹: 'These things are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life in his name.' Christian faith is the decisive action of the whole inner man—understanding, feeling, will; it is the trustful and self-sur-rendering acknowledgment of God in Christ.

(3) Further, Jesus called on the world to 'believe the good news' of His coming for redemption. This task, marked out by OT prophecy, and laid on Him at His birth (Lk 1⁶⁸⁻⁷⁹ 23⁸) and baptism (Jn 1²⁹), from an early period of His ministry Jesus connected with His death (see Jn 21¹⁹⁻²³ 34¹); and later, Mt 16¹⁶⁻²⁸ 20²⁸, Lk 9³¹ 12⁵⁰, Jn 12²³⁻²⁸). The words of Mt 26²⁸, which must be vindicated as original, make it clear that Jesus regarded His death as the culmination of His mission; at the Last Supper He is ready to offer His 'blood' to seal 'the new covenant' under which 'forgiveness of sins' will be universally guaranteed (cf. Jer 31³¹). Having concentrated on Himself the faith of men, giving to faith thereby a new heart and energy, He finally fastens that faith upon His death; He marks this event for the future as the object of the specifically saving faith. By this path, the risen Lord explained, He had 'entered into his glory' and 'received from the Father the promise of the Spirit,' in the strength of which His servants are commissioned to 'preach to all the nations repentance and remission of sins' (Lk 24⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸; cf. Ac 2³⁸⁻³⁹). Taught by Him, the Apostles understood and proclaimed their Master's death as the hinge of the relations between God and man that centre in Christ; believing in Him meant, above all, believing in that, and finding in the cross the means of deliverance from sin and the revelation of God's saving purpose toward the race (Ac 3¹⁴, 20²⁸, 1 Co 1¹⁸⁻²³, 2 Co 5¹⁴⁻²¹, 1 P 3¹⁸, Rev 1⁴⁻⁸, etc.). Faith in the resurrection of Jesus was logically antecedent to faith in His sacrificial death; for His rising from the dead set His dying in its true light (Ac 4¹⁰⁻¹²), revealing the shameful crucifixion of Israel's Messiah as a glorious expiation for the guilt of mankind (He 2⁹, Ro 4²⁵, 1 P 1²¹). To 'confess with one's mouth Jesus as Lord, and believe in one's heart that God raised him from the dead,' was therefore to fulfil the essential conditions of the Christian salvation (Ro 10⁹), since the Lord's resurrection, including His ascension which completes it, gives assurance of the peace with God won by His accepted sacrifice (He 7²⁶ 9¹¹⁻¹⁴ 10¹⁹ 22); it vindicates His Divine Sonship and verifies His claims on human homage (Ro 14, Ac 2³, 1 P 1²¹); it guarantees 'the redemption of the body,' and the attainment, both for the individual and for the Church, of the glory of the Messianic Kingdom, the consummated salvation that is in Christ Jesus (1 Co 15¹²⁻²⁸, Ro 8¹⁷⁻²⁸, Eph 1⁷ 2⁸, Ac 17³¹, Rev 1⁸ 11¹, etc.). In two words, the Christian faith is to 'believe that Jesus died and rose again' (1 Th 4¹⁰)—that in dying He atoned for human sin, and in rising He abolished death. St. Paul was the chief exponent and defender of this 'word of the cross,' which is at the same time 'the word of faith' (Ro 10⁸); its various aspects and issues appear under the terms JUSTIFICATION, ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION, GRACE, LAW (in NT), etc. But St. Peter in his 1st Ep., St. John in his 1st Ep. and Rev., and the writer of Hebrews, each in his own fashion, combine with St. Paul to focus the redeeming work of Jesus in the cross. According to the whole tenor of the NT, the forgiving grace of God there meets mankind in its sin; and faith is the hand reached out to accept God's gifts of mercy proffered from the cross of Christ. The faculty of faith, which we understood in its fundamental meaning as the spiritual sense, the consciousness of God, is in no wise narrowed or diverted when it fixes itself on 'Jesus Christ, and him crucified'; for, as St. Paul insists, 'God commendeth his own love to us in that Christ died for us,' 'God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.' 'The glory of God' shines into men's hearts, His true character becomes for the first time apparent, and calls forth a full and satisfied faith, when beheld 'in the face of Christ' (Ro 5⁸, 2 Co 4⁶ 5¹⁸⁻²¹).

FAITHLESS.—Wherever this word occurs in AV, it means, not untrustworthy, but unbelieving, just as in the Merchant of Venice Shylock is called 'a faithless Jew,' simply because he was an unbeliever in Christ.

FALL.—The story of the Fall in Gn 3 is the immediate sequel to the account of man's creation with which the Jahwistic document opens (see CREATION). It tells how the first man and woman, living in childlike innocence and happiness in the Garden of Eden, were tempted by the subtle serpent to doubt the goodness of their Creator and aim at the possession of forbidden knowledge by tasting the fruit of the one tree of which they had been expressly charged not to eat. Their transgression was speedily followed by detection and punishment: on the serpent was laid the curse of perpetual enmity between it and mankind; the woman was doomed to the pains of child-bearing; and the man to unremitting toil in the cultivation of the ground, which was cursed on account of his sin. Finally, lest the man should use his newly-acquired insight to secure the boon of immortality by partaking of the tree of life, he was expelled from the garden, which appears to be conceived as still existing, though barred to human approach by the cherubim and the flaming sword.

It is right to point out that certain incongruities of representation suggest that two slightly varying narratives have been combined in the source from which the passage is taken (J). The chief difficulty arises in connexion with the two trees on which the destiny of mankind is made to turn. In 2^d the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil grow together in the midst of the garden; in 2^d the second alone is made the test of man's obedience. But ch.3 (down to v.²²) knows of only one central tree, and that obviously (though it is never so named) the tree of knowledge. The tree of life plays no real part in the story except in 3rd 24; and its introduction there creates embarrassment; for if this tree also was forbidden, the writer's silence regarding the prohibition is inexplicable, and if it was not forbidden, can we suppose that the Divine prerogative of immortality was placed within man's reach during the period of his probation? The hypothesis of a twofold recension of the Paradise story, while relieving this difficulty, would be of interest as showing that the narrative had undergone a development in Hebrew literature; but it does not materially aid the exegesis of the passage. The main narrative, which is complete, is that which speaks of the tree of knowledge; the other, if it be present at all, is too fragmentary to throw light on the fundamental ideas embodied in the story.

That this profoundly suggestive narrative is a literal record of a historic occurrence is an opinion now generally abandoned even by conservative theologians; and the view which tends to prevail amongst modern expositors is that the imagery is derived from the store of mythological traditions common to the Semitic peoples. It is true that no complete Babylonian parallel has yet been discovered; the utmost that can be claimed is that particular elements or motives of the Biblical story seem to be reflected in some of the Babylonian legends, and still more in the religious symbolism displayed on the monuments (tree of life, serpent, cherubim, etc.). These coincidences are sufficiently striking to suggest the inference that a mythical account of man's original condition and his fall existed in Babylonia, and had obtained wide currency in the East. It is a reasonable conjecture that such a legend, 'stripped of its primitive polytheism, and retaining only faint traces of what was probably its original mythological character, formed the material setting which was adapted by the [Biblical] narrator for the purpose of exhibiting, under a striking and vivid imaginative form, the deep spiritual truths which he was inspired to discern' (Driver). These spiritual truths, in which the real significance of the narrative lies, we must endeavour very briefly to indicate.

(1) The story offers, on the face of it, an explanation of the outstanding ills that flesh is heir to: the hard, toilsome lot of the husbandman, the travail of the woman and her subjection to man, the universal fate of death. These evils, it is taught, are inconsistent with the ideal of human life, and contrary to the intention of a good God. Man, as originally created, was exempt from them; and to the question, Whence came they? the answer is that they are the effect of a Divine curse to which the race is subject; though it is to be noted that no curse is pronounced on the first pair, but only on the serpent as the organ of temptation, and the ground which is cursed for man's sake.

(2) The consequences of the curse are the penalty of a single sin, by which man incurred the just anger of God. The author's conception of sin may be considered from two points of view. Formally, it is the transgression of a Divine commandment, involving distrust of the wisdom and goodness of the Almighty, and breaking the harmony which had subsisted between man and his Maker. The process by which these evil thoughts are insinuated into the mind of the woman is described with a masterly insight into the psychology of temptation which is unsurpassed in literature. But it is a mistake to suppose that the essence of the sin consists in the merely formal disobedience to a command arbitrarily imposed as a test of fidelity. There was a reason for the Divine injunction, and a reason for man's transgression of it; and the reasons are unambiguously indicated. To eat of the tree would make man like God, knowing good and evil; and God does not wish man to be like Himself. The essence of the sin is therefore presumption,—an overstepping of the limits of creaturehood, and an encroachment on the prerogatives of Deity.

(3) What, then, is meant by the 'knowledge of good and evil,' which was acquired by eating of the tree? Does it mean simply an enlargement of experience such as the transition from childhood to maturity naturally brings with it, and of which the feeling of shame (3^d) is the significant index? Or is it, as has generally been held, the experimental knowledge of moral distinctions, the awaking of the conscience, the faculty of discerning between right and wrong? It is very difficult to say which of these interpretations expresses the thought in the mind of the writer. It is in accordance with Hebrew idiom to hold that knowledge of good and evil is equivalent to knowledge in general; though it is of course not certain that that is the sense in which the phrase is here used. On the other hand, there is nothing to show that it refers to the moral sense; and the fact that neither of the ways in which the newly acquired faculty manifests itself (the perception of sex, and insight into the mystic virtue of the tree of life, v.²²) is a distinctively ethical cognition, rather favours the opinion that the knowledge referred to is the power to discern the secret meanings of things and utilize them for human ends, regardless of the will and purpose of God—the knowledge, in short, which is the principle of a godless civilization. The idea may be that succinctly expressed by the writer of Ecclesiastes: 'God made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions' (Ec 7th).

(4) One specific feature of the story remains to be considered, namely, the rôle assigned to the serpent, and his character. The identification of the serpent with the devil appears first in the Apocryphal literature (Wis 24th): in the narrative itself he is simply the most subtle of the creatures that God has made (3^d), and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that he is there regarded as the mouthpiece of the evil spirit. At the same time it is impossible to escape the impression that the serpent is conceived as a malevolent being, designedly insinuating suspicion of God into the minds of our first parents, and inciting them to an act which will frustrate the Divine purpose regarding mankind. There is thus a certain ambiguity in the representation of the serpent, which may have its source in some more primitive phase of the legend; but which also points the way, under the influence of a deeper apprehension of the nature of moral evil than had been attained in the time of the writer, to that identification of the serpent with the Evil One which we find in the NT (Ro 16th, Rev 12th 20th). In the same way, and with the same justification, the reflexion of later ages read into the curse on the serpent (v.¹⁶) the promise of ultimate redemption from the power of evil through the coming of Christ. Strictly interpreted, the words imply nothing more than a perpetual antagonism between the human race and the repulsive reptiles which excite its instinctive antipathy. It is only the general scope of the passage that can be thought to warrant the inference that the victory is to be on the side of humanity; and it is a still higher flight of religious inspiration to conceive of that victory as culminating in the triumph of Him whose mission it was to destroy the works of the devil. J. SKINNER.

FALLOW-DEER.—This word occurs in the AV among the clean animals (Dt 14th), and in the list of game furnished for Solomon's daily table (1 K 4th). In each list 'ayyal, zēbī, and yachmār occur in the same order. The first is correctly translated, in both AV and

FAMILIAR

RV, 'hart' (see HART). The second is incorrectly tr. in AV 'roebuck,' and correctly in RV 'gazelle' (see GAZELLE). The third is incorrectly tr. in AV 'fallow-deer,' and correctly in RV 'roebuck' (see ROE, ROEBUCK).

FAMILIAR.—The expression 'familiar spirit' was taken into the AV from the Geneva Version, as the trans. of Heb. 'obh. See MAGIC, etc. The word is also used as a subst. in Jer 20¹⁰ 'All my familiars watched for my halting' (RV 'familiar friends,' Heb. 'men of my place').

FAMILY.—1. Character of the family in OT.—'Family' in the OT has a wider significance than that which we usually associate with the term. The word tr. 'house' (Gn 7¹) approaches most nearly to our word 'family': but a man's 'house' might consist of his mother; his wives and the wives' children; his concubines and their children; sons-in-law and daughters-in-law, with their offspring; illegitimate sons (Jg 11¹); dependents and aliens; and slaves of both sexes. Polygamy was in part the cause of the large size of the Hebrew household; in part the cause of it may be found in the insecurity of early times, when safety lay in numbers, and consequently not only the married sons and daughters dwelt, for the sake of protection, with their father, but remote relatives and even foreigners ('the stranger within thy gates') would attach themselves, with a similar object, to a great household. The idea of the family sometimes had an even wider significance, extending to and including the nation, or even the whole race of mankind. Of this a familiar illustration is the figure of Abraham, who was regarded as being in a very real sense the father of the nation. So also the same feeling for the idea of the family is to be found in the careful assigning of a 'father' to every known nation and tribe (Gn 10). From this it is easily perceived that the family played an important part in Hebrew thought and affairs. It formed the base upon which the social structure was built up; its indistinguishable merging into the wider sense of clan or tribe indicates how it affected the political life of the whole nation.

Polygyny and bigamy were recognized features of the family life. From the Oriental point of view there was nothing immoral in the practice of polygamy. The female slaves were in every respect the property of their master, and became his concubines; except in certain cases, when they seem to have belonged exclusively to their mistress, and could not be appropriated by the man except by her suggestion or consent (Gn 16²⁻³). The slave-concubines were obtained as booty in time of war (Jg 5²⁰), or bought from poverty-stricken parents (Ex 21⁷); or, possibly, in the ordinary slave traffic with foreign nations. In addition to his concubines a man might take several wives, and from familiar examples in the OT it seems that it was usual for wealthy and important personages to do so; Abraham, Jacob, David, Solomon, occur as instances. Elkanah, the husband of Hannah and Peninnah, is an interesting example of a man of no particular position who nevertheless had more than one wife; this may be an indication that bigamy, at least, if not polygamy, was not confined to the very wealthy and exalted. At all events, polygyny was an established and recognized institution from the earliest times. The gradual evolution in the OT of monogamy as the ideal is therefore of the highest interest. The earliest codes attempt in various ways to regulate the custom of polygyny. The Deut. code in particular actually forbids kings to multiply wives (Dt 17¹⁷); this is the fruit, apparently, of the experience of Solomon's reign. In the prophetic writings the note of protest is more clearly sounded. Not only Adam but also Noah, the second founder of the human race, represents monogamy, and on that account recommends it as God's ordinance. It is in the line of Cain that bigamy is first represented, as though to emphasize the consequences of the Fall. Reasons are given in explanation of the bigamy of Abraham (Gn 16) and of Jacob (29²³). Hosea and other prophets constantly dwell upon the thought of a monogamous marriage as being a symbol of the union between God and His people; and denounce idolatry as unfaithfulness to this spiritual marriage-tie.

2. Position of the wife.—Side by side with the growth of the recognition of monogamy as the ideal form of marriage, polygamy was practised even as late as NT times. The natural accompaniment of such a practice was the insignificance of the wife's position: she was ordinarily regarded as a piece of property, as the wording of the Tenth Commandment testifies. Also her rights and privileges were necessarily shared by others. The relative positions of wives and concubines were determined mainly by the husband's favour. The children of the wife claimed the greater part, or the whole, of the inheritance; otherwise there does not seem to have been any inferiority in the position of the concubine as compared with that of the wife, nor was any idea of illegitimacy, in our sense of the word, connected with her children.

The husband had supreme authority over the wife. He was permitted by the Deut. code to divorce her with apparently little reason. The various passages (Dt 22^{13, 19, 28, 29}, Is 50¹, Jer 3¹, Mal 2¹⁰) referring to and regulating divorce, indicate that it was of frequent occurrence. Yet wives, and even concubines who had been bought in the first place as slaves, might not be sold (Ex 21⁷⁻¹¹, Dt 21¹⁴). Indeed, the Law throughout proves itself sympathetic towards the position of the wife and desirous of improving her condition (Ex 21^{12, 13}, Dt 21¹⁰⁻¹⁷). This very attitude of the Law, however, indicates that there was need of improvement. The wife seems to have had no redress if wronged by the husband; she could not divorce him; and absolute faithfulness, though required of the wife, was not expected of the husband, so long as he did not injure the rights of any other man.

The wife, then, was in theory the mere chattel of her husband. A woman of character, however, could improve her situation and attain to a considerable degree of importance and influence as well as of personal freedom. Thus we read not only of Hagar, who were dealt hardly with and were obliged to submit themselves under the hands of their masters and rivals, but also of Sarah and Rebekahs and Abigail, who could act independently and even against the wishes of their husbands in order to gain their own ends. And the Book of Proverbs testifies to the advantage accruing to a man in the possession of a good wife (19¹⁴ 31^{10a}), and to the misery which it is in the power of a selfish woman to inflict (19¹² etc.).

3. Children.—In a household consisting of several families, the mother of each set of children would naturally have more to do with them than the father, and the maternal relationship would usually be more close and affectionate than the bond between the father and his children. Although it was recognized to be disastrous for a household to be divided against itself, yet friction between the various families could hardly have been avoided. 'One whom his mother comforteth' (Is 66¹³) must have been a sight common enough—a mother consoling her injured son for the taunts and blows of her rivals' children. Thus the mother would have the early care and education of her children under her own control. The father, on the other hand, had complete power over the lives and fortunes of his children, and would represent to them the idea of authority rather than of tenderness. He it was who arranged the marriage of his sons (Gn 24¹ 28¹, Jg 14²), and had the right to sell his daughters (Ex 21⁷). The father seems even to have had powers of life and death over his children (Jg 11³⁹); and the Law provided that an unworthy son might be stoned to death upon the accusation of his parents (Dt 21¹⁸⁻²¹). See also art. CHILD.

4. Family duties.—The claims of the family upon the various members of it were strongly felt. Many laws provide for the vengeance and protection of the injured and defenceless by their next-of-kin. Brothers were the guardians of their sisters (Gn 34). A childless widow could demand, though not enforce, re-marriage with her brother-in-law (Dt 25⁵⁻¹⁰). Boaz, as the nearest relation, performed this duty towards Ruth. In spite of the prohibition of the later code (Lv 20¹⁰), levirate marriage seems to have been practised at the time of Christ (Mt 22²⁶). Its purpose was perhaps rather for the preservation of the particular branch of the family than for the advantage of the widow herself: in any case it illustrates the strong sense of duty towards the family as a whole.

Children owed obedience and respect to their parents. Even a married man would consider himself still under the authority of his father, whether living with him or not; and his wife would be subject to her father-in-law even after her husband's death.

To an Israelite, 'family' conveyed the notions of unity, security, order, and discipline. These conceptions were nourished by the religious customs and observances in the home, the most conspicuous instance of which was the keeping of the Passover. Such observances no doubt helped to bind the members of the family in close religious and spiritual sympathies. The common longing to love and to serve God was the base of the family affection and unity—from patriarchal times when the head of each family would offer sacrifice upon his own altar, until the hour in which Mary's Son asked in tender surprise of her and Joseph: 'Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' (Lk 2⁴⁹).

FAMINE.—In Palestine, famine is usually due to failure of the rainfall (Lv 26¹⁹, Am 4⁶⁻⁷). Both crops and pasturage depend on the proper amount falling at the right time, the 'early rain' in Oct.-Nov., the 'latter' in March-April. Its importance and uncertainty caused it to be regarded as the special gift of God (Dt 11¹¹⁻¹⁴). Accordingly famine is almost always a direct judgment from Him (1 K 17¹, Ezk 5, and continually in the Prophets; Ja 5¹⁷). Hence we find it amongst the terrors of the eschatological passages of NT (Mk 13⁸, Rev 18⁸). The idea is spiritualized in Am 8¹¹ 'a famine of hearing the words of the Lord.' In Egypt, famine is due to the failure of the annual inundation of the Nile, which is ultimately traceable to lack of rain in the Abyssinian highlands of the interior.

Crops may be destroyed by other causes—hail and thunder-storms (Ex 9²¹, 1 S 12¹⁷); locusts and similar pests (Ex 10¹⁵, Jl 1⁴, Am 4⁹). Further, famine is the usual accompaniment of war, the most horrible accounts of famines being connected with sieges (2 K 6²⁵, 25², Jer 21¹, La 4¹⁰).

These passages should be compared with the terrible description of Dt 28⁴⁹⁻⁵⁷, and with Josephus' account of the last siege of Jerusalem (BJ v. x. 3). So in Rev 6⁵ scarcity, connected with the black horse, follows on bloodshed and conquest; but a maximum price is fixed for wheat and barley, and oil and wine are untouched, so that the full horrors of famine are delayed. A natural result of famine is pestilence, due to improper and insufficient food, lack of water, and insanitary conditions. The two are frequently connected, especially in Ezk. and Jer. (1 K 8³⁷, Jer 21¹, Lk 21¹¹ [not Mt 24⁷]).

Famines are recorded in connexion with Abraham (Gn 12¹⁰) and Isaac (26¹). There is the famous seven years' famine of Gn 41 ff., which included Syria as well as Egypt. It apparently affected cereals rather than pasturage, beasts of transport being unharmed (cf. per contra 1 K 18⁹). The device by which Joseph warded off its worst effects is illustrated by Egyptian inscriptions. In one, Baba, who lived about the time of Joseph, says:

'I collected corn, as a friend of the harvest-god, and was watchful at the time of sowing. And when a famine arose, lasting many years, I distributed corn to the city each year of famine' (see Driver, Genesis, p. 346). Other famines, besides those already referred to, are mentioned in Ru 1¹, 2 S 21¹. The famine of Ac 11²⁸ is usually identified with one mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xx. ii. 5, v. 2), which is dated A.D. 45. But famines were characteristic of the reign of Claudius (Suetonius mentions 'assiduæ sterilitates'), so that the exact reference remains uncertain. C. W. EMMET.

FAN.—The fan of Scripture (Is 30²⁴, Mt 3¹², Lk 3¹⁷) is the five- or six-pronged wooden winnowing-fork, for which see AGRICULTURE, § 3. The corresponding verb is rendered 'winnow,' Is 30²⁴, Ru 3², but 'fan' elsewhere (Amer. RV has 'winnow' throughout); the fanners of Jer 51² (AV, RVm and Versions) are the 'winnowers,' as Amer. RVm. Fanning or winnowing is a frequent figure for the Divine sifting and chastisement, Jer 4¹¹ 15⁷ etc. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FARTHING.—See MONEY, § 7.

FASTING.—I. In the OT.—'To afflict the soul' is the term by which fasting is usually mentioned (cf. Lv 16²⁹⁻³¹ 23²⁷⁻²⁸, Nu 29⁷ 30¹³; the two terms are combined in Ps 35¹³, Is 58³⁻⁵). In the period preceding the Captivity we find no universal fast prescribed. The institution of the Day of Atonement—the only fast ordained in the Law—was traditionally ascribed to this period; but there is no certain reference to it before Sir 50²⁶. Zechariah does not allude to it, and Ezk 40-48 prescribes a more simple ceremonial for such an occasion, whence it may be inferred that the elaborate ritual of Lv 16 was not yet customary. Neh 7⁷²⁻⁹³ records a general fast on the 24th day of the 7th month, and therefore the 10th day of that month—the proper date for the Day of Atonement—was probably not yet set apart for this purpose. Moreover, the characteristic ideas of the fast—its public confession, its emphasis on sin and atonement—are late, and can be compared with post-exilic analogies (Ezr 9, Neh 1⁴⁻¹¹ 9²). See ATONEMENT [DAY OF]. Previously to the Captivity fasting was observed by individuals or the whole people on special occasions (cf. 2 S 12¹⁶, 1 K 21²⁷, Jg 20²⁶, 1 S 7⁴, 2 Ch 20³).

After the Captivity this type of fasts of course continued (cf. Ezr 8²¹⁻²³, Neh 1⁴ 9¹). But in Zec 7³⁻⁴ 8¹⁹ we hear of four general fasts which were observed with comparative regularity. On 17th Tammuz (July) a fast was ordained to commemorate the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 39² 52⁴). This was celebrated on the 17th day of the 4th month, and not on the 9th, because, according to the Talmudic tradition, the 17th was the day on which Moses broke the tables of the Law, on which the daily offering ceased owing to the famine caused by the Chaldean siege, and on which Antiochus Epiphanes burnt the Law and introduced, an idol into the Holy Place. On the 9th day of the 5th month (Ab) was celebrated a fast in memory of the burning of the Temple and city (2 K 25⁸, Jer 52¹). The 9th, and not the 7th or 10th, was the prescribed day, because tradition placed on the 9th the announcement that the Israelites were not to enter Canaan, and the destruction of the Second Temple. On the 3rd of Tishri (October) the murder of Gedaliah was commemorated by a fast (Jer 41¹), and on the 10th of Tebeth (January) another fast recalled the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (2 K 25¹, Jer 52⁴). Besides these, we hear of a Fast of Esther being observed; on this see PURIM.

Fasting probably meant complete abstinence, though the Talmud allowed lentils to be eaten during the period of mourning. No work was done during a fast (Lv 16²⁹⁻³¹ 23²⁷, Nu 29⁷), and sackcloth and ashes were sometimes used (Dn 9³, Jon 3⁶ 7). The usual reasons for a fast were either mourning (1 S 31¹³) or a wish to deprecate the Divine wrath (2 S 12¹⁶ 17).

2. In the NT.—We hear that frequent additional fasts were imposed by tradition, and that strict observers kept two weekly fasts (Lk 18¹²)—on Thursday and Monday—commemorating, as it seems, the days on which Moses ascended and came down from the Mount. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, a huge system of fasts was instituted, and the present Jewish calendar prescribes 22, besides the Day of Atonement, the Fast of Esther, and the four fasts of Zec 8¹⁹.

3. Christianity and fasting.—Jesus refused to lay down any specific injunctions to fast. To prescribe forms was not His purpose—all outward observance was to be dictated by an inward principle. He Himself probably kept the usual fasts, and individual ones, as during the Temptation. But He laid emphasis in His teaching on the inutility of fasting except as a part of personal godliness, and gave plain warnings of its possible abuse by hypocrisy (Mt 6¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 9¹⁴, 17, Mk 2¹⁸, 22, Lk 5³³, 39). The early Church used to fast before solemn appointments (Ac 13², 14²³), and St. Paul alludes to his fastings, whether voluntary or compulsory, in 2 Co 6⁵, 11²⁷. In time a greater stress was put on the value of fasting, as is shown by the probable insertion of an allusion to it in Mt 17²¹, Mk 9²⁹, Ac 10³⁰, 1 Co 7⁵.

FAT.—See FOOD, § 10, SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

FAT.—The same word as vat, a large vessel for holding liquids, but in OT and NT only in connexion with the making of wine. See WINE AND STRONG DRINK, § 2.

FATHER.—See FAMILY, GENEALOGY, 1.

FATHERHOOD OF GOD.—See GOD, § 7.

FATHOM.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FAUCHION (Jth 13⁶ AV, RV 'scimitar').—The Eng. word denoted originally a broad sword more or less curved on the convex side; but in later use and in poetry it signified a sword of any kind.

FAVOUR.—The Eng. word 'favour' is used in AV in the mod. sense of 'goodwill' but in 'well-favoured' and 'ill-favoured' we see the older meaning of personal appearance. In Jos 11²⁶ the word seems to be used in the old sense of 'mercy'—'that he might destroy them, and they might have no favour'—as in Elyot, The Governour, ii. 298: 'And they, which by that lawe were condemned, were put to deathe without any favour.' For the theology of the word see GRACE.

FAWN.—See ROE, § 3.

FEAR.—In the OT 'the fear of the Lord' is frequently a definition of piety. The purpose of the giving of the Law is the implanting of this fear in the hearts of men (Dt 4¹⁰); it is the sum of religious duty (10²) and prompts to obedient and loving service (10¹²). 'Fear cannot be appraised without reference to the worth of the objects feared' (Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory, ii. 184), hence it is on the revelation of the Divine nature as holy and to be feared' (Ps 111⁹) that this fundamental principle of religion rests: those who know His name have learnt that to fear Him is true wisdom (v 10) and true blessedness (Ps 112¹). In the NT mention is made of a fear which has high moral quality and religious value. 'The fear of the Lord' was the rule by which the early Christians walked (Ac 9³¹), and when an uncircumcised foreigner became a devout worshipper of the God of Israel he was known as 'one that feareth God' (10²; cf. 2 Co 7¹, Ph 2¹², 1 P 1⁷, 2⁷, Rev 14⁷, 15², 19⁵). Although the usual Gr. word for 'fear' is not used in He 5⁷, the reference to the 'godly fear' of the perfect Son emphasizes the contrast between reverent awe and slavish terror.

The fear which 'hath punishment' (1 Jn 4¹⁸) is the result of sin (Gn 3¹⁰). The sinner, under condemnation of the Law, is in 'bondage unto fear' (Ro 8¹⁵), and inasmuch as 'the sting of death is sin' (1 Co 15⁵⁶), he is also 'through fear of death . . . subject to bondage'.

(He 2¹⁵). Transgression may so completely deceive him that he has 'no terror of God' (Ps 36¹); the climax of human wickedness is the loss of any dread of God's judgments, though the Gr. and Eng. translations of the Heb. word for 'terror' (pachadh, cf. Is 2¹⁰, 12, 2 RV) fail to bring out this thought in St. Paul's quotation of this verse (Ro 3¹⁸). To rouse men from this callous indifference to God's threatenings is the purpose of the appeal to fear, which is a primary and self-regarding emotion and a powerful spring of human action. This appeal is warranted by our Lord's words (Mt 10²⁸) as well as by Apostolic example (He 4¹, 10³¹, 1 Ti 5²⁰, Jude 23). The spirit in which this appeal should be made is that which inspired St. Paul, when he declares that, 'knowing the fear of the Lord,' before whose judgment-seat all must be made manifest, he is constrained by the love of Christ to persuade men to be 'reconciled to God' (2 Co 5¹⁴). J. G. TARKER.

FEARFULNESS.—The adj. 'fearful' is often used in AV in the sense, not of causing fear, but of feeling it: and 'fearfulness' always denotes the emotion of fear. Thus Mt 8²⁷ 'Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?'; Ps 55⁵ 'Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me.' In the RV of the NT the only meaning of 'fearful' is full of fear, the Revisers, Westcott tells us, having purposely retained this use in order that 'fear,' 'fearful,' and 'fearfulness' might all agree in meaning. They have accordingly changed 'fearful sights' in Lk 21¹¹ into 'terrors.' The Revisers of the OT, however, had no such thought, and they have left the word unchanged.

FEASTS.—Introductory.—The sacred festivals of the Jews were primarily occasions of rejoicing, treated as a part of religion. To 'rejoice before God' was synonymous with 'to celebrate a festival.' In process of time this characteristic was modified, and a probably late institution, like the Day of Atonement, could be regarded as a feast, though its prevalent note was not one of joy. But the most primitive feasts were marked by religious merriment; they were accompanied with dances (Jg 21²¹), and, as it seems, led to serious excesses in many cases (1 S 1³, Am 2⁷, 2 K 23⁷, Dt 23¹⁸). Most of the feasts were only local assemblies for acts and purposes of sacred worship; but the three great national festivals were the occasions for general assemblies of the people, at which all males were supposed to appear (Ex 23¹⁷, 34²³, Dt 16¹⁶).

1. FEASTS CONNECTED WITH THE SABBATH.—These were calculated on the basis of the sacred number 7, which regulated all the great dates of the Jewish sacred year. Thus the 7th was the sacred month, the feasts of Unleavened Bread and Tabernacles each lasted for 7 days, Pentecost was 49 days after the Feast of Unleavened Bread, Passover and Tabernacles each began on the 14th day of their respective months, and there were 7 days of holy convocation in the year.

1. The Sabbath and the observances akin to it were lunar in character (cf. Am 8², Hos 2¹¹, Is 1³, 2 K 4²³). The Sabbath ordinances are treated in Ex 20¹¹, 31¹⁷ as designed to commemorate the completion of creation, but Dt 5¹⁴, 15 connects them with the redemption from Egypt, and Ex 23¹² ascribes them to humanitarian motives. On this day work of all sorts was forbidden, and the daily morning and evening sacrifices were doubled. Sabbath-breaking was punishable with death (Nu 15³²⁻³⁶, Ex 31¹⁴, 15). No evidence of Sabbath observance is traced in the accounts of the patriarchal age, and very little in pre-exilic records (Is 56², 58¹³, Jer 17²⁰⁻²⁴, Ezk 20¹², 13, 16, 20). But after the Captivity the rules were more strictly enforced (Neh 13¹⁵⁻²²), and in later times the Rabbinical prohibitions multiplied to an inordinate extent. See art. SABBATH.

2. At the New Moon special sacrifices were offered (Nu 28¹¹⁻¹⁵), and the silver trumpets were blown over them (Nu 10¹⁰). All trade and business were discontinued, as well as work in the fields (Am 8⁸). It appears also that this was the occasion of a common sacred meal and family sacrifices (cf. 1 S 20⁶. 18. 24), and it seems to have been a regular day on which to consult prophets (2 K 4²³).

3. The Feast of Trumpets took place at the New Moon of the 7th month, Tishri (October). See TRUMPETS.

4. The Sabbatical year.—An extension of the Sabbath principle led to the rule that in every 7th year the land was to be allowed to lie fallow, and fields were to be neither tilled nor reaped. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

5. By a further extension, every 50th year was to be treated as a year of Jubilee, when Hebrew slaves were emancipated and mortgaged property reverted to its owners. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

11. GREAT NATIONAL FESTIVALS.—These were solar festivals, and mostly connected with different stages of the harvest; the Jews also ascribed to them a commemorative significance, and traditionally referred their inauguration to various events of their past history. They were:—

1. The Passover, followed immediately by the Feast of Unleavened Bread. These two feasts were probably distinct in origin (Lv 23⁶. Nu 28¹⁶. 17), and Josephus distinguishes between them; but in later times they were popularly regarded as one (Mk 14². Lk 22¹). The Passover festival is probably of great antiquity, but the Feast of Unleavened Bread, being agricultural in character, can scarcely have existed before the Israelites entered Canaan. For the characteristic features of the two festivals, see PASSOVER.

2. Pentecost, on the 50th day after 16th Nisan (April), celebrated the completion of the corn harvest. See PENTECOST.

3. The Feast of Tabernacles, the Jewish harvest-home, took place at the period when the harvests of fruit, oil, and wine had been gathered in. See TABERNACLES.

III. MINOR HISTORICAL FESTIVALS.—1. The Feast of Purim, dating from the Persian period of Jewish history, commemorated the nation's deliverance from the intrigues of Haman. See PURIM.

2. The Feast of the Dedication recalled the purification of the Temple after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes. See DEDICATION.

3. The Feast of the Wood-offering or of the Wood-carriers, on the 15th day of Abib (April), marked the last of the nine occasions on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the Temple (Neh 10³⁴ 13³¹).

Besides these there were certain petty feasts, alluded to in Josephus and the Apocrypha, but they seem never to have been generally observed or to have attained any religious importance. Such are: the Feast of the Reading of the Law (1 Es 9⁵⁰, cf. Neh 8⁹); the Feast of Nicanor on the 13th day of Adar (March) (1 Mac 7⁴⁹; see PURIM); the Feast of the Captured Fortress (1 Mac 13⁵⁰⁻⁵²); the Feast of Baskets. A. W. F. BLUNT.

FELIX, ANTONIUS.—Procurator of Judæa (Ac 23²⁴); according to Josephus, he had been sent to succeed Cumanus in A.D. 52; but this contradicts Tacitus, who makes Cumanus governor of Galilee and Felix of Samaria simultaneously; and this suits Ac 24¹⁰ ('many years'). Both historians give 52 as the year of Cumanus' disgrace, so that we may probably take that as the date of Felix' accession to office in Judæa. Felix was brother of Pallas, Claudius' powerful freedman, whose influence continued him in office under Nero, and on his disgrace (due to a riot at Caesarea) procured him his life. He is described by Tacitus as a very bad and cruel governor. He was somewhat touched by St. Paul's preaching (24²⁴), but kept him in prison, first in hope of a bribe,—one of many details showing that St. Paul was a prisoner of social importance,—and, finally, to please the Jews. He is called 'most excellent' (23²⁶ 24¹; cf. 26²⁵, Lk 1³), a title given him as governor, but more properly confined to those of equestrian rank. He married thrice, each time to a person of royal birth; see DRUSILLA. A. I. MACLEAN.

FELLOW.—This Eng. word is used in AV with the meaning either of (1) companion, or (2) of person. Thus (1) Ps 45⁷ 'God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows'; (2) Mt 26⁷¹ 'This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth' (RV 'man'; there is no word in the Gr.). Cf. Tindale's trans. of Gn 39² 'And the LORDE was with Joseph, and he was a luckie fellowe.' Although the word when used in AV for person may have a touch of disparagement, nowhere is it used to express strong contempt as now.

FELLOWSHIP.—See COMMUNION.

FENCE.—Ps 62³ is the only occurrence of the subst., and probably the word there has its modern meaning (Coverdale 'hedge'). But the participle 'fenced' (used of a city) always means 'fortified' (which Amer. RV always substitutes). See FORTIFICATION.

FERRET (anāqah).—An unclean animal, Lv 11³⁰, RV 'gecko.' Rabbinical writers suggest the hedgehog, but this is unlikely. For gecko see LIZARD.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FESTUS, PORCIUS.—Procurator of Judæa after Felix. His short term of office was marked by a much better administration than that of Felix or of Albinus his successor (Jos. Ant. xx. viii. f.). He is addressed with respect by St. Paul (Ac 26²⁸), whom he would not give up to the Jews untried; it was, however, from fear of being eventually given up that St. Paul made his appeal to Caesar, in consequence of which he was sent to Rome. Festus was a friend of king Agrippa II., whose visit to him is described in Ac 25¹², and took his side in a dispute with the Jewish priests. His accession to office is one of the puzzles of NT chronology; Eusebius gives A.D. 56, but this is probably some three years too early. A. J. MACLEAN.

FIG.—(te'ēnah).—The common fig, fruit of the Ficus carica, is cultivated from one end of Palestine to the other, especially in the mountainous regions occupying to-day a place as important as it did in Bible times. The failure of the fig and grape harvest would even now bring untold distress (Jer 5¹⁷. Hab 3¹⁷ etc.). Although the figs are all of one genus, the fellahtn distinguish many varieties according to the quality and colour of the fruit.

The summer foliage of the fig is thick, and excels other trees for its cool and grateful shade. In the summer the owners of gardens everywhere may be seen sitting in the shadow of their fig trees. It is possible the references in Mic 4⁴. Zec 3¹⁰ may be to this, or to the not uncommon custom of having fig trees overhanging rural dwellings. Although fig trees are of medium height, some individual trees (e.g. near Jenin) reach to over 25 feet high. Self-sown fig trees are usually barren, and are known to the natives as wild or 'male' fig trees. The fruiting of the fig is very interesting and peculiar. Though earlier in the plains, the annual occurrence in the mountain regions, e.g. round Jerusalem is as follows: The trees, which during the winter months have lost all their leaves, about the end of March begin putting forth their tender leaf buds (Mt 24³². Mk 13²⁸⁻²⁹. Lk 21²⁹⁻³⁰), and at the junction of the old wood with these leaves appear at the same time the tiny figs. These little figs develop along with the leaves up to a certain point, to about the size of a small cherry, and then the great majority of them fall to the ground, carried down with every gust of wind. These immature figs are known as the taksh, and are eaten by the fellahtn as they fall; they may indeed sometimes be seen exposed for sale in the market in Jerusalem. They are the paggim ('green figs') of

Ca 2¹³, and the dyntioi ('untimely figs') of Rev 6¹³. In the case of some trees, especially the best varieties, a certain proportion of these little green figs continue to develop, and reach ripeness in June. These are then known as the dafar or early figs, mentioned in Is 28¹, Jer 24², Hos 9¹⁰, Mic 7¹, as bikkurāh, 'the figs first ripe.' They are to-day, as of old, specially esteemed for their delicate flavour. As the dafar are ripening, the little buds of the next crop begin to appear higher up the branches. These steadily develop and form the second and great crop of figs, which comes about August.

In the much-discussed miracle of our Lord (Mt 21¹³⁻²⁰, Mk 11^{12, 13, 20-21}) we may dismiss at once the theory that He came looking for figs from the previous season, as He would certainly not have found any such survivors, and such fruit would not have been eatable. On the other hand, at the Passover season, about April, when the young leaves are on the fig trees, every tree which is going to bear fruit at all will have some taksh on it, and so, though it is a true statement that 'the time of figs,' i.e. of ordinary edible figs, 'was not yet' (Mk 11¹³), yet there would be fruit which could be, and is to-day, eaten, and fruit, too, which would be a guarantee of a harvest to come later on. It was the want of promise of future fruitfulness in the Jewish nation for which they were condemned in the acted parable of the barren fig tree. It may be noted, however, that in May many fig trees may be found round Jerusalem which have dropped all their 'green figs' (none ripening to dafar) and have not yet put forth the buds of the late summer crop.

Figs are eaten in Palestine not only fresh but dried, the fruit being often threaded on to long strings for convenience of carriage. They are also pressed into a solid cake which can be cut in slices with a knife. These are the fig-cakes of 1 S 25^{18, 30²}, 1 Ch 12¹⁰. A lump of such was used as a poultice for Hezekiah's boil, 2 K 20⁷, Is 38²¹. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FILE.—Only 1 S 13³¹, but the passage is very corrupt; see the larger commentaries.

FINE.—The verb 'to fine' (mod. 'refine') is used in Job 28¹ 'Surely there is a vein for silver, and a place for gold where they fine it' (RV 'which they refine'). 'Fining' occurs in Pr 17^{3, 27¹}, and 'finer' in Pr 25⁴ 'a vessel for the finer' (Amer. RV 'refiner'). See REFINER.

FINES.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 8.

FIR (berdsh, RVm cypress [wh. see], 2 S 6⁴, 1 K 5^{8, 10, 6¹³, 34} etc.).—It was a tree of large growth (2 K 19²³, Ezk 31⁸), evergreen (Hos 14⁸); a chief element in the glory of Lebanon (Is 60¹³); associated with cedars (Ps 104^{16, 17}, Is 14⁸, Zec 11²). The timber of the berdsh ranked with the cedar for house- and ship-building (1 K 5^{8, 10} etc.). Cypress is accepted by most modern authorities, but berdsh may have also included several varieties of pine. 'Fir' is also RV tr. of dren in Is 44⁴ (AV and RVm wrongly 'ash'). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FIRE.—See HOUSE, § 7, and next article.

FIREPAN.—1. A pan of bronze (Ex 27³ etc.), silver (Mishna, Yōma, iv. 4), or gold (1 K 7³⁰ etc.), for removing charcoal, and probably ashes also, from the altar of burnt-offering. According to the Mishna (loc. cit.), the firepans or coal-pans were of various sizes, three given, and were each furnished with a long or a short handle. They seem, therefore, to have resembled ladles, or the now obsolete bed-warmers.

When used to hold live charcoal for the burning of incense the coal-pan becomes a censer (Lv 10^{1, 16¹³} etc.). Hence in Nu 4¹⁴, 1 K 7³⁰, 2 Ch 4²², RV has 'firepans' for AV 'censers,' there being no reference in these passages to incense. The same utensil was used for removing the burnt portions of the lamp-wicks of the golden 'candlestick' or lamp-stand, although rendered snuff dishes (which see—Tindale has rightly 'firepans').

2. In Zec 12⁶ RV there is mention of 'a pan (AV hearth) of fire'; in other words, a brasier. See COAL; HOUSE, § 7. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FIRKIN.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FIRMAMENT.—See CREATION.

FIRSTBORN.—1. The dedication of the firstborn of men and beasts was probably a primitive nomadic custom, and therefore earlier than the offering of first-fruits, which could not arise until the Israelites had settled into agricultural life in Canaan. The origin of the belief that a peculiar value attached to the firstborn cannot be definitely traced; but it would be a natural inference that what was valuable to the parent would be valuable to his God. And thus the word 'firstborn' could be used figuratively of Israel as the firstborn of J^h among the nations (Ex 4²², cf. Jer 31⁹), and the seed of David among dynasties (Ps 89²⁸). The law of the dedication of the firstborn is found in JE (Ex 13^{11-16, 22^{29b}, 30, 34^{1st}}), D (Dt 15¹⁹⁻²³), P (Ex 13¹¹, Nu 3^{11-12, 40-51, 18¹⁵⁻¹⁸}). It is not impossible that in very primitive times firstborn sons were sometimes actually sacrificed (cf. 2 K 3²⁷, Mic 6⁷), but the practice would soon grow up of 'redeeming' them by money or payments in kind.

2. The firstborn (bekhōr) enjoyed the birthright (bekhōrāh). He succeeded his father as head of the family, and took the largest share of the property; this was fixed in Dt 21¹⁷ as a 'double portion.' [In 2 Ch 21³ the principle of the birthright is extended to the succession to the throne. But this is a late passage, and it is not certain that the firstborn was necessarily the heir apparent.] If a man died without children, the heir was the firstborn of his widow by his brother or next-of-kin (Dt 25⁵⁻¹⁰). The right of the firstborn, however, was often disturbed, owing to the jealousies and quarrels arising from the polygamy practised in Israel. The law in Dt 21¹⁵⁻¹⁷ is directed against the abuse. Reuben, although the son of Leah, the less favoured of Jacob's two wives, was considered the firstborn, and lost the right only because of his sin (Gn 49²¹, 1 Ch 5¹). But Ishmael was allowed no share at all in the father's property (Gn 21¹⁹); and the superiority of Jacob over Esau (symbolizing the superiority of Israel over Edom) is described as having been foretold before their birth (25²³), and as brought about by Esau's voluntary surrender of the birthright (vv. 29-31). And other instances occur of the younger being preferred to the elder, e.g. Ephraim (48¹³⁻²⁰), Solomon (1 K 1), Shimri (1 Ch 26¹⁰).

3. The death of the firstborn was the last of the punishments sent upon Egypt for Pharaoh's refusal to let the Israelites go. Moses gave him due warning (Ex 11⁴⁻⁸), and on his continued refusal the stroke fell (12²¹⁻³⁰). The event is referred to in Ps 78^{41, 105³⁶, 135⁹, 136¹⁰}, He 11²⁸. It is probable (see PLAGUES OF EGYPT) that the stories of all the other plagues have been founded on historical occurrences, and that the Egyptians suffered from a series of 'natural' catastrophes. If this is true of the first nine, it is reasonable to assume it for the last, and we may suppose that a pestilence raged which created great havoc, but did not spread to the Israelite quarter. The growth of the tradition into its present form must be explained by the 'ætiological' interest of the Hebrew writer—the tendency to create idealized situations in a remote past for the purpose of explaining facts or institutions whose origin was forgotten. Thus the Feast of Booths was accounted for at a late date by the dwelling of the Israelites in booths after the Exodus (Lv 23⁴²), the Feast of Unleavened Cakes by the haste with which they departed from Egypt (Ex 12^{34, 13¹⁰}), the Feast of the Passover by the passing over of the houses marked with blood at the destruction of the firstborn (12^{12, 23, 27}). And similarly the singling out of the firstborn for destruction was itself connected with the ancient practice of offering to God annually in spring the firstlings of beasts. Moses demanded release in order to offer the sacrifice (10^{24f.}), and because Pharaoh refused to allow them to offer their firstlings, Jⁿ took from the Egyptians their firstborn. This explanation, though not explicitly given, is implied in the close connexion of the dedication of the firstborn with the Passover (13¹¹⁻¹³, Dt 15¹⁹ 16¹⁻³). In a redactional passage (Ex 4^{21f.}) a different explanation is offered. The death of the firstborn would be a punishment for refusal to release Israel, who was Jⁿ's firstborn.

4. In the NT the term 'firstborn' (prōtotokeos) is used of Christ (Ro 8²⁹, Col 1¹⁸, He 1⁶, Rev 1⁵), and of Christians who have died (He 12²³); see the commentaries. A. H. M'NEILE.

FIRST-FRUIT.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

FISH would appear to have always been a favourite article of diet among the Hebrews (Nu 11⁵ and references in the Gospels), as it is to-day. Fish are found in enormous numbers in all the inland waters of Palestine, and especially in the Lake of Galilee, Lake Huleh, and the 'meadow lakes' of Damascus. The extraordinary feature of these fish is the number of species peculiar to the Jordan valley. Out of a total of 43 species found in the region, no fewer than 14 are peculiar to this district. Many of these are quite small. The chief edible fish are members of the Chromidae and of the Cyprinidae (carps). The cat-fish, Clarias macracanthus, not being a scaly fish, cannot be eaten by the Jews (Dt 14⁹), though considered a delicacy by the Christians of Damascus. It is thought by some to be the 'bad fish' of Mt 13⁴⁷. 48. In NT times fish-curing was extensively carried on at Tarichea on the Lake of Tiberias. Some of the native fish is still salted to-day. The 'fish-pools' of Ca 7⁴ and the 'pools for fish' in Is 19¹⁰ are both mistranslations. See also FOOD, § 6.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FITCHES.—1. getsach (Is 28²⁵, 27), RVm 'black cummin', the seeds of the aromatic herb Nigella sativa, commonly used to-day in Palestine as a condiment, especially on the top of loaves of bread. The contrast between the staff for the 'fitches' and the rod for the cummin is the more instructive when the great similarity of the two seeds is noticed. 2. kusemeth, Ezk 4⁹, in AVm and RV 'spelt', and in Ex 9³², Is 28²⁵ AV 'rie' and RV 'spelt'. Spelt (Triticum spelta) is an inferior kind of wheat, the grains of which are peculiarly adherent to the sheath. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FLAG.—1. āchā (Job 8¹¹), prop. 'reed-grass' (cf. Gn 41² 18). 2. sūph (Ex 23⁴, Is 19⁶), sedgy plants by the Nile and its canals.

FLAGON occurs five times in AV, but in only one of these instances is the tr. retained by RV, namely, Is 22⁴, 'vessels of flagons.' Here it is perhaps an earthenware bottle. On the other hand, RV introduces 'flagons' in two instances where it is not found in AV, namely, Ex 25³⁰ 37¹⁶. This tr. is probably correct, although RV gives 'cups' for the same Heb. word in Nu 4⁷. In all these three passages AV has 'covers.' In the remaining four instances where AV gives 'flagons' (2 S 6¹⁹, 1 Ch 16³, Hos 3¹, Ca 2⁹), the meaning of the Heb. word is a 'pressed cake . . . composed of meal, oil, and dibe' (W. R. Smith, OTJC 434, n. 7). Hence in 2 S 6¹⁹, 1 Ch 16³, RV gives 'cake of raisins' for AV 'flagon [of wine]', in Hos 3¹ 'cakes of raisins' for 'flagons of wine,' and in Ca 2⁹ 'raisins' (RVm 'cakes of raisins') for 'flagons.'

FLAX (pishlah).—The plant Linum usitatissimum, and the prepared fibres used for making linen. It was early cultivated in Palestine (Jos 2⁹); the failure of the flax was one of God's judgments (Hos 2⁹). The plant is about two to three feet high, with pretty blue flowers; the flax is said to be 'bolloed' (Ex 9⁹) when the seed vessels reach maturity and the plant is ready for gathering. The stalks were dried on the housetops (Jos 2⁹), and then soaked in water and the fibre combed out (Is 19⁹ RV). The 'tow' of Is 43¹⁷ is teased-out flax. The oil of the seeds is the well-known linseed oil.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FLEA (par'ōsh, 1 S 24¹⁴ 26²⁰).—The common flea, Pulex irritans, is a universal pest in Palestine. Fleas are present in incredible numbers in the dust of caves to which goats resort. RVm has 'fleas' for 'lice' in Ex 8¹⁰.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FLESH.—This word is used in Scripture to express: (1) the substance of the animal body, whether of man or of beast (Gn 41²). (2) The whole human body (Ex 4⁷). (3) Relationship by birth or marriage (Gn 24³ 37²⁷, Neh 5⁵), for which also the further phrase 'flesh and bones' is found (Gn 2²³, 2 S 19¹²)—a phrase which is also used to describe the reality of the humanity of Jesus after His resurrection (Lk 24³⁹). (4) The finite earthly creature, in contrast with God and His Spirit (Is 31³, Gn 7²¹)—a use of the term to emphasize man's frailty and dependence on God (Job 34¹⁵, Is 40⁶⁻⁸), but without any moral disparagement, as it is applied to the whole human race without reference to its sin (Jl 2²³), and to the human nature of Christ (Jn 1¹⁴, Ro 1³). We have the equivalent phrase 'flesh and blood' in the NT (1 Co 15⁵⁰ || 'corruption', He 2¹⁴=human nature [cf. Jn 1¹³]). (5) One element of the nature of man in combination or contrast with the others, such as 'soul' (Ps 63¹), 'heart' (73²⁴), 'soul' and 'heart' (84²); while it is the lower element, it is recognized even in man's relation to God (Job 19²⁸). In the NT 'flesh' is, without suggestion or moral defect, either combined or contrasted with 'spirit' (Mt 26¹¹, 1 Co 5⁵). As a necessary element in human nature under present conditions, it is in no way condemned (Gal 2²⁰); the duality is ascribed to Christ Himself (Ro 13⁴); and sin is represented as infecting the other elements in man as well as the body (2 Co 7¹, Eph 2³). (6) The seat and vehicle of sin, as contrasted with the 'mind' which approves and serves the law of God (Ro 7⁵), and the 'spirit' which is the gift of God (Ro 8⁴, Gal 5¹⁶). A similar use is made of the adjective 'fleshy' or 'carnal', in contrast with 'spiritual' (Ro 7¹⁴, 1 Co 3¹, Col 2¹⁸). It is to be noted, however, that in this use the 'flesh' is not conceived as exclusively material substance, for among the works of the flesh are included idolatry, sorcery, enmities, strifes, jealousies, etc. (Gal 5²⁰). The explanation usually given of this use of the term 'flesh' is that, man having fallen, sin comes by natural inheritance (flesh), whereas goodness is given by supernatural grace (spirit). Whatever be the explanation of the Pauline use, that the term gets a distinctly ethical content, and is used with reference to sin as dwelling in human nature, cannot be denied.

Pfleiderer endeavours to show how from the Hebraic use of the term for creaturely weakness, St. Paul passed to the Hellenic use for moral defect. His conclusion is that 'from the opposition of physically different substances results the dualism of antagonistic moral principles' (Paulinism, i. p. 54). The usual explanation of the depravity of human nature is rejected—'there seems to be no allusion,' says Usteri, quoted by Pfeiderer (p. 61), 'in the writings of Paul to a change in the moral nature of man, or of his bodily constitution in consequence of the fall, i.e. of the first actual sin of Adam.' St. Paul is supposed to leave us with two explanations of the origin of sin. Against the assumption of this dualism Bruce offers the following arguments: (1) It is un-Hebrew, and St. Paul's culture is Rabbinic rather than Hellenistic; (2) the body is capable of sanctification as well as the spirit (1 Th 5², 1 Co 6¹⁹, 2²⁰, 2 Co 7¹); (3) the body as well as the soul will be raised from the dead, although it will be changed (1 Co 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁹); (4) the Christian salvation is in the present life, and not only after the death of the body (St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 269 ff.). It may be added that flesh is ascribed to Christ, and St. Paul's phrase 'the likeness of sinful flesh' (Ro 8³) is intended to deny sinfulness, not a similar body in Christ (see Comm. in loc.).

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

FLESH-HOOK.—The flesh-hook used by the priest's servant at Shiloh was a three-pronged fork (1 S 2¹³), as were probably those of bronze and gold mentioned in connexion with the Tabernacle (Ex 27³ 38³) and Temple (1 Ch 28¹⁷, 2 Ch 4¹⁸) respectively.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FLESHLY, FLESHY.—There is a distinction preserved in the AV between these words. 'Fleshly' is that which belongs to the flesh, carnal, as Col 2¹⁸ 'fleshly mind,' as opposed to 'spiritually minded' (cf. Ro 8⁶). 'Fleshy' is that which is made of flesh, tender, as 2 Co 3³ 'written . . . not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart.'

FLESH POTS (Ex 16³).—See HOUSE, § 9.

FLINT.—See MINING AND METALS.

FLOCK.—See SHEEP.

FLOOD.—See DELUGE. And notice that the word is used generally for a stream or river, as Is 44⁵ 'I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground' (RV 'streams'). Sometimes a particular river is meant, the Euphrates, the Nile, or the Jordan. (1) The Euphrates is referred to in Jos 24² ('your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood,' RV 'beyond the River') 24¹⁴⁻¹⁵, 2 Es 13¹⁴, 1 Mac 7⁸. (2) The Nile in Ps 78⁴⁴, Am 8⁸ 9⁸, Jer 46⁷⁻⁸. (3) The Jordan in Ps 66⁶ ('they went through the flood on foot'). The word is also frequently used in AV as now, of a torrent, as Ps 69² 'I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me' (Heb. shibboleth, the word which the Ephraimites pronounced sibboleth).

FLOOR.—Used in AV (a) in the primary sense of a house-floor, and (b) in the secondary sense of a threshing-floor, the Heb. words for which are quite distinct. Under (a) we have the earthen floor of the Tabernacle, Nu 5¹⁷, and the wooden floor of the Temple, 1 K 6¹⁵ (see HOUSE, § 4.). By 'from floor to floor,' 7⁷ RV, is meant 'from floor to ceiling,' a sense implied in the better reading 'from the floor to the rafters'; cf. 6¹⁵, where for 'walls' read 'rafters' of the ceiling. In Am 9⁸ our EV has obscured the figure 'the floor of the sea.'

(b) Where 'floor' occurs in the sense of 'threshing-floor' (see AGRICULTURE, § 3), the latter has been substituted by RV except in three passages (Gn 50¹¹, Is 21¹⁰, Jl 2⁴). The same word (goren) appears as barndoor (2 K 6²⁷, RV 'threshing-floor') and cornfloor (Hos 9¹ AV and RV).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FLOUR.—See BREAD, FLOOD, § 2, MILL.

FLOWERS.—1. nizzān, only Ca 2¹². 2. ziz, Is 28¹⁻⁴ 40⁶, Job 14⁵, 'blossoms' Nu 17⁸. 3. nizzah—used of the inconspicuous flowers of vine and olive, Is 18⁵, Job 15³. 4. perach, Ex 25³, Is 18⁶, AV 'bud,' RV 'blossom,' Nah 1⁴. Flowers are one of the attractive features of Palestine: they come in the early spring (Ca 2¹²), but fade all too soon, the brilliant display being a matter of but a few short weeks. Hence they are an appropriate symbol of the evanescence of human life (Job 14⁵, Ps 103¹⁵ etc.). The 'lilies of the field' of Mt 6²⁸ may have been a comprehensive term for the brilliant and many-coloured anemones, the irises, the gladioli, etc., which lend such enchantment to the hill-sides in March and April. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FLUTE.—See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

FLUX.—The expression 'a bloody flux' (1611 'bloody-fluxe') is used in AV for Gr. dysenterion (RV 'dysentery'). This trans. is first found in Wyclif, who offers the alternative 'dissenterie, or flux.' See MEDICINE.

FLY.—1. zebub, Ec 10¹, Is 7¹⁸; also Baal-zebub [wh. see]. 2. 'arab, Ex 8² etc., the insects of one of the plagues of Egypt, thought by some to have been cockroaches. Flies of many kinds, mosquitoes, 'sand-flies,' etc., swarm in Palestine and Egypt. In summer any sweet preparation left uncovered is at once defiled by flies falling into it (Ec 10¹). Flies carry ophthalmia and infect food with the micro-organisms of other diseases, e.g. cholera, enteric fever, etc. They frequently deposit their eggs in uncleanly wounds and discharging ears, and these eggs develop into maggots. Special flies, in Africa at any rate, carry the trypanosoma, which produce fatal disease in cattle and 'sleeping sickness' in man. Mosquitoes, which may have been included in the 'arab (the 'swarms of flies') in Egypt, are now known to be the carriers of the poison of malaria, the greatest scourge of parts of Palestine.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FODDER (belu, Job 6⁶ and Jg 19² RV). See PROVENDER.

FOLK.—This Eng. word is used in the NT indefinitely for 'persons,' there being no word in the Gr. (Mk 6⁶, Jn 5³, Ac 5¹⁶). But in the OT the word has the definite meaning of nation or people, even Pr 30²⁶ 'The conies are but a feeble folk,' having this meaning. In the metrical version of Ps 100³, 'flock' should be 'folk,' corresponding to 'people' in the prose version. So the author wrote—

'The Lord ye know is God in dede
With out our aide, he did us make:
We are his folk, he doth us fede,
And for his shepe, he doth us take.'

FOLLOW.—This Eng. verb means now no more than to come after, but in older Eng. it was often equivalent to pursue. Now it states no more than the relative place of two persons, formerly it expressed purpose or determination. Tindale translates Lv 26¹⁷ 'ye shal flee when no man foloweth you,' and Dt 28²⁶ 'they [the diseases named] shal folowe the, intyll thou perishe.' In AV to follow is sometimes to imitate, as 2 Th 3⁷ 'For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us.'

FOOD.—This article will deal only with food-stuffs, in other words, with the principal articles of food among the Hebrews in Bible times, the preparation and serving of these being reserved for the complementary article MEALS.

1. The food of a typical Hebrew household in historical times was almost exclusively vegetarian. For all but the very rich the use of meat was confined to some special occasion,—a family festival, the visit of an honoured guest, a sacrificial meal at the local sanctuary, and the like. According to the author of the Priests' Code, indeed, the food of men and beasts alike was exclusively herbaceous in the period before the Deluge (Gn 1²⁹), permission to eat the flesh of animals, under stipulation as to drawing off the blood, having been first accorded to Noah (9³). In Isaiah's vision of the future, when 'the lion shall eat straw like the ox' (11⁷) a return is contemplated to the idyllic conditions of the first age of all.

The growth of luxury under the monarchy (cf. Am 6⁴, and similar passages) is well illustrated by a comparison of 2 S 17²⁸ with 1 K 4²². In the former there is brought for the entertainment of David and his followers 'wheat and barley and meal and parched corn and beans and lentils and parched pulse' [? see p. 266. § 3] and honey and butter and sheep and cheese of kine; while, according to the latter passage, Solomon's daily provision was 'thirty measures of fine flour and three-score measures of meal, ten fat oxen and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep, besides harts and gazelles and roebucks and fatted fowl.'

2. The first place in the list of Hebrew food-stuffs must be given to the various cereals included under the general name of 'corn'—in Amer. RV always 'grain'—the two most important of which were wheat and barley. Millet (Ezk 4⁹) and spelt (see FITCHES, RYE) are only casually mentioned. The most primitive method of using corn was to pluck the 'fresh ears' (Lv 23⁴ RV 2 K 4⁴²) and remove the husk by rubbing in the hands (Dt 23², Mt 12¹ etc.). When bruised in a mortar these ears yielded the 'bruised corn of the fresh ear' of Lv 24¹⁰ RV. A favourite practice in all periods down to the present day has been to roast the ears on an iron plate or otherwise. The result is the parched corn so frequently mentioned in OT. Parched corn and bread with a light sour wine furnished the midday meal of Boaz's reapers (Ru 2¹⁴). The chief use, however, to which wheat and barley were put was to supply the household with bread (wh. see). Wheat and barley 'meal' (RV) were prepared in early times by means of the primitive rubbing-stones, which the excavations show to have long survived the introduction of the quern or hand-mill (for references to illustrations of both, see MILL). The 'fine flour' of our EV was obtained from the coarser variety by bolting the latter with a fine sieve. Barley bread (Jg 7¹³, Jn 6^{9, 12}) was the usual bread, indeed the principal food, of the poorer classes. (For details of bread-making, see BREAD.) The obscure word rendered 'dough' in Nu 15²⁰, Neh 10³⁷, Ezk 44²⁰ denoted either coarse meal (so RVm) or a sort of porridge made from wheat and barley meal, like the polenta of the Romans.

3. Next in importance to wheat and barley as food-stuffs may be ranked the seeds of various members of the pulse family (Leguminosae), although only two leguminous plants (lentils and beans) are mentioned by name in OT. The pulse of Dn 12¹² 16 denotes edible herbs generally (so RVm); the 'parched (pulse)' of 2 S 17²⁸, on the other hand, is due to a mistaken rendering of the word for 'parched corn,' here repeated by a copyist's slip. Of red lentils Jacob made his fateful pottage (Gn 25²⁹⁻³⁴), probably a stew in which the lentils were flavoured with onions and other ingredients, as is done at the present day in Syria. Lentils and beans were occasionally ground to make bread (Ezk 4⁹).

Next to its fish, the Hebrews in the wilderness looked back wistfully on the 'cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic' of Egypt (Nu 11⁵), all of them subsequently cultivated by them in Palestine. It is to the agricultural treatises of the Mishna, however, that the student must turn for fuller information regarding the rich supplies available either for a 'dinner of herbs' (Pr 15¹⁷) alone, or for supplementing a meat diet. At least four varieties of bean, for example, are named, also the chickpea (which the Vulgate substitutes for the 'parched pulse' above referred to), various species of chicory and endive—the bitter herbs of the Passover ritual (Ex 12⁹)—mustard (Mt 13²¹), radish, and many others.

4. Passing now to the 'food-trees' (Lv 19²³), we may follow the example of Jotham in his parable (Jg 9⁷⁻¹⁵), and begin with the olive, although, as it happens, the 'olive berry' (Ja 3¹² AV) is never expressly mentioned in Scripture as an article of diet. Apart, however, from their extensive use in furnishing oil (wh. see), itself an invaluable aid in the preparation of food, olives were not only eaten in the fresh state, but were at all times preserved for later use by being soaked in brine. Such pickled olives were, and still are, used as a relish with bread by rich and poor alike.

Next to the olive in rank, Jotham's parable places the fig-tree, whose 'sweetness' and 'good fruit' it extols (Jg 9¹¹). The great economic importance of the fig need not be emphasized. From Is 28⁴, Jer 24² it appears that the 'first ripe fig,' i.e. the early fig which appears on last year's wood, was regarded as a special delicacy. The bulk of the year's fruit was dried for use out of the season, as was the case also among the Greeks and Romans, by whom dried figs were the most extensively used of all fruits. When pressed in a mould they formed 'cakes of figs' (1 S 25¹⁸, 1 Ch 12⁴⁰). A fig-cake, it will be remembered, was prescribed by Isaiah as a poultice (EV 'plaister') for Hezekiah's boil (Is 38²¹ — 2 K 20⁷ RV).

With the fig Hebrew writers constantly associate the grape, the 'fruit of the vine' (Mt 28²⁹ and parallels). Like the former, grapes were not only enjoyed in their natural state, but were also, by exposure to the sun after being gathered, dried into raisins, the 'dried grapes' of Nu 6³. In this form they were better suited for the use of travellers and soldiers (1 S 25¹⁸, 1 Ch 12⁴⁰). What precisely is meant by the word rendered 'raisin-cake,' 'cake of raisins,' by RV (2 S 6¹⁹, Is 16⁷, Hos 3¹; AV wrongly 'flagon of wine') is still uncertain. By far the greater part of the produce of the vineyards was used for the manufacture of wine (wh. see). For another economic product of the grape, see HONEY.

Dates are only once mentioned in AV, and that without any justification, as the marginal alternative of 'honey,' 2 Ch 31⁶; yet Joel includes 'the palm tree' in his list of fruit-trees (1¹⁹), and from the Mishna we learn that dates, like the fruits already discussed were not only eaten as they came from the palm, but were dried in clusters and also pressed into cakes for convenience of transport.

For other less important fruits such as the pomegranate, the much discussed tappûch—the 'apple' of AV, according to others the quince (see APPLE)—the fruit of the sycamore or fig-mulberry, associated with Amos the prophet, and the husks (Lk 15¹⁶), or rather pods of the carob tree, reference must be made to the separate articles. To these there fall to be added here almonds and nuts of more than one variety.

5. As compared with the wide range of foods supplied by the cereals, vegetables, and fruits above mentioned, the supply of flesh-food was confined to such animals and birds as were technically described as 'clean.' For this important term, and the principles underlying the distinction between clean and unclean, see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. The clean animals admitted to the table according to the 'official' lists in Lv 11² Dt 14²⁰ (conveniently arranged in parallel columns for purposes of comparison in Driver's Deut. ad loc.), may be ranged under the two categories, domestic animals, which alone were admitted as sacrifice to the 'table of J'' (Mal 1^{7, 12}), and game. The former comprised the two classes of 'the flock,' i.e. sheep and goats, and 'the herd.'

The flesh of the goat, and especially of the 'kid of the goats,' was more relished by the Hebrews than by the present inhabitants of Palestine, by whom the goat is reared chiefly for its milk. A kid, as less valuable than a well-fleeced lamb, was the most frequent and readiest victim, especially among the poor, a fact which gives point to the complaint of the Elder Son in the parable (Lk 15²⁹). The original significance of the thrice-repeated injunction against seething a kid in its mother's milk (Ex 23¹⁹ and parallels) is still uncertain.

Regarding the sheep as food, it may be noted that in the case of the fat-tailed breed the tail was forbidden as ordinary food by the Priests' Code at least, and had to be offered with certain other portions of the fat (see § 10 p. 267) upon the altar (Ex 29²², Lv 3⁹, both RV). Of the neat cattle, the flesh of females as well as of males was eaten, the Hebrews not having that repugnance to cow's flesh which distinguished the Egyptians of antiquity as it does the Hindus of to-day. Calves, of course, supplied the daintiest food, and might be taken directly from the herd, as was done by Abraham (Gn 18⁷, cf. 1 K 4²²), or specially fattened for the table. The 'fatted calf' of Lk 15²³ will be at once recalled, also the 'fattlings,' and the 'stalled,' i.e. stall-fed, ox (Pr 15¹⁷) of OT. 'One ox and six choice sheep' were Nehemiah's daily portion (Neh 5¹⁴); Solomon's has been already given (§ 1). From the females of the herd and of the flock (Dt 32¹⁴), especially from the she-goat (Pr 27²⁷), probably also from the milch-camel (Gn 32¹⁴), came the supply of milk and its preparations, butter and cheese, for which see MILK.

Of the seven species of game mentioned in Dt 14⁴,

It is evident from 12¹⁴ that the gazelle and the hart were the typical animals of the chase hunted for the sake of their flesh. They are also named along with the roe-buck in Solomon's list, 1 K 4²¹. One or more of these, doubtless supplied the venison from which Esau was wont to make the 'savoury meat' which his father loved (Gn 25²⁸ 27¹⁴). Among the unclean animals which were taboo to the Hebrews the most interesting are the swine (Lv 11⁷, Dt 14⁸; cf. Mt 8³⁰ and parallels), the camel, the hare, and the ass (but see 2 K 6²⁵).

6. In the Deuteronomic list above cited, the permitted and forbidden quadrupeds are followed by this provision regarding fish: 'These ye shall eat of all that are in the waters, whatsoever hath fins and scales shall ye eat: and whatsoever hath not fins and scales ye shall not eat, it is unclean unto you' (Dt 14⁹ RV; cf. Lv 11⁹⁻¹²). No particular species of fish is named in OT, either as food or otherwise, although no fewer than thirty-six species are said to be found in the Jordan system alone. Yet we may be sure that the fish which the Hebrews enjoyed in Egypt 'for nought' (Nu 11⁶ RV) had their successors in Canaan. Indeed, it is usual to find in the words of Dt 33⁹ 'they shall suck the abundance of the seas,' a contemporary reference to the fisheries possessed by the tribes of Zebulun and Issachar. In the days of Nehemiah a considerable trade in cured fish was carried on by Tyrian, i.e. Phœnician, merchants with Jerusalem (Neh 13¹⁶), where a market must have been held at or near the Fish-gate (3² etc.). In still later times, as is so abundantly testified by the Gospels and Josephus, the Sea of Galilee was the centre of a great fishing industry. In addition to the demand for fresh fish, a thriving trade was done in the salting and curing of fish for sale throughout the country. The fishes of our Lord's two miracles of feeding were almost certainly of this kind, fish cleaned, split open, salted, and finally dried in the sun, having been at all times a favourite form of provision for a journey.

7. Regarding the 'clean' birds, all of which were allowed as food (Dt 14¹¹), no definite criterion is prescribed, but a list of prohibited species is given (Lv 11¹³⁻¹⁹, Dt 14¹¹⁻¹⁸), mostly birds of prey, including the bat. In the ritual of various sacrifices, however, pigeons and turtle doves, and these only, find a place, and are therefore to be reckoned as 'clean' for ordinary purposes as well. The early domestication of these birds is shown by the reference to the 'windows' of the dove-cots in Is 60⁸, while the Mishna has much to say regarding various breeds of domestic pigeons, their 'towers,' feeding, etc. The ordinary domestic fowl of the present day seems to have been first introduced into Palestine from the East in the Persian period (2 Es 13⁹, Mt 23³⁷ 26²⁴ and parallels). The fatted fowl for Solomon's table (1 K 4²²) are generally supposed to be geese, which with poultry and house-pigeons are frequently named in the Mishna. Roast goose was a favourite food of the Egyptians, and has, indeed, been called their national dish.

Among the edible game birds mention is made of the partridge and the quail (see these articles). Most or all of these were probably included in the 'fowls' (lit. birds) which appeared on Nehemiah's table (5¹⁸). The humble sparrow (Mt 10²⁹, Lk 12²⁴) would have been beneath the dignity of a Persian governor. The eggs of all the clean birds were also important articles of food (Dt 22⁶, Is 10⁴, Lk 11², Job 6⁶ is doubtful, see RVm). Ostrich eggs have recently been found in an early grave at Gezer (PEFSI 1907, 191).

8. Under the head of animal food must also be reckoned the various edible insects enumerated, Lv 11²¹, apparently four species of the locust family (see LOCUST). Locusts were regarded as delicacies by the Assyrians, formed part of the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3⁴, Mk 1⁹), and are still eaten by the Arabs. By the latter they are prepared in various ways, one of the commonest being to remove the head, legs, and wings, and to fry the body in samn or clarified butter. Locusts may also be preserved by salting. This is the place, further, to refer to the article HONEY for information regarding that important article of diet.

9. Nothing has as yet been said on the subject of condiments. Salt, the chief of condiments, will be treated separately (see SALT). Of the others it has been said that, 'before pepper was discovered or came into general use, seeds like cummin, the coriander, etc., naturally played a more important rôle.' Of these the greyish-white seeds of the coriander are named in Ex 16²¹, Nu 11⁷; these are still used in the East as a spice in bread-making and to flavour sweetmeats. Similarly the seeds of the black cummin (Is 28²⁵ RVm) are sprinkled on bread like caraway seeds among ourselves. For the other condiments, mint, anise, cummin, and rue, see the separate articles. To these may be added mustard, of which the leaves, not the seed, (Mt 13⁹), were cut up and used as flavouring. Pepper is first mentioned in the Mishna. The caper-berry (Ec 12⁵ RV) was eaten before meals as an appetizer, rather than used as a condiment.

10. Reference has already been made to the restrictions laid upon the Hebrews in the matter of animal food by the all-important distinction between 'clean' and 'unclean,' as applied not only to quadrupeds, but to fish, birds, and winged creatures generally. All creatures technically 'unclean' were taboo, to use the modern term (see ABOMINATION, CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). There were other food taboos, however, which require a brief mention here. The chief of these was the absolute prohibition of the blood even of 'clean' beasts and birds, which occupies a prominent place in all the stages of the Hebrew dietary legislation (Dt 12¹⁶, 23, 25 15²³, Lv 17¹⁰, [H], 31⁷ 7²⁶, [P], etc.). Its antiquity is attested by the incident recorded 1 S 14³². According to P, indeed, it is coeval with the Divine permission to eat animal food (Gn 9⁴). All sacrificial animals had therefore to be drained of their blood before any part could be offered to God or man, and so with all animals slaughtered for domestic use only (Dt 12¹⁶), and with all game of beast and bird taken in the chase (Lv 17¹³).

Closely associated with the above (cf. Lv 3¹⁷) is the taboo imposed upon certain specified portions of the intestinal fat of the three sacrificial species, the ox, the sheep, and the goat (Lv 3³, 7²², etc.), to which, as we have seen, the fat tail of the sheep was added. There was forbidden, further, the flesh of every animal that had died a natural death (Dt 14²¹, Lv 17¹⁵), or had been done to death by a beast of prey (Ex 22³¹, Lv 17¹⁵); in short, all flesh was rigidly taboo except that of an animal which had been ritually slaughtered as above prescribed. For another curious taboo, see Gn 32³². The Jews of the present day eat only such meat as has been certified by their own authorities as kosher, i.e. as having been killed in the manner prescribed by Rabbinic law.

The intimate association in early times between flesh-food and sacrifice explains the abhorrence of the Hebrew for all food prepared by the heathen, as illustrated by Daniel (Dn 1⁸), Judas Maccabeus (2 Mac 5²⁷), Josephus (Vita 3), and their associates (cf. also Ac 15²⁰, 29, 1 Co 8¹⁻¹⁰ 10¹⁹, 28).

11. A word finally as to the sources of the Hebrew food-supply. Under the simpler conditions of early times the exclusive source of supply was the householder's own herd (Gn 18⁷) or flock (27⁹), his vineyard and oliveyard or his 'garden of herbs' (1 K 21²). As the Hebrews became dwellers in cities their food-stuffs naturally became more and more articles of commerce. The bakers, for example, who gave their name to a street in Jerusalem (Jer 37²¹), not only fired the dough prepared in private houses, as at the present day, but, doubtless, baked and sold bread to the public, as did their successors in the first and second centuries (see Mishna, passim. An active trade in 'victuals' is attested for Nehemiah's day (13¹⁶¹), when we hear of the 'fish-gate' (3¹) and the 'sheep gate' (3¹), so named, doubtless, from their respective markets. The disciples were accustomed to buy provisions as they journeyed through the land (Jn 4⁸; cf. 13²⁹); and Corinth, we may be sure, was not the only city of the time that had a provision-market (1 Co 10²⁸, EV shambles). In Jerusalem, again, cheese was to be bought in the Cheesemakers' Valley (Tyropoeon), and oil at the oil-merchants (Mt 25⁹), and so on. In the early morning especially, the streets near the city gates on the north and west, which led to the country, were doubtless then, as now, transformed into market-places, lined with men and women offering for sale the produce of their farms and gardens. Even the outer court of the Temple itself had in our Lord's day become a 'house of merchandise' (Jn 2¹⁶).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FOOL.—The Heb. language is rich in words which express various kinds of folly. 1. The kesl is glib of tongue, 'his mouth is his destruction' (Pr 18⁷; cf. 9¹³ 14²³); in Ec 5¹¹ 'the sacrifice of fools' is offered by him who is rash with his mouth. But such an one is 'light-hearted, thoughtless and noisy rather than vicious.' 2. The sākhāl manifests his folly not in speech, but in action; it was after David had numbered the people that he reproached himself for acting 'very foolishly' (2 S 24¹⁰). Consequences prove that fools of this class have blundered in their calculations (Gn 31²⁸, 1 S 13¹³, Is 44²⁸). 3. The erl is stupid, impatient of reproof, often sullen and quarrelsome. He despises wisdom and instruction (Pr 17, cf. 15⁵), is soon angry (Pr 12¹⁸ 27³), and may sometimes be described as sinful (Pr 5²¹ 24⁹). 4. The folly of the nābhāl is never mere intellectual deficiency or stupidity; it is a moral fault, sometimes a crime, always a sin. 'To commit folly' is a euphemism for gross unchastity (Dt 22¹, Jer 29²³); the word is used also of sacrilege (Jos 7¹⁰), of blasphemy (Ps 74¹⁸), as well as of impiety in general (Dt 32⁶, Ps 14¹). These words are sometimes employed in a more general sense; to determine the shade of meaning applicable in any passage, a study of the context is essential. For further details see Kennedy, Hebrew Synonyms, p. 29 ff. In the NT the Gr. words for 'fool' describe him as 'deficient in understanding' (Lk 24²⁸), 'unwise' (Eph 5¹⁸), 'senseless' (Lk 12²⁰), 'unintelligent' (Ro 1²¹). The Gr. word which corresponds to the 'impious fool' of the OT is found in Mt 5²: Raca expresses 'contempt for a man's head—you stupid!' But 'fool' (mōre) expresses 'contempt for his heart and character—you scoundrell' (Bruce, EGT, in loc.). If mōre were a Hebrew expression of condemnation' (RVm), it would 'enjoy the distinction of being the only pure Hebrew word in the Greek Testament' (Field, Notes on the Translation of NT, p. 3). A 'pure Hebrew word' means a word not taken from the LXX and not Aramaic.

J. G. TASKER.

FOOT.—Is 3¹⁶. 16 refers to the ornaments of women's feet. Most of the metaphorical or figurative usages are connected with the idea of the feet as the lowest part of the body, opposed to the head; hence falling at a man's feet, as the extreme of reverence or humility, kissing the feet (Lk 7³⁸), sitting at the feet, as the attitude of the pupil (Lk 10³⁹, Ac 22³). The foot was literally placed on the neck of conquered foes (Jos 10²⁴), as may be seen in Egyptian monuments. Hence 'under foot' is used of subjection (Ps 8⁹, 1 Co 15²⁷). In Dt 11¹⁰ the reference is to some system of irrigation in vogue in Egypt, either to the turning of a water-wheel by the foot, or to a method of distributing water from a canal 'by making or breaking down with the foot the small ridges which regulate its flow' (Driver, ad loc.). Other usages arise from the feet as stained or defiled in walking. The shaking of dust from the feet (Mt 10⁴, Ac 13³¹) was the sign of complete rejection; the land was as a heathen land, and its dust unclean. So the sandals were removed as a sign of reverence (Ex 3⁸, Jos 5¹⁴; cf. covering the feet, Is 6²). To remove the sandal was also the sign of the renunciation of a right (Dt 25⁹, Ru 4⁸). To walk barefoot was the symbol of mourning (2 S 15³⁰) or slavery (Is 20²). Jer 2²⁶ 'Withhold thy foot from being unshod,' i.e. do not wear the shoes off your feet in running after strange gods.

Washing the feet stained with the dust of the road was part of the regular duty of hospitality (Gn 18⁴, Ex 30¹⁸, 2 S 11⁸, Ca 5³, Lk 7⁴⁴). The use of ointment for this purpose was the sign of the penitent's lavish love (Lk 7³⁸, Jn 12³). The washing of the feet at the Last Supper is primarily connected with this custom (Jn 13). Christ 'the Lord and Master' assumes the garb and does the work of a slave (13¹⁴). The lesson is not merely one of humility (cf. the dispute in Lk 22²⁶), but of ready and self-sacrificing service. An interesting Rabbinic parallel is quoted on Ezk 16²: 'Among men the slave washes his master; but with God it is not so.' Edersheim further sees in the act a substitute for the washing of hands which was part of the Paschal ceremonial; and there may be a reference to the proverb, connected with the Greek mysteries, that a great undertaking must not be entered upon 'with unwashed feet.' The service of the Kingdom of heaven (or in particular the crisis of that night) is not to be approached in the spirit of unthinking pride shown in the dispute about precedence (see D. Smith, The Days of His Flesh, p. 440). Besides the lesson of humility, there is also the symbolism of purification. St. Peter, at first protesting, afterwards characteristically accepts this as literal. Christ's reply takes up the figure of one who has walked from the bath to his host's house, and needs only to have the dust of his journey removed. Broadly, they are clean by their consecration to Him, but they need continual cleansing from the defilements of daily life. 'It seems impossible not to see in the word "bathed" a foreshadowing of the idea of Christian baptism' (Westcott, ad loc.). The same or other commentaries should be consulted for later imitations of the ceremony (cf. 1 Ti 5¹⁰).

C. W. EMMET.

FOOTMAN.—This word is used in two different senses: 1. A foot-soldier, always in plur. 'footmen,' foot-soldiers, infantry. Footmen probably composed the whole of the Isr. forces (1 S 4¹⁰ 15¹) before the time of David. 2. A runner on foot: 1 S 22¹⁷ (AVm 'or guard, Heb. runners'; RV 'guard,' RVm 'Heb. runners'). 'Runners' would be the literal, and at the same time the most appropriate, rendering. The king had a body of runners about him, not so much to guard his person as to run his errands and do his bidding. They formed a recognized part of the royal state (1 S 8⁴, 2 S 15¹); they served as executioners (1 S 22¹⁷, 2 K 10²⁸); and, accompanying the king or his general into battle, they brought back official tidings of its progress or event (2 S 18¹⁹). In Jer 12⁵ both the Heb. and the Eng. (footmen) seem to be used in the more general sense of racers on foot.

FOOTSTOOL.—See HOUSE, § 8.

FORBEARANCE.—See LONGUFFERING.

FORD.—Of the numerous 'fords' or passages of the Jordan, two in ancient times were of chief importance: that opposite Jericho near Gilgal (Jos 2⁷, Jg 3²⁸), and that at Bethabara (mod. 'Abarah'), at the junction of the Jalud (which drains the Jezreel valley) and the Jordan. Bridges are now used in crossing the Jordan. In 2 S 15²⁸ 17¹⁶ the AV has 'plain' for 'fords,' and in Jg 12⁵ 'passages.' Other fords were those of the Jabbok (Gn 32²) and the Arnon (Is 16²).

G. I. ROBINSON.

FOREHEAD.—In Jer 3³ a whore's forehead is a type of shamelessness; in Ezk 3⁸ 'the forehead stands for obstinacy. In 9⁴ the righteous receive a mark, probably the letter Taw, on their forehead. Hence the symbolism in Rev 7³, etc., where the mark is the Divine signet. It is doubtful what is the mark of the beast (Rev 13⁶); see Swete, ad loc. 17⁵ is a probable allusion to a custom of Roman harlots. Shaving the forehead in sign of mourning is forbidden (Dt 14¹). For Ezk 16¹², see RV. See also MARKS. C. W. EMMET.

FOREIGNER.—See NATIONS, STRANGER.

FOREKNOWLEDGE.—See PREDESTINATION.

FORERUNNER.—The English word gives the exact sense of the Greek prodromos, which, in its classical usage, signifies 'one who goes before'; it may be as a scout to reconnoitre, or as a herald to announce the coming of the king and to make ready the way for the royal journey.

1. John the Baptist was our Lord's 'forerunner.' The word is never applied to him in the NT, but he was the 'messenger' sent 'before the face' of the Lord 'to prepare his way' (Mt 11¹⁰, Mk 1², Lk 7²⁷; cf. Mal 3¹), and to exhort others to 'make his paths straight' (Mk 1³; cf. Is 40³).

2. Only in He 6²⁰ is the word 'forerunner' found in the EV (Wyclif 'the bifor goer', Rheims 'the precursor'). Instead of the AV 'whither the forerunner has for us entered, even Jesus,' the RV rightly renders: 'whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us.' The change is important. To the readers of this Epistle it would be a startling announcement that Jesus had entered the Holy of Holies as a forerunner. Thither the Jewish high priest, one day in the year, went alone (He 9⁷). He was the people's representative, but he was not their forerunner, for none might dare to follow him. The key-note of the Epistle is that all believers have access with boldness to the presence of the Most Holy God 'in the blood of Jesus'; they have this boldness because their High Priest has inaugurated for them a fresh and living way (10¹⁹). Already within the veil hope enters with assurance, for Jesus has 'gone that we may follow too.' As the Forerunner of His redeemed He has inaugurated their entrance. He makes intercession for them, and He is preparing for them a place (Jn 14²). Commenting on the significance of this 'one word,' Dr. A. B. Bruce says that it 'expresses the whole essential difference between the Christian and the Levitical religion—between the religion that brings men nigh to God, and the religion that kept or left men standing afar off' (Expositor, III. vii. [1888], p. 167 f.).

FOREST.—1. ya'ar (root meaning a 'rugged' place), Dt 19², 2 K 22⁴, Rhes 3¹² etc. 2. horesh, 2 Ch 27⁴ etc.; tr. 'wood,' 1 S 23³⁵ (perhaps a proper name). 3. pardēs, Neh 2⁸ AV 'king's forest,' RVm 'park'; also tr. 'orchards,' Ca 4¹³, Ec 2⁵, RV 'parks.' From the many references it is clear that Palestine had more extensive forests in ancient times than to-day,—indeed, within living memory there has been a vast destruction of trees for fuel. Considerable patches of woodland still exist, e.g. on Tabor and Carmel, in parts of N. Galilee, around Bania, and especially in Gilead between es-Salt and the Jabkok. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FORGETFULNESS.—Ps 88¹³ 'Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?' The meaning is general, as Coverdale 'the londe where all thinges are forgotten,' but probably more passive than active, that the person is forgotten rather than that he forgets. So Wis 17³; but in Wis 14²⁶ 16¹¹, Sir 11²⁸ the word expresses the tendency to forget.

FORGIVENESS.—Like many other words employed to convey ideas connected with the relations of God and man, this covers a variety of thoughts. In both OT and NT we have evidences of a more elastic vocabulary than the EV would lead us to suppose. 1. The OT has at least three different words all tr. 'forgiveness' or 'pardon,' referring either to God's actions with regard to men (cf. Ex 34⁷, Ps 86⁵, Neh 9¹⁷) or to forgiveness extended to men by each other (cf. Gn 50¹⁷, 1 S 25²⁹). At a very early period of human, or at least of Jewish, history, some sense of the need of forgiveness by God seems to have been felt. This will be especially evident if the words of despairing complaint put into the mouth of Cain be tr. literally (see Driver, The Book of Genesis, on 4¹³, cf. RVm). The power to forgive came to be looked on as inherent in God, who not only possessed the authority, but loved thus to exhibit His mercy (Dn 9⁹, Neh 9¹⁷, Jer 36³). In order, however, to obtain this gift, a corresponding condition of humiliation and repentance on man's part had to be fulfilled (2 Ch 7¹⁴, Ps 86⁵), and without a conscious determination of the transgressor to amend and turn towards his God, no hope of pardon was held out (Jos 24¹⁹, 2 K 24⁴, Jer 51⁷). On the other hand, as soon as men acknowledged their errors, and asked God to forgive, no limit was set to His love in this respect (1 K 8^{36.50}, Ps 103³; cf. Dt 30¹⁻¹⁰). Nor could this condition be regarded as unreasonable, for holiness, the essential characteristic of the Divine nature, demanded an answering correspondence on the part of man made in God's image. Without this correspondence forgiveness was rendered impossible, and that, so to speak, automatically (cf. Lv 19², Jos 24¹⁹; see Nu 14¹⁸, Job 10¹⁴, Nah 1³).

According to the Levitical code, when wrong was done between man and man, the first requisite in order to Divine pardon was restitution, which had to be followed up by a service of atonement (Lv 6²⁻⁷). Even in the case of sins of ignorance, repentance and its outward expression in sacrifice had to precede forgiveness (Lv 4¹³, Nu 15²⁵ etc.). Here the educative influence of the Law must have been powerful, inculcating as it did at once the transcendent holiness of God and the need of a similar holiness on the part of His people (Lv 11⁴). Thus the Pauline saying, 'The law hath been our tutor to bring us to Christ' (Gal 3²⁴), is profoundly true, and the great priestly services of the Temple, with the solemn and ornate ritual, must have given glimpses of the approach by which men could feel their way and obtain the help indispensable for the needs adumbrated by the demands of the Mosaic institutions. The burden of the prophetic exhortations, 'Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?' (Ezk 33¹; cf. Is 44², Jer 35¹³ 18¹¹, Hos 14¹, Jl 2¹³ etc.), would be meaningless if the power to obey were withheld, or the way kept hidden. Indeed, these preachers of moral righteousness did not hesitate to emphasize the converse side of this truth in dwelling on the 'repentance' of God and His returning to His afflicted but repentant people (Jon 3⁸, Mal 3⁷ etc.). The resultant effect of this mutual approach was the restoration to Divine favour, of those who had been alienated, by the free act of forgiveness on the part of God (Ps 85¹, Is 55⁷ 59²⁰, Jer 13^{17.24} etc.).

2. We are thus not surprised to learn that belief in the forgiveness of sins was a cardinal article of the Jewish faith in the time of Jesus (Mk 2⁷—Lk 5²¹, cf. Is 43²⁶). Nor was the teaching of Jesus in any instance out of line with the national belief, for, according to His words, the source of all pardon was His Father (Mk 11²⁵, Mt 6¹⁴; cf. His appeal on the cross, 'Father, forgive them,' Lk 23³⁴). It is true that 'the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins' (Mk 2¹⁰—Mt 9⁶—Lk 5²⁴), but the form of the expression shows that Jesus was laying claim to a delegated authority (cf. Lk 7¹⁸, where, as in the case of the palsied man, the words are declaratory rather than absolute; see Plummer, ICC, in loc.). This is more clearly seen by a reference to NT epistolary literature, where again and again forgiveness and restoration are spoken of as mediated 'in' or 'through' Christ (Eph 4³, Col 2¹², 1 P 5¹⁰; cf. Eph 1⁷, Rev 1⁵, 1 Jn 2¹² etc.). Here, as in OT, only more insistently dwelt on, the consciousness of guilt and of the need of personal holiness is the first step on the road to God's forgiveness (1 Jn 1⁹, cf. Ps 32⁵ 51³ etc.); and the open acknowledgment of these feelings is looked on as the natural outcome of their existence (Ac 19¹⁸; cf. Ro 10¹⁰, 1 Jn 1⁹). The hopelessness which at times seemed to have settled down on Jesus, when confronted by Pharisaic opposition, was the result of the moral and spiritual blindness of the religious teachers to their real position (Jn 9⁴⁰).

3. Again, following along the line we have traced in the OT, only more definitely and specifically emphasized, the NT writers affirm the necessity for a moral likeness between God and man (cf. Mt 5⁴⁸). It is in this region, perhaps, that the most striking development is to be seen. Without exhibiting, in their relations to each other, the Divine spirit of forgiveness, men need never hope to experience God's pardon for themselves. This, we are inclined to think, is the most striking feature in the ethical creations of Jesus' teaching. By almost every method of instruction, from incidental postulate (Mt 6¹²—Lk 11⁴, Mk 11²⁸) to deliberate statement (Mt 18^{21ff.}, 6¹⁵, Mk 11²⁸, Lk 17⁴) and elaborate parable (Mt 18²³⁻³⁵), He sought to attune the minds of His hearers to this high and difficult note of the Christian spirit (cf. Col 3¹³, 1 Jn 4¹¹). Once more, Jesus definitely asserts the limitation to which the pardon and mercy even of God are subjected. Whatever may be the precise meaning attaching to the words 'an eternal sin' (Mk 3²⁹), it is plain that some definite border-line is referred to as the line of demarcation between those who may hope for this evidence of God's love and those who are outside its scope (Mt 12³²). See art. SIN, III, 1.

4. We have lastly to consider the words, recorded only by St. John, of the risen Jesus to His assembled disciples (Jn 20²³). It is remarkable that this is the only place in the Fourth Gospel where the word tr. 'forgive' (RV) occurs, and we must not forget that the incident of conferring the power of absolution on the body of believers, as they were gathered together, is peculiar to this writer. At the same time, it is instructive to remember that nowhere is St. John much concerned with a simple narrative of events as such; he seems to be engaged rather in choosing those facts which he can subordinate to his teaching purposes. The choice, then, of this circumstance must have been intentional, as having a particular significance, and when the immediately preceding context is read, it is seen that the peculiar power transmitted is consequent upon the gift of the Holy Spirit. On two other occasions somewhat similar powers were promised, once personally to St. Peter as the great representative of that complete faith in the Incarnation of which the Church is the guardian in the world (Mt 16¹⁹), and once to the Church in its corporate capacity as the final judge of the terms of fellowship for each of its members (Mt 18¹⁸). In both these instances the words used by Jesus with regard to this spiritual power differ from those found in the narrative of the Fourth Gospel, and the latter is seen to be more definite, profound, and far-reaching in its scope than the former. The abiding presence of the living Spirit in the Church is the sure guarantee that her powers in judging spiritual things are inherent in her (cf. 1 Co 2¹²⁻¹⁵) as the Body of Christ. Henceforth she carries in her bosom the authority so emphatically claimed by her Lord, to declare the wondrous fact of Divine forgiveness (Ac 13²⁸) and to set forth the conditions upon which it ultimately rests (see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, in loc.). Closely connected with the exercise of this Divinely given authority is the rite of Baptism, conditioned by repentance and issuing in 'the remission of sins' (Ac 2³⁸). It is the initial act in virtue of which the Church claims to rule, guide, and upbuild the life of her members. It is symbolic, as was John's baptism, of a 'death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness' (Mk 14—Lk 3³; cf. Ro 6⁴, Col 2¹²). It is more than symbolic, for by it, as by a visible channel, the living and active Spirit of God is conveyed to the soul, where the fruition of the promised forgiveness is seen in the fullness of the Christian life (Ac 2³⁸, cf. 10⁴³, 47 19⁵¹).

5. On more than one occasion St. Paul speaks of the forgiveness of sins as constituting the redemption of the human race effected by the death of Christ ('through his blood' Eph 1⁷, cf. Col 1¹⁴); and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes this aspect of the atoning work of Jesus by showing its harmony with all with which previous revelation had made us familiar, for 'apart from shedding of blood there is no remission' (9²²). The same writer, moreover, asserts that once this object has been accomplished, nothing further remains to be done, as 'there is no more offering for sin' (10¹⁸) than that which the 'blood of Jesus' (10¹⁹) has accomplished. The triumphant cry of the Crucified, 'It is finished' (Jn 19³⁰), is for this writer the guarantee not only that 'the Death of Christ is the objective ground on which the sins of men are remitted' (Dale, The Atonement, p. 430 f.); it is also the assurance that forgiveness of sin is the goal of the life and death of Him whose first words from the cross breathed a prayer for the forgiveness of His tormentors. FORNICATION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, §3.

FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT.—At the date of the Hebrew invasion of Canaan its inhabitants were found to be in possession of 'cities great and fenced up to heaven' (Dt 9¹; cf. Nu 13²⁸, Jos 14¹²), most of them, as is now known, with a history of many centuries behind them. The inhabited places, then as always, were of two classes, walled and unwalled (Dt 3⁵), the latter comprising the country villages, the former the very numerous 'cities,' which though small in area were 'fenced,' i.e. fortified (the modern term everywhere adopted by Amer. RV), 'with high walls, gates, and bars.' In this article it is proposed to indicate the nature of the walls by which these cities were fenced in OT times, and of the fortresses or 'strong holds' so frequently mentioned in Hebrew history, and finally, to describe the methods of attack and defence adopted by the Hebrews and their contemporaries.

1. The earliest fortification yet discovered in Palestine is that erected, it may be, as far back as B.C. 4000 by the neolithic cave-dwellers of Gezer. This consisted of a simple bank of earth, between six and seven feet in height, the inside face of which is vertical, the outside sloping, and both faced with random stones (PEFSI, 1903, 113, with section plan 116; 1904, 200; for date see 1905, 29). A similar 'earth rampart' was found at Tell el-Hesi, the ancient Lachish.

The Semitic invaders, who appeared in Canaan about the middle of the third millennium, were able with their tools of bronze to carry the art of fortification far beyond this primitive stage. Their cities were planted for the most part on an outlying spur of a mountain range, or on a more or less isolated eminence or tell. In either case the steep rock-faces of nature's building may be said to have been the city's first line of defence. The walls, of crude brick or stone, with which art supplemented nature, followed the contours of the ridge, the rock itself being frequently cut away to form artificial scarps, on the top of which the city wall was built. Consequently the walls were not required to be of uniform height throughout the encinte, being lowest where the rock scarp was steepest, and highest on that side of the city from which approach was easiest and attack most to be feared. In the latter case, as at Jerusalem, which was assailable only from the north, it was usual to strengthen the defences by a wide and deep trench. Where, on the other hand, the city was perched upon an elevated tell, as at Gezer, Lachish, and in the Shephelah generally, a trench was not required.

The recent excavations in Palestine have shown that the fortifications of Canaanite and Hebrew cities were built, like their houses, of sun-dried bricks, or of stone, or of both combined. When brick was the chief material

It was usual to begin with one or more foundation courses of stone as a protection against damp. After the introduction of the battering-ram (§ 6) it was necessary to increase the resistance of brick walls by a revetment or facing of stone, or less frequently of kiln-burnt bricks, more especially in the lower part of the wall. At Tell el-Hesi or Lachish the lower face of the north wall had been preserved by a strengthening wall on the outside, consisting of large rough stones in a parallel line about three feet away, with the intervening space filled in with pebbles' (Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, 29). At Tell es-Safi, again—perhaps the ancient Gath—the lower part of the city wall 'shows external and internal facings of rubble with a packing of earth and small field stones,' while the upper part had been built of large mud bricks (Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, 30—to be cited in the sequel as BM. Exc. In this work will be found detailed descriptions, with plans and illustrations, of the walls of the various cities of Southern Palestine excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1898-1900).

The treatment of the stone used for fortifications and other masonry of importance varied considerably in the successive periods, gradually advancing from that of the imposing but primitive 'cyclopean' walls characteristic of the early architecture of the Levant, to the carefully dressed stones with drafted margins, laid in perfect courses, of the Herodian period. There was also a great variety in the size of the stones employed. Some of those still in situ in the wall of the Temple enclosure at Jerusalem are 'over 30 feet long, 8 feet wide, and 3½ feet high, weighing over 80 tons' (Warren), and even these are exceeded by the colossal stones, over 60 feet in length, still to be seen in the temple wall at Baalbek.

2. The thickness of the walls varied from city to city, and even in the same city, being to a certain extent dependent on the required height at any given point. The outer wall of Gezer, of date cir. B.C. 1500, was 14 feet in thickness. At one period the north wall of Lachish was 'at least 17 feet thick,' while a thickness of 28 ft. is reached by a wall which is regarded as the oldest fortification of Megiddo. The foot of this wall, according to a well-known practice, was protected by a glacis of beaten earth.

To increase the strength of a wall, the earliest builders were content to add to its thickness by means of buttresses, which, by increasing the projection, gradually pass into towers. The latter were indispensable at the corners of walls (cf. 2 Ch 26⁸, Zeph 1¹⁶, both RVm; see the plans of the walls and towers of Tell Zakariya etc. in BM. Exc.). Besides strengthening the wall, the projecting towers were of the first importance as enabling the defenders to command the portion of the walls, technically the 'curtain,' between them.

Col. Billerbeck, a recognized authority on ancient fortifications, has shown that the length of the curtain between the towers was determined by the effective range of the bows and slings of the period, which he estimates at 30 metres, say, 100 feet (Der Festungsbau im Alten Orient, Af.). This estimate receives a striking confirmation from the earlier of the two walls of Gezer, of date cir. B.C. 2900. This wall is provided with 'long narrow towers, of small projection, at intervals of 90 feet,' which is precisely the distance between the towers of Sargon's city at Khorsabad. The most famous towers in later Hebrew history are the three 'royal towers' of Herod's Jerusalem—Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamme.

3. The height of the fortifications, as we have seen, varied with the nature of the site. The minimum height, according to Billerbeck (op. cit. 6), was about 30 feet, this being the maximum length of the ancient scaling-ladders. No Canaanite city wall, however, has yet been found intact, and we can only calculate roughly from the breadth what the height may have been in any particular case. The former, according to the authority just quoted, had for reasons of stability to be from one-third to two-thirds of the height. From the numerous representations of city walls on the Assyrian sculptures, and from other sources, we know that the walls were furnished with a breastwork or battlements, generally crenellated—probably the pinnacles of Is 54¹⁴ RV. The towers in particular were provided with projecting battlements supported on corbels springing from the wall.

When the site was strongly protected by nature, a single wall sufficed; otherwise it was necessary to have an outer wall, which was of less height than the main wall. This is the chēl frequently mentioned in OT, generally rendered rampart (1 K 21²³) or bulwark (Is 26¹). At Tell Sandahannah—probably the ancient Mareshah—were found two walls of the same period, the outer being in some places 15 feet in advance of the inner (BM. Exc. 54). It was on a similar outer wall (chēl) that the 'wise woman of Abel of Beth-maacah' held parley with Joab (2 S 20¹⁴); for the reading see Cent. Bible, in loc. Jerusalem, as is well known, was latterly 'fenced' on the N. and N.W. by three independent walls (see JERUSALEM).

4. In addition to its walls, every ancient city of importance possessed a strongly fortified place, corresponding to the acropolis of Greek cities, which served as a refuge from, and a last defence against, the enemy when the city itself had been stormed (cf. Jg 9⁵¹). Such was the 'strong tower' of Thebez (Jg. loc. cit.), the castle in Tirzah (1 K 16¹⁸ RV), and the tower of Jezreel (2 K 9¹⁷). The most frequent designation in EV, however, is hold or strong hold, as the 'strong hold' of Zion (2 S 5⁷), the acropolis of the Jebusite city, which AV in v. 9 terms 'the fort,' and in 1 Ch 11¹ 'the castle of Zion.' In the later struggles with the Syrians and Romans, respectively, two Jerusalem forts played an important part: the citadel (RV) of 1 Mac 13³⁴ etc. (in the original the Acra, built by Antiochus IV.); and the castle of Antonia, on the site of the earlier 'castle' of Nehemiah's day (Neh 2⁸ 7² RV), and itself the 'castle' of Ac 21³⁴ 22³⁴ etc.

Apart from these citadels there is frequent mention in OT of fortresses in the modern sense of the word,—that is, strong places specially designed to protect the frontier, and to command the roads and passes by which the country might be invaded. Such were most of the places built, i.e. fortified, by Solomon (1 K 9¹⁵ 17¹); the 'strong holds' fortified and provisioned by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11¹¹), the 'castles and towers' built by Jotham (27⁴), and many more. A smaller isolated fort was named 'the tower of the watchmen' (2 K 17¹⁸). Among the more famous fortresses of later times may be named as types: the Idumean fortress of Bethsura, conspicuous in the Maccabæan struggle; Jotapata, the fortress in Galilee associated with the name of the historian Josephus; Machærus, said by Pliny to have been the strongest place in Palestine, next to Jerusalem; and Masada, the scene of the Jews' last stand against the Romans.

While there is Egyptian evidence for the existence of fortresses in Southern Palestine or the neighbourhood as early as B.C. 3600, and while a statue of Gudea (cir. B.C. 3000), with the tracing of an elaborate fortress, shows that the early Babylonians were expert fortress builders, the oldest actual remains of a Canaanite fortress are those discovered by Schumacher on the site of Megiddo in 1904, and dated by him between B.C. 2500 and 2000. Its most interesting feature is a fosse 8 ft. wide and from 6 to 10 ft. deep, with a counter-scarp lined with stone. At the neighbouring Taanach Dr. Sellin laid bare several forts, among them the now famous 'castle of Ishtar-Washshur,' in which was found 'the first Palestinian library yet discovered,' in the shape of a series of cuneiform tablets containing this prince's correspondence with neighbouring chiefs.

It is impossible within the limits of this article to give details of those interesting buildings. The student is referred to Sellin's Tell Ta'anek in vol. 50 (1904), and his Nachlese in vol. 52 (1905), of the Denkschriften of the Vienna Academy

An excellent résumé, with plans and photographs, both of the Taanach and the Megiddo fortresses, is given by Father Vincent in his Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, pp. 47-65. More easily accessible to the ordinary student is the detailed account, with measurements and plans, of the citadel of Tell Zakariya—perhaps the ancient Azekah fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁹, cf. Jer 34⁷)—given by Bliss and Macalister in their Excavations, etc., pp. 14-23, and plates 2-5.

5. No mention has as yet been made of an important element in the line of a city's defences, namely, the gates. These were as few as possible, as being the weakest part of the defence, and for the same reason the strongest towers are found on either side of the gates (cf. 2 Ch 26⁹). The most effective arrangement was to make the gateway a passage through a single gate-tower, which projected beyond both the outer and inner faces of the wall. In such cases two gates were provided, an outer and an inner, at either end of the passage, as was the case at Mahanaim, where David is found sitting 'between the two gates' (2 S 18²⁴). Here we further learn that it was usual to have a stair leading up to an upper storey in the gate-tower (v. 3³), the roof of which was apparently on a level with the top of the city wall (v. 2⁴). In place of a straight passageway through the tower, a passage bent at a right angle like the letter L increased the possibilities of defence. In most cases the base of the L would be on the inside, towards the city, but in one of the Taanach forts above referred to the outer gate is in the side of an outer tower, and it is the inner gate that is in line with the walls (see restored plan in Vincent, op. cit. 59). The average width of the numerous gateways laid bare by recent excavation is about nine feet.

The gate itself, called the 'door of the gate' in Neh 6¹, consisted ordinarily of two parts or leaves (Is 45¹) of wood. For greater security against fire these were often overlaid with bronze, the 'gates of brass' of Ps 107¹⁶, Is 45². The leaves were hung on pivots which turned in sockets in the sill and lintel, and were fastened by bolts let into the former. A strong bar or bars of wood, bronze (1 K 4³), or iron (Job 40¹³) secured the whole gate, passing transversely into sockets in the gate-posts, as we learn from Samson's exploit at Gaza (Jg 16¹⁻³). 'To have the charge of the gate' (2 K 7¹⁷) was a military post of honour, as this passage shows. In war time, at least, a sentinel was posted on the roof of the gate-house or tower (2 S 18²⁴, cf. 2 K 9¹⁷).

6. It remains to deal briefly with the siegecraft of the Hebrews and their contemporaries. A 'fenced' or fortified place might be captured in three ways: (a) by assault or storm, (b) by a blockade, or (c) by a regular siege. (a) The first method was most likely to succeed in the case of places of moderate strength, or where treachery was at work (cf. Jg 12³⁰). The assault was directed against the weakest points of the enceinte, particularly the gates (cf. Is 28⁹). Before the Hebrews learned the use of the battering-ram, entrance to an enemy's city or fortress was obtained by setting fire to the gates (Jg 9^{19, 22}), and by scaling the walls by means of scaling-ladders, under cover of a deadly shower of arrows and sling-stones. According to 1 Ch 11⁶, Joab was the first to scale the walls of the Jebusite fortress of Zion, when David took it by assault. Although scaling-ladders are explicitly mentioned only in 1 Mac 5³⁰—a prior reference may be found in Pr 21¹²—they are familiar objects in the Egyptian representations of sieges from an early date, as well as in the later Assyrian representations, and may be assumed to have been used by the Hebrews from the first. In early times, as is plain from the accounts of the capture of Ai (Jos 8¹⁰⁻¹⁶) and Shechem (Jg 9²²), a favourite stratagem was to entice the defenders from the city by a pretended flight, and then a force placed in ambush would make a dash for the gate.

(b) The second method was to completely surround the city, and, by preventing ingress and egress, to starve it into surrender. This was evidently the method adopted by Joab at the blockade of Rabbath-ammon, which was forced to capitulate after the capture of the 'water fort' (for this rendering see Cent. Bible on 2 S 12²¹), by which the defenders' main water-supply was cut off.

(c) In conducting a regular siege, which of course included both blockade and assault, the first step was to 'cast up a bank' (AV 2 S 20¹⁵, 2 K 19³², Is 37³⁵) or mount (AV Ezk 4² 17¹⁷—RV has 'mount,' Amer. RV 'mound' throughout). This was a mound of earth which was gradually advanced till it reached the walls, and was almost equal to them in height, and from which the besiegers could meet the besieged on more equal terms. The 'mount' is first met with in the account of Joab's siege of Abel of Beth-maacah (2 S 20^{15ff.}). In EV Joab is represented as, at the same time, 'battering' or, in RVm, 'undermining' the wall, but the text is here in some disorder. Battering-rams are first mentioned in Ezekiel, and are scarcely to be expected so early as the time of David. The Egyptians used a long pole, with a metal point shaped like a spear-head, which was not swung but worked by hand, and could only be effective, therefore, against walls of crude brick (see illustr. in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i. 242).

The battering-engines (Ezk 26⁹ RV; AV 'engines of war') of the Assyrians were called 'rams' by the Hebrews (Ezk 4² 21⁷), from their butting action, although they were without the familiar ram's head of the Roman aries. The Assyrian battering-ram ended either in a large spear-head, as with the Egyptians, or in a flat head shod with metal, and was worked under the shelter of large wooden towers mounted on four or six wheels, of which there are many representations in the Assyrian wall-sculptures (see illustr. in Toy's 'Ezekiel,' SBOT, 102). These towers were sometimes of several storeys, in which archers were stationed, and were moved forward against the walls on the mounds above described.

When Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, his troops are said to have 'built forts against it round about' (2 K 25¹, cf. Ezk 4²), but the original term is obscure, and is rather, probably, to be understood in the sense of a siege-wall or circumvallation—the 'bank' of Lk 19³³ RV—for the purpose of making the blockade effective. On the other hand, the bulwarks of 1 K 20²⁹, also Ec 9¹², which had to be made of wood other than 'trees for meat,' properly denote wooden forts or other siege works (Is 29³ RV) built for the protection of the besiegers in their efforts to storm or undermine the walls.

7. The Assyrian sculptures give life-like pictures of the various operations of ancient siegecraft. Here we see the massive battering-rams detaching the stones or bricks from an angle of the wall, while the defenders, by means of a grappling-chain, are attempting to drag the ram from its covering tower. There the archers are pouring a heavy fire on the men upon the wall, from behind large rectangular shields or screens of wood or wickerwork, standing on the ground, with a small projecting cover. These are intended by the 'shield' of 2 K 19²⁶, the 'buckler' of Ezk 26⁴, and the mantelet of Nah 2⁶, all named in connexion with siege works. In another place the miners are busy undermining the wall with picks, protected by a curved screen of wickerwork supported by a pole (illustr. of both screens in Toy, op. cit. 149; cf. Wilkinson, op. cit. i. 243).

The monuments also show that the Assyrians had machines for casting large stones long before the tormenta, or siege-artillery, are said to have been invented in Sicily in B.C. 399. By the 'artillery' of 1 S 20⁴⁰ AV is, of course, meant the ordinary bow and arrows; but Uziah is credited by the Chronicler with having 'made engines invented by cunning men to be on the towers and upon the battlements to shoot arrows and great stones withal' (2 Ch 26¹⁸). The Books of the Maccabees show that by the second century, at least, the Jews were not behind their neighbours in the use of the artillery (1 Mac 6³⁴. AV) of the period, 'engines of war and instruments for casting fire and stones, and pieces to cast darts and slings.' (A detailed description, with illustrations, of these catapultæ and ballistæ, as the Romans termed them, will be found in the art. 'Tormentum' in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq.) At the siege of Gezer (such is the best reading, 1 Mac 13⁴²) Simon is even said to have used effectively a piece of the most formidable siege-artillery then known, the helepolis (lit. 'city-taker,' RV 'engine of siege'), which Titus also employed in the siege of Jerusalem (for description see 'Helepolis' in Smith, op. cit.). In this siege the Jews had 300 pieces for discharging arrows or rather bolts (catapultæ), and 40 pieces for casting stones (ballistæ), according to Josephus, who gives a graphic account of the working of these formidable 'engines of war' in his story of the siege of Jotapata (BJ iii. vii. 23.)

8. The aim of the besieged was by every artifice in their power to counteract the efforts of the besiegers to scale or to make a breach in the walls (Am 4²), and in particular to destroy their siege works and artillery. The battering-rams were rendered ineffective by letting down bags of chaff and other fenders from the battlements, or were thrown out of action by grappling-chains, or by having the head broken off by huge stones hurled from above. The mounds supporting the besiegers' towers were undermined, and the towers themselves and the other engines set on fire (1 Mac 6¹²; cf. the 'fiery darts' or arrows of Eph 6¹⁶).

In addition to the efforts of the bowmen, slingers, and javelin-throwers, who manned the walls, boiling oil was poured on those attempting to place the scaling-ladders, or to pass the boarding-bridges from the towers to the battlements. Of all these and many other expedients the Jewish War of Josephus is a familiar répertoire. There, too, will be found the fullest account of the dire distress to which a city might be reduced by a prolonged siege (cf. 2 K 6²⁴). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FORTUNATUS.—The name of an apparently young member of the household of Stephanas, and a Corinthian. With Stephanas and Achaicus he visited St. Paul at Ephesus (1 Co 16¹⁷); he had probably been baptized by the Apostle himself (16¹⁶). Lightfoot (Clement i. 29, li. 187) thinks that he may well have been alive forty years later, and that he may be the Fortunatus mentioned in Clement of Rome's Epistle to the Corinthians (§ 65). The manner in which the name is there introduced suggests that it belongs to a Corinthian. A. J. MACLEAN.

FORTUNE.—See GAD (tribe and god).

FOUNDATION.—Great importance was attached to the laying of the foundation. It was accompanied by human sacrifice, as may be seen in the Babylonian records; a possible trace occurs in the story of Hiel (1 K 16³⁴). Hence the stress on the size and splendour of the foundation, as in Solomon's Temple (7²). It is a natural metaphor for the ultimate basis on which a thing rests (Job 4², Ezk 13⁴, Lk 6⁴⁸). Righteousness and judgment are the foundation of God's throne (Ps 89¹⁰ 97¹ RV). 'The city that hath the foundations' is the type of the real and eternal (He 11¹⁰). The Apostles themselves are the foundation of the New Jerusalem, formed of all manner of precious stones (Rev 21¹⁴ 19). 'The Apostolic Church is conditioned through the ages by the preaching and work of the Apostolate' (Swete, ad loc.; cf. Is 28¹⁶, Mt 16¹⁸, Eph 2²⁰). In 1 Co 3¹⁰ the metaphor is slightly different, the preaching of Jesus Christ being the one foundation (cf. Is 19¹⁰ RVm, where the word is used of the chief men of the State). In the frequent phrase 'from the foundation of the world,' the word is active meaning 'founding.' 'Foundations' occurs similarly in a passive sense, the earth being more or less literally conceived of as a huge building resting on pillars etc. (Ps 187¹² 24², Is 24¹⁸). In Ps 113⁷ 75⁸ 82⁸, Ezk 30⁴, the idea is applied metaphorically to the 'fundamental' principles of law and justice on which the moral order rests. In 2 Ch 3¹, Is 64¹⁰, Jer 50¹⁶, RV should be followed. In 2 Ch 23⁵ the 'gate of the foundation' is obscure; possibly we should read 'the horse-gate.' See also HOUSE, § 3. C. W. EMMET.

FOUNTAIN.—A word applied to living springs of water as contrasted with cisterns (Lv 11³⁶); specifically of Beer-lahai-roi (Gn 16⁷), Elim (Nu 33², RV here 'springs'), Nephtoa (Jos 15⁷), and Jezreel (1 S 29¹). The porous chalky limestone of Palestine abounds in good springs of water, which, owing to their importance in a country rainless half the year, were eagerly coveted (Jg 1¹⁶). In many springs the flow of water has been directed and increased by enlarging to tunnels the fissures through which the water trickled; many of these tunnels are of considerable length. Specimens exist at 'Urtas, Bittir, and other places near Jerusalem. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

FOWL.—The word 'fowl' is used in AV for any kind of bird. The two words 'bird' and 'fowl' are employed simply for the sake of variety or perhaps to distinguish two different Heb. or Gr. words occurring near one another. Thus Gn 15⁹ 'the birds' (Heb. aiyyōr) divided he not, 15¹¹ 'when the fowls' (Heb. ayit) came down upon the carcasses'; Jer 12⁹ 'the birds round about' (same Heb. as 'fowls' in Gn 15¹¹), Ps 8⁸ 'the fowl of the air' (same Heb. as 'birds' in Gn 15¹⁰). See BIRD.

FOWLER.—See SNARES.

FOX.—(1) shū āl, see JACKAL. (2) ālōpēz (Gr.), Mt 8³⁰, Lk 9³⁸ 13³². In the NT there is no doubt that the common fox and not the jackal is intended. It is noted in Rabbinical literature and in Palestinian folklore for its cunning and treachery. It burrows in the ground (Lk 9³⁸). The small Egyptian fox (Vulpes nilotica) is common in S. Palestine, while the Tawny fox (V. flavescens), a larger animal of lighter colour, occurs farther north. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FRANKINCENSE (libbānāh; Gr. libanos Mt 21¹, Rev 18¹³).—Frankincense is in six passages (Is 43³ 60⁶ 66³, Jer 6²⁰ 17³ 41⁵) mistranslated in AV 'incense,' but correctly in RV. It is a sweet-smelling gum, obtained as a milky exudation from various species of Boswellia, the frankincense tree, an ally of the terebinth. The gum was imported from S. Arabia (Is 60⁶, Jer 6²⁰); it was a constituent of incense (Ex 30³⁴); it is often associated with myrrh (Ca 3⁶ 4⁶, Mt 21¹); it was offered with the shewbread (Lv 24⁷). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FRAY.—This obsolete Eng. verb is found in Zec 1²¹ and 1 Mac 14¹² ('every man sat under his vine and his fig tree, and there was none to fray them'); and 'fray away' occurs in Dt 28²⁶, Jer 7³, Sir 22²⁹ ('whoso casteth a stone at the birds frayeth them away'). It is a shortened form of 'afray,' of which the ptcp. 'afraid' is still in use.

FREE.—In the use of this adj. in the Eng. Bible notice 1 P 2¹⁶ 'as free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God, that is, free from the Law, yet servants (slaves) to the higher law of love to God.' Ps 88⁵ 'free among the dead,' a difficult passage; the probable meaning of the Heb. is 'separated from companionship' or perhaps from Divine protection. Ac 22²⁸ 'I was free born,' that is, as a Roman citizen. 2 Th 3¹ 'Pray for us that the word of the Lord may have free course' (Gr. literally 'May run,' as Avm and RV); 'free' means 'unhindered' as in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, v. ii. 738, 'For mine own part, I breathe free breath.' Ps 51¹ 'uphold me with thy free spirit' (RVm and Amer. RV 'willing'); the word means generous, noble, and the reference is to the man's own spirit (RV 'with a free spirit').

FREELY.—The use to observe is when 'freely' means 'gratuitously,' as Nu 11⁴ 'We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely' (Vulg. gratis); Mt 10⁸ 'freely ye received freely give' (Gr. dōrean, Rheim. 'gratis').

FREEWILL.—See PREDESTINATION.

FRINGES.—In Nu 15³⁸ the Hebrews are com

manded to 'make them fringes (Heb. tsistith) in the borders [but RVm 'tassels in the corners'] of their garments throughout their generations.' The same ordinance, somewhat differently expressed, is found in the earlier legislation of Dt.: 'Thou shalt make thee fringes (lit., as RVm, 'twisted threads') upon the four quarters (RV borders) of thy vesture wherewith thou coverest thyself' (Dt 22¹²). The 'vesture' here referred to is the plaid-like upper garment of the Hebrews, as is evident from Ex 22⁷, where 'vesture' (RV 'covering') is defined as the simlah, the upper 'garment' (RV) in question, as described under DRESS, § 4 (a).

The 'fringes' to be made for this garment, however, are not a continuous fringe round the four sides, like the fringes which are a characteristic feature of Assyrian dress, but, as RVm, tassels of twisted or plaited threads, and are to be fastened to the four corners of the simlah. It was further required 'that they put upon the fringe of each border a cord of blue' (Nu 15³⁸ RV), the precise meaning of which is uncertain. It is usually taken to mean that each tassel was to be attached by means of this cord of blue, or rather of blue-purple, to a corner of the simlah.

That this ordinance was faithfully observed by the Jews of NT times is seen from the references to the tsistith or tassel of our Lord's upper garment, disguised in EV under the 'hem' (AV) of Mt 9²⁰ 14³⁶, and 'border' of Mk 6⁴, Lk 8⁴. RV has 'border' throughout. These tassels are still worn by the Jews, attached to the tallith or prayer-shawl, and to the smaller tallith, in the shape of a chest-protector, now worn as an undergarment but without the addition of the blue thread. (For the somewhat complicated method by which the tassels are made, the mode of attachment, and the mystical significance assigned to the threads and knots, see Hastings' DB ii. 69^a; for illustration see i. 627^a.) In the passage in Nu. it is expressly said that the object of this ordinance was to furnish the Hebrews with a visible reminder of the obligation resting upon them, as J's chosen people, to walk in His law and to keep all His commandments. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the practice of wearing such tassels was unknown before the date of the Deuteronomic legislation. On the contrary, the representations of Asiatics on the walls of tombs and other Egyptian monuments show that tasselled garments are of early date in Western Asia (see plate i b of Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, vol. i., where note that the tassels are of blue threads). Hence it is altogether probable that the object of the Hebrew legislation is 'to make a deeply rooted custom serve a fitting religious purpose' (G. B. Gray, 'Numbers' [ICC], 183 f.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FROCK.—In the Greek text of Sir 40^a the poor man's dress is said to be of unbleached linen, paraphrased in AV as 'a linen' and in RV as 'a hempen frock.' The Hebrew original has, 'he that wraps himself in a mantle of hair' (Smend), for which see DRESS, § 4 (c). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

FROG.—1. tsephardēa, Ex 8²⁻¹⁴, Ps 78⁴⁶ 105³⁰—one of the plagues of Egypt. 2. batrachos (Gr.), Rev 16¹³ 14, a type of uncleanness. The edible frog and the little green tree-frog are both common all over the Holy Land. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

FRONTLETS.—See ORNAMENTS, 2; PHYLACTERIES.

FRWARD.—'Froward' is a dialectic form of 'fromward'; it is the opposite of 'toward,' as we say 'to and fro' for 'to and from.' Thus its meaning is perverse. The word is used chiefly in Proverbs. In NT it occurs only once, 1 P 2¹⁸, where the Gr. means literally tortuous like the course of a river, and then is applied to conduct that is not straightforward. Frowardly is found in Is 57¹⁷ 'and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart.' The Heb. is lit. 'he walked turning away,' as AVm. Frowardness occurs only in Pr. (24⁶ 10²⁵). Barlowe says 'Moyses the most faythfull seruaunte of God was partly by their frowardnes debarred fro the plesaunte lande of behest.'

FRUIT.—See FOON, § 4.

FRYING-PAN.—See HOUSE, § 9.

FUEL.—The principal 'fuel' (lit. 'food') of fire' (Is 9⁵ 19) in use among the Hebrews was undoubtedly wood, either in its natural state or, among the wealthier classes, as charcoal (see COAL). The trees which furnished the main supply (cf. Is 44¹⁴) probably differed little from those so employed in Syria at the present day, for which see PEFSL., 1891, 118 ff. Among other sources of supply were shrubs and undergrowth of all kinds, including the broom (Ps 120^a RVm) and the buck-thorn (58⁸); also chaff and other refuse of the threshing-floor (Mt 3¹²); and withered herbage, the 'grass' of Mt 6³⁰. The use of dried animal dung as fuel, which is universal in the modern East, was apparently not unknown to the Hebrews (cf. Ezk 4¹³⁻¹⁶). See further, HOUSE, § 7.

FULLER, FULLER'S FIELD.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 6, and JERUSALEM, i. 4.

FULNESS.—See PLEROMA.

FURLONG.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FURNACE.—EV tr. of kiḥshān (Gn 19²⁵, Ex 9⁸ etc.), 'ḫū (Ps 12⁹), kār (Dt 4²⁰, 1 K 8⁴ etc.), 'attūn (Dn 3⁴ 11 etc.), which stand for either a brick-kiln or a smelting furnace; and of tannūr, which is better rendered 'oven' (see BREAD).

FURNITURE.—In the AV 'furniture' is used in the general sense of furnishings, just as Bunyan speaks of 'soldiers and their furniture' (Holy War, p. 112). 1. For the details of house furniture, see HOUSE, § 8. In this sense we read also of 'the furniture of the tabernacle' (Ex 31⁷, Nu 3⁸ RV, for AV 'instruments,' and elsewhere). For the less appropriate 'furniture' of the table of shewbread and of 'the candlestick' (Ex 31⁸), RV has 'vessels.'

2. The 'camel's furniture' of Gn 31⁴ was a 'camel-palankeen' (Orf. Heb. Lex. p. 1124), 'a crated frame, with cushions and carpets inside, and protected by an awning above, fastened to the camel's saddle' (Driver, Genesis, in loc.), still used by women travellers in the East. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

GAAL, son of Ebed (Jg 9²⁵), organized the rising against Abimelech by the discontented in Shechem. Zebul, Abimelech's officer there, warned his master, who came with a strong force, and defeated the rebels under Gaal outside the city. Gaal and his brethren were driven out of Shechem, and terrible vengeance was taken upon the disaffected city. See ABIMELECH, 2. W. EWING.

GAASH.—A mountain in Ephraim (Jos 24³⁰, Jg 2⁹). The torrent-valleys of Gaash are mentioned in 2 S 23²⁵ = 1 Ch 11²⁵.

GABAEI.—1. A distant ancestor of Tobit (To 1¹). 2. A friend and kinsman of Tobit, residing at Rages in Media. To him Tobit, when purveyor to the king of Assyria, once entrusted, as a deposit, 10 talents of silver (To 1¹⁴). When blindness and poverty came on Tobit in Nineveh, he recollected, after prayer, the long-forgotten treasure (To 4¹), and wished his son Tobias to fetch it (v. 21). Tobias found a guide, Raphael in disguise, who said he had lodged with Gabaei (To 5⁶). When Tobias married Sarah in Ecbatana, he sent Raphael for the deposit (9²).

GABATHA.—One of two eunuchs whose plot against Artaxerxes (the Ahasuerus, i.e. Xerxes, of canonical Est.) was discovered and frustrated by Mardocheus (Mordecai) Ad. Est 12¹. In Est 2¹ he is called Bigthan and in 6¹ Bigthana.

GABBAI.—A Benjamite (Neh 11⁸, but text doubtful).

GABBATHA (Jn 19¹³).—The meaning of this word is most uncertain; possibly 'height' or 'ridge.' It is used as the Heb. or Aramaic equivalent of the Gr. litrostrōton or 'pavement.' There is no mention in any other place of either Gabbatha or 'the Pavement.' That it was, as has been suggested, a portable tessellated pavement such as Julius Caesar is said to have carried about with him, seems highly improbable. Tradition has identified as Gabbatha an extensive sheet of Roman pavement recently excavated near the Ecce Homo Arch. It certainly covered a large area, and the blocks of stone composing it are massive, the average size being 4 ft. x 3 ft. 6 in. and nearly 2 ft. thick. The pavement is in parts roughened for the passage of animals and chariots, but over most of the area it is smooth. The paved area was on a lofty place, the ground rapidly falling to east and west, and was in close proximity to, it not actually included within, the Antonia.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GABBE (1 Es 5²⁰).—In Ezr 2³⁶ Geba.

GABRIAS.—The brother of the Gabael to whom Tobit entrusted 10 talents of silver (To 1¹⁴; in 4²⁰ AV and RV wrongly tr. 'Gabael the son of Gabrias').

GABRIEL ('man of God').—In the first rank of the innumerable hosts of the heavenly hierarchy (Dn 7¹⁰) there are seven who occupy the first place—the seven archangels; of these Gabriel is one. In Dn 8¹⁶ Gabriel is sent to explain to Daniel the meaning of the vision of the ram and the he-goat; in 9²¹ he tells Daniel of the seventy weeks which are 'decreed' upon the people and the holy city. This is the only mention of Gabriel in the OT. In post-Biblical literature the name occurs more frequently. He appears twice in the NT as God's messenger. He is sent to announce to Zacharias that Elisabeth will bear a son; he also tells the name that the child is to bear (Lk 1¹³⁻²⁰). In Lk 1²⁶⁻³⁸ he appears to the Virgin Mary and announces the birth of a son to her; here again he says what the name of the child is to be: 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus.'

In the Babylonian and Persian angelologies there are analogies to the seven archangels of the Jews, and the possibility of Jewish belief having been influenced by these must not be lost sight of. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

GAD ('fortunate').—Gn 30⁹ (J), 35⁹ (P); the first son of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, by Jacob, and full brother of Asher ('Happy'). This like other of the tribal names, e.g. Dan, Asher, is very probably, despite this popular etymology, the name of a deity (cf. Is 65¹¹, where AV renders 'troop' but RV 'Fortune'). Another semi-etymology or, better, paronomasia (Gn 49¹⁴) connects the name of the tribe with its warlike experiences and characteristics, taking note only of this feature of the tribal life:

wehū yāghūdh 'āqēbh:*

'As for Gad, plunderers shall plunder him,
And he shall plunder in the rear' (i.e. effect reprisals and plunder in return).

In the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33²⁰) Gad is compared to a lioness that teareth the arm and the crown of the head, and later (1 Ch 12⁸⁻¹⁴) the Gadites who joined David are described as leonine in appearance and incomparable in combat: 'Their faces are as the faces of lions, the smallest is equal to a hundred and the greatest to a thousand.'

Upon the genetic relations of Gad and Asher the genealogy throws no light, for the fact that Gad and Asher, as it appears, were names of related divinities of Good Fortune would be sufficient ground for uniting them; but why they should have been brought together under the name of Zilpah is not to be conjectured with any certainty. Leah, unlike Rachel, who was barren until after her maid had brought forth to Jacob, had already borne four sons before Zilpah was called in to help her infirmity.

It appears that Gad, notwithstanding the genealogy, was a late tribe. In the Song of Deborah it is not even mentioned. Gilead there takes its place, but Mesha (9th cent.) knows the inhabitants of Gilead as the 'men of Gad.'

The families of Gad are given by P in Gn 46¹⁶ and Nu 26¹⁸⁻²⁸. 1 Ch 5¹¹⁻¹² repeats them with variations. In the Sinal census P gives 46,650 men of war. By the time they had reached the Wilderness they had decreased to 40,500. Their position on the march through the desert is variously given in Numbers as 3rd, 6th, 11th.

Nu 32³⁴⁻³⁵ (P) gives eight towns lying within the territory of Gad. The most southerly, Aroer, lay upon the Arnon; the most northerly, Jogbehah, not far from the Jabbok. Ataroth, another of these towns, is mentioned on the Moabite stone (l. 10), and the 'men of Gad' are there said to have dwelt within it 'from of old.' Within this region, and clustering about Heshbon, P gives six cities to the Reubenites. But in Jos 13¹⁶⁻¹⁷ Reuben has all to the south of Heshbon, and Gad all to the north of it. Owing to the divergent statements in the Hexateuch and the historical books, it is quite impossible to say what the northern boundary was. In any case it was not a stable one.

The reason assigned by the traditions for the settlement of Gad and Reuben in Gilead is that they were pastoral tribes, with large herds and flocks, and that they found the land pre-eminently adapted to their needs. They, therefore, obtained from Moses permission to settle on the east side of Jordan after they had first crossed the river and helped the other tribes in the work of conquest (see Nu 32 and Dt 3¹⁸⁻²⁰).

After the conquest, in the time of the Judges, the people of Gilead were overrun by the Ammonites until Jephthah finally wrought their deliverance. In David's conflicts with Saul, the Gadites and other eastern tribes came to his assistance. As the Mesha stone shows, they had probably at that time absorbed the Reubenites, who had been more exposed previously to Moabite attacks, which at this time fell more directly upon Gad. When the northern tribes revolted, Jeroboam must have found the Gadites among his staunchest supporters, for it was to Penuel in Gadite territory that he moved the capital from Shechem in Ephraim (1 K 12²⁵).

In 734 the Gadites with their kinsmen of the East Jordan, Galilee and Naphtali, were carried captive by Tiglath-pileser III. when Ahaz in his perplexity ventured upon the bold alternative of appealing to him for assistance against the powerful confederation of Syrians, Israelites, and Edomites who had leagued together to dethrone him (1 K 15²⁹, 2 Ch 28¹⁶⁻²⁰). It was clearly a case of Scylla and Charybdis for Ahaz. It was fatal for Gad. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

GAD.—A god whose name appears in Gn 30¹¹ ('by the help of Gad'); so in v. 13 'by the help of Asherah'; in the place-names Baal-gad, and Migdal-gad (Jos 11¹⁷ 12⁷ 13⁸ 15²⁷); and in the personal name Azgad (Ezr 2²⁴, Neh 7¹⁷ 10¹⁵). In Is 65¹¹ Gad (RV 'Fortune') and Meni are named as two demons with whom the Israelites held communion (see MENI). Gad was probably an appellative before it became a personal name for a divinity, and is of Aramæan, Arabian, and Syrian provenance, but not Babylonian. He was the god who gave good fortune (Gr. Tyche), and presided over a person, house, or mountain. W. F. COBB.

GAD is entitled 'the seer' (1 Ch 29²⁹, 'David's' or 'the king's seer' (1 Ch 21⁹, 2 Ch 29²⁵, 2 S 24¹¹), or 'the prophet' (1 S 22⁵, 2 S 24¹¹). He is represented as having announced the Divine condemnation on the royal census, and as having advised the erection of an altar on Araunah's threshing-floor (2 S 24¹⁸ = 1 Ch 21¹⁸). The Chronicler again (1 Ch 29²⁹) names him as having written an account of some part of his master's reign. A late conception associated him with the prophet Nathan (2 Ch 29²⁵) in the task of planning some of the king's regulations with reference to the musical part of the service, while (1 S 22⁵) he is also stated to have acted as David's counsellor in peril during the period when the two dwelt together in 'the hold'.

GAD (Valley of).—Mentioned only in 2 S 24⁵, and there the text should read 'in the midst of the valley towards Gad,' the valley (wady) here being the Arnon (wh. see). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GADARA.—A town whose ruins (extensive, but in recent years much destroyed by the natives) bear the name of Umm Keis, about six miles S.E. of the Sea of Galilee. It was a town of the Decapolis, probably Greek in origin, and was the chief city of Peræa. The date of its foundation is unknown, its capture by Antiochus (B.C. 218) being the first event recorded of it. It was famous for its hot baths, the springs of which still exist. The narrative of the healing of the demoniac, according to Mt 8²⁸, is located in the 'country of the Gadarenes,' a reading repeated in some MSS of the corresponding passage of Lk. (8²⁶), where other MSS read Gergesenes. The probability is that neither of these is correct, and that we ought to adopt a third reading, Gerasenes, which is corroborated by Mk 5¹. This would refer the miracle not to Gadara, which, as noted above, was some distance from the Sea of Galilee, but to a more obscure place represented by the modern Kersa, on its Eastern shore.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GADARENES.—See GADARA.

GADDI.—The Manassite spy, Nu 13¹¹ (P).

GADDIEL.—The Zebulunite spy, Nu 13¹⁰ (P).

GADDIS (1 Mac 2²).—The surname of Johanan or John, the eldest brother of Judas Maccabæus. The name perhaps represents the Heb. Gaddi (Nu 13¹¹), meaning 'my fortune.'

GADI.—Father of Menahem king of Israel (2 K 15¹⁵, 17).

GADITES.—See GAD (tribe).

GAHAM.—A son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gn 22²⁴).

GAHAR.—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr. 2⁴⁷, Neh 7⁴⁹), called in 1 Es 5³⁰ Gedduur.

GAI.—Given as a proper name in RV of 1 S 17⁵² 'until thou comest to Gai,' where AV has 'until thou comest to the valley.' The LXX, as is noted in RVm, has Gath, and this would suit the context.

GAIUS.—This name is mentioned in five places of NT. One Gaius was St. Paul's host at Corinth, converted and baptized by him (Ro 16²³, 1 Co 1¹⁴). He was perhaps the same as 'Gaius of Derbe' who accompanied the Apostle from Greece to Asia (Ac 20⁴); if so, he would be a native of Derbe, but a dweller at Corinth. The Gaius of Macedonia, St. Paul's 'companion in travel' who was seized in the riot at Ephesus (Ac 19²⁹), and the Galus addressed by St. John (3 Jn¹), were probably different men. A. J. MACLEAN.

GALAL.—The name of two Levites (1 Ch 9¹⁵, 16, Neh 11¹⁷).

GALATIA is a Greek word, derived from Galata, the Gr. name for the Gauls who invaded Asia Minor in the year B.C. 278-7 (Lat. Gallogræci [= 'Greek Gauls'], to distinguish them from their kindred who lived in France and Northern Italy). These Gauls had been ravaging the south-eastern parts of Europe, Greece, Macedonia, and Thrace, and crossed into Asia Minor at the invitation of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. Part of the same southward tendency appears in their movements in Italy and their conflicts with the Romans in the early centuries of the Republic. Those who entered Asia Minor came as a nation with wives and families, not as mercenary soldiers. After some fifty years' raiding and warring, they found a permanent settlement in north-eastern Phrygia, where the population was unwarlike. Their history down to the time of the Roman Empire is best studied in Ramsay's Hist. Com. on Galatians, p. 45 ff. They continued throughout these two centuries to be the ruling caste of the district, greatly outnumbered by the native Phrygian population, who, though in many respects an inferior race, had a powerful influence on the religion, customs, and habits of the Gauls, as subject races often have over their conquerors. The earlier sense of the term Galatia is, then, the country occupied by the Gaulish immigrants, the former north-eastern part of Phrygia, and the term Galatæ is used after the occupation to include the subject Phrygians as well as the Galatæ strictly so called (c.g. 1 Mac 8²).

About B.C. 160 the Gauls acquired a portion of Lycaonia on their southern frontier, taking in Iconium and Lystra. About the same time also they had taken in Pessinus in the N.W. These and other expansions they ultimately owed to the support of Rome. From B.C. 64 Galatia was a client state of Rome. At the beginning of that period it was under three rulers; from B.C. 44 it was under one only. Deiotarus, the greatest of the Galatian chiefs, received Armenia Minor from Pompey in B.C. 64. Mark Antony conferred the eastern part of Paphlagonia on Castor as sole Galatian king in B.C. 40, and at the same time gave Amyntas a kingdom comprising Pisidia Phrygia and Pisidia generally. In B.C. 36, Castor's Galatian dominions and Pamphylia were added to Amyntas' kingdom. He was also given Iconium and the old Lycaonian tetrarchy, which Antony had formerly given to Polemon. After the battle of Actium in B.C. 31, Octavian conferred on Amyntas the additional country of Cilicia Tracheia. He had thus to keep order for Rome on the south side of the plateau and on the Taurus mountains. He governed by Roman methods, and, when he died in B.C. 25, he left his kingdom in such a state that Augustus resolved to take the greater part of it into the Empire in the stricter sense of that term, and made it into a province which he called Galatia. This is the second sense in which the term Galatia is used in ancient documents, namely, the sphere of duty which included the ethnic districts, Paphlagonia, Pontus Galaticus, Galatia (in the original narrower sense), Phrygia Galatica, and Lycaonia Galatica (with 'the Added Land,' part of the original Lycaonian tetrarchy). Galatia, as a province, means all these territories together, under one Roman governor, and the inhabitants of such a province, whatever their race, were, in conformity with invariable Roman custom, denominated by a name etymologically connected with the name of the province. Thus Galatæ ('Galatians') has a second sense, in conformity with the second sense of the term Galatia: it is used to include all the inhabitants of the province (see the first map in the above-mentioned work of Ramsay).

The word 'Galatia' occurs three times in the NT

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE

(1 Co 16¹, Gal 1², and 1 P 1¹). A possible fourth case (2 Ti 4¹⁰) must be left out of account, as the reading there is doubtful. There is an alternative 'Gallia,' which, even if it be not the original, suggests that the word 'Galatia' there should be taken in the sense of 'Gallia' (that is, France). It is beyond doubt that in the passage of 1 Peter the word must be taken in the sense of the province. The bearer of the letter evidently landed at some port on the Black Sea, perhaps Sinope, and visited the provinces in the order in which they appear in the address of the letter:—Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, taking ship again at the Black Sea for Rome. The Taurus range of mountains was always conceived of as dividing the peninsula of Asia Minor into two parts, and St. Peter here appears as supervising or advising the whole body of Christians north of the Taurus range. (The effect of taking 'Galatia' in the other sense would be to leave out certain Pauline churches, Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch, and perhaps these alone, in all that vast region: which is absurd.) With regard to the two passages in St. Paul, the case is settled by his unvarying usage. It has been noted that he, as a Roman citizen and a statesman, invariably uses geographical terms in the Roman sense, and that he even does violence to the Greek language by forcing the Latin names for 'Philippians' (Ph 4¹⁶) and 'Illyricum' (Ro 15¹⁹) into Greek, and passes by the proper Greek term in each case. We are bound, therefore, to believe that he uses 'Galatia' in the Roman sense, namely in the meaning of the Roman province as above defined. ('This province had, as we have seen, 'Galatia' in the narrower and earlier sense as one of its parts.) It follows, therefore, that he uses 'Galatians' (Gal 3¹) also in the wider sense of all (Christian) inhabitants of the province, irrespective of their race, as far as they were known to him.

In order to discover what communities in this vast province are especially addressed by the Apostle in his Epistle, it is necessary to make a critical examination of the only two passages in Acts which afford us a clue (16¹⁸ 18²³). It is important to note that St. Luke never uses the term 'Galatia' or the term 'Galatians,' but only the adjective 'Galatic' (16¹⁸ 18²³). In 16¹⁸ the rules of the Greek language require us to translate:—'the Phrygo-Galatic region' or 'the region which is both Phrygian and Galatian'; that is, 'the region which according to one nomenclature is Phrygian, and according to another is Galatian.' This can be none other than that section of the province Galatia which was known as Phrygia Galatica, and which contained Pisidian Antioch and Iconium, exactly the places we should expect St. Paul and his companions to go to after Derbe and Lystra. In 18²³ the Greek may be translated either 'the Galatic-Phrygian region' or 'the Galatian region and Phrygia,' preferably the latter, as it is difficult otherwise to account for the order in the Greek. 'The Galatian region,' then, will cover Derbe and Lystra; 'Phrygia' will include Iconium and Pisidian Antioch. We conclude then that, whether any other churches are comprised in the address of the Epistle to the Galatians or not,—and a negative answer is probably correct,—the churches of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch are included. There is not a scrap of evidence that St. Paul had visited any other cities in that great province. A. SOUTER.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Occasion of the Epistle.—From internal evidence we gather that St. Paul had, when he wrote, paid two visits to the Galatians. On the first visit, which was due to an illness (4¹³), he was welcomed in the most friendly way; on the second he warned them against Judaizers (1⁵ 5³ 'again,' cf. 4¹³ 'the former time,' though this may be translated 'formerly'). After the second visit Judaizers came among the Galatians, and, under the influence of a single individual (the 'who' of 3¹ 5⁷ is singular, cf. 5¹⁰) persuaded them that they must be circumcised, that St. Paul had changed his mind and was inconsistent, that he had refrained from preaching circumcision to them only from a desire to be 'all things to all men,' but that he had preached it (at any rate as the better way) to others. It is doubtful if the Judaizers upheld circumcision as necessary to salvation, or only as necessary to a complete Christianity. It depends on whether we fix the date before or after the Council of Ac 15, which of these views we adopt (see § 4). Further, the Judaizers disparaged St. Paul's authority as compared with that of the Twelve. On hearing this the Apostle hastily wrote the Epistle to check the evil, and (probably) soon followed up the Epistle with a personal visit.

2. To whom written. The North Galatian and South Galatian theories.—It is disputed whether the inhabitants of N. Galatia are addressed (Lightfoot, Salmon, the older commentators, Schmiedel in Encyc. Bibl.), or the inhabitants of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which lay in the S. part of the Roman province Galatia (Ramsay, Sanday, Zahn, Renan, Pfeiderer, etc.). Those who hold the N. Galatian theory take Ac 16¹⁸ 18²³ as indicating that St. Paul visited Galatia proper, making a long detour. They press the argument that he would not have called men of the four cities by the name 'Galatians,' as these lay outside Galatia proper, and that 'Galatians' must mean men who are Gauls by blood and descent; also that 'by writers speaking familiarly of the scenes in which they had themselves taken part' popular usage rather than official is probable, and therefore to call the Christian communities in the four cities 'the churches of Galatia' would be as unnatural as to speak of Pesth or (before the Italo-Austrian war) Venice as 'the Austrian cities' (Lightfoot, Gal. p. 19). Pesth is not a case in point, for no educated person would call it 'Austrian'; but the Venice illustration is apt. These are the only weighty arguments. On the other hand, the N. Galatian theory creates Churches unheard of elsewhere in 1st cent. records; it is difficult on this hypothesis to understand the silence of Acts, which narrates all the critical points of St. Paul's work. But Acts does tell us very fully of the foundation of the Church in S. Galatia. Then, again, on the N. Galatian theory, St. Paul nowhere in his Epistles mentions the four cities where such eventful things happened, except once for blame in 2 Ti 3¹—a silence made more remarkable by the fact that in the collection of the alms he does mention 'the churches of Galatia' (1 Co 16¹). If the four cities are not here referred to, why were they omitted? The main argument of the N. Galatian theory, given above, is sufficiently answered by taking into account St. Paul's relation to the Roman Empire (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, § 7.).

With regard to the nomenclature, we notice that St. Luke sometimes uses popular non-political names like 'Phrygia' or 'Mysia' (Ac 20¹⁶ 16¹⁸); but St. Paul, as a Roman citizen, uses place-names in their Roman sense throughout, e.g. 'Achaia' (which in Greek popular usage had a much narrower meaning than the Roman province, and did not include Athens, while St. Paul contrasts it with Macedonia, the only other Roman province in Greece, and therefore clearly uses it in its Roman sense, Ro 15²⁶ 2 Co 9² 11¹⁰ 1 Th 1⁷; cf. 1 Co 16¹). 'Macedonia,' 'Illyricum' (Ro 15¹⁹ only; the Greeks did not use this name popularly as a substantive, and none but a Roman could so denote the province; in 2 Ti 4¹⁰ St. Paul himself calls it 'Dalmatia,' as the name-usage was changing from the one to the other), 'Syria and Cilicia' (one Roman province), and 'Asia' (the Roman province of that name, the W. part of Asia Minor, including Mysia). We may compare St. Peter's nomenclature in 1 P 1¹, where he is so much influenced by Pauline ideas as to designate all Asia Minor north of the Taurus by enumerating the Roman provinces. St. Paul, then, calls all citizens of the province of Galatia by the honourable name 'Galatians.' To call the inhabitants of the four cities 'Phrygians' or 'Lycanians' would be as discourteous as to call them 'slaves' or 'barbarians.' The Roman colonies like Pisidian Antioch were most jealous of their Roman connexion.

The South Galatian theory reconciles the Epistle and Acts without the somewhat violent hypotheses of the rival theory. The crucial passages are Ac 16^a 18^a, which are appealed to on both sides. In 16^a St. Paul comes from Syro-Cilicia to Derbe and Lystra, no doubt by land, through the Cilician Gates (Derbe being mentioned first as being reached first, while in 14^a Lystra was reached first and mentioned first), and then 'they went through (i.e. going through) the region of Phrygia and Galatia,' lit. 'the Phrygian and Galatic region' [so all the best MSS read these last words]. This 'region,' then (probably a technical term for the subdivision of a province), was a single district to which the epithets 'Phrygian' and 'Galatic' could both be applied; that is, it was that district which was part of the old country of Phrygia, and also part of the Roman province of Galatia. But no part of the old Galatia overlapped Phrygia, and the only district satisfying the requirements is the region around Pisidian Antioch and Iconium; therefore in 16^a a detour to N. Galatia is excluded. Moreover, no route from N. Galatia to Bithynia could bring the travellers 'over against Mysia' (16^b). They would have had to return almost to the spot from which they started on their hypothetical journey to N. Galatia. Attempts to translate this passage, even as read by the best MSS, as if it were 'Phrygia and the Galatic region,' as the AV text (following inferior MSS) has it, have been made by a citation of Lk 3^b, but this appears to be a mistake; the word translated there 'Iturea' is really an adjective 'Iturean,' and the meaning probably is 'the Iturean region which is also called Trachonitis.'

In the other passage, Ac 18^a, the grammar and therefore the meaning are different. St. Paul comes, probably, by the same land route as before, and to the same district; yet now Derbe and Lystra are not mentioned by name. St. Paul went in succession through 'the Galatic region' and through 'Phrygia' (or '[the] Phrygian [region]'). The grammar requires two different districts here. The first is the 'Galatic region' [of Lycaonia]—that part of old Lycaonia which was in the province Galatia, i.e. the region round Derbe and Lystra. The second is the 'Phrygian region' [of Galatia], i.e. what was in 16^a called the Phrygo-Galatic region, that around Antioch and Iconium. In using a different phrase St. Luke considers the travellers' point of view; for in the latter case they leave Syrian Antioch, and enter, by way of non-Roman Lycaonia, into Galatic Lycaonia ('the Galatic region'), while in the former case they start from Lystra and enter the Phrygo-Galatic region near Iconium.

All this is clear on the S. Galatian theory. But on the other theory it is very hard to reconcile the Epistle with Acts. The S. Galatian theory also fits in very well with incidental notices in the Epistle, such as the fact that the Galatians evidently knew Barnabas well, and were aware that he was the champion of the Gentiles (2^a 'even Barnabas'); but Barnabas did not accompany Paul on the Second Missionary Journey, when, on the N. Galatian theory, the Galatians were first evangelized. Again, Gal 4^a fits in very well with Ac 13^a on the S. Galatian theory; for the very thing that one attacked with an illness in the low-lying lands of Pamphylia would do would be to go to the high uplands of Pisidian Antioch. This seems to have been an unexpected change of plan (one which perhaps caused Mark's defection). On the other hand, if a visit to Galatia proper were part of the plan in Ac 16 to visit Bithynia, Gal 4^a is unintelligible.

3. St. Paul's autobiography.—In chs. 1, 2 the Apostle vindicates his authority by saying that he received it direct from God, and not through the older Apostles, with whom the Judaizers compared him unfavourably. For this purpose he tells of his conversion, of his relations with the Twelve, and of his visits to Jerusalem; and shows that he did not receive his commission from men. Prof. Ramsay urges with much force that it was essential to Paul's argument that he should mention all visits paid by him to Jerusalem between his conversion and the time of his evangelizing the Galatians. In the Epistle we read of two visits (1^a 2^a), the former 3 years after his conversion (or after his return to Damascus), to visit Cephas, when of the Apostles he saw only James the Lord's brother besides, and the latter 14 years after his conversion (or after his first visit), when he went 'by revelation' with Barnabas and Titus and privately laid before the Twelve (this probably is the meaning of 'them' in 2^a; James, Cephas, and John are mentioned) the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles. We have, then, to ask, To which, if any, of the visits recorded in Acts do these correspond? Most scholars agree that Gal 1^a = Ac 9^{20a}, and that the word 'Apostles' in the latter place means Peter and James only. But there is much diversity of opinion concerning Gal 2^a. Lightfoot and Sanday identify this visit with that of Ac 15^a (the Jerusalem Council), saying that at the intermediate visit of Ac 11³⁰ there were no Apostles in Jerusalem, the storm of persecution having broken over the Church (only the 'elders' are mentioned), and the Apostles having retired; as, therefore, St. Paul's object was to give his relation to the Twelve, he does not mention this visit, during which he did not see them. Ramsay identifies the visit with that of Ac 11³⁰, since otherwise St. Paul would be suppressing a point which would tell in favour of his opponents, it being essential to his argument to mention all his visits (see above); moreover, the hypothesis of the flight of the Apostles and of 'every Christian of rank' is scarcely creditable to them. They would hardly have left the Church to take care of itself, or have allowed the elders to bear the brunt of the storm; while the mention of elders only in 11³⁰ would be due to the fact that they, not the Apostles, would administer the alms (cf. Ac 6²).

Other arguments on either side may perhaps balance each other, and are not crucial. Thus Prof. Ramsay adduces the discrepancies between Gal 2^a and Ac 15^a; in the former case the visit was 'by revelation,' in the latter by appointment of the brethren (these are not altogether incompatible facts); in the former case the discussion was private, in the latter public (this is accounted for by the supposition of a preliminary private conference, but that greatly damages St. Paul's argument). On the other hand, Dr. Sanday thinks that the stage of controversy in Gal 2 suits Ac 15 rather than Ac 11. This argument does not appear to the present writer to be of much value, for the question of the Gentiles and the Mosaic Law had really arisen with the case of Cornelius (Ac 11³⁰), and from the nature of things must have been present whenever a Gentile became a Christian. The Council in Ac 15 represents the climax when the matter came to public discussion and formal decision; we cannot suppose that the controversy sprang up suddenly with a mushroom growth. On the whole, in spite of the great weight of the names of Bp. Lightfoot and Dr. Sanday, the balance of the argument appears to lie on the side of Prof. Ramsay.

St. Peter at Antioch.—This incident in the autobiography (20^a) is placed by Lightfoot immediately after Ac 15^a. Ramsay thinks that it was not necessarily later in time than that which precedes, though on his view of the second visit it is in its proper chronological order. He puts it about the time of Ac 15^a. The situation would then be as follows. At first many Jewish Christians began to associate with Gentile Christians. But when the logical position was put to them that God had opened another door to salvation outside the Law of Moses, and so had practically annulled the Law, they shrank from the consequences, Peter began to draw back (this is the force of the tense in Gal 2^a), and even Barnabas was somewhat carried away. But Paul's arguments were convincing, and both Peter and Barnabas became champions of the Gentiles at the Council. It is difficult to understand Peter's action if it happened after the Council.

4. Date and place of writing.—Upholders of the N. Galatian theory, understanding Ac 16^a 18^a to represent the two visits to the Galatians implied in Gal 4^a, usually fix on Ephesus as the place of writing, and suppose that the Epistle dates from the long stay there recorded in Ac 19^{20a}, probably early in the stay (cf. Gal 1^a 'ye are so quickly removing'); but Lightfoot postpones the date for some two years, and thinks that the Epistle was written from Macedonia (Ac 20^a), rather earlier than Romans and after 2 Corinthians. He gives a comparison of these Epistles, showing the very close connexion between Romans and Galatians: the same use of OT, the same ideas and same arguments, founded on the same texts; in the doctrinal part of Galatians we can find a parallel for almost every thought and argument in Romans. It is generally agreed that the latter, a systematic treatise, is later than the former, a personal and fragmentary Epistle. The likeness is much less marked between Galatians and 1 and 2 Corinthians; but in 2 Corinthians the Apostle vindicates his authority much as in Galatians. The opposition to him evidently died away with the controversy about circumcision. Thus it is clear that these four Epistles hang together and are to be separated chronologically from the rest.

On the S. Galatian theory, the Epistle was written from Antioch. Ramsay puts it at the end of the Second Missionary Journey (Ac 18²). Timothy, he thinks, had been sent to his home at Lystra from Corinth, and rejoined Paul at Syrian Antioch, bringing news of the Galatian defection. Paul wrote off hastily, despatched Timothy back with the letter, and as soon as possible followed himself (Ac 18²³). On this supposition the two visits to the Galatians implied by the Epistle would be those of Ac 13 f. and 16. The intended visit of Paul would be announced by Timothy, though it was not mentioned in the letter, which in any case was clearly written in great haste. It is certainly strange, on the Ephesus or Macedonia hypothesis, that Paul neither took any steps to visit the erring Galatians, nor, if he could not go to them, explained the reason of his inability. Ramsay's view, however, has the disadvantage that it separates Galatians and Romans by some years. Yet if St. Paul kept a copy of his letters, he might well have elaborated his hastily sketched argument in Galatians into the treatise in Romans, at some little interval of time. Ramsay gives A.D. 53 for Galatians, the other three Epistles following in 56 and 57.

Another view is that of Weber, who also holds that Syrian Antioch was the place of writing, but dates the Epistle before the Council (see Ac 14²³). He agrees with Ramsay as to the two visits to Jerusalem; but he thinks that the manner of the Judaizers' attack points to a time before the Apostolic decree. Gal 6¹ ('compel') suggests that they insisted on circumcision as necessary for salvation (§ 1). If so, their action could hardly have taken place after the Council. A strong argument on this side is that St. Paul makes no allusion to the decision of the Council. The chronological difficulty of the 14 years (2¹) is met by placing the conversion of St. Paul in A.D. 32. Weber thinks that 5² could not have been written after the circumcision of Timothy; but this is doubtful. The two visits to the Galatians, on this view, would be those of Ac 13, on the outward and the homeward journey respectively. The strongest argument against Weber's date is that it necessitates such a long interval between Galatians and Romans.

5. Abstract of the Epistle.—Chs. 1, 2. Answer to the Judaizers' disparagement of Paul's office and message. Narrative of his life from his conversion onwards, showing that he did not receive his Apostleship and his gospel through the medium of other Apostles, but direct from God.

3¹–5¹². Doctrinal exposition of the freedom of the gospel, as against the legalism of the Judaizers. Abraham was justified by faith, not by the Law, and so are the children of Abraham. The Law was an inferior dispensation, though good for the time, and useful as educating the world for freedom; the Galatians were bent on returning to a state of tutelage, and their present attitude was retrogressive.

5¹³–6¹⁰. Hortatory. 'Hold fast by freedom, but do not mistake it for licence. Be forbearing and liberal.'

6¹¹–14. Conclusion. Summing up of the whole in Paul's own hand, written in large characters (6¹¹ RV) to show the importance of the subject of the autograph.

6. Genuineness of the Epistle.—Until lately Galatians, Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians were universally acknowledged to be by St. Paul, and the Tübingen school made their genuineness the basis of their attack on the other Epistles. Lately Prof. van Manen (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Paul') and others have denied the genuineness of these four also, chiefly on the ground that they are said to quote late Jewish apocalypses, to assume the existence of written Gospels, and to quote Philo and Seneca, and because the external attestation is said to begin as late as A.D. 150. These arguments are very unconvincing, the facts being improbable. And why should there not have been written Gospels in St. Paul's time? (cf. Lk 1¹). As for the testimony, Clement of Rome explicitly mentions and quotes 1 Corinthians, and his date cannot be brought down later than A.D. 100. Our Epistle is probably alluded to or cited by Barnabas, Hermas, and Ignatius (5 times); certainly by Polycarp (4 times), the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin Martyr, Melito, Athenagoras, and the Acts of Paul and Thecla. It is found in the Old Latin and Syrian versions and in the Muratorian Fragment (c. A.D. 180–200), used by 2nd cent. heretics, alluded to by adversaries like Celsus and the writer of the Clementine Homilies, and quoted by name and distinctly (as their fashion was) by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, at the end of the 2nd century. But, apart from this external testimony, the spontaneous nature of the Epistle is decisive in favour of its genuineness. There is no possible motive for forgery. An anti-Jewish Gnostic would not have used expressions of deference to the Apostles of the Circumcision; an Ebionite would not have used the arguments of the Epistle against the Mosaic Law (thus the Clementine Homilies, an Ebionite work, clearly hits at the Epistle in several passages); an orthodox forger would avoid all appearance of conflict between Peter and Paul. After A.D. 70 there never was the least danger of the Gentile Christians being made to submit to the Law. There is therefore no reason for surprise that the recent attack on the authenticity of the Epistle has been decisively rejected in this country by all the best critics. A. J. MACLEAN.

GALBANUM.—One of the ingredients of the sacred incense (Ex 30³⁴). It is a brownish-yellow, pleasant-smelling resin from various species of Ferula; it is imported from Persia. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GALEED ('cain of witness').—The name which according to Gn 31⁴⁷, was given by Jacob to the cairn erected on the occasion of the compact between him and Laban. There is evidently a characteristic attempt also to account in this way for the name Gilead. The respective proceedings of Jacob and of Laban are uncertain, for the narrative is not only of composite origin, but has suffered through the introduction of glosses into the text. It is pretty certain that we should read 'Laban' instead of 'Jacob' in v. 4. The LXX seeks unsuccessfully to reduce the narrative to order by means of transpositions.

GALILEE.—1. Position.—Galilee was the province of Palestine north of Samaria. It was bounded southward by the Carmel range and the southern border of the plain of Esdraelon, whence it stretched eastward by Bethshean (Scythopolis, Beisan) to the Jordan. Eastward it was limited by the Jordan and the western bank of its expansions (the Sea of Galilee and Waters of Merom). Northward and to the north-west it was bounded by Syria and Phœnicia; it reached the sea only in the region round the bay of Acca, and immediately north of it. Its maximum extent therefore was somewhere about 60 miles north to south, and 30 east to west.

2. Name.—The name Galilee is of Hebrew origin, and signifies a 'ring' or 'circuit.' The name is a contraction of a fuller expression, preserved by Is 9¹, namely, 'Galilee of the [foreign] nations.' This was originally the name of the district at the northern boundary of Israel, which was a frontier surrounded by foreigners on three sides. Thence it spread southward, till already by Isaiah's time it included the region of the sea, i.e. the Sea of Galilee. Its further extension southward, to include the plain of Esdraelon, took place before the Maccabæan period. The attributive 'of the nations' was probably dropped about this time—partly for brevity, partly because it was brought into the Jewish State by its conquest by John Hyrcanus, about the end of the 2nd cent. B.C.

3. History.—In the tribal partition of the country the territory of Galilee was divided among the septes of Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, and part of Issachar. In the OT history the tribal designations are generally used when subdivisions of the country are denoted; this is no doubt the reason why the name 'Galilee,' which is not a tribal name, occurs so rarely in the Hebrew Scriptures—though the passage in Isaiah already quoted, as well as the references to Kedesh and other cities 'in Galilee' (Jos 207 21st, 1 K 9th, 2 K 15th, 1 Ch 6th), show that the name was familiar and employed upon occasion. But though some of the most important of the historical events of the early Hebrew history took place within the borders of Galilee, it cannot be said to have had a history of its own till later times.

After the return of the Jews from the Exile, the population was concentrated for the greater part in Judæa, and the northern parts of Palestine were left to the descendants of the settlers established by Assyria. It was not till its conquest, probably by John Hyrcanus, that it was once more included in Jewish territory and occupied by Jewish settlers. Under the pressure of Egyptian and Roman invaders the national patriotism developed rapidly, and it became as intensely a Jewish State as Jerusalem itself, notwithstanding the contempt with which the haughty inhabitants of Judæa regarded the northern provincials. Under the Roman domination Galilee was governed as a tetrarchate, held by members of the Herod family. Herod the Great was ruler of Galilee in B.C. 47, and was succeeded by his son Antipas, as tetrarch, in B.C. 4. After the fall of Jerusalem, Galilee became the centre of Rabbinic life. The only ancient remains of Jewish synagogues are to be seen among the ruins of Galilean cities. Maimonides was buried at Tiberias. But it is as the principal theatre of Christ's life and work that Galilee commands its greatest interest. Almost the whole of His life, from His settlement as an infant in Nazareth, was spent within its borders. The great majority of the twelve Apostles were also natives of this province.

4. Physical Characteristics.—Owing to moisture derived from the Lebanon mountains, Galilee is the best-watered district of Palestine, and abounds in streams and springs, though the actual rainfall is little greater than that of Judæa. The result of this enhanced water supply is seen in the fertility of the soil, which is far greater than anywhere in Southern Palestine. It was famous for oil, wheat, barley, and fruit, as well as cattle. The Sea of Galilee fisheries were also important. The formation of the country is limestone, broken by frequent dykes and outflows of trap and other volcanic rocks. Hot springs at Tiberias and elsewhere, and not infrequent earthquakes, indicate a continuance of volcanic and analogous energies.

5. Population.—Galilee in the time of Christ was inhabited by a mixed population. There was the native Jewish element, grafted no doubt on a substratum of the Assyrian settlers and other immigrants, whose intrusion dated from the Israelite Exile—with probably yet a lower stratum, stretching back to the days of the Canaanites. Besides these there was the cultivated European class—the inhabitants of the Greek cities that surrounded the Sea of Tiberias, and the military representatives of the dominant power of Rome. We have seen that in Judæa the Galilæans were looked down upon. 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' (Jn 1st) was one proverb. 'Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet' (7th) was another, in the face of the fact that Galilee was the home of Deborah, Barak, Ibzan, Tola, Elon, with the prophets Jonah, Elisha, and possibly Hosea. The Galilæans no doubt had provincialisms, such as the confusion of the gutturals in speech, which grated on the sensitive ears of the Judeans, and was one of the indications that betrayed Peter when he endeavoured to deny his discipleship (Mt 26th).

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GALILEE, MOUNTAIN IN.—After our Lord's resurrection, the eleven disciples went away from Jerusalem 'into Galilee, unto the mountain where Jesus had appointed them' (Mt 28th). No record or hint indicates to us what mountain is meant. There is no foundation for the theory that it is the Mt. of Olives, whose north point is said to have borne the name 'Galilee.'

GALILEE, SEA OF.—1. Situation, etc.—The Sea of Galilee is an expansion of the Jordan, 13 miles long, about 8 miles in maximum breadth; its surface is 680 feet below that of the Mediterranean; its maximum depth is about 150 feet. In shape it is like a pear, the narrow end pointing southward. Like the Dead Sea, it is set deep among hills, which rise on the east side to a height of about 2000 feet. At the emergence of the Jordan, however, the Lake impinges on the plain of the Ghôr.

2. Names.—The original name of the Sea seems to have been Chinnereth or Chinneroth, which a hazardous etymology connects with the Heb. kinnôr, 'harp.' The name is supposed to be given to the Sea on account of its fancied resemblance to such an instrument. It more probably takes its name from an as yet unrecognized town or district in Naphtali (which bordered the Lake on the west side) referred to in Jos 11th 19th, 1 K 15th. By this name it is referred to in assigning the border of the Promised Land (Nu 34th), in stating the boundary of the trans-Jordanic tribes (Dt 3rd, Jos 13th), and in enumerating the kings conquered by Joshua (Jos 12th). The Lake is referred to also by the name Gennesar in Josephus (always), and in 1 Mac 11th (AV). This name also is of uncertain origin; strong grounds exist for questioning its derivation as a corruption of the earlier appellation. In the Gospels it is referred to under a variety of names: besides such general terms as 'the lake' (Lk 8th etc.), or 'the sea' (Jn 6th), we find Lake of Gennesaret (only in Lk 5th), Sea of Tiberias (Jn 21st), and also as an explanatory or alternative name in Jn 6th, but most frequently Sea of Galilee, which seems to have been the normal name. The modern name is Bahr Tubariya, which is often rendered in English as 'Lake of Tiberias,' by which name the Sea is now frequently described (as in Bædeker's Syria and Palestine).

3. Importance in NT Times.—The Sea in the time of Christ was surrounded by a number of important cities, each of them the centre of a cultured population. Such were Tiberias, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Chorazin, Magdala, and others. The fishing industry was extensive, and where now but a few small boats are to be seen, there evidently were formerly large fleets of fishing vessels. The fishing trade of Galilee was of great importance, and was renowned throughout the world. Owing to the great height of the mountains surrounding the Lake, differences of temperature are produced which give rise to sudden and violent storms. Two such storms are mentioned in the Gospels—one in Mt 8th, Mk 4th, Lk 8th, the other in Mt 14th, Mk 6th, Jn 6th. The repetition of the event within the narrow historical limits of the Gospels indicates that such tempests, then as now, were matters of frequent occurrence.

GALL.—(1) rōsh, some very bitter plant, Dt 29th, 1a 3rd; 'water of gall,' Jer 8th 9th; tr. 'hemlock,' Hos 10th; 'poison,' Job 20th. Hemlock (Conium maculatum), colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), and the poppy (Papaver somniferum) have all been suggested. The last is perhaps most probable. (2) merērah (Job 16th) and merōrah (20th) refer to the bile. The poison of serpents was supposed to lie in their bile (20th). The gall (Gr. chole) of Mt 27th evidently refers to the LXX version of Ps 69th, where cholē is tr. of rōsh.

GALLERY.—1. AV in Ca 7th reads 'The king is held in the galleries.' The Heb. is bārekhām, which, there is no reasonable doubt, means 'in the treasuries' (so RV). The king is captivated, that is to say, by the tresses of this 'prince's daughter.' 2. AV and RV tr. of attiq, a word whose etymology and meaning are both obscure. It is found only in the description of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk 41^{18,19} 42^{2,3}).

GALLEY.—See SHIPS AND BOATS.

GALLIM ('heaps').—A place near Jerusalem (1 S 25⁴). It is personified, along with Anathoth and other towns, in Is 10³⁰. It is generally placed to the N. of Jerusalem, but the exact site is unknown.

GALLIO.—The elder brother of Seneca. According to Acts (18¹²⁻¹⁷), he was proconsul of Achaia under the Emperor Claudius A.D. 53, when St. Paul was in Corinth. Seneca mentions that his brother contracted fever in Achaia, and thus corroborates Acts. The Jews of Corinth brought St. Paul before Gallio, charging him with persuading men 'to worship God contrary to the law' (v. 13). When, however, Gallio found that there was no charge of 'villainy,' but only of questions which the Jews as a self-administering community were competent to decide for themselves, he drove them from the judgment-seat (v. 14). Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, was then dragged before him and beaten; but such 'Lynch law' had no effect upon the proconsul (v. 17).

Pliny tells us that Gallio after his consulship travelled from Rome to Egypt in consequence of an attack of hæmorrhage from the lungs. Eusebius quotes Jerome as saying that he committed suicide A.D. 65; it is also said that he as well as Seneca was put to death by Nero; but these reports are unsubstantiated. Seneca speaks of him as a man of extreme amiability of character.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

GALLOWES.—This word occurs eight times in EV in the Book of Esther only (5¹¹ etc.) as the rendering of the ordinary Heb. word for 'tree' (see margins). It is very doubtful if death by strangulation is intended—'tree' in all probability having here its frequent sense of 'pole,' on which, as was customary in Persia, the criminal was impaled (see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

GAMAEEL.—1 Es 8²⁹ = Daniel, No. 3 (Ezr 8⁷).

GAMALIEL.—1. The son of Pedahzur, and 'prince of the children of Manasseh' (Nu 1¹⁰ 2²⁰ etc.). 2. Gamaliel i., the grandson of Hillel, was a Pharisee, and regarded as one of the most distinguished doctors of the Law of his age. He was a member of the Sanhedrin during the years of our Lord's ministry. His views were tolerant and large-hearted; he emphasized the humaner side of the Law, relaxing somewhat the rigour of Sabbatical observance, regulating the customs of divorce so as the more to protect helpless woman, and inculcating kindness on the part of Jews towards surrounding heathen. The advice given by him to the chief priests (Ac 5³⁴⁻³⁹) in reference to their dealing with the Apostles shows similar tolerance and wisdom. At his feet St. Paul was brought up (Ac 22³).

The Clementine Recognitions absurdly state that by the advice of the Apostles he remained among the Jews as a secret believer in Christ. The Mishna deprecates that 'with the death of Gamaliel i. the reverence for Divine Law ceased, and the observance of purity and piety became extinct.'

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

GAMES.—I. AMONG THE ISRAELITES.—The Jews were essentially a serious people. What in other nations developed into play and games of various kinds, had with them a seriously practical and often a religious character. Their dances were a common form of religious exercise, which might indeed degenerate into disorderly or unseemly behaviour, but were only exceptionally a source of healthy social amusement (Ps 150⁴, Ex 32¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 2 S 6¹⁴, Jer 31⁴, Ec 3⁴). Music, again, was especially associated with sacred song. Its secular use was condemned by Isaiah as a sign of extravagant luxury (Is 5¹²). Lots and the like were used as a means of ascertaining the Divine will, not for amusement or profit. Even what with children might be called games of 'make believe' became with some of the prophets vehicles of religious instruction. The symbolic object-lessons of Ezekiel were like children's toys adapted to a religious purpose (see esp. ch. 4). Even this humour of the prophets, striking as it was, was intensely serious: witness the scathing ridicule of Phœnician idolatry by Elijah and Deutero-Isaiah (1 K 18²⁷, Is 44¹²⁻²⁰ 46^{1, 2}).

It is a matter of some dispute whether manly sports had any place in the social life of the Israelites. There was undoubtedly some sort of training in the use of weapons, particularly the sling (among the Benjamites especially) and the bow, for the purposes of warfare and the chase. We have a definite reference to the custom of practising at a mark in 1 S 20²⁰ 33², and there are several metaphorical allusions to the same practice (Job 16¹² 13, La 3¹²). Again, it has also been thought that we have in the burdensome stone of Zec 12³ an allusion to a custom of lifting a heavy stone either as a test of strength or as a means of strengthening the muscles; but there is no actual proof that there was any sort of competitive contest in such exercises. It may be suggested, however, on the other hand, that the practice of determining combats by selected champions, one or more, from either side, which we read of in 1 S 17¹⁰, 2 S 21¹⁵⁻¹⁶, and the expression used in the latter case, 'let the young men . . . arise and play before us,' makes it likely that friendly tournaments were not unknown.

Riddle-guessing is the one form of competition of which we have any certain proof. In Jg 14¹²⁻¹⁴ the propounding and guessing of riddles as a wager appears as part of the entertainment of a marriage feast. The questions put by the queen of Sheba to Solomon probably belong to the same category (1 K 10¹⁻³). Indeed, the propounding of 'dark sayings' was a common element in proverbial literature (Ps 78², Pr 1⁹).

Children's Games.—Games of play are so invariable an element of child life among all peoples, that it hardly needs proof that the Israelites were no exception to the rule. The playing of the boys and girls in the streets of the glorified Jerusalem (Zec 8⁹) might indeed mean nothing more than kitten play; but fortunately we have in Mt 11¹⁶ || Lk 7³¹ a most interesting allusion to the games (mock-weddings and mock-funerals) played in the market-place in our Lord's time, as they are played in Palestine at the present day.

We read in 2 Mac 4⁹⁻¹⁷ how Jason the high priest and the head of the Hellenizing party, having bribed Antiochus Epiphanes with 150 talents of silver, set up 'a place of exercise' (gymnasium) for the training up of youths 'in the practices of the heathen.' The only game specifically mentioned is the discus. There is also mentioned in v. 18 'a game' that was held every fifth year at Tyre—evidently an imitation of the Olympic games. Later, Herod the Great appears from Josephus (Ant. xv. viii. 1) to have provoked a conspiracy of the Jews by building a theatre and an amphitheatre at Jerusalem for the spectacular combats of wild beasts, and to have initiated very splendid games every five years in honour of Cæsar. These included wrestling and chariot races, and competitors were attracted from all countries by the very costly prizes.

II. GAMES OF GREECE AND ROME.—Athletic contests formed a very important feature in the social life of the Greeks. They originated in pre-historic times, and were closely associated with religious worship. Thus the Olympic games were held in honour of Olympian Zeus in connexion with the magnificent temple in Olympia in Elis; the Isthmian games on the Isthmus of Corinth in honour of Poseidon; the Pythian were associated with the worship of the Pythian Apollo at Delphi; the Nemean were celebrated at Nemea, a valley of Argolis, to commemorate the Nemean Zeus. These four games were great Pan-Hellenic festivals, to which crowds came from all parts, not only free-born Greeks, but also foreigners, although the latter, except the Romans in later times, were not allowed to compete. The most important of these games were the Olympic. They were held every four years, and so great was the occasion that from the year B.C. 264 events as far back as 776 were computed by them. The period between one celebration and another was called an Olympiad, and an event was said to have occurred in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, or 4th year of such an Olympiad. The Isthmian games, which took place biennially in the first and third year of each Olympiad, seem to have been modelled on very much the same lines as the Olympic. To the Biblical student they have a more direct interest, as it is highly probable that the frequent allusions to such contests by St. Paul (see esp. 1 Co 9²⁴⁻²⁷) were due to his personal observation of these games, which must have taken place while he was at Corinth. As, however, our knowledge of the Olympic games, of which several ancient writers have left us particulars, is far more complete, it often happens that the language of St. Paul is more easily illustrated from them. It should be mentioned also in this connexion that besides these four great athletic contests, games of a local character, often in imitation of the Olympic, were held throughout Greece and her colonies in all towns of importance, which had both their stadium and their theatre. The most important of these, from the Biblical student's point of view, were the games of Ephesus. With these St. Paul was certainly familiar, and, as will be seen below, allusions to games are remarkably frequent in writings connected with Ephesus.

The contests at Olympia included running, boxing, wrestling, chariot races, and other competitions both for men and for youths. The judges, who seem also to have acted as a sort of managing committee, with many dependents, were chosen by lot, one for each division of Elis. They held at once a highly honoured and a very difficult post, and were required to spend ten months in learning the duties of their office. For the last 30 days of this period they were required personally to superintend the training of the athletes who were preparing to compete. In addition to this, the athletes were required to swear before competing that they had spent ten months previously in training. We thus realize the force of such allusions as that of 1 Ti 4⁷⁻⁸, where St. Paul insists on the greater importance of the training unto godliness than that of the body. These facts also add point to the allusions in 2 Ti 2⁵. An athlete is not crowned unless he contend 'according to regulation.' These regulations required the disqualification not only of the disfranchised and criminals, but of those who had not undergone the required training. It is the last to which the passage seems especially to point.

The prize, while it differed in different places, was always a crown of leaves. At Olympia it was made of wild olive; in the Isthmus, in St. Paul's time, of pine leaves; at Delphi, of 'laurel'; at Nemea, of parsley. In addition to this, at Olympia, Delphi, and probably elsewhere, the victor had handed to him a palm-branch as a token of victory. It is almost impossible to exaggerate the honour attached to winning the prize in these contests. The victor entered his native city in triumphal procession; he had conferred upon him many privileges and immunities, and his victory was frequently celebrated in verse. His statue might be, and often was, placed in the sacred grove of Elis, and he was looked upon as a public benefactor. St. Paul in 1 Co 9²⁴⁻²⁷ makes use of the spirit of these contests to illustrate to the Corinthians, to whom it must have specially appealed, the self-denial, the strenuousness, and the glorious issue of the Christian conflict, drawing his metaphorical allusions partly from the foot-race and partly from the boxing and wrestling matches. 'They do it to receive a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, as not uncertainly; so fight I, as not beating the air; but I buffet my body, and bring it into bondage,' etc.

There is a very interesting allusion to the games of Ephesus in 2 Ti 4⁷ 'I have contended the good contest,

I have completed the race . . . henceforth is laid up for me the crown of righteousness,' etc. This stands in striking contrast to Ph 3¹²⁻¹⁶ 'Not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect; but I press on . . . forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.' Here again it is the intense eagerness of the athlete that is specially in St. Paul's mind. We have many other allusions by St. Paul to the foot-race, as in Ro 9¹⁶, Gal 2⁵⁷, Ph 2¹⁶, Ac 20²⁴. These generally refer to the 'course' of life and conduct. The last passage, it should be remembered, is addressed to the elders at Ephesus. The full significance of Ro 9¹⁶ is missed unless we realize the intensity of effort required by the racer. The supreme effort of the will is worthless without the grace of God.

We have allusions to the wrestling match certainly in Eph 6¹², where St. Paul speaks of wrestling against spiritual forces, and probably to boxing in 4²⁷, where 'giving place' means giving vantage-ground to the spiritual foe. In connexion with Ephesus we may notice also the allusion in Ac 19³¹ to the Asiarchs—the officers who superintended the games. The reference to fighting 'with wild beasts at Ephesus' in 1 Co 15³² is probably a metaphorical allusion to such contests as were common afterwards in the Colosseum at Rome, and were, according to Schmitz (see 'Isthmia' in Smith's Dict. of Gr.-Rom. Ant.), probably introduced into the Isthmian games about this time.

Outside St. Paul's writings there is an important reference to athletic contests in He 12¹⁻². Here the two points emphasized are: (1) the 'cloud of witnesses' (Gr. martyres), whose past achievements are to encourage the Christian combatants for the faith; (2) the self-sacrifice and earnestness needed in running the Christian race. The Christian athlete must lay aside every 'weight'—every hindrance to his work, just as the runner divested himself of his garments, having previously by hard training got rid of all superfluous flesh,—and look only to Christ. Again, in Rev 7⁹ we have in the palms in the hands of the great company of martyrs a very probable reference to the palms given to the successful competitors in the games. Here, again, it should be borne in mind that it was to Ephesus and the surrounding towns, the district of the great Ephesian games, that St. John was writing. F. H. Woods.

GAMMADIM.—A term of very doubtful meaning, occurring in Ezk 27¹¹. The Gammadim (AV-lms) were in thy towers.' No place of the name of Gammad is known, but a proper name is what the context seems to demand. RVm 'valorous men' has not commended itself to the majority of scholars.

GAMUL ('weaned').—A chief of the Levites, and head of the 22nd course of priests (1 Ch 24¹⁷).

GARDEN (Heb. gan [lit. 'enclosure'], gannah, which, like the Persian (mod. Armenian) parda [Neh 2⁸ etc.], and the Arab jannah and bustan, may mean a garden of herbs [Dt 11¹⁰, 1 K 21² etc.], a fruit orchard [Jer 29²³, 24, Am 4¹ etc.], or a park-like pleasure-ground [2 K 25⁴, Est 1⁸ etc.]).—Flowers were cultivated (Ca 6²), and doubtless, as in modern times, crops of grain or vegetables were grown in the spaces between the trees. In the long dry summer of Palestine the fruitfulness of the garden depends upon abundant water supply (Nu 24⁶). Perennial fountains fleck the landscape with the luxuriant green and delicious shade of gardens, as e.g. at Jenin (Ca 4⁶). Great cisterns and reservoirs collect the water during the rains, and from these, by numerous conduits, it is led at evening to refresh all parts of the garden. Failure of water is soon evident in withered leaves and wilted plants (Is 58¹¹, cf. 1³⁰). The orange and lemon groves of Jaffa and Sidon are famous; and the orchards around Damascus form one of the main attractions of that 'earthly paradise.'

The cool shade of the trees, the music of the stream, and the delightful variety of fruits in their season, make the gardens a favourite place of resort (Est 7⁷, Ca 4¹⁰ etc.), especially towards evening; and in the summer months many spend the night there. In the sweet air, under the sheltering boughs, in the gardens of Olivet, Jesus no doubt passed many of the dark hours (Mk 11¹⁹ RV, Lk 21³⁷). From His agony in a garden (Jn 18¹⁻²⁸) He went to His doom.

The gardens, with their luxuriant foliage and soft obscurities, were greatly resorted to for purposes of idolatry (Is 56³, Bar 6⁷⁹). There the Moslem may be seen to-day, spreading his cloth or garment under orange, fig, or mulberry, and performing his devotions. The garden furnishes the charms of his heaven (el-jannah, or Firdaus), see artt. PARADISE, EDEN (GARDEN OF).

Tombs were often cut in the rock between the trees (2 K 21¹⁸ etc.); in such a tomb the body of Jesus was laid (Jn 19⁴¹). W. EWING.

GARDEN HOUSE in 2 K 9²⁷ should prob. be Beth-haggan (leaving Heb. untranslated), the name of an unknown place S of Jezreel.

GAREB.—1. One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23³⁹, 1 Ch 11⁴⁰). 2. A hill near Jerusalem (Jer 31³⁹). Its situation is uncertain, being located by some to the S.W., while others place it to the N., of the capital. At the present day there is a Wady Gourab to the W. of Jerusalem.

GARLAND.—The 'garlands' (Gr. stemmata) of Ac 14¹³ were probably intended to be put on the heads of the sacrificial victims. For the use of a garland (Gr. stephanos) as a prize to the victor in the games, see artt. CROWN, § 2, and cf. GAMES.

GARLIC (Nu 11⁵).—The familiar Allium sativum, still a very great favourite in Palestine, especially with the Jews. Originally a product of Central Asia, and once a delicacy of kings, it is only in the East that it retains its place in the affections of all classes.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GARMENT.—See DRESS.

GARMITE.—A gentile name applied in a totally obscure sense to Keilah in 1 Ch 4¹⁹.

GARNER.—'Garner,' which is now archaic if not obsolete, and 'granary,' the form now in use, both come from Lat. granaria, a storehouse for grain. RV retains the subst. in all its occurrences in AV, and introduces the verb in Is 62²⁹ 'They that have garnered (AV 'gathered') it shall eat it.'

GAS (1 Es 5⁴).—His sons were among the 'temple servants' (Ezr. and Neh. omit).

GASEMU (Neh 6⁵).—A form of the name Geshem (wh. see), probably representing the pronunciation of N. Arabian dialect.

GATAM.—The son of Eliphaz (Gn 36¹¹ = 1 Ch 1³⁶), and 'duke' of an Edomite clan (Gn 36¹⁶) which has not been identified.

GATE.—See CITY, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, § 5, JERUSALEM, TEMPLE.

GATH.—A city of the Philistine Pentapolis. It is mentioned in Jos 11²² as a place where the Anakim took refuge; but Joshua is significantly silent about the apportioning of the city to any of the tribes. The ark was brought here from Ashdod (1 S 5⁸), and thence to Ekron (5¹⁰). It was the home of Goliath (1 S 17⁴, 2 S 21¹⁹), and after the rout of the Philistines at Ephes-dammim it was the limit of their pursuit (1 S 17⁵³ [LXX]). David during his outlawry took refuge with its king, Achish (1 S 21¹⁰). A bodyguard of Gittites was attached to David's person under the leadership of a certain Ittai: these remained faithful to the king after the revolt of Absalom (2 S 15¹⁸). Shimei's servants ran to Gath, and were pursued thither by him contrary to the tabu laid upon him (1 K 2¹⁹). Gath was captured by Hazael of Syria (2 K 12¹⁷). An unsuccessful Ephraimite cattle-lifting expedition against Gath is recorded (1 Ch 7²¹). The city was captured by David, according to the Chronicler (18¹), and fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁸). It was again captured by Uzziah (26⁶). Amos refers to it in terms which imply that some great calamity has befallen it (6²); the later prophets, though they mention other cities of the Pentapolis, are silent respecting Gath, which seems therefore to have dropped out of existence. The exact circumstances of its final fate are unknown. The topographical indications, both of the Scripture references and of the Onomasticon, point to the great mound Tell es-Safi as the most probable site for the identification of Gath. It stands at the mouth of the Valley of Elah, and clearly represents a large and important town. It was partially excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1899, but, unfortunately, the whole mound being much cumbered with a modern village and its graveyards and sacred shrines, only a limited area was found available for excavation, and the results were not so definite as they might have been. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GATH-HEPHER (Jos 19¹³ [AV wrongly Gittah-hepher, which is simply the form of the name with He locale], 2 K 14²⁵, 'wine press of the pit or well').—The home of the prophet Jonah. It lay on the border of Zebulun, and is mentioned with Japhia and Rimmon—the modern Yāfa and Rummāneh. Jerome, in the preface to his Com. on Jonah, speaks of Geth quae est in Opher (cf. Vulg. 2 K 14²⁵), and places it 2 Roman miles from Sepphoris (Seffūrich), on the road to Tiberias. This points to el-Meshhed, a village on a slight eminence N. of the Tiberias road, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile W. of Kefr Kenna, where one of Jonah's many reputed tombs is still pointed out. W. EWING.

GATH-RIMMON.—1. A city in Dan, near Jehud and Bene-berak (Jos 19⁴⁵), assigned to the Kohathites (21²⁴), and reckoned (1 Ch 6⁶⁹) to Ephraim. It is unidentified. 2. A city of Manasseh, assigned to the Kohathites (Jos 21²⁵). LXX has Iebatha (B), or Baitha (A), while 1 Ch 6⁷⁹ has Bileam = Ibleam (wh. see). The position of the town is not indicated, so in this confusion no identification is possible. W. EWING.

GAULANTIS.—See GOLAN.

GAULS.—See GALATIA.

GAZA.—A city of the Philistine Pentapolis. It is referred to in Genesis (10¹⁹) as a border city of the Canaanites, and in Jos 10⁴¹ as a limit of the South country conquered by Joshua; a refuge of the Anakim (Jos 11²²), theoretically assigned to Judah (15⁷). Samson was here shut in by the Philistines, and escaped by carrying away the gates (Jg 16¹⁻²); he was, however, brought back here in captivity after being betrayed by Delilah, and here he destroyed himself and the Philistines by pulling down the temple (16²¹⁻³⁰). Gaza was never for long in Israelite hands. It withstood Alexander for five months (B.C. 332). In B.C. 96 it was razed to the ground, and in B.C. 57 rebuilt on a new site, the previous site being distinguished as 'Old' or 'Desert' Gaza (cf. Ac 8²⁶). It was successively in Greek, Byzantine Christian (A.D. 402), Muslim (635), and Crusader hands; it was finally lost by the Franks in 1244. A Crusaders' church remains in the town, now a mosque. It is now a city of about 16,000 inhabitants, and bears the name Ghuzzeh. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GAZARA.—An important stronghold often mentioned during the Maccabaean struggle (1 Mac 4¹⁵ 7⁴⁶ 9⁵² 13¹⁴ 14⁷ 15²⁸ 16¹, 2 Mac 10²²). In Ant. xii. vii. 4, xiv. v. 4, BJ. i. viii. 5, it is called Gadara. There seems to be no doubt that it is the OT Gezer (wh. see).

GAZELLE (zebi, tr. 2 S 2¹⁸, 1 Ch 12⁸ etc. in AV 'roe'; in Dt 14⁵ etc. 'roe-buck,' but in RV 'gazelle').—The gazelle (Arab. ghazal, also zabi) is one of the commonest of the larger animals of Palestine; it is one of the most beautiful and graceful of antelopes. It is fawn and white in colour; it is much hunted (Pr 6^a, Is 13¹⁴); it is noted for its speed (2 S 2¹⁸, 1 Ch 12⁹); its flesh is considered, at least in towns, a delicacy.

Ghazaleh ('female gazelle') is a favourite name for a girl among the Yemin Jews, as Dorcas and Tabitha, with the same meaning, were in NT times (Ac 9³⁶, 40).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GAZERA (1 Es 5³¹).—His sons were among the 'Temple servants.' In Ezr 2⁴⁸ Gazzam.

GAZEZ.—1. A son of Ephah, Caleb's concubine (1 Ch 2⁴⁶). 2. In same verse a second Gazez is mentioned as a son of Haram, who was another of Ephah's sons.

GAZITES.—The inhabitants of Gaza (wh. see), Jos 13², Jg 16².

GAZZAM.—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁴⁸, Neh 7²¹), called in 1 Es 5³¹ Gazera.

GEBA (Heb. geba, 'a hill').—A city of Benjamin, on the N.E. frontier (Jos 18²⁴), assigned to the Levites (Jos 21¹⁷, 1 Ch 6⁶⁰). It stands for the N. limit of the kingdom of Judah (2 K 23⁸ 'from Geba to Beersheba'). In 2 S 5²⁵ we should probably read 'Gibeon' as in 1 Ch 14¹⁸. The position of Geba is fixed in 1 S 14⁵ S. of the great Waddy Suweint, over against Michmash, the modern Mukhmās. This was the scene of Jonathan's famous exploit against the Philistines. Everything points to its identity with Jeba, a village 6 miles N. of Jerusalem. It occupied an important position commanding the passage of the valley from the north. It was fortified by Asa (1 K 15²²). It appears in Isaiah's picture of the approach of the Assyrian upon Jerusalem (10²⁸). It is mentioned also as occupied after the Exile (Neh 11³¹, Ezr 2²⁸ etc.). It seems to be confused with the neighbouring Gibeon in Jg 20¹⁰. 2, 1 S 13⁸. 16. In Jg 20³¹ 'Gibeah' should be 'Geba.' 2. A stronghold in Samaria, between which and Scythopolis Holofernes pitched his camp (Jth 3¹⁰). Perhaps Jeba'a is intended, about 2 miles S. of Sanūr, on the road to Jenin. W. EWING.

GEBAL.—1. A place apparently S. of the Dead Sea, whose inhabitants made a league with Edomites, Moabites, and the Bedouin of the Arabah against Israel, on some unknown occasion (Ps 83⁷), possibly the Gentile attack described in 1 Mac 5. It is the modern Jebel. 2. A town in Phœnicia, now Jebel. It was theoretically (never actually) within the borders of the Promised Land (Jos 13⁹). It provided builders for Solomon (1 K 5¹⁸ RV Gebalites, AV 'stone-squarers') and ships' caulkers for Tyre (Ezk 27⁹). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GEBER (1 K 4¹⁹).—One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, whose district lay to the E. of Jordan. At the end of v. 19 comes a sentence referred by AV and RV to this Geber, and rendered 'and he was the only officer which was in the land.' But it is possible that the text should be emended so as to read 'and one officer was over all the officers who were in the land,' the reference being, not to Geber, but to Azariah, son of Nathan, mentioned in v. 3 as 'over the officers.'

GEBIM.—A place N. of Jerusalem (Is 10³² only). In Eusebius a Geba 5 Roman miles from Gophna, on the way to Neapolis (Shechem), is noticed. This is the modern Jebā, which, being near the great northern road, is a possible site for Gebim.

GEOKO.—See FERRET, LIZARD.

GEDALIAH.—1. Son of Ahikam, who had protected Jeremiah from the anti-Chaldean party (Jer 26²⁴), and probably grandson of Shaphan, the pious scribe (2 K 22). Gedaliah naturally shared the views of Jeremiah. This commended him to Nebuchadnezzar, who made him governor over 'the poor of the people that were left in the land.' His two months' rule and treacherous murder are detailed in Jer 40. 41 (2 K 25²²⁻²⁶). The anniversary of Gedaliah's murder—the third day of the seventh month, Tishri (Zec 7⁸ 8¹⁹)—has ever since been observed as one of the four Jewish fasts. 2. Eldest 'son' of Jeduthun (1 Ch 25³). 3. A priest 'of the sons of Jeshua,' who had married a 'strange' woman (Ezr 10¹⁴); called in 1 Es 9¹⁹ Jodanus. 4. Son of Pashhur, a prince in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 38¹). 5. Grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1¹).

GEDDUR (1 Es 5⁴⁰).—In Ezr 2⁴⁷ and Neh 7⁴⁹ Gahar.

GEDER.—An unidentified Canaanitish town, whose king was amongst those conquered by Joshua (Jos 12¹⁸ only). It is very probably identical with Beth-gader of 1 Ch 2³¹. In 1 Ch 27²⁸ Baal-hanan, who had charge of David's olives and sycamores, is called the Gederite, which may be a gentile name derived from Geder, although some prefer to derive it from Gederah (wh. see).

GEDERAH.—AV of 1 Ch 4²³ reads, 'Those that dwell among plants (RVm 'plantations') and hedges,' but RV gives 'the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah,' and this is probably the correct rendering. In that case the Gederah referred to would probably be the city of that name located by Jos 15³⁶ in the Shephelah, the modern Jedireh and the Gedour of Eusebius. The gentile name Gederathite occurs in 1 Ch 12⁴.

GEDEROTH.—A town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15⁴¹, 2 Ch 28¹⁸). It appears to be the modern Katrah near Yebna. Possibly it is also the Kidron of 1 Mac 15³⁹. 41 16².

GEDEROTHAIM occurs in Jos 15³⁸ as one of the fourteen cities of Judah that lay in the Shephelah. There are, however, fourteen cities without it, and it is probable that the name has arisen by dittography from the preceding Gederah. The subterfuge of the AVm 'Gederah or Gederothaim' is not permissible.

GEDOR.—A town of Judah (Jos 15³⁸; cf. 1 Ch 4¹¹ 12⁷). It is generally identified with the modern Jedūr north of Beit-sur. 2. The district from which the Simeonites are said to have expelled the Hamite settlers (1 Ch 4⁴³). The LXX, however, reads Gerar, and this suits admirably as to direction. 3. A Benjamite, an ancestor of king Saul (1 Ch 8³¹ 9²⁷). 4. 5. The eponym of two Judahite families (1 Ch 4¹⁸).

GE-HARASHIM ('valley of craftsmen,' 1 Ch 4¹⁴, Neh 11³⁸).—In the latter passage it occurs with Lod and Ono. The location of this 'valley' is quite uncertain.

GEHAZI.—Of the antecedents of Gehazi, and of his call to be the attendant of Elisha, the sacred historian gives us no information. He appears to stand in the same intimate relation to his master that Elisha had done to Elijah, and was probably regarded as the successor of the former. Through lack of moral fibre he fell, and his heritage in the prophetic order passed into other hands. Gehazi is first introduced to us in connexion with the episode of the Shunammite woman. The prophet consults familiarly with him, in regard to some substantial way of showing their appreciation of the kindness of their hostess. Gehazi bears Elisha's message to her: 'Behold, thou hast been careful for us with all this care; what is to be done for thee? Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?' On her refusal to be a candidate for such honours, Gehazi reminds his master that the woman is childless. Taking up his attendant's suggestion, Elisha promises a son to their benefactress (2 K 4¹⁸). According to prediction, the child is born; but after he has grown to be a lad, he suffers from sunstroke and death ensues. The mother immediately betakes herself to the prophet, who sends Gehazi with his own staff to work a miracle. To the servant's prayer there is neither voice nor hearing; but where he falls, the prophet succeeds (2 K 4¹⁷⁻²⁷). Gehazi, like his master, had access to the court, for we read of him narrating to the king the story of the prophet's dealings with the Shunammite (2 K 8⁴). In contrast with the spirit of the other characters, his covetousness and lying stand out in black hideousness in the story of Naaman (wh. see). The prophet's refusal to receive any payment from the Syrian general for the cure which had been effected, does not meet with the approval of Gehazi. He follows the cavalcade of Naaman, and, fabricating a message from his master, begs a talent of silver and two changes of raiment for two young men of the sons of the prophets, who are supposed to be on a visit to Elisha. Having received and hidden his ill-gotten possessions, he stands before his master to do his bidding as if nothing had occurred, quite unaware that Elisha with prophetic eye has watched him on his foul mission of deception. Dumbfounded he must have been to hear his punishment from the lips of the prophet: 'The leprosy, therefore, of Naaman shall cleave unto thee and unto thy seed for ever' (2 K 5²⁰). With this dread sentence, Gehazi is ushered off the stage of sacred history, never to reappear. JAMES A. KEISO.

GEHENNA.—A word derived from Ge-Hinnom, the valley on the west of Jerusalem. In this valley it is possible that Molech and Tammuz were worshipped (2 K 23¹⁰, 2 Ch 28³³, Jer 7³¹ 32³⁵). The recollection of this terrible worship gave to the valley a sinister character, and led to its being defiled by Josiah (2 K 23¹⁰), for the purpose of preventing these rites. Thereafter it became the place for the burning of the refuse of the city, along with dead animals and the bodies of criminals. It was natural, therefore, that the name should become a synonym of hell (cf. Mt 5²⁹ 10²⁸). In its eschatological force Gehenna was the place of punishment. It generally was conceived of as being under the earth, but it was very much vaster in extent than the earth. It was believed to be filled with fire intended for the punishment of sinners, who apparently went there immediately after death. Late Rabbinic thought would seem to imply that men who are neither great saints nor great sinners might be purified by the fire of Gehenna. Only those who had committed adultery or shamed or slandered their neighbours were believed to be hopelessly condemned to its fires, while the Jews were not to be permanently injured by them. According to the later belief, Gehenna was to be destroyed at the final consummation of the age. There is no clear evidence that Gehenna was regarded as a place for the annihilation of the wicked, although there are some passages which give a certain support to this opinion. No systematic eschatological statement has, however, been preserved for us from Jewish times, much less one which may be said to represent a general consensus of opinion. The NT writers employ the word in its general force as a synonym for the idea of endless punishment for sinners, as over against 'heaven'—the synonym of endless bliss for those who have enjoyed the resurrection. They attempt, however, no description of suffering within its limits further than that implied in the figures of fire and worms.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

GELIOTH ('stone circles,' Jos 18⁷).—Identical with the Gilgal of Jos 15⁷, and possibly with the Beth-gilgal of Neh 12²⁹. It was a place on the border of Benjamin and Judah near the Ascent of Adummim. This last was probably in the neighbourhood of Tal'at ed-dum, a hill near the so-called 'Inn of the Good Samaritan' on the carriage road to Jericho. The word geluith occurs also in the Heb. in Jos 13²² 22¹⁰, 11 and JI 3⁴, and is tr. in AV either 'borders' or 'coasts,' RV 'regions.'

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GEM.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

GEMALI.—Father of the Danite spy, Nu 13¹² (P).

GEMARA.—See TALMUD.

GEMARIAH.—1. A son of Shaphan the scribe. He vainly sought to deter king Jehoiakim from burning the roll (Jer 36¹⁰ 11. 12. 23). 2. A son of Hilkiah who carried a letter from Jeremiah to the captives at Babylon (Jer 29³).

GENEALOGY.—The genealogies of the OT fall into two classes, national and individual, though the two are sometimes combined, the genealogy of the individual passing into that of the nation.

1. National genealogies.—These belong to a well-recognized type, by which the relationship of nations, tribes, and families is explained as due to descent from a common ancestor, who is often an 'eponymous hero,' invented to account for the name of the nation. The principle was prevalent in Greece (see Grote, Hist. vol. i. ch. iv. etc. and p. 416); e.g. Hellen is the 'father' of Dorus, Æolus, and Xuthus, who is in turn the 'father' of Ion and Achæus, the existence of the various branches of the Greek races being thus explained. M'Lennan (Studies in Ancient History, 2nd series, ix.) gives further examples from Rome (genealogies traced to Numa), Scotland, India, Arabia, and Africa; the Berbers ('barbarians') of N. Africa invented an ancestor Berr, and connected him with Noah. The Arabs derived all their subdivisions from Nebaioth or Joktan. The genealogies of Genesis are of the same type. The groundwork of the Priestly narrative (P) is a series of inter-connected genealogies, each beginning with the formula, 'These are the generations (alcedoth) of . . . ' (24 51 6⁸ etc.). The gap between Adam and Noah is filled by a genealogy of 10 generations (Gn 5), and in Gn 10 the nations of the world, as known to the writer, are traced in a genealogical tree to Noah's three sons. We find in the list plural or dual names (e.g. Mizraim, Ludim, Anamim), names of places (Tarshish, Zidon, Ophir) or of nations (the Jebusite, Amorite, etc.). An 'Eber' appears as the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews. Sometimes the names might in form represent either individuals or nations (Asshur, Moab, Edom), but there can in most cases be little doubt that the ancestor has been invented to account for the nation. In later chapters the same method is followed with regard to tribes more or less closely related to Israel; the connexion is explained by deriving them from an ancestor related to Abraham. In Gn 22²⁰ the twelve Aramæan tribes are derived from Nahor his brother; in 25¹² twelve N. Arabian tribes, nearer akin, are traced to Ishmael and Hagar; six others, a step farther removed, to Keturah, his second wife, or concubine (25¹). The Edomites, as most nearly related, are derived from Esau (36). The frequent recurrence of the number 12 in these lists is a sign of artificiality. The same principle is applied to Israel itself. The existence of all the twelve sons of Jacob as individuals is on various grounds improbable; they represent tribes, and in many cases their 'descendants' are simply individual names coined to account for cities, clans, and subdivisions of the tribes (Gn 46⁸, Nu 26). A good illustration is found in the case of Gilead. In Dt 3⁴ we are told that Moses gave Gilead to Machir, son of Manasseh. In Nu 26²⁹ etc. Gilead has become the 'son' of Manasseh, and in Jg 11¹ 'begets' Jephthah. So among the 'sons' of Caleb we find cities of Judah (Hebron, Tappuah, Ziph, Gibeon, etc., 1 Ch 2¹²), and Kirjath-jearim and Bethlehem are descendants of Hur (24). It is indeed obvious that, whether consciously or not, terms of relationship are used in an artificial sense. 'Father' often means founder of a city; in Gn 4²⁰ it stands for the originator of occupations and professions; members of a guild or clan are its 'sons.' The towns of a district are its 'daughters' (Jg 17 RVm).

With regard to the historical value of these genealogies, two remarks may be made. (a) The records, though in most cases worthless if regarded as referring to individuals, are of the highest importance as evidence of the movements and history of peoples and clans, and of the beliefs entertained about them. Gn 10 gives geographical and ethnographical information of great value. A good example is found in what we learn of Caleb and the Calebites. In the earliest tradition (Nu 32¹², Jos 14⁶, ¹⁴) he is descended from Kenaz, a tribe of Edom, and 'grandson' of Esau (Gn 36¹¹, ⁴³); in 1 S 25³ 30¹⁴ the Calebite territory is still distinct from Judah. But in 1 Ch 2⁴⁶ Caleb has become a descendant of Judah. We gather that the Calebites ('dog-tribe') were a related but alien clan, which entered into friendly relations with Judah at the time of the conquest of Canaan, and perhaps took the lead in the invasion. Ultimately they coalesced with Judah, and were regarded as pure Israelites. So generally, though no uniform interpretation of the genealogies is possible, a marriage will often point to the incorporation of new elements into the tribe, a birth to a fresh subdivision or migration, or an unfruitful marriage to the disappearance of a clan. Contradictory accounts of an individual in documents of different date may tell us of the history of a tribe at successive periods, as in the case of the Calebites.

(b) Though the genealogical names usually represent nations, there is, no doubt, in certain cases a personal element as well. The patriarchs and more prominent figures, such as Ishmael and Esau and Caleb, were no doubt individuals, and their history is not entirely figurative. On this point see Driver, Genesis, pp. liv. ff.; also artt. ABRAHAM, and TRIBES. We should note that the distinctive feature of the Greek genealogies, which traced national descent from the gods, is absent from the OT. A trace remains in Gn 6⁴ (cf. Lk 3³⁸).

2. Genealogies of individuals.—Whatever view be taken of the genealogies of our Lord (see next article), their incorporation in the Gospels proves the importance attached to descent in the NT period; they also show that at that time records were kept which made the construction of such tables a possibility. St. Paul was conscious of his pure pedigree (Ph 3⁵), and in several cases in the NT the name of a person's tribe is preserved. The hope of being the ancestor of the Messiah, and the natural pride of royal descent, probably caused the records of the house of David to be preserved with great care. In the same way Josephus, in the opening chapter of his Life, sets out his genealogy as vouched for by the public records, though only as far back as his grandfather Simon. In c. Apion. i. 7, he speaks of the careful preservation of the Priestly genealogies; and the story of Africanus (ap. Eus. HE i. 7, 13), that Herod the Great destroyed the genealogical records of the Jews in order to conceal his own origin, is at least an indication of the existence of such records and of the value attached to them. The Talmud speaks of professional genealogists, and in the present day many Jews, especially among the priests, treasure long and detailed family trees, showing their pure descent (cf., for an earlier period, 1 Mac 2¹, Bar 1¹, To 1¹).

There can be no doubt that this careful recording of genealogies received its main impetus in the time of Ezra. It was then that the line between the Jews and other nations became sharply drawn, and stress was laid on purity of descent, whether real or fictitious. After the return from Babylon, it was more important to be able to trace descent from the exiles than to be a native of Judah (Ezr 9). Certain families were excluded from the priesthood for lack of the requisite genealogical records (2¹, Neh 7⁶²). And in fact practically all the detailed genealogies of individuals as preserved in P, Chronicles, and kindred writings, date from this or a later period. No doubt the injunctions of Dt 23³ and the arrangements for a census (2 S 24) imply that there was some sort of registration of families before this, and the stage of civilization reached under the monarchy makes it probable that records were kept of royal and important houses. But the genealogical notes which really date from the earlier period rarely go further back than two or three generations, and the later genealogies bear many traces of their artificiality. The names are in many cases late and post-exilic, and there is no evidence outside the genealogies that they were in use at an earlier period. Of the twenty-four courses of the sons of Aaron in 1 Ch 24¹², sixteen names are post-exilic. Names of places and clans appear as individuals (2¹⁸⁻²⁴ 730-40). Gaps are filled up by the repetition of the same name in several generations (e.g. 6⁴⁻¹⁴). At a later time it was usual for a child to be named after his father or kinsman (Lk 1⁵⁸ ⁶¹), but there are probably no cases where this is recorded for the pre-exilic period, except in the Chronicler's lists (see Gray, HPN). There are numerous discrepancies in the various lists, and there is a strongly marked tendency to ascribe a Levitical descent to all engaged in the service of the sanctuary, e.g. the guilds of singers and porters. So Samuel is made a Levite by the Chronicler (6²² ²³), almost certainly wrongly, as his story shows. In the same way the position of clans, such as Caleb and Jerahmeel, which in the early history appear as alien, is legitimized by artificial genealogies (1 Ch 2). In 25⁴ the names of the sons of Heman seem to be simply fragments of a hymn or psalm. In 6⁴ there are, including Aaron, 23 priests from the Exodus to the Captivity—an evidently artificial reconstruction; forty years is a generation, and 40x12=480 years to the building of the Temple (1 K 6¹), the other 11 priests filling up the period till the Exile, which took place in the eleventh generation after Solomon. Such marks of artificiality, combined with lateness of date, forbid us to regard the lists as entirely historical. No doubt in certain cases the genealogist had family records to work upon, but the form in which our material has reached us makes it almost impossible to disentangle these with any degree of certainty. W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, p. 6) gives an interesting parallel to this development of genealogizing activity at a particular period. The Arabian genealogies all date from the reign of Caliph Omar, when circumstances made purity of descent of great importance.

C. W. EMMET.

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.—1. The two genealogies.—Both the First and Third Evangelists (here for brevity referred to as Mt. and Lk.) give our Lord's ancestry, but they differ from one another very largely. Lk. traces back the genealogy to Adam, Mt. to Abraham only. Both lists agree from Abraham to David, except that Aram or Ram in Mt 1³=Arni in Lk 3³² (best text); but between David and Joseph the lists have only Shealtiel and Zerubbabel, and possibly two other names (see below), in common.

(a) The Matthean list from Perez to David is taken almost verbatim from Ru 4¹⁸⁻²² LXX (inserting Rahab and Ruth, and calling David 'the king'), and agrees with 1 Ch 2¹⁻¹⁵; it then gives the names of the kings to Jechoniah, from 1 Ch 3¹⁰⁻¹⁵, but inserts 'the [wife of] Uriah' and omits kings Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah between Joram and Uzziah (= Azariah), and also Jehoiaakim son of Josiah and father of Jechoniah (Coniah, Jer 22²⁴) or Jehoiachin (2 Ch 36⁵). This last omission may be merely a mistake, for the list is made up of three artificial divisions of fourteen generations each, and Jechoniah appears both at the end of the second and at the beginning of the third division, being counted twice. Perhaps, then, originally Jehoiaakim ended the second division, and Jehoiachin began the third, and they became confused owing to the similarity of spelling and were written alike (as in 1 Ch 3¹⁵, Jer 52¹¹ LXX); then the synonym Jechoniah was substituted for both. In the third division the names Shealtiel, Zerubbabel (both in Lk. also) are from Ezr 3², 1 Ch 3¹⁷ ¹⁹, but we notice that in Mt. and Ezra Zerubbabel is called son of Shealtiel, whereas in 1 Ch (except in some MSS of the LXX) he is his nephew. Both in Mt. and 1 Ch. Shealtiel is called son of Jechoniah. Between Zerubbabel and Joseph the names are perhaps from some traditional list of the heirs of the kings, but some names here also have been omitted, for in Mt. ten generations are spread over nearly 500 years, while Lk. gives nineteen generations for the same period. The Mt. genealogy ends with Matthan, Jacob, Joseph.

(b) The Lukan list, which inverts the order, beginning at Jesus and ending at Adam, takes the line from Adam to Abraham, from Gn 5. 10²¹⁻²² (to Peleg), 1 Ch 11²⁷, but inserts Cainan between Arphaxad and Shelah, as does the LXX in Gn. and 1 Ch.; it practically agrees with Mt. (see above) from Abraham to David, but then gives the line to Shealtiel through David's son Nathan, making Shealtiel the son of Neri, not of king Jehoniah (see 2 below). The names between Nathan and Shealtiel are not derived from the OT, and those between Zerubbabel and Joseph are otherwise unknown to us, unless, as Plummer supposes (ICC, 'St. Luke,' p. 104,) Joanan (Lk 3²⁷ RV) = Hananiah son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3⁹)—the name Rhesa being really a title ('Zerubbabel Rhesa' = 'Z. the prince'), misunderstood by some copyist before Lk. — and Joda (Lk 3²⁸ RV) = Abiud (Mt 1¹³) = Hodaviah (1 Ch 3²⁴ RV, a descendant of Zerubbabel, not son of Hananiah). Some think that Matthat (Lk 3²⁹) = Matthan (Mt 1¹³).

2. Reason of the differences.—It is not enough merely to say that theories which endeavour to harmonize the four Gospels are failures, and that, as is shown in art. GOSPELS, 2 (b), Mt. and Lk. wrote each without knowing the work of the other. We have to consider why two independent writers, both professing to give our Lord's genealogy, produced such different lists. Jewish genealogies were frequently artificial; that of Mt. is obviously so; for example, its omissions were apparently made only so as to produce an equality between the three divisions. Burkitt (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ii. 260f.) and Allen (ICC, 'St. Matthew,' p. 2ff.) think that Mt. compiled his genealogy for the purpose of his Gospel. The details about Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba, not to be expected in a genealogy, but suitable for that purpose (see below), and the artificial divisions, seem to point to this view. The object of the Mt. genealogy would be to refute an early Jewish slander that Jesus was born out of wedlock—a slander certainly known to Celsus in the 2nd cent. (Origen, c. Cels. i. 28 etc.). In this connexion Burkitt (l.c.) shows that Mt. 1. 2 are by the same hand as the rest of the Gospel (see also Hawkins, Horæ Synopticae, p. 4ff.). This view may, however, perhaps be modified a little by the hypothesis that the Mt. list is due to a Christian predecessor of the First Evangelist, perhaps to one of his sources; this modification would allow for the corruption of Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin (above, 1).

In any case, in spite of the argument to the contrary by Bacon in Hastings' DB ii. 139, we must probably agree with Westcott (*NT in Greek*², ii. 141), Barnard (Hastings' DG i. 638), Allen, and Burkitt, that the word 'begat' in this list expresses legal heirship and not physical descent. The same is true in some cases in 1 Chronicles. Mt. clearly believed in the Virgin Birth, and puts the genealogy immediately before the assertion of it; if physical descent is intended, the genealogy through Joseph is unmeaning. He wishes to prove that Jesus is legally descended from David, and therefore gives the 'throne succession,' the list of regal heirs. On the other hand, it may be supposed that Lk. states Jesus' heirship by giving Joseph's actual physical descent according to some genealogy preserved in the family. According to this view, Joseph was really the son of Heli (Lk 3²²) but the legal heir of Jacob (Mt 1¹⁴). It is not difficult to understand why Shealtiel and Zerubbabel appear in both lists. Jehoniah was childless, or at least his heirs died out (Jer 22³⁰), and Shealtiel, though called his 'son' in 1 Ch 3¹⁷, was probably only his legal heir, being son of Neri (Lk 3²⁷). This theory is elaborated by Lord A. Hervey, Bishop of Bath and Wells (The Genealogies of our Lord, 1853, and in Smith's *DB*²).

The reason of the insertion of the names of the four women in the Mt. list is not quite obvious. It has been suggested that the object was to show that God accepts penitents and strangers. Burkitt, with more probability, supposes that the mention of the heirs being born out of the direct line or irregularly is intended to prepare us for the still greater irregularity at the last stage, for the Virgin Birth of Jesus (l.c. p. 260). We note that in the OT Rahab is not said to have been the wife of Salmon as in Mt. 1¹⁵.

3. Other solutions.—(a) Africanus, perhaps the earliest writer to discuss Biblical questions in a critical manner (c. A.D. 220), treats of these genealogies in his Letter to Aristides (Euseb. HE i. 7, vi. 31). He harmonizes them (expressly, however, not as a matter of tradition) on the theory of levirate marriages, supposing that two half-brothers, sons of different fathers, married the same woman, and that the issue of the second marriage was therefore legally accounted to the elder, but physically to the younger brother. It is a difficulty that two, or even three, such marriages must be supposed in the list; and this theory is almost universally rejected by moderns. Africanus had no doubt that both genealogies were Joseph's.

Africanus says that Herod the Great destroyed all the Jewish genealogies kept in the archives, so as to hide his own ignoble descent, but that not a few had private records of their own (Euseb. HE i. 7). Here clearly Africanus exaggerates. Josephus says that his own genealogy was given in the public records, and that the priests' pedigrees, even among Jews of the Dispersion, were carefully preserved (Life, i. c. Ap. i. 7). There is no reason why Lk. should not have found a genealogy in Joseph's family. Africanus says that our Lord's relatives, called desposyni, prided themselves on preserving the memory of their noble descent.

(b) A more modern theory, expounded by Weiss, but first by Annus of Viterbo (c. A.D. 1490), is that Mt. gives Joseph's pedigree, Lk. Mary's. It is necessary on this theory to render Lk 3²² thus: 'being the son (as was supposed) of Joseph [but really the grandson] of Heli.' This translation is rightly pronounced by Plummer to be incredible (l.c. p. 103); and a birthright derived through the mother would be 'quite out of harmony with either Jewish ideas or Gentile ideas.' The important thing was to state Jesus' birthright, and the only possible way to do this would be through Joseph.

It must, however, be added that Joseph and Mary were probably near relations. We cannot, indeed, say with Eusebius (HE i. 7) that they must have been of the same tribe, because 'intermarriages between different tribes were not permitted.' He is evidently referring to Nu 36¹, but this relates only to heiresses, who, if they married out of their tribe, would forfeit their inheritance. Mary and Elisabeth were kinswomen though the latter was descended from Aaron (Lk 1³⁶). But it was undoubtedly the belief of the early Christians that Jesus was descended, according to the flesh, from David, and was of the tribe of Judah (Ac 2³⁰ 13², Ro 1³, 2 Ti 2⁸, He 7¹⁴, Rev 5⁵ 22¹⁶; cf. Mk 10¹⁷ 11¹⁰). At the same time it is noteworthy that our Lord did not base His claims on His Davidic descent. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, an apocryphal work written in its present form c. A.D. 120, we find (Sym. 7, Gad. 8) the idea that the Lord should 'raise (one) from Levi as priest and from Judah as king. God and man,'—an inference, as Sanday-Headlam remark (ICC, 'Romans' p. 7), from Lk 1³.

4. The Matthean text.—In Mt 1¹⁶ the reading of almost all Greek MSS, attested by Tertullian, is that of EV, 'Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus,' etc. The lately discovered Sinaitic-Syriac palimpsest has 'Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus.' This reading is carefully discussed by Prof. Burkitt (l.c. p. 262 ff.), who thinks that it is not original, but derived from a variant of the ordinary text: 'Jacob begat Joseph, to whom being betrothed the Virgin Mary bare [i.e. begat, as often] Jesus' [this is questioned by Allen, l.c. p. 8]. On the other hand, it has been suggested that the Sinaitic palimpsest has the original reading of a source of our Mt. which did not believe in the Virgin Birth. If so, it is strange that the First Evangelist should place it in such close juxtaposition to his assertion of that belief. In view, however, of what has been said above, that the word 'begat' in Mt. implies only legal heirship, the question has no real doctrinal significance. On purely literary grounds, Prof. Burkitt seems to the present writer to have established his point.

A. J. MACLEAN.

GENERAL.—This adj. means in AV 'universal,' as Latimer, Sermons, 182, 'The promises of God our Saviour are general; they pertain to all mankind.' So in He 12^a, 'the general assembly' means the gathering of all without exception. Generally in like manner means 'universally,' 2 S 17¹¹ 'I counsel that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee.' The subst. 'general' is once (1 Ch 27^a) used for Heb. sar, of which the more usual rendering is 'captain' (wh. see; cf. ARMY, § 2).

GENERATION.—'Generation' is used in AV to tr. 1. Heb. dōr, which is used (a) generally for a period, especially in the phrases dōr wādōr, etc., of limitless duration; Is 51^a; future, Ps 10^a; past and future, Ps 102^a; (b) of all men living at any given time (Gn 6^a); (c) of a class of men with some special characteristic, Pr 30¹¹⁻¹⁴ of four generations of bad men; (d) in Is 38¹² and Ps 49¹⁹ dōr is sometimes taken as 'dwelling-place.' 2. Heb. wlādōth (from wlād, 'beget' or 'bear children'), which is used in the sense of (a) genealogies Gn 5¹, figuratively of the account of creation, Gn 2⁴; also (b) divisions of a tribe, as based on genealogy; wlādōth occurs only in the Priestly Code, in Ru 4¹⁸, and in 1 Ch. 3. Gr. genea in same sense as 1 (a), Col 1^a; as 1 (b), Mt 24^a. 4. genesis=2 (a), Mt 1¹, an imitation of LXX use of genesis for wlādōth. 5. Gennēma, 'offspring'=1 (c): so Mt 3¹¹ ('generation, i.e. offspring, of vipers'). 6. genos, 'race'=1 (c): so 1 P 2⁹ (AV 'chosen generation,' RV 'elect race').

GENESIS.—1. Name, Contents, and Plan.—The name 'Genesis,' as applied to the first book of the Bible, is derived from the LXX, in one or two MSS of which the book is entitled Genesis kosmou ('origin of the world'). A more appropriate designation, represented by the heading of one Greek MS, is 'The Book of Origins'; for Genesis is pre-eminently the Book of Hebrew Origins. It is a collection of the earliest traditions of the Israelites regarding the beginnings of things, and particularly of their national history; these traditions being woven into a continuous narrative, commencing with the creation of the world and ending with the death of Joseph. The story is continued in the book of Exodus, and indeed forms the introduction to a historical work which may be said to terminate either with the conquest of Palestine (Hexateuch) or with the Babylonian captivity (2 Kings). The narrative comprised in Genesis falls naturally into two main divisions—(i) The history of primeval mankind (chs. 1-11), including the creation of the world, the origin of evil, the beginnings of civilization, the Flood, and the dispersion of peoples. (ii) The history of the patriarchs (ch. 12-50), which is again divided into three sections, corresponding to the lives of Abraham (12-25¹²), Isaac (25¹²-36), and Jacob (37-50); although in the last two periods the story is really occupied with the fortunes of Jacob and Joseph respectively. The transition from one period to another is marked by a series of genealogies, some of which (e.g. chs. 5. 11^{a-c}) serve a chronological purpose and bridge over intervals of time with regard to which tradition was silent, while others (chs. 10. 36, etc.) exhibit the nearer or remoter relation to Israel of the various races and peoples of mankind. These genealogies constitute a sort of framework for the history, and at the same time reveal the plan on which the book is constructed. As the different branches of the human family are successively enumerated and dismissed, and the history converges more and more on the chosen line, we are meant to trace the unfolding of the Divine purpose by which Israel was separated from all the nations of the earth to be the people of the true God.

2. Literary sources.—The unity of plan which characterizes the Book of Genesis does not necessarily exclude the supposition that it is composed of separate documents; and a careful study of the structure of the book proves beyond all doubt that this is actually the case. The clue to the analysis was obtained when (in 1753) attention was directed to the significant alternation of two names for God, Jahweh and Elohim. This at once suggested a compilation from two pre-existing sources; although it is obvious that a preference for one or other Divine name might be common to many independent writers, and does not by itself establish the unity of all the passages in which it appears. It was speedily discovered, however, that this characteristic does not occur alone, but is associated with a number of other features, linguistic, literary, and religious, which were found to correspond in general with the division based on the use of the Divine names. Hence the conviction gradually gained ground that in Genesis we have to do not with an indefinite number of disconnected fragments, but with a few homogeneous compositions, each with a literary character of its own. The attempts to determine the relation of the several components to one another proved more or less abortive, until it was finally established in 1853 that the use of Elohim is a peculiarity common to two quite dissimilar groups of passages; and that one of these has much closer affinities with the sections where Jahweh is used than with the other Elohist sections. Since then, criticism has rapidly advanced to the positions now held by the great majority of OT scholars, which may be briefly summarized as follows:

(1) Practically the whole of Genesis is resolved into three originally separate documents, each containing a complete and consecutive narrative: (a) the Jahwistic (J), characterized by the use of 'Jahweh,' commencing with the Creation (2^{4b-c}) and continued to the end of the book; (b) the Elohist (E), using 'Elohim,' beginning at ch. 20; (c) the Priestly Code (P), also using 'Elohim,' which opens with the first account of the Creation (1-2^a). (2) In the compilation from these sources of our present Book of Genesis, two main stages are recognized: first, the fusion of J and E into a single work (JE); and second, the amalgamation of the combined work JE with P (an intermediate stage; the combination of JE with the Book of Deuteronomy, is here passed over because it has no appreciable influence on the composition of Genesis). (3) The oldest documents are J and E, which represent slightly varying recensions of a common body of patriarchal tradition, to which J has prefixed traditions from the early history of mankind. Both belong to the best age of Hebrew writing, and must have been composed before the middle of the 8th cent. B.C. The composite work JE is the basis of the Genesis narrative; to it belong all the graphic, picturesque, and racy stories which give life and charm to the book. Differences of standpoint between the two components are clearly marked; but both bear the stamp of popular literature, full of local colour and human interest, yet deeply pervaded by the religious spirit. Their view of God and His converse with men is primitive and childlike; but the bold anthropomorphic representations which abound in J are strikingly absent from E, where the element of theological reflexion is somewhat more pronounced than in J. (4) The third source, P, reproduces the traditional scheme of history laid down in JE; but the writer's unequal treatment of the material at his disposal reveals a prevailing interest in the history of the sacred institutions which were to be the basis of the Sinaitic legislation. As a rule he enlarges only on those epochs of the history at which some new religious observance was introduced, viz., the Creation, when the Sabbath was instituted; the Flood, followed by the prohibition of eating the blood; and the Abrahamic Covenant, of which circumcision was the perpetual seal. For the rest, the narrative is mostly a meagre and colourless epitome, based on JE, and scarcely intelligible apart from it. While there is evidence that P used other sources than JE, it is significant that, with the exception of ch. 23, there is no single episode to which a parallel is not found in the older and fuller narrative. To P, however, we owe the chronological scheme, and the series of genealogies already referred to as constituting the framework of the book as a whole. The Code belongs to a comparatively late period of Hebrew literature, and is generally assigned by critics to the early post-exilic age.

3. Nature of the material.—That the contents of Genesis are not historical in the technical sense, is implied in the fact that even the oldest of its written documents are far from being contemporary with the events related. They consist for the most part of traditions which for an indefinite period had circulated orally amongst the Israelites, and which (as divergences in the written records testify) had undergone modification in the course of transmission. No one denies that oral tradition may embody authentic recollection of actual occurrences; but the extent to which this is the case is uncertain, and will naturally vary in different parts of the narrative. Thus a broad distinction may be drawn between the primitive traditions of chs. 1-11 on the one hand, and those relating to the patriarchs on the other. The accounts of the Creation, the Fall, the Flood, and the Dispersion, all exhibit more or less clearly the influence of Babylonian mythology; and with regard to these the question is one not of trustworthy historical memory, but of the avenue through which certain mythical representations came to the knowledge of Israel. For the patriarchal period the conditions are different: here the tradition is ostensibly national; the presumed interval of oral transmission is perhaps not beyond the compass of the retentive Oriental memory; and it would be surprising if some real knowledge of its own antecedents had not persisted in the national recollection of Israel. These considerations may be held to justify the belief that a substratum of historic fact underlies the patriarchal narratives of Genesis; but it must be added that to distinguish that substratum from legendary accretions is hardly possible in the present state of our knowledge. The process by which the two elements came to be blended can, however, partly be explained. The patriarchs, for instance, are conceived as ancestors of tribes and nations; and it is certain that in some narratives the characteristics, the mutual relations, and even the history, of tribes are reflected in what is told as the personal biography of the ancestors. Again, the patriarchs are founders of sanctuaries; and it is natural to suppose that legends explanatory of customs observed at these sanctuaries are attached to the names of their reputed founders and go to enrich the traditional narrative. Once more, they are types of character; and in the inevitable simplification which accompanies popular narration the features of the type tended to be emphasized, and the figures of the patriarchs were gradually idealized as patterns of Hebrew piety and virtue. No greater mistake could be made than to think that these non-historical, legendary or imaginative, parts of the tradition are valueless for the ends of revelation. They are inseparably woven into that ideal background of history which bounded the horizon of ancient Israel, and was perhaps more influential in the moulding of national character than a knowledge of the naked reality would have been. The inspiration of the Biblical narrators is seen in the fashioning of the floating mass of legend and folklore and historical reminiscences into an expression of their Divinely given apprehension of religious truth, and so transforming what would otherwise have been a constant source of religious error and moral corruption as to make it a vehicle of instruction in the knowledge and fear of God. Once the principle is admitted that every genuine and worthy mode of literary expression is a suitable medium of God's word to men, it is impossible to suppose that the mythic faculty, which plays so important a part in the thinking of all early peoples, was alone ignored in the Divine education of Israel. GENEVA BIBLE.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, § 26.

GENNEUS.—The father of Apollonius, a Syrian commander of a district in Palestine (2 Mac 12⁷).

GENNESARET, LAKE OF.—See GALILEE [SEA OF] GENNESARET, LAND OF.—Mentioned only in the parallel passages Mt 14²⁴, Mk 6⁵³, as the place whither the disciples sailed after the stilling of the second storm on the Lake. It was somewhere on the W. bank of the Lake of Galilee, as the feeding of the five thousand had taken place, just before the crossing, on the E. side; it was also near habitations, as sick people were brought for healing to Christ on His landing. It is usually, and with reason, identified with the low land at the N.W. corner of the Lake. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GENTILES.—See NATIONS. For 'Court of the Gentiles,' see TEMPLE.

GENTLENESS.—The word 'gentle' occurs five times in NT (AV). In 1 Th 2⁷ and 2 Ti 2²⁴ it corresponds to Gr. ἐπιος; it is the character proper to a nurse among trying children, or a teacher with refractory pupils. In Tit 3², Ja 3¹⁷, 1 P 2¹⁸ 'gentle' is the AV tr. of επιεικής, which is uniformly so rendered in RV. The general idea of the Gr. word is that which is suggested by equity as opposed to strict legal justice; it expresses the quality of considerateness, of readiness to look humanely and reasonably at the facts of a case. There is a good discussion of it in Trench, Syn. § xliii.; he thinks there are no words in English which answer exactly to it, the ideas of equity and fairness, which are essential to its import, usually getting less than justice in the proposed equivalents.

In 2 S 22²⁸ = Ps 18³⁵ ('Thy gentleness hath made me great') RV keeps 'gentleness' in the text, but gives 'condescension' in the margin, which is much better. The key to the meaning is found in comparing such passages as Ps 113⁵, Is 57¹⁵, Zec 9⁹, Mt 11²⁹.

GENUBATH.—Son of Hadad, the fugitive Edomite prince, by the sister of queen Tahpenes (1 K 11¹⁹, 20).

GEOGRAPHY OF PALESTINE.—See PALESTINE.

GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE.—I. NATURAL DIVISIONS.

—The land of Palestine (using the name in its widest sense to include the trans-Jordanic plateau and the Sinai Peninsula) is divided by its configuration and by natural boundary lines into five strongly contrasted divisions. These are (1) the Coast Plain, (2) the Western Table-land, (3) the Ghôr, (4) the Eastern Table-land, (5) the Sinai Peninsula.

1. The Coast Plain extends from the mouth of the Nile to Carmel (the political boundary line, the valley known as Wady el-Arish, or the River of Egypt, is of no importance geologically). North of Carmel, Esdraelon and the narrow strip that extends as far as Beyrout is the continuation of the same division. It is characterized by sandhills along the coast, and by undulating ground inland. 2. The Western Table-land extends from Lebanon to the northern border of Sinai: the headland of Carmel is an intrusion from this division on to the preceding. It consists of a ridge of limestone with deep valleys running into it on each side, and at Hebron it attains a height of 3040 feet above the sea-level; it broadens out into the desert of the Th (or of the 'wanderings')—an almost barren expanse of an average level of 4000 feet. 3. The Ghôr is the line of a fault wherein the strata on the Eastern side have been raised, or on the western side depressed. It runs from the base of Lebanon to the Dead Sea, where it is 1292 feet below the level of the Mediterranean; thence it rises to 640 feet above the same plane at er-Rishi, whence it descends by a gentle slope to the Gulf of 'Akabah. 4. The Eastern Table-land runs along the W. side of the Arabian desert from Hermon to the Gulf of 'Akabah. It is chiefly volcanic in the character of its rocks. 5. The Sinai Peninsula is composed of Archæan rocks, which form bare mountains of very striking outline.

Each of these divisions has special characters of its own. The Coast Plain is composed of sand, gravel, or calcareous sandstone, overlaid in many places with rich fertile loam. The Western Table-land has streams rising in copious springs of water stored in the limestone strata; these streams on the Eastern side have a very rapid fall, owing to the great depth of the Ghôr. The hills are generally bare, but the valleys, where the soil has accumulated, are very fertile. The surface of the Ghôr is for its greater part alluvial. The Eastern Table-land is composed of granite and other igneous rocks, overlaid towards the North by sandstones which are themselves covered by calcareous strata. To the South, however, it is entirely covered with basaltic lava sheets, through which the cones of extinct volcanoes rise. The Sinai Peninsula is characterized by its barrenness, vegetation being found only in the valleys.

II. GEOLOGICAL FORMATIONS.—The geological formations of which the above regions are composed are the following.—(1) Archæan (granitic gneiss, hornblende, diorite, etc.): the oldest rocks in this region, found only among the mountains of Sinal and Edom.—(2) Volcanic (lavas, ash-beds, etc.): found in the Wady Harûn and Jebal esh-Shomar, east of the Dead Sea.—(3) Lower Carboniferous (sandstone, blue limestone): found in Wady Nasb, and Lebruj, E. of the Dead Sea: sandstones below, and limestones containing shells and corals of carboniferous limestone species.—(4) Cretaceous: lower beds of Nubian sandstone, which is found all along the Tih escarpment and along the Western escarpment from 'Akabah to beyond the Dead Sea. It was probably a lake-deposit. It is overlaid by a great thickness of cretaceous limestone, amounting to nearly 1000 feet. This is the most important constituent of the rocks of Palestine. Good building stones are taken from it in the quarries of Jerusalem.—(5) Lower Eocene: nummulite limestone, found overlying the cretaceous beds in elevated situations, such as Carmel, Nâblus, and Jerusalem.—(6) Upper Eocene: a formation of calcareous sandstone on the surface between Beersheba and Jaffa. Its true position is uncertain. Prof. Hull assigns it to the Upper Eocene, but Dr. Blanckenhorn to a post-tertiary or diluvial origin.—(7) Miocene Period. No rocks are assignable to this period, but it is important as being that in which the country rose from the bed of the sea and assumed its present form. This was the time when the great fault in the Jordan valley took place.—(8) Pliocene to Pluvial Period. During this period a subsidence of about 220 feet took place round the Mediterranean and Red Sea basins, afterwards compensated by a re-elevation. The evidence for this remains in a number of raised beaches, especially in the valley of Sheriah, east of Gaza. A similar phenomenon has been found at Mokattam, above Cairo.—(9) Pluvial to Recent Period. In the glacial epoch there were extensive glaciers in Lebanon, which have left traces in a number of moraines. At that time the temperature was colder, and the rainfall higher; hence the valleys, now dry, were channels of running water. Alluvial terraces in the Jordan valley-lake prove that the Dead Sea was formerly hundreds of feet higher than its present level. With the passing of the Pleistocene period the lakes and streams were reduced to their present limits.

GEPHYRUN.—A city captured by Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac 12²³; AV 'he went also about to make a bridge to a certain city,' RV 'he also fell upon a certain city Gephyrun'). It is possible that the Greek text is corrupt (see RVm).

GER.—See STRANGER.

GERA.—One of Benjamin's sons (Gn 46²¹, omitted in Nu 26³³⁻⁴⁰). Acc. to 1 Ch 8³, s. 7 he was a son of Bela and a grandson of Benjamin. Gera was evidently a well-known Benjamite clan, to which belonged Ehud (Jg 3¹⁵) and Shimei (2 S 16¹ 19¹⁴, 1 K 2²⁴).

GERAH, the twentieth part of the shekel (Ex 30¹³, Lv 27² etc.). See MONEY, 3; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, III.

GERAR.—A place mentioned in Gn 10⁶ in the boundary of the Canaanite territory near Gaza, where Abraham sojourned and came in contact with a certain 'Abimelech king of Gerar' (20¹). A similar experience is recorded of Isaac (26¹), but the stories are evidently not independent. Gerar reappears only in 2 Ch 14¹³⁻¹⁴, in the description of the rout of the Ethiopians by Asa, in which Gerar was the limit of the pursuit. Eusebius makes Gerar 25 Roman miles S. of Eleutheropolis; hence it has been sought at Umm el-Jerir, 6 miles S. of Gaza. This, however, seems a comparatively modern site and name. Possibly there were two Gerars: the Abrahamic Gerar has also been identified with Wady Jerir, 13 miles W.S.W. from Kadesh. The problem, like that of the mention of Philistines in connexion with this place in the time of Abraham, has not yet been solved.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GERASA.—A city of the Decapolis of unknown origin, the first known event in its history being its capture by Alexander Jannæus, about B.C. 83. It was rebuilt by the Romans in A.D. 65, and destroyed in the Jewish revolt. Vespasian's general, Lucius Annius, again took and destroyed the city. In the 2nd cent. A.D. it was a flourishing city, adorned with monuments of art; it was at this time a centre of the worship of Artemis. It afterwards became the seat of a bishop, but seems to have been finally destroyed in the Byzantine age. An uncertain tradition of some Jewish scholars, favoured by some modern writers, identifies it with Ramoth-gilead. The ruins of the city still exist under the modern name Jerdah; they lie among the mountains of Gilead, about 20 miles from the Jordan. These are very extensive, and testify to the importance and magnificence of the city, but they are unfortunately being rapidly destroyed by a colony of Circassians who have been established here. The chief remains are those of the town walls, the street of columns, several temples, a triumphal arch, a hippodrome, a theatre, etc.

Gerasa is not mentioned in the Bible, unless the identification with Ramoth-gilead hold. The Geraseses referred to in Mk 5¹ (RV) cannot belong to this place, which is too far away from the Sea of Galilee to suit the story. This name probably refers to a place named Kersa, on the shore of the Lake, which fulfils the requirements. See GADARA. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GERASENES, GERGESENES.—See GADARA and GERASA. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GERIZIM.—A mountain which with Ebal encloses the valley in which is built the town of Nâblus (Shechem). The Samaritan sect regard it as holy, it being to them what Jerusalem and Mount Zion are to the Jew. According to Samaritan tradition, the sacrifice of Isaac took place here. From Gerizim were pronounced the blessings attached to observance of the Law (Jos 8³²), when the Israelites formally took possession of the country. It was probably chosen as the fortunate mountain (as contrasted with Ebal, the mount of cursings), because it would be on the right hand of a spectator facing east. Here Jotham spoke his parable to the elders of Shechem (Jg 9⁷).

The acoustic properties of the valley are said to be remarkable, and experiment has shown that from some parts of the mountain it is possible with very little effort to make the voice carry over a very considerable area. A ledge of rock half-way up the hill is still often called 'Jotham's pulpit.'

On this mountain was erected, about 432 B.C., a Samaritan temple, which was destroyed about 300 years afterwards by Hyrcanus. Its site is pointed out on a small level plateau, under the hill-top. The Passover is annually celebrated here. Other ruins of less interest are to be seen on the mountain-top, such as the remains of a castle and a Byzantine church. The summit of the mountain commands a view embracing nearly the whole of Palestine. Contrary to the statement of Josephus, it is not the highest of the mountains of Samaria, Ebal and Tell 'Azur being rather higher.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GERON should possibly appear as a proper name in 2 Mac 6¹ (AV and RV 'an old man of Athens'; RVM 'Geron an Athenian').

GERRENANS (2 Mac 13²⁴).—The true reading and the people intended are both uncertain. The analogy of 1 Mac 11³⁹ suggests some place near the border of Egypt; but Gerrha, between Pelusium and Rhinocolura, was in Egyptian territory. It has been suggested that the reference is to Gerar, an ancient Phil. city S.E. of Gaza. On the other hand, Syr. reads Gazar, i.e. Gezer or Gazara, not far from Lydda (cf. 1 Mac 15²⁸ ²⁸).

GERSHOM.—1. The elder of the two sons borne to Moses by Zipporah (Ex 2²² 18²⁻⁴; the explanation of the name given in these two passages is folk-etymology). According to Ex 14²⁸ ²⁸, the origin of circumcision among the Israelites was connected with that of Gershon; the rite was performed by his mother; this was contrary to later usage, according to which this was always done by a man. The son of Gershon, Jonathan, and his descendants were priests to the tribe of the Danites; but the fact that these latter set up for themselves a graven image, and that therefore the descendants of Gershon were connected with worship of this kind, was regarded as a grave evil by later generations, for which reason the word 'Moses' in Jg 18³⁰ was read 'Manassch' by the insertion of an n above the text; it was thought derogatory to the memory of Moses that descendants of his should have been guilty of the worship of graven images. In Jg 17⁷ there is a possible reference to Gershon, for the words 'and he sojourned there' can also be read 'and he (was) Gershon' (W. H. Bennett). In 1 Ch 23¹⁶ 26²⁴ the sons of Gershon are mentioned, Shebuel or Shubael being their chief. 2. A son of Levi (1 Ch 6¹⁶ [v. in Heb.]); see GERSHON. 3. A descendant of Phinehas, one of the 'heads of houses' who went up with Ezra from Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes (Ezr 8²). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

GERSHON, GERSHONITES.—The name Gershon is given to the eldest son of Levi, to whom a division of the Levites traced their descent (Gn 46¹¹, Ex 6¹⁶, Nu 3¹⁷, 1 Ch 6¹⁶ [Gershon] 23⁹). The title 'Gershonites' is found in Nu 3²¹ 23¹ 42¹ 26⁵⁷, Jos 21³², 1 Ch 23⁷ 26²¹, 2 Ch 29¹²; and of an individual, 1 Ch 26²⁴ 29³; the 'sons of Gershon' (Ex 6¹⁷, Nu 3¹⁸ ²⁸ 42²⁸ 38. 41 7¹⁰ 10¹⁷, Jos 21⁶ 37¹), or 'of Gershon' (1 Ch 6¹⁷ 62. 71 157). They were subdivided into two groups, the Libnites and the Shimeites (Nu 3²¹ 26⁵⁸), each being traced to a 'son' of Gershon (Ex 6¹⁷, Nu 3¹⁸, 1 Ch 6¹⁷ 30 [2]. Shimei is omitted from the genealogy). 'Ladan' stands for Libni in 1 Ch 23⁷ 26²¹. From these families fragments of genealogies remain (see 1 Ch 23¹⁻¹¹). Comparatively little is related of the Gershonites after the Exile. Certain of them are mentioned in 1 Ch 9¹⁸ and Neh 11^{17a} ²² as dwelling in Jerusalem immediately after the Return. Of the 'sons of Asaph' (Gershonites), 128 (Ezr 2⁴¹) or 148 (Neh 7⁴⁴) returned with Ezra to the city in B.C. 454. Asaphites led the music at the foundation of the Temple (Ezr 3¹⁰); and certain of them blew trumpets in the procession at the dedication of the city walls (Neh 12³⁸).

F and the Chronicler introduce the family into the earlier history. (1) During the desert wanderings the Gershonites were on the west side of the Tent (Nu 3²); their duty was to carry all the hangings which composed the Tent proper, and the outer coverings and the hangings of the court, with their cords (3²⁻⁴ 10¹⁷), for which they were given two wagons and four oxen (7⁷); and they were superintended by Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron (4²⁸ 7⁹). (2) After the settlement in Palestine, thirteen cities were assigned to them (Jos 21²⁷⁻³² = 1 Ch 6⁵² 71-76). (3) In David's reign the Chronicler relates that the Temple music was managed partly by Asaph, a Gershonite, and his family (1 Ch 6³⁹⁻⁴³ 25¹⁻⁶ 6. 9a. 10. 12. 14; and see 15⁷ 17-19). David divided the Levites into courses 'according to the sons of Levi' (23⁵; Gershonites, vv. 7-11); and particular offices of Gershonites are stated in 26²¹. (4) Jahaziel, an Asaphite, prophesied to Jehoshaphat before the battle of En-gedi (2 Ch 20¹⁴⁻¹⁷). (5) They took part in the cleansing of the Temple under Hezekiah (29¹²). Cf. also KOHATH.

A. H. M'NEILLE.

GERSON (1 Es 8²⁹) = Ezr 8² Gershom.

GERUTH-CHIMHAM (Jer 41¹⁷).—A khan (?) which possibly derived its name from Chimham, the son of Barzillai the Gileadite (2 S 19²⁷). Instead of geruth we should perhaps read gidrōth 'hurdles.'

GESHAN.—A descendant of Caleb, 1 Ch 2⁴⁷. Mod. editions of AV have Gesham, although the correct form of the name appears in ed. of 1611.

GESHEM (Neh 2¹⁹ 6¹⁻²; in 6² the form Gashmu occurs).—An Arabian who is named, along with Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the Ammonite, as an opponent of Nehemiah during the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2¹⁹ 6¹⁻²). He may have belonged to an Arab community which, as we learn from the monuments, was settled by Sargon in Samaria c. B.C. 715—this would explain his close connexion with the Samaritans; or he may have been the chief of an Arab tribe dwelling in the S. of Judah, in which case his presence would point to a coalition of all the neighbouring peoples against Jerusalem.

GESHUR, GESHURITES.—A small Aramæan tribe, whose territory, together with that of Maacah (wh. see), formed the W. border of Bashan (Dt 3⁴, Jos 12¹³ 13¹¹). The Geshurites were not expelled by the half-tribe of Manassch, to whom their land had been allotted (Jos 13¹³), and were still ruled by an independent king in the reign of David, who married the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur (2 S 3³). After the murder of his half-brother Amnon, Absalom took refuge with his maternal grandfather in 'Geshur of Aram' (2 S 13³⁷ 15³). Geshur and Maacah were probably situated in the modern Jaulān, if they are not to be identified with it. In 1 Ch 2²³ Geshur and Aram are said to have taken the 'tent-villages' of Jair from the Israelites. On the strength of Jos 13¹³ and 1 S 27⁵, it has been maintained that there was another tribe of this name in the neighbourhood of the Philistines; but the evidence in support of this view is very precarious.

GESTURES.—The Oriental is a natural expert in appropriate and expressive gesture. To his impulsive and emotional temperament, attitude and action form a more apt vehicle for thought and feeling than even speech. Movement of feature, shrug of shoulder, turn of hand, express much, and suggest delicate shades of meaning which cannot be put in words. Conversation is accompanied by a sort of running commentary of gestures. Easterns conduct argument and altercation at the pitch of their voices; emphasis is supplied almost wholly by gestures. These are often so violent that an unskilled witness might naturally expect to see bloodshed follow.

The word does not occur in Scripture, but the thing, in various forms, is constantly appearing. Bowing the head or body marks reverence, homage, or worship (Gn 18², Ex 20⁶, 1 Ch 21²¹, Ps 95⁶, Is 60¹⁴). The same is true of kneeling (1 K 19¹⁸, 2 K 1¹³, Ps 95⁶, Mk 1⁴⁰). This sign of homage the tempter sought from Jesus (Mt 4⁹). Kneeling was a common attitude in prayer (1 K 8⁵⁴, Ezr 9⁴, Dn 6¹⁰, Lk 22⁴¹, Eph 3¹⁴ etc.). The glance of the eye may mean appeal, as the upward look in prayer (Job 22²⁸, Mk 6⁴¹ etc.), anger (Mk 3⁴), or reproach (Lk 22⁶¹). A shake of the head may express scorn or derision (2 K 19²¹, Ps 109²⁵, Mk 15²⁰ etc.). A grimace of the lip is a sign of contempt (Ps 22⁷). Shaking the dust off the feet, or shaking, however gently, one's raiment, indicates complete severance (Mt 10¹⁴ etc.).

denial of responsibility (Ac 18¹⁶), and often now, total ignorance of any matter referred to. Rending the garments betokens consternation, real (Gn 37²⁹, Jos 7⁶, Ac 14¹⁴ etc.) or assumed (2 Ch 23¹⁸, Mt 26⁶⁸), and grief (Jg 11³⁵, 2 S 1¹¹ etc.). Joy was expressed by dancing (Ex 15²⁰, 1 S 30¹⁶, Jer 31⁴ etc.) and clapping the hands (Ps 47¹, Is 55¹² etc.). Spitting upon, or in the face, indicated deep despite (Nu 12¹⁴, Is 50⁶, Mt 26⁶⁷, etc.). See HAND, MOURNING CUSTOMS, SALUTATION.

Some gestures in common use are probably ancient. One who narrowly escapes danger, describing his experience, will crack his thumb nail off the edge of his front teeth, suggesting Job's 'with the skin of my teeth' (19²⁰). One charged with a fault will put his elbows to his sides, turn his palms outward, and shrug his shoulders, with a slight side inclination of the head, repudiating responsibility for an act which, in his judgment, was plainly inevitable. W. EWING.

GETHER.—Named in Gn 10²², along with Uz, Hul, and Mash, as one of the 'sons of Aram' (in 1 Ch 1¹⁷ simply 'sons of Shem'). The clan of which he is the eponymous founder has not been identified.

GETHESEMANE.—A place to which Christ retired with His disciples (Mt 26³⁰, Mk 14²⁶), and where Judas betrayed Him. It was probably a favourite resort of our Lord, as Judas knew where He was likely to be found. There are two traditional sites, side by side, one under the Greeks, the other under the Latins. It may be admitted that they are somewhere near the proper site, on the W. slope of the Mount of Olives above the Kidron; but there is no justification for the exact localization of the site. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GEUEL.—The Gadite spy, Nu 13¹⁶ (P).

GEZER.—A very ancient city of the Shephelah, on the borders of the Philistine Plain; inhabited c. B.C. 3000 by a race probably kin to the Horites, who were succeeded by the Semitic Canaanites about B.C. 2500. These were not driven out by the invading Israelites (Jg 1²⁹). In David's time the city was in Philistine hands (1 Ch 20⁴). The king of Egypt captured it, and gave it as a dowry to his daughter, Solomon's wife (1 K 9¹⁶). Simon Maccabæus besieged and captured it, and built for himself a dwelling-place (1 Mac 13¹³⁻¹⁵). Gazara RV). The city has been partly excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund, and Simon's dwelling-place discovered, as well as a great Canaanite high place, and innumerable other remains of early Palestinian civilization. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GHOST.—A ghost = Germ. Geist (the h has crept into the word through what Earle calls an Italian affectation of spelling) is a spirit. The word is also used in Old English of the breath, the soul or spirit of a living person, and even a dead body. In AV it occurs only in the phrase 'give up or yield up the ghost' and in the name 'the Holy Ghost.' Wherever in AV hagion 'holy' occurs with pneuma 'spirit', the tr. is 'Holy Ghost'; but when pneuma occurs alone, it is always rendered 'Spirit' or 'spirit,' according as it is supposed to refer to God or to man. See HOLY SPIRIT and SPIRIT.

GIAH.—Named in the account of Joab's pursuit of Abner (2 S 2²⁴). Its situation is quite unknown; it is even doubtful whether the mention of Giah is not due to textual corruption.

GIANT.—I. IN THE O.T.—1. As tr. of Heb. neph̄līm. In Gn 6⁴ the Nephilim appear as a race of demi-gods, distinguished by their power and renown, but without any mention of gigantic stature. The context itself suggests that they were the antediluvians, or among the antediluvians, destroyed by the Flood. The story of their origin is, however, common in more or less degree to many ancient races; and it is thought by some to have no original connexion with the Flood story. At any rate the name appears again in Nu 13³³, where they appear to be identified with the Anakim. It seems probable, therefore, that the story in Gen. is an ancient myth which arose to account for the origin of this race, and perhaps of other ancient races of a similar type.

2. As tr. of Heb. reph̄a'īm. This word, frequently left untranslated, esp. in RV, is used of several probably different aboriginal peoples of Palestine, and probably meant 'giants.' The Rephaim included the Anakim, the aborigines of Philistia and the southern districts of Judah (Dt 2¹¹); the Emim, the aborigines of the Moabite country (Dt 2¹⁰); the Zamzumim, the aborigines of the Ammonite country (Dt 2²⁰), who are perhaps to be identified with the Zuzim of Gn 14⁶; and the old inhabitants of Bashan (Dt 3¹¹). The statement that Og, whose gigantic bedstead (or perhaps sarcophagus; see Driver, in loco) was still to be seen at Rabbah, was one of the Rephaim (though the last surviving member of the race in that district) is confirmed by Gn 14⁶, where the Rephaim are the first of the peoples smitten by the four kings on their journey south. These were followed by the Zuzim and Emim. We thus have evidence of a widely-spread people or peoples called Rephaim from ancient times. In addition to the Rephaim of Bashan, the Zuzim or Zamzumim, and the Emim, on the east of Jordan, the Anakim in the southwest and south—for Arba, the traditional founder of Hebron, is described as the progenitor of the Anakim (Jos 15¹³)—we find traces of Rephaim in the well-known valley of that name near Jerusalem (Jos 15⁸⁻⁹), and apparently also in the territory of Ephraim (Jos 17¹⁶). Taken together, this evidence seems to suggest that the name Rephaim was applied to the pre-Canaanite races of Palestine.

There is a well-known tendency among ancient peoples to regard their aborigines either as giants or as dwarfs, according as they were a taller or a shorter race than themselves. Thus the Anakim were so tall that the Israelitish spies were in comparison as grasshoppers (Nu 13³³). The 'bedstead' of Og cannot possibly have been less than 11 ft. in length [the more probable estimate of the cubit would give 13 ft. 6 in.]; but this is not very surprising if a sarcophagus is really meant, as it was a compliment to a dead hero to give him a large tomb (Dt 3¹¹). The Zamzumim are described as a people 'great and tall like the Anakim' (Dt 2²⁰). Again, Goliath was a man of fabulous height.

The Rephaim were, no doubt, very largely annihilated by their conquerors, but partly also absorbed. We naturally find the most evident traces of them in those districts of Palestine and its borders more recently occupied by past invaders, as in the East of Jordan and Philistia. In the latter country especially, that most recently occupied before the Israelitish settlement, we seem to find traces of them in the encounter with Goliath and his kind. Whereas Og was the last of the Rephaim of Bashan at the time of the Conquest, these seem to have continued to the time of David.

3. As tr. of the sing. word rāphāh or rāphā'. This is evidently akin to the plur. reph̄a'īm. In 2 S 21¹⁵⁻²², part of which recurs in 1 Ch 20⁴⁻⁸, four mighty Philistines—Ishbi-benob, Saph (Chron. 'Sippai'), Goliath the Gittite (Chron. 'Lahmi, the brother of Goliath,' etc.), and a monster with 6 fingers on each hand and 6 toes on each foot—are called 'sons of the giant.' As, however, the four are said in v. 22 to have fallen by the hand of David and his servants, and not one of them is described as slain by David, the passage is evidently incomplete, and the original probably contained the story of some encounter by David, with which the story of Goliath came to be confused. This, which ascribes his death to Elhanan, is probably the earliest form of that story, and it is probable that the reading of Chronicles is a gloss intended to reconcile this passage with 1 S 17. 'The giant' is probably used generically, meaning that they were all 'giants.' The passage is probably an extract from an old account of David and his faithful companions while he was an outlaw, from which also we get the greater part of 2 S 23. Though Goliath in the well-known story is not called a giant, he was certainly the typical giant of the OT. His height, 6 cubits and a span (1 S 17⁴), not necessarily more than 7 ft. 4 in., but more probably 9 ft. 10 in., may well be regarded, with the enormous size and weight of his armour, as the natural exaggeration to be expected in a popular story. Even if the story is not historical in its present form, it arose out of the conflicts which David and his men were frequently having with those Philistine giants. There is no mention of the Rephaim or of a single giant after David's time.

4. As tr. of Heb. gibbôr = 'a mighty man,' as in Job 16⁴; cf. Ps 10⁶ (Pr.-Bk. version). This is hardly a correct tr. of the word.

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—We find here some interesting allusions: (1) to the supposed destruction of the Nephilim by the Flood (Wis 14⁶, Sir 16⁷, Bar 3²⁸⁻²⁹); (2) to the slaughter of the 'giant' by David (Sir 47⁴).

F. H. WOODS.

GIBBAR.—A family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2²⁹). The name is probably an error for Gibeon of Neh 7²⁴.

GIBBETHON ('mound,' 'height').—A town belonging to the tribe of Dan, and a Levitical city (Jos 19⁴⁴ 21²³). Nadab, king of Israel, was besieging it when he was slain by Baasha; and Omri was similarly engaged when he was made king by the army (1 K 15²⁷ 16¹⁵⁻¹⁷). It is possibly the modern Kibbiyah, to the N.E. of Lydda.

GIBEA.—A grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴⁹). The list of the descendants of Judah through Caleb given in 1 Ch 2⁴⁹ is geographical rather than genealogical, and comprises all the towns lying in the Negeb of Judah to the S. of Hebron. Gibea is probably only a variation in spelling of the more common Gibeah. See GIBEAH, 1.

GIBEAH (Heb. gib'ah, 'a hill').—The name, similar in form and meaning to Geba, attached to a place not far from that city. The two have sometimes been confused. It is necessary to note carefully where the word means 'hill' and where it is the name of a city. At least two places were so called. 1. A city in the mountains of Judah (Jos 15⁷, perhaps also 2 Ch 13²), near Carmel and Ziph, to the S.E. of Hebron, and therefore not to be identified with the modern Jeba, 9 miles W. of Bethlehem (Onomast.); site unknown. 2. Gibeah of Benjamin (Jg 19² etc.), the scene of the awful outrage upon the Levite's concubine, and of the conflict in which the assembled tribes executed such terrible vengeance upon Benjamin. It was the home of Israel's first king (1 S 10⁶), and was known as 'Gibeah of Saul' (1 S 11⁴, 1 S 10²⁹); probably identical with 'Gibeah of God' (1 S 10⁶ RVm). From the narrative regarding the Levite we learn that Gibeah lay near the N. road from Bethlehem, between Jerusalem and Ramah. It was near the point where the road from Geba joined the highway towards Bethel (Jg 20³¹). Jg 20³³ affords no guidance: Maareh-geba (RV) is only a transliteration of the words as they stand in MT. A slight emendation of the text makes it read 'from the west of Gibeah,' which is probably correct (Moore, Judges, in loc.). Josephus, who calls it 'Gabaiothsaül' (BJ v. ii. 1), places it 30 stadia N. of Jerusalem. The site most closely agreeing with these conditions is Tuleil el-Ful, an artificial mound, E. of the road to the N., about 4 miles from Jerusalem. The road to Jeba leads off the main road immediately to the north of the site. Certain remains of ancient buildings there are, but nothing of importance has yet been discovered. As a place of strategic importance, Gibeah formed the base of Saul's operations against the Philistines (1 S 13. 14). There was enacted the tragedy in which seven of Saul's sons perished, giving occasion for the pathetic vigil of Rizpah. It appears in the description of Senacherib's advance from the north (Is 10²⁸⁻²⁹).

GIBEATH (Heb. gib'ath, st. constr. of gib'ah), 'hill of,' enters into the composition of place names, and is occasionally retained untranslated by RVm. Such instances are: (a) Gibeath ha-'ardloth, 'hill of the foreskins,' where the Israelites were circumcised (Jos 5²). (b) Gibeath-Phinehas, in Mount Ephraim, where Eleazar was buried (Jos 24²⁸); site unknown. (c) Gibeath ham-môreh (Jg 7¹ etc.; see MOREH, 2). (d) Gibeath ha-Elohim (1 S 10⁶) = Gibeah, 2. (e) Gibeath ha-Hachilah (1 S 23¹⁹ etc.). See HACHILAH. (f) Gibeath Ammah (2 S 2²⁴). See AMMAH. (g) Gibeath Gareb (Jer 31³⁹). See GAREB, 2. W. EWING.

GIBEON.—A town in Palestine north of Jerusalem. Its inhabitants seem to have been Hivites (Jos 9⁷), though spoken of in 2 S 21² by the more general term 'Amorites.' It was a city of considerable size. Its inhabitants, by means of a trick, succeeded in making a truce with Joshua, but were reduced to servitude (Jos 9); a coalition of other Canaanite kings against it was destroyed by him (ch. 10). It became a Levitical city (21¹⁷) in the tribe of Benjamin (18²). The circumstances of the destruction of part of the Gibeonites by Saul (2 S 21¹) are unknown. Here the champions of David fought those of the rival king Ish-bosheth (2 S 21²⁻²²), and defeated them; and here Joab murdered Amasa (20⁹). The 'great stone' in Gibeon was probably some part of the important high place which we know from 1 K 3⁴ was situated here. The statement of the parallel passage, 2 Ch 1², that the ark was placed here at the time, is probably due merely to the desire of the Chronicler to explain Solomon's sacrificing there in the light of the Deuteronomic legislation. Here Solomon was vouchsafed a theophany at the beginning of his reign. In Jer 41² we again hear of Gibeon, in connexion with Johanan's expedition against Ishmael to avenge the murder of Gedaliah.

The city has constantly been identified with el-Jib, and there can be little or no doubt that the identification is correct. This is a small village standing on an isolated hill about 5 miles from Jerusalem. The hill is rocky and regularly terraced. It is remarkable chiefly for its copious springs—a reputation it evidently had in antiquity (2 S 23³, Jer 41²). Ninety-five Gibeonites returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Neh 7²⁸), and Gibeonites were employed in repairing part of the wall of Jerusalem (3⁷). At Gibeon, Cestius Gallus encamped in his march from Antipatris to Jerusalem.

GIDDALTI ('I magnify [God]').—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25⁴ 22⁹).

GIDDEL ('very great').—1. The eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁴⁷ = Neh 7⁴⁹); called in 1 Es 5³⁶ Cathua. 2. The eponym of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2⁴⁶ = Neh 7⁴⁸); called in 1 Es 5³⁸ Isdael.

GIDEON.—The son of Joash, a Manassite; he dwelt in Ophrah, a place hitherto unidentified, which belonged to the clan of the Abiezrites. Gideon has also the names of Jerubbaal (Jg 6³²) and Jerubbesheth (2 S 11²¹). After the victory of the Israelites, under the guidance of Deborah, over the Canaanites, the land had rest for forty years (an indefinite period). Apostasy from Jahweh again resulted in their being oppressed, this time by the neighbouring Bedouin tribes, the Midianites and Amalekites. The underlying idea is that, since the Israelites did not exclusively worship their national God, He withdrew His protection, with the result that another nation, aided by its national god, was enabled to overcome the unprotected Israelites. A return to obedience, and recognition of Jahweh the national God, ensures His renewed protection; relief from the oppressor is brought about by some chosen instrument, of whom it is always said that Jahweh is 'with him'; this is also the case with Gideon (Jg 6¹²).

The sources of the story of Gideon, preserved in Jg 6¹-8³³, offer some difficult problems, upon which scholars differ considerably; all that can be said with certainty is that the narrative is composite, that the hand of the redactor is visible in certain verses (e.g.

630 7^a 8^a 22), and that the sources have not always been skillfully combined; this comes out most clearly in 7^a–8^a, which breaks the continuity of the narrative. Disregarding details, the general outline of the history of Gideon is as follows:

Introduction, 6^a–10^a: For seven years the Israelites suffered under the Midianite oppression; but on their 'crying unto the Lord' a prophet is sent, who declares unto them the reason of their present state, viz. that it was the result of their having forsaken Jahweh and served the gods of the Amorites.*

The call of Gideon, 6^a–11^a: The 'Angel of the Lord' appears to Gideon and tells him that the Lord is with him, and that he is to free Israel from the Midianite invasion. Gideon requires a sign: he brings an offering of a kid and unleavened cakes, the Angel touches these with his staff, whereupon fire issues from the rock on which the offering lies and consumes it. Gideon is now convinced that it was the 'Angel of the Lord' who had been speaking to him, and at Jahweh's† command he destroys the altar of Baal in Ophrah and builds one to Jahweh, to whom he also offers sacrifice. This act embitters Gideon's fellow-townsmen against him; they are, however, quieted down by the boldness and shrewdness of Gideon's father.

Gideon's victory, 6^a–7^a 22 8^a–11^a: Allegiance to Jahweh being thus publicly acknowledged, the Israelites are once more in a position to assert their political independence; so that when the Midianites again invade their land, Gideon raises an army against them, being moreover assured by the miracle of the dew on the fleece that he will be victorious. At the command of Jahweh his army is twice reduced, first to ten thousand men, and then to three hundred. At the command of Jahweh again, he goes with his servant, Purah, down to the camp of the Midianites, where he is encouraged by overhearing a Midianite recounting a dream, which is interpreted by another Midianite as foreshadowing the victory of Gideon. On his return to his own camp Gideon divides his men into three companies; each man receives a torch, an earthen jar, and a horn; at a given sign, the horns are blown, the jars broken, and the burning torches exposed to view, with the result that the Midianites flee in terror. Gideon pursues them across the Jordan; he halts during the pursuit, both at Succoth and at Penuel, in order to refresh his three hundred followers; in each case food is refused him by the inhabitants; after threatening them with vengeance on his return, he presses on, overtakes the Midianite host, and is again victorious; he then first punishes the inhabitants of Succoth and Penuel, and next turns his attention to the Midianite chiefs, Zebah and Zalmunna. From this part of the narrative it would seem that Gideon's attack upon the Midianites was, in part, undertaken owing to a blood-feud; for, on his finding out that the murderers of his brethren at Tabor were these two Midianite chiefs, he slays them in order to avenge his brethren.

The offer of the kingship, 8^a–22^a: On the Israelites offering to Gideon and his descendants the kingship, Gideon declines it on theocratic grounds, but asks instead for part of the gold from the spoil taken from the Midianites; of this he makes an image (ephod), which he sets up at Ophrah, and which becomes the cause of apostasy from Jahweh. The narrative of Gideon's leadership is brought to a close by a reference to his offspring, and special mention of his son Abimelech; after his death, we are told, the Israelites 'went a whoring after the Baalim.'

In the section 8^a–22^a there is clearly a mixing-up of the sources: on the one hand Israel's apostasy is traced to the action of Gideon, on the other this does not take place until after his death. Again, the refusal of the kingship on theocratic grounds is an idea which belongs to a much later time; moreover, Gideon's son, Abimelech, became king after slaying his father's legitimate sons; it is taken for granted (9^a) that there is to be a ruler after Gideon's death. This, together with other indications, leads to the belief that in its original form the earliest source gave an account of Gideon as king.

* 'Amorites' is a general name for the Canaanite nations, see Am 2^a 10.

† On this apparent identity between Jahweh and His 'Angel,' see the art. ANGEL OF THE LORD.

The section 7^a–8^a is undoubtedly ancient; it tells of how the Ephraimites, at Gideon's command, cut off part of the fugitive Midianite host under two of their chiefs, Oreb and Zeeb, whom the Ephraimites slew. When the victorious band with Gideon joins hands with the Ephraimites, the latter complain to Gideon because he did not call them to attack the main body of the enemy; Gideon quiets them by means of shrewd flattery. This section is evidently a fragment of the original source, which presumably went on to detail what further action the Ephraimites took during the Midianite campaign; for that the Midianite oppression was brought to an end by this one battle it is impossible to believe. * W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

GIDEONI.—Father of Abidan, prince of Benjamin (Nu 1st 27th 790. 65 102^a (P)).

GIDOM.—The limit of the pursuit of Benjamin by the other tribes (Jg 40^a). Possibly the word is not a proper name, but may be read as an infinitive, 'till they cut them off.' No place of the name of Gidom is mentioned elsewhere.

GIER EAGLE ('gier' is the same as the German Geier, 'vulture,' 'hawk,') is tr. in AV of rāchām in Lv 11^a and Dt 14th, in both of which passages RV has 'vulture.' RV gives 'gier eagle' also as tr. of peres in Dt 14th, where AV has 'ossifrage' (lit. 'bone-breaker'). The peres is the bearded vulture or Lammmergeier, 'the largest and most magnificent of the vulture tribe.' The adult rāchām has the front of the head and the upper part of the throat and cere naked, and of a bright lemon-yellow. The plumage is of a dirty white, except the quill feathers, which are of a greyish black. Its appearance when soaring is very striking and beautiful. It is the universal scavenger of Egyptian cities. It is found in great abundance also in Palestine and Syria.

GIFT, GIVING.—I. In the OT.—1. In the East what is described as a 'gift' is often hardly worthy of the name. 'Gift' may be a courtesy title for much that is of the nature of barter or exchange, tribute or compulsory homage, or even of bribery. It is well understood that a gift accepted lays the recipient under the obligation of returning a quid pro quo in some form or other. The queen of Sheba's gifts to Solomon were a sort of royal commerce. The charming picture of Ephron's generosity to Abraham with regard to the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23) must be interpreted in the light of Oriental custom; it is a mere piece of politeness, not intended to be accepted. An Arab will give anything to an intending buyer, and appeal to witnesses that he does so, but it is understood to be only a form, to help him to raise the price (see Driver, Genesis, ad loc.). Cf. the transaction between David and Araunah (2 S 24th). In other cases the return is of a less material character, consisting of the granting of a request or the restoring of favour. Hence Jacob's anxiety as to Esau's acceptance of his gifts (Gn 32nd 33rd); cf. the present to Joseph (43rd) and 1 S 25th 30th. The principle is stated in Pr 14th 'A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men' (cf. 19th). It is obvious that a gift in this sense easily becomes a bribe; hence the frequent commands to receive no gift, 'for a gift blindeth the eyes of the wise' (Ex 23rd, Dt 16th 27th, Pr 17th 24, Ps 15th, Is 1st 52nd etc.). It should be noticed that in this connexion a special Heb. word (shōchad) is used, meaning a 'bribe'; AV and RV often tr. 'gift' or 'reward.' In 1 K 15th, 2 K 18th it is used of a bribe.

* Cf. the Philistine campaign under Saul.

GIFT, GIVING

from king to king. Even the Roman Felix expects a gift (Ac 24²⁸).

2. In a more legitimate sense we find gifts offered to kings, etc., by way of homage (1 S 10²⁷, Ps 45¹²), or tribute (Jg 3¹⁵, 2 S 8², 1 K 4²¹, Ps 72⁹); the presents to Assyria, etc., are clearly not spontaneous, and the receiving of such homage from subject kings is a favourite subject of sculptures and paintings. 1 S 25 illustrates the ground on which such a gift was sometimes claimed; it was a payment for protection. Gifts were expected in consulting a prophet or oracle (Nu 22, 1 S 9⁷, 2 K 5⁸, 2 K 8⁸, Dn 5¹⁷). Whether regulated or unregulated, they formed the chief support of priests and Levites, and were the necessary accompaniment of worship. 'None shall appear before me empty' (Ex 23¹⁵ 34²⁰). One side of sacrifice is giving to God. The spiritual religion realized that Jehovah's favour did not depend on these things (Is 1, Ps 50), still more that He was not to be bribed. In Dt 10¹⁷ it is said that He is One 'who taketh not reward' [the word for 'bribe'; see above]. But there can be no doubt that in the popular view a gift to God was supposed to operate in precisely the same manner as a gift to a judge or earthly monarch (Mal 1⁸). Its acceptance was the sign of favour and of the granting of the request (Jg 13²⁸, 2 Ch 7¹); its rejection, of disfavour (Gn 4¹, Mal 1¹⁰). 1 S 26¹⁹ shows that a gift was regarded as propitiatory, and the machinery of the vow takes the same point of view. It should be noted that the word minchah, which is continually used of gifts and homage to men, is also specially used of offerings to God, and in P technically of the 'meal-offering.' For the meaning of 'gift' or Corban in Mk 7¹¹ etc., see art. SACRIFICE AND OFFERING. Almsgiving became one of the three things by which merit was earned before God, the other two being prayer and fasting; and magnificent gifts to the Temple were a means of personal display (Lk 21¹, Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 3).

3. Passing from cases where the gift is neither spontaneous nor disinterested, but is only a polite Oriental periphrasis for other things, we turn to instances where the word is used in a truer sense. If the king looked for 'gifts' from his subjects, he was also expected to return them in the shape of largesse, especially on festive occasions (Est 2⁸). This often took the form of an allowance from the royal table (Gn 43³¹, 2 S 11⁸, Jer 40⁸). We read more generally of gifts to the needy in Neh 8¹⁰, Est 9², Ec 11⁵, Ps 112⁹ (see ALMSGIVING). The gift of a robe, or other article from the person, was of special significance (1 S 18¹). Interchanges of gifts between equals are mentioned in Est 9⁸, Rev 11¹⁰. On the occasion of a wedding, presents are sent by friends to the bridegroom's house. Gifts, as distinct from the 'dowry,' were sometimes given by the bridegroom to the bride (Gn 24⁵³ 34¹²); sometimes by the bride's father (Jg 1¹⁴, 1 K 9¹⁶).

II. In the NT.—It is characteristic of the NT that many of its usages of the word 'gift' are connected with God's gifts to men—His Son, life, the Holy Spirit, etc. 'Grace' is the free gift of God. 'Gifts' is specially used of the manifestations of the Spirit (see SPIRITUAL GIFTS). Eph 4¹ illustrates well the change of attitude. St. Paul quotes from Ps 68¹, where the point is the homage which Jehovah receives from vanquished foes, and applies the words to the gifts which the victorious Christ has won for His Church. It is more Divine, more characteristic of God, to give than to receive. This is, in fact, the teaching of the NT on the subject. As the Father and His Son freely give all things, so must the Christian. Almsgiving is restored to its proper place; the true gift is not given to win merit from God, or to gain the praise of men, but proceeds from love, hoping for nothing again (Mt 6¹, Lk 6³⁷; see ALMSGIVING). Our Lord Himself accepted gifts, and taught that it is our highest privilege to give to Him and His 'little ones' (Lk 5²⁹ 7⁷ 8³, Jn 12³). And giving remains an integral part of Christian worship, as a willing homage to God, the wrong ideas of compulsion or persuasion being cast aside (1 Ch 29¹⁴, Mt 21⁵, 2 Co 9⁷, Rev 21³). The gifts to St. Paul from his converts (Ph 4¹⁸), and from the Gentile Churches to Jerusalem (Ac 11²⁹, Ro 15²⁷, 1 Co 16¹, 2 Co 8. 9), play a very important part in the history of the early Church.

GIHON (from root 'to burst forth,' 1 K 18³⁸ 38. 46, 2 Ch 32³⁰ 33¹⁴).—1. A spring near Jerusalem, evidently sacred and therefore selected as the scene of Solomon's coronation (1 K 1³³). Hezekiah made an aqueduct from it (2 Ch 32³⁰). Undoubtedly the modern 'Ain ummed-derajor' 'Virgin's Fount.' See SILOAM. 2. One of the four rivers of Paradise. See EDEN [GARDEN OF].

GILALAI.—A Levitical musician (Neh 12³⁶).

GILBOA (1 S 28¹ 31¹, 2 S 16²¹ 21¹², 1 Ch 10¹ 8).—A range of hills, now called Jebel Faki'a, on the E. boundary of the Plain of Esdraelon. They run from Zer'in (Jezreel) due S.E., and from the eastern extremity a prolongation runs S. towards the hills of Samaria. They are most imposing from the Vale of Jezreel and Jordan Valley, but nowhere reach a height of more than 1700 feet above sea level. The little village of Jebun on the slopes of Jebel Faki'a is thought to retain an echo of the name Gilboa. The slopes of these hills are steep, rugged, and bare. At the N. foot lies 'Ain Jalud, almost certainly the spring of Harod (wh. see).

GILEAD.—1. A person (or personified sept), son of the Manasse Machir (Nu 26²⁹, 1 Ch 2²¹), and grandfather of Zelophehad (Nu 27¹). See No. 4 below. 2. A Gadite, son of Michael (1 Ch 5¹⁴). 3. A mountain mentioned in Jg 7³ in an order of Gideon's to his followers, 'Whosoever is fearful . . . let him return and depart from [mg. 'go round about'] Mount Gilead.' The passage is very difficult, and probably corrupt. The trans-Jordanic Gilead will not suit the context, and no other is known. Various attempts have been made at emendation, none of which has commanded acceptance.

4. The name of the territory bounded on the north by Bashan, on the west by the Jordan between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, on the east by the desert, and on the south by the territory of Moab. It is a lofty fertile plateau, about 2000 feet above the sea-level: its western edge is the precipitous eastern wall of the Jordan Valley. It is an upland country, wooded in places, with productive fields intersected by valleys and streams. It is mentioned first in connexion with Jacob's flight from Laban; it was the goal at which he aimed, the place where the pursuer overtook him, and where the 'heap of witness' was raised (Gn 31). Even in the patriarchal period it was famous for its spices, myrrh, and medicinal 'balm,' whatever that may have been (cf. Jer 8²² 46¹¹). The Ishmaelite trading caravan which bought Joseph was carrying these substances from Gilead to Egypt (Gn 37²⁵). The Amorites were in possession of Gilead under their king Sihon when the Israelites were led to the Land of Promise. When that king was defeated, his territory aroused the desires of the pastoral tribes of Reuben and Gad. Its fitness for pasture is celebrated in the Song of Songs: the Shulamite's hair is twice compared to 'goats that lie along the side of Mount Gilead' (Ca 4³ 6⁴). On the partition of the land, Gilead was divided into two, the southern half being given to Reuben and Gad, the northern half to the trans-Jordanic half of Manasseh. The Manassite part is distinguished by the name Havvoth-jair, apparently meaning the 'Settlements of Jair.' Jair was a son of Manasseh, according to Nu 32⁴¹, but he seems in Jg 10³ to be confused with one of the minor Judges of the same name. Another Judge, Jephthah (Jg 11), was a Gileadite, whose prowess delivered Israel from Ammon. His subsequent sacrifice of his daughter is indicated as the origin of a festival of Israelite women (Jg 11⁴⁰). In a previous stress of the Israelites, Gilead did not bear its part, and is upbraided for its remissness by Deborah (Jg 5¹⁷). In Jg 20¹ Gilead is used as a general term for trans-Jordanic Israel. Here some of the Hebrews took refuge from the Philistines (1 S 13⁷); and over Gilead and other parts of the country Ish-bosheth was made king (2 S 2⁹). Hither David fled from before Absalom, and was succoured, among others, by Barzillai (2 S 17²⁷ 19³¹, 1 K 2⁷), whose descendants are referred to in post-exilic records (Ezr 2⁶¹, Neh 7⁶³). To Gilead David's census agents came (2 S 24⁶). It was administered by Ben-geber for Solomon (1 K 4¹³). It was the land of Elijah's origin (1 K 17¹). For cruelties to Gileadites, Damascus and Ammon are denounced by Amos (1³ 1³), while on the other hand Hosea (6⁸ 12¹¹) speaks bitterly of the sins of Gilead. Pekah had a following of fifty Gileadites when he slew Pekahiah (2 K 15²⁵). The country was smitten by Hazael (10³²), and its inhabitants carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser (15²⁹). R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GILGAL.—A name meaning 'stone circle' applied to several places mentioned in the OT. 1. A place on the east border of Jericho (Jos 4¹⁹), where the Israelites first encamped after crossing Jordan, and which remained the headquarters of the congregation till after the rout of the northern kings at Merom (14⁹). The stone circle from which it certainly took its name (in spite of the impossible etymology given in Jos 5⁹), was no doubt that to which the tradition embodied in Jos 4¹⁹ refers, and the same as the 'images' by Gilgal in the story of Ehud (Jg 3¹⁹ RVm). The name is still preserved in the modern Jiljāliḥ. This is probably the same Gilgal as that included in the annual circuit of Samuel (1 S 7¹⁶). This shrine is mentioned by Hosea (4¹⁸ 9¹⁵ 12¹¹) and by Amos (4⁵). 2. A place of the same name near Dor mentioned in a list of conquered kings (Jos 12²⁵). It may be Jiljāliḥ, about 4 miles N. of Antipatris (Ras el-'Ain). 3. A place in the Samaritan mountains (2 K 4²⁸), somewhere near Bethel (2¹). It may possibly be Jiljāliḥ, 8 miles N.W. of Bethel. 4. The Gilgal of Dt 11³⁰ is unknown. It may be identical with No. 1; but it seems closely connected with Ebal and Gerizim. There is a Julcūl 2½ miles S.E. of Nāblus that may represent this place. 5. A place of uncertain locality, also possibly the same as No. 1, in the border of the tribe of Judah (Jos 15⁷). At none of these places have any remains of early antiquity been as yet observed. There was in A.D. 700 a large church that covered what were said to be the twelve commemoration stones of Joshua: this is reported by Arculf. The church and stones have both disappeared. The only relic of antiquity now to be seen is a large pool, probably of mediæval workmanship, 100 ft. by 84 ft. A tradition evidently suggested by the Biblical story of the fall of Jericho is recorded by Conder as having been related to him here. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GILOH.—A city in the southern hills of Judah (Jos 15⁴¹), the birthplace of Ahithophel the Gilonite, the famous counsellor of David (2 S 15³ 23³⁴). Its site is uncertain.

GIMEL.—The third letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 3rd part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

GIMZO.—A town on the border of Philistia (2 Ch 28¹⁸). It is the modern Jimzū near Ajlajon.

GIN.—See SNARES.

GINATH.—Father of Tibni, who unsuccessfully laid claim against Omri to the throne of Israel (1 K 16²¹ 22).

GINNETHOL.—A priest among the returned exiles (Neh 12⁹); called in Neh 12¹⁶ 10⁶ Ginnethon.

GIRDING THE LOINS, GIRDLE.—See DRESS, §§ 2. 3.

GIRGASHITES (in Heb. always sing. 'the Girgashite,' and rightly so rendered in RV).—Very little is known of this people, whose name, though occurring several times in OT in the list of Can. tribes (Gn 10¹⁶ 15²¹, Dt 7¹ [and 20¹⁷ in Sam. and LXX], Jos 3¹⁰ 24¹¹, 1 Ch 1⁴, Neh 9³), affords no indication of their position, or to what branch of the Canaanites they belonged, except in two instances, namely, Gn 10¹⁶, where the 'Girgashite' is given as the name of the fifth son of Canaan; and Jos 24¹¹, where the Girgashites would seem to have inhabited the tract on the west of Jordan, the Israelites having been obliged to cross over that river in order to fight the men of Jericho, among whom were the Girgashites.

GIRZITES.—Acc. to 1 S 27⁸, David and his men while living at the court of Achish king of Gath, 'made a raid upon the Geshurites and the Girzites' (RVm Gizrites) and the Amalekites: for those nations were the inhabitants of the land, which were of old, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.' The LXX (B) is probably correct in reading only one name 'Gizrites' for 'Geshurites and Girzites,' viz. the Canaanite inhabitants of Gezer (wh. see), a town on the S.W. border of Ephraim (Jos 10³³ 16¹⁰, Jg 12⁹).

GISHPA.—An overseer of the Nethinim (Neh 11²), but text is probably corrupt.

GITTAIM.—A town of Benjamin (?), 2 S 4³, noticed with Hazor and Ramah (Neh 11³⁴). The site is unknown.

GITTITES.—See GATH.

GITTITH.—See PSALMS (titles).

GIZONITE.—A gentile name which occurs in 1 Ch 11¹⁴ in the colloc. 'Hashem the Gizonite.' In all probability this should be corrected to 'Jashen (cf. the parallel passage 2 S 23²²) the Gunite.' See JASHEN.

GIZRITES.—See GIRZITES.

GLASS, LOOKING-GLASS, MIRROR.—This indispensable article of a lady's toilet is first met with in Ex 38⁸, where the 'laver of brass' and its base are said to have been made of the 'mirrors' (AV 'looking-glasses') of the serving women which served at the door of the tent of meeting' (RV). This passage shows that the mirrors of the Hebrews, like those of the other peoples of antiquity, were made of polished bronze, as is implied in the comparison, Job 37¹⁸, of the sky to a 'molten mirror' (RV and AV 'looking-glass'). A different Hebrew word is rendered 'hand mirror' by RV in the list of toilet articles, Is 3². The fact that this word denotes a writing 'tablet' in 8¹ (RV) perhaps indicates that in the former passage we have an oblong mirror in a wooden frame. The usual shape, however, of the Egyptian (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 350 f. with illust.), as of the Greek, hand-mirrors was round or slightly oval. As a rule they were furnished with a tang, which fitted into a handle of wood or metal, often delicately carved. Two specimens of circular mirrors of bronze, one 5 inches, the other 4½, in diameter, have recently been discovered in Philistine (?) graves at Gezer (PEFS, 1905, 321; 1907, 199 with illust.).

In the Apocrypha there is a reference, Sir 12¹¹, to the rust that gathered on these metal mirrors, and in Wis 7²⁸ the Divine wisdom is described as 'the unspotted mirror of the power of God,' the only occurrence in AV of 'mirror,' which RV substitutes for 'glass' throughout. The NT references, finally, are those by Paul (1 Co 13¹², 2 Co 3¹⁸) and by James (1²³). For the 'sea of glass' (RV 'glassy sea') of Rev 4⁶ 15² see art. SEA OF GLASS. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

GLEANING.—For the humanitarian provisions of the Pentateuchal codes, by which the gleanings of the corn-field, vineyard, and oliveyard were the perquisites of the poor, the fatherless, the widow, and the ger or outlander.

see Lv 19^{9f}, 23²² (both H), Dt 24¹⁹⁻²¹; cf. AGRICULTURE, § 3; POVERTY. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

GLEDE.—See KITE.

GLORY (in OT).—The first use of this word is to express the exalted honour or praise paid either to things, or to man, or to God. From that it passes to denote the dignity or wealth, whether material or spiritual, that calls forth such honour. Thence it has come to mean, in the OT especially, the majesty and splendour that attend the revelation of the power or character of God. The principal Heb. word (kābōd) for 'glory' is derived from a root denoting heaviness. The root may be seen in Is 1⁴, 'a people heavy with the burden of iniquity.' For its derived use, cf. 'loaded with honours,' 'weight of glory.' A few illustrations of each of these uses may be given.

1. It is only necessary to mention the constantly recurring phrase 'glory to God' (Jos 7¹⁹, Ps 29¹ etc.). As applying to man may be quoted, 'the wise shall inherit glory' (Pr 3³⁴).

2. Phrases such as 'the glory of Lebanon' (Is 35²), i.e. the cedars; 'of his house' (Ps 49⁶), i.e. his material possessions; 'the glory and honour of the nations' (Rev 21²⁶), parallel with 'the wealth of the nations' in Is 60¹¹, may be quoted here. 'My glory' (Gn 49⁶, Ps 18² 30¹² 57⁸ etc.) is used as synonymous with 'soul,' and denotes the noblest part of man; cf. also Ps 8⁹. Jehovah is called 'the glory' of Israel as the proudest possession of His people (Jer 21¹; cf. 1 S 4²¹ 2², Lk 22³). With reference to God may be named Ps 19¹, His wisdom and strength; and Ps 63², the worthiness of His moral government.

3. Two uses of the expression 'the glory of Jehovah' are to be noted. (a) The manifestation of His glory in the self-revelation of His character and being, e.g. Is 6³. Here 'glory' is the showing forth of God's holiness. For God's glory manifested in history and in the control of the nations, see Nu 14²², Ezk 39²¹; in nature, Ps 29² 9 104²¹. (b) A physical manifestation of the Divine Presence. This is especially notable in Ezekiel, e.g. 1²⁸, where the glory is bright like the rainbow. In the P sections of the Pentateuch such representations are frequent (see Ex 24¹⁶⁻¹⁸, Lv 9⁶ etc.). A passage combining these two conceptions is the story of the theophany to Moses (Ex 33¹⁷⁻²² 34¹⁻⁷). Here the visible glory, the brightness of Jehovah's face, may not be seen. The spiritual glory is revealed in the proclamation of the name of Jehovah, full of compassion and gracious.

GLORY (in Apoc. and NT).—Except in 1 P 2²⁰ (where it means renown), 'glory,' as a noun, is always the translation of Gr. doxa. This word, coming from a root meaning 'to seem,' might signify outward appearance only, or, in a secondary sense, opinion. This use is not found in the Biblical writings, but the derived classical use—favourable opinion or reputation, and hence exalted honour—, as applied to things, splendour, is very common (Wis 8¹⁰, Ro 2⁷⁻¹⁰, Bar 2¹⁷, Jn 9²⁴, Sir 43¹ 50⁷). The special LXX use of 'glory' for the physical or ethical manifestation of the greatness of God is also frequent. In AV of NT doxa is occasionally translated 'honour' (e.g. Jn 5⁴, 2 Co 6⁸ etc.); in Apocrypha sometimes 'honour' (1 Es 8⁴ etc.), and a few times 'pomp' (1 Mac 10³⁶ 11⁴ etc.), or 'majesty' (Ad. Est 15⁷); otherwise it is uniformly rendered 'glory.' As a verb, 'glory' in the sense of boast (Gr. kauchaomai) is frequently found (Sir 11⁴, 1 Co 13³¹).

A few examples of the use of 'glory' to denote the brightness of goodness may be given. In Bar 5¹ is the striking phrase 'the glory of godliness,' whilst wisdom is called 'a clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty' (Wis 7²⁸). In Jn 1¹⁴ the 'glory' of the Only-begotten consists in grace and truth (cf. Jn 2¹¹ 17²⁴). In Ro 3²³ the 'glory' of God, of which men have fallen short, is His manifested excellence, revealed at first in man made in God's image (cf. 1 Co 11^{7a}), lost through sin, but meant to be recovered as he is transfigured 'from glory to glory' (2 Co 3¹⁸). For 'glory' as used to express the visible brightness, cf. To 12¹⁵, where Raphael goes in before the glory of the Holy One (cf. 2 Mac 3³⁰, of angels). In NT, cf. Lk 2⁹ 'The glory of the Lord shone round about them.' In 2 Co 3⁷⁻¹¹ the double use of 'glory' is clearly seen; the fading brightness on the face of Moses is contrasted with the abiding spiritual glory of the new covenant. Passages which combine both the ethical and the physical meanings are those which speak of the glory of the Son of Man (Mt 16²⁷ etc.), and the glory, both of brightness and of purity, which gives light to the heavenly city (Rev 21²³). 'Glory,' as applied to the saints, culminates in a state where both body and spirit are fully changed into the likeness of the glorified Lord (Ph 3²¹, Col 3⁴).

In Wis 18²⁴ a special use appears, where 'the glories of the fathers' is a phrase for the names of the twelve tribes, written on the precious stones of the high-priestly breastplate. Doubtless this is suggested by the flashing gems. An interesting parallel is given in Murray, Eng. Dict. s.v.: 'They presented to his Electoral Highness . . . the Two Stars or Glories, and Two Pieces of Ribbon of the Order [of the Garter]'; cf. Kalisch on Ex 28 'The jewels are the emblems of the stars, which they rival in splendour.'

GNAT (Mt 23²⁴).—Various members of the Culicidae, mosquitoes and true gnats, are found in Palestine; of the former, four species are known which are fever-bearing. These and such small insects are very apt to fall into food or liquid, and require to be 'strained out' (RV), especially in connexion with Lv 11²² 24. An Arab proverb well illustrates the ideas of Mt 23²⁴: 'He eats an elephant and is suffocated by a gnat.' In the RVm of Is 51⁶ 'like gnats' is suggested for 'in like manner.'

GNOSTICISM.—1. Gnosticism proper.—The term, which comes from the Gr. gnōsis, 'knowledge,' is now technically used to describe an eclectic philosophy of the 2nd cent. A.D. which was represented by a number of sects or divisions of people. The philosophy was constructed out of Jewish, Pagan, and Christian elements, and was due mainly to the inevitable contact and conflict between these various modes of thought. It was an attempt to incorporate Christian with Jewish and Pagan ideas in solving the problems of life. The more important of these problems were—(1) How to reconcile the creation of the world by a perfectly good God with the presence of evil; (2) how the human spirit came to be imprisoned in matter, and how it was to be emancipated. The first problem was solved by predicated a series of emanations starting from a perfectly good and supreme God, and coming down step by step to an imperfect being who created the world with its evils. Thus there was an essential dualism of good and evil. The second problem was solved by advocating either an ascetic life, wherein everything material was as far as possible avoided, or else a licentious life, in which everything that was material was used without discrimination. Associated with these speculations was a view of Christ which resolved Him into a phantom, denied the reality of His earthly manifestation, and made Him only a temporary non-material emanation of Deity. Gnosticism culminated, as the name suggests, in the glorification of knowledge and in a tendency to set knowledge against faith, regarding the former as superior and as the special possession of a select spiritual few, and associating the latter with the great mass of average people who could not rise to the higher level. Salvation was therefore by knowledge, not by faith. The will was subordinated to the intellect, and everything was made to consist of an esoteric knowledge which was the privilege of an intellectual aristocracy.

2. Gnosticism in relation to the NT.—It is obvious that it is only in the slightest and most partial way that we can associate Gnosticism of a fully developed kind with the NT.

There is a constant danger, which has not always been avoided, of reading back into isolated NT expressions the Gnostic ideas of the 2nd century. While we may see in the NT certain germs which afterwards came to maturity in Gnosticism, we must be on our guard lest we read too much into NT phraseology, and thereby draw wrong conclusions. One example of this danger may be given. Simon Magus occupies a prominent place in the thoughts of many 2nd and 3rd cent. writers, and by some he is regarded as one of the founders of Gnosticism. This may or may not have been true, but at any rate there is absolutely nothing in Ac 8 to suggest even the germ of the idea.

It is necessary to consider carefully the main idea of gnosis, 'knowledge,' in the NT. (a) It is an essential element of true Christianity, and is associated with the knowledge of God in Christ (2 Co 2¹⁴ 4⁶), with the knowledge of Christ Himself (Ph 3⁸, 2 P 3¹⁸), and with the personal experience of what is involved in the Christian life (Ro 2²⁰ 15¹⁴, 1 Co 1⁸ 3¹⁴, Col 2²). In the term epignosis we have the further idea of 'full knowledge' which marks the ripe, mature Christian. This word is particularly characteristic of the Pauline Epistles of the First Captivity (Phil., Col., Eph.), and indicates the Apostle's view of the spiritually-advanced believer. But gnosis and epignosis always imply something more and deeper than intellectual understanding. They refer to a personal experience at once intellectual and spiritual, and include intellectual apprehension and moral perception. As distinct from wisdom, knowledge is spiritual experience considered in itself, while wisdom is knowledge in its practical application and use. In Colossians it is generally thought that the errors combated were associated with certain forms of Gnosticism. Lightfoot, on the one hand, sees in the references in ch. 2 Jewish elements of scrupulousness in the observance of days, and of asceticism in the distinction of meats, together with Greek or other purely Gnostic elements in theosophic speculation, shadowy mysticism, and the interposition of angels between God and man. He thinks the references are to one heresy in which these two separate elements are used, and that St. Paul deals with both aspects at once in 2⁸⁻²². With Gnostic intellectual exclusiveness he deals in 1¹⁸ and 2¹⁴ with speculative tendencies in 1¹⁸⁻²⁰ 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶, with practical tendencies to asceticism or licence in 2¹⁶⁻²². Hort (Judaistic Christianity), on the other hand, sees nothing but Judaistic elements in the Epistle, and will not allow that there are two independent sets of ideas blended. He considers that, apart from the phrase 'philosophy and vain deceit' (2⁸), there is nothing of speculative doctrine in the Epistle. He says that angel-worship was already prevalent quite apart from philosophy, and that there is no need to look beyond Judaism for what is found here. This difference between these two great scholars shows the extreme difficulty of attempting to find anything technically called Gnosticism in Colossians. (b) The Pastoral Epistles are usually next put under review. In 1 Ti 1⁴ 4², we are bidden by Lightfoot to see further developments of what had been rife in Colossae. Hort again differs from this view, and concludes that there is no clear evidence of speculative or Gnosticizing tendencies, but only of a dangerous fondness for Jewish trifling, both of the legendary and casuistical kind. (c) In the First Epistle of John (4¹⁻³) we are reminded of later Gnostic tendencies as represented by Cerinthus and others, who regarded our Lord as not really man, but only a phantom and a temporary emanation from the Godhead. The prominence given to 'knowledge' as an essential element of true Christian life is very striking in this Epistle, part of whose purpose is that those who possess eternal life in Christ may 'know' it (5¹¹). The verb 'to know' occurs in the Epistle no less than thirty-five times. (d) In Revelation (2¹⁷, 18, 20, 24 and 3¹⁴, 21) it is thought that further tendencies of a Gnostic kind are observable, and Lightfoot sees in the latter passage proof that the heresy of Colossae was continuing in that district of Asia Minor. The precariousness of this position is, however, evident, when it is realized that the errors referred to are clearly antinomian, and may well have arisen apart from any Gnostic speculations.

From the above review, together with the differences between great scholars, it is evident that the attempt to connect the NT with the later Gnosticism of the 2nd cent. must remain at best but partially successful. All that we can properly say is that in the NT there are signs of certain tendencies which were afterwards seen in the 2nd cent. Gnosticism, but whether there was any real connexion between the 1st cent. germs and the 2nd cent. developments is another question. In the clash of Judaistic, Hellenic, and Christian thought, it would not be surprising if already there were attempts at eclecticism, but the precise links of connexion between the germs of the NT and the developments of the 2nd cent. are yet to seek.

One thing we must keep clearly before us: gnosis in the NT is a truly honourable and important term, and stands for an essential part of the Christian life. Of course there is always the liability to the danger of mere speculation, and the consequent need of emphasizing love as contrasted with mere knowledge (1 Co 8¹ 13²), but when gnosis is regarded as both intellectual and moral, we see at once how necessary it is to a true, growing Christian life. The stress laid upon epignosis in later books of the NT, Pauline and Petrine, and the marked prominence given to the cognate terms in 1 John, clearly indicate the importance placed on the idea by Apostolic writers as a safeguard of the Christian life. While it is the essential feature of the young Christian to have (forgiveness); and of the growing Christian to be (strong); it is that of the ripe Christian to know (1 Jn 2¹²⁻¹⁴). Knowledge and faith are never contrasted in the NT. It is a false and impossible antithesis. 'Through faith we understand' (He 11³). Faith and sight, not faith and reason, are antithetical. We know in order to believe, credence leading to confidence; and then we believe in order to know more. Knowledge and trust act and react on each other. Truth and trust are correlatives, not contradictories. It is only mere speculative knowledge that is 'falsely so called' (1 Ti 6²⁰), because it does not take its rise and find its life and sustenance in God's revelation in Christ; but Christian gnosis received into the heart, mind, conscience and will, is that by which we are enabled to see the true as opposed to the false 'to distinguish things that differ' (Ph 1¹⁰), and to adhere closely to the way of truth and life. The Apostle describes the natural earth-bound man as lacking this spiritual discernment; he has no such faculty (1 Co 2¹⁴, 16). The spiritual man (2¹⁴ 3¹), or the perfect or ripe man (2⁶), is the man who knows; and this knowledge which is at once intellectual, moral and spiritual, is one of the greatest safeguards against every form of error and one of the choicest secrets of the enjoyment of the revelation of God in Christ.

GOAD.—See AGRICULTURE, § 1.

GOAH.—An unknown locality near Jerusalem (Jer 31¹⁰).

GOAT.—(1) ʔz, used generically, both sexes, Gn 30³², Ex 12⁸, Ezr 6¹⁷ etc. (2) tsaphr (root 'to leap'), 'he-goat,' 2 Ch 29¹⁷, Ezr 8²², Dn 8⁵, 8. (3) adtr (root 'hairy'), usually a he-goat, e.g. Dn 8²¹ 'rough goat'; setrah, Lv 5⁶ 'she-goat'; setrim, tr. 'devils' 2 Ch 11¹¹, 'satyrs' Is 13¹ 34¹⁴. See SATYR. (4) atad, only in pl. atadim, 'he-goats' Gn 31¹⁰, 11, AVm and RV 'chief ones' Is 14¹, but RVm 'he-goats.' (5) taytah, 'he-goat,' Pr 30¹ etc. In NT eriphas, eriphion, Mt 25³², 33; trapos, He 9¹², 13, 19 10⁴. Goats are among the most valued possessions of the people of Palestine. Nabal had a thousand goats (1 S 25²; see also Gn 30³², 33 32¹⁴ etc.). They are led to pasture with the sheep, but are from time to time separated from them for milking, herding, and even feeding (Mt 25³²). Goats thrive on extraordinarily bare pasturage, but they do immeasurable destruction to young trees and shrubs, and are responsible for much of the barrenness of the hills. Goats supply most of the milk used in Palestine (Pr 27¹⁷); they are also killed for food, especially the young kids (Gn 27⁹, Jg 6¹⁹ 13¹⁴ etc.). The Syrian goat (Capra mambrica) is black or grey, exceptionally white, and has shaggy hair and remarkably long ears.

Goat's hair is extensively woven into cloaks and material for tents (Ex 26⁷ 36⁴), and their skins are tanned entire to make water-bottles. See BOTTLE.

Wild goat.—(1) yā'el (cf. proper name Jael), used in pl. yē'elīm, 1 S 24², Ps 104¹⁸, and Job 39¹. (2) 'akkō, Dt 14². Probably both these terms refer to the wild goat or ibex, Capra bedou, the bedou or 'goats of Moses' of the Arabs. It is common on the inaccessible cliffs round the Dead Sea, some of which are known as jehel el-bedou, the 'mountains of the wild goats' (cf. 1 S 24²). The ibex is very shy, and difficult to shoot. Though about the size of an ordinary goat, its great curved horns, often 3 feet long, give it a much more imposing appearance.

GOB.—A place mentioned only in 2 S 21¹⁸ as the scene of an exploit of one of David's warriors. In the parallel passage 1 Ch 20⁴ Gob appears as Gezer; many texts read it as Nob. The Gr. and Syr. versions have Gath. Nothing is known of Gob as a separate place. The word means 'cistern.' W. F. CONN.

GOD.—The object of this article is to give a brief sketch of the history of belief in God as gathered from the Bible. The existence of God is everywhere assumed in the sacred volume; it will not therefore be necessary here to consider the arguments adduced to show that the belief in God's existence is reasonable. It is true that in Ps 14¹ 53¹ the 'fool' (i.e. the ungodly man) says that there is no God; but the meaning doubtless is, not that the existence of God is denied, but that the 'fool' alleges that God does not concern Himself with man (see Ps 10⁴).

1. Divine revelation gradual.—God 'spake,' i.e. revealed Himself, 'by divers portions and in divers manners' (He 1¹). The world only gradually acquired the knowledge of God which we now possess; and it is therefore a gross mistake to look for our ideas and standards of responsibility in the early ages of mankind. The world was educated 'precept upon precept, line upon line' (Is 28¹⁰); and it is noteworthy that even when the gospel age arrived, our Lord did not in a moment reveal all truth, but accommodated His teaching to the capacity of the people (Mk 4²³); the chosen disciples themselves did not grasp the fulness of that teaching until Pentecost (Jn 16¹²). The fact of the very slow growth of conceptions of God is made much clearer by our increased knowledge with respect to the composition of the OT; now that we have learnt, for example, that the Mosaic code is to be dated, as a whole, centuries later than Moses, and that the patriarchal narratives were written down, as we have them, in the time of the Kings, and are coloured by the ideas of that time, we see that the idea that Israel had much the same conception of God in the age of the Patriarchs as in that of the Prophets is quite untenable, and that the fuller conception was a matter of slow growth. The fact of the composite character of the Pentateuch, however, makes it very difficult for us to find out exactly what were the conceptions about God in patriarchal and in Mosaic times; and it is impossible to be dogmatic in speaking of them. We can deal only with probabilities gathered from various indications in the literature, especially from the survival of old customs.

2. Names of God in OT.—It will be convenient to gather together the principal OT names of God before considering the conceptions of successive ages. The names will to some extent be a guide to us.

(a) Elohim, the ordinary Hebrew name for God, a plural word of doubtful origin and meaning. It is used, as an ordinary plural, of heathen gods, or of supernatural beings (1 S 28¹³), or even of earthly judges (Ps 82¹), cf. Jn 10⁴¹; but when used of the One God, it takes a singular verb. As so used, it has been thought to be a relic of pre-historic polytheism, but more probably it is a 'plural of majesty,' such as is common in Hebrew, or else it denotes the fulness of God. The singular Eloah is rare except in Job; it is found in poetry and in late prose.

(b) El, common to Semitic tribes, a name of doubtful meaning, but usually interpreted as 'the Strong One' or as 'the Ruler.' It is probably not connected philologically with Elohim (Driver, Genesis, p. 404). It is used often in poetry and in proper names; in prose rarely, except as part of a compound title like El Shaddai, or with an epithet or descriptive word attached; as 'God of Bethel,' El-Bethel (Gn 31¹³); 'a jealous God,' El qanna (Ex 20⁹).

(c) El Shaddai.—The meaning of Shaddai is uncertain; the name has been derived from a root meaning 'to overthrow,' and would then mean 'the Destroyer'; or from a root meaning 'to pour,' and would then mean 'the Rain-giver'; or it has been interpreted as 'my Mountain' or 'my Lord.' Traditionally it is rendered 'God Almighty,' and there is perhaps a reference to this sense of the name in the words 'He that is mighty' of Lk 1⁴⁹. According to the Priestly writer (P), the name was characteristic of the patriarchal age (Ex 6³, cf. Gn 17¹ 28³). 'Shaddai' alone is used often in OT as a poetical name of God (Nu 24⁴ etc.), and is rendered 'the Almighty.'

(d) El Elyon, 'God Most High,' found in Gn 14¹⁸. (a passage derived from a 'special source' of the Pentateuch, i.e. not from J, E, or P), and thought by Driver (Genesis, p. 165) perhaps to have been originally the name of a Canaanite deity, but applied to the true God. 'Elyon' is also found alone, as in Ps 82⁵ (so tr. into Greek, Lk 12²⁵ 70 63), and with 'Elohim' in Ps 57², in close connexion with 'El' and with 'Shaddai' in Nu 24¹⁶, and with 'Jahweh' in Ps 71⁷ 18¹ etc. That 'El Elyon' was a commonly used name is made probable by the fact that it is found in an Aramaic translation in Dn 3² 4² 51²¹ and in a Greek translation in 1 Es 6⁹ etc., Mk 5⁷, Ac 16¹⁷, and so in He 7¹, where it is taken direct from Gn 14¹⁸ LXX.

(e) Adonai (= 'Lord'), a title, common in the prophets expressing dependence, as of a servant on his master, o. of a wife on her husband (Otley, BL p. 192 f.).

(f) Jehovah, properly Yahweh (usually written Jahweh) perhaps a pre-historic name. Prof. H. Guthe (EB ii art. 'Israel,' § 4) thinks that it is of primitive antiquity and cannot be explained; that it tells us nothing about the nature of the Godhead. This is probably true of the name in pre-Mosaic times; that it was then in existence was certainly the opinion of the Jahwist writer (Gn 4²⁶, J), and is proved by its occurrence in proper names, e.g. in 'Jochebed,' the name of Moses' mother (Ex 6², P). What it originally signified is uncertain; the root from which it is derived might mean 'to blow' or 'to breathe,' or 'to fall,' or 'to be.' Further, the name might have been derived from the causative 'to make to be,' and in that case might signify 'Creator.' But, as Driver remarks (Genesis, p. 409), the important thing for us to know is not what the name meant originally, but what it came actually to denote to the Israelites. And there can be no doubt that from Moses' time onwards it was derived from the 'imperfect' tense of the verb 'to be,' and was understood to mean 'He who is wont to be,' or else 'He who will be.' This is the explanation given in Ex 3¹⁴; when God Himself speaks. He uses the first person, and the name becomes 'I am' or 'I will be.' It denotes, then, Existence; yet it is understood as expressing active and self-manifesting Existence (Driver, p. 408). It is almost equivalent to 'He who has life in Himself' (cf. Jn 5²⁶). It became the common name of God in post-Mosaic times, and was the specially personal designation.

We have to consider whether the name was used by the patriarchs. The Jahwist writer (J) uses it constantly in his narrative of the early ages; and Gn 4²⁶ (see above) clearly exhibits more than a mere anachronistic use of a name common in the writer's age. On the other hand, the Priestly writer (P) was of opinion that the patriarchs had not used the name, but had known God as 'El Shaddai' (Ex 6²¹); for it is putting force upon language to suppose that P meant only that the patriarchs did not understand the full meaning of the name 'Jahweh,' although they used it. P is consistent in not using the name 'Jahweh' until the Exodus. So the author of Job, who lays his scene in the patriarchal age, makes the characters of the dialogue use 'Shaddai,' etc., and only once (12⁹) 'Jahweh' (Driver, p. 185). We have thus contradictory authorities. Driver (p. xix.) suggests that though the name was not absolutely new in Moses' time, it was current only in a limited circle, as is seen from its absence in the composition of patriarchal proper names.

'Jehovah' is a modern and hybrid form, dating only from A.D. 1518. The name 'Jahweh' was so sacred that it was not, in later Jewish times, pronounced at all, perhaps owing to an over-literal interpretation of the Third Commandment. In reading 'Adonai' was substituted for it; hence the vowels of that name were in MSS attached to the consonants of 'Jahweh' for a guide to the reader, and the result, when the MSS are read as written (as they were never meant by Jewish scribes to be read), is 'Jehovah.' Thus this modern form has the consonants of one word and the vowels of another. The Hellenistic Jews, in Greek, substituted 'Kyrios' (Lord) for the sacred name, and it is thus rendered in LXX and NT. This explains why in EV 'the Lord' is the usual rendering of 'Jahweh.' The expression 'Tetragrammaton' is used for the four consonants of the sacred name, YHWH, which appears in Greek capital letters as Pi pi, owing to the similarity of the Greek capital p to the Hebrew h, and the Greek capital i to the Hebrew w and u [thus, Heb. יהוה = Gr. ΠΙ ΠΙ].

(g) Jah is an apocopated form of Jahweh, and appears in poetry (e.g. Ps 68⁴, Ex 15²) in the word 'Hallelujah' and in proper names. For Jah Jahweh see Is 11² 26⁴.

(h) Jahweh Tsebaōth ('Sabaōth' of Ro 9²⁹ and Ja 5⁴), in EV 'Lord of hosts' (wh. see), appears frequently in the prophetic and post-exilic literature (Is 1⁹ 6³, Ps 84¹ etc.). This name seems originally to have referred to God's presence with the armies of Israel in the times of the monarchy; as fuller conceptions of God became prevalent, the name received an ampler meaning. Jahweh was known as God, not only of the armies of Israel, but of all the hosts of heaven and of the forces of nature (Cheyne, Aids to Devout Study of Criticism, p. 284).

We notice, lastly, that 'Jahweh' and 'Elohim' are joined together in Gn 2¹-3²² 9²⁶, Ex 9³⁰, and elsewhere. Jahweh is identified with the Creator of the Universe (Otley, BL 2, p. 195). We have the same conjunction, with 'Sabaōth' added ('Lord God of hosts'), in Am 5². 'Adonai' with 'Sabaōth' is not uncommon.

3. Pre-Mosaic conceptions of God.—We are now in a position to consider the growth of the revelation of God in successive ages; and special reference may here be made to Kautzsch's elaborate monograph on the 'Religion of Israel' in Hastings' DB, Ext. vol. pp. 612-734, for a careful discussion of OT conceptions of God. With regard to those of pre-Mosaic times there is much room for doubt. The descriptions written so many centuries later are necessarily coloured by the ideas of the author's age, and we have to depend largely on the survival of old customs in historical times—customs which had often acquired a new meaning, or of which the original meaning was forgotten. Certainly pre-Mosaic Israel conceived of God as attached to certain places or pillars or trees or springs, as we see in Gn 12⁸ 13¹⁸ 14⁷ 35⁷, Jos 24²⁶ etc. It has been conjectured that the stone circle, Gilgal (Jos 4²⁻⁵ 20⁷), was a heathen sanctuary converted to the religion of Jahweh. A. B. Davidson (Hastings' DB ii. 201) truly remarks on the difficulty in primitive times of realizing deity apart from a local abode; later on, the Ark relieved the difficulty without representing Jahweh under any form, for His presence was attached to it (but see below, § 4).—Traces of 'Totemism,' or belief in the blood relationship of a tribe and a natural object, such as an animal, treated as the protector of the tribe, have been found in the worship of Jahweh under the form of a molten bull (1 K 12²⁸; but this was doubtless derived from the Canaanites), and in the avoidance of unclean animals. Traces of 'Animism,' or belief in the activity of the spirits of one's dead relations, and its consequence 'Ancestor-worship,' have been found in the mourning customs of Israel, such as cutting the hair, wounding the flesh, wearing sackcloth, funeral feasts, reverence for tombs, and the levirate marriage, and in the name elohim (i.e. supernatural beings) given to Samuel's spirit and (probably) other spirits seen by the witch of Endor (1 S 28¹³). Kautzsch thinks that these results are not proved, and that the belief in demoniacal powers explains the mourning customs without its being necessary to suppose that Animism had developed into Ancestor-worship.—Polytheism has been traced in the plural 'Elohim' (see 2 above), in the teraphim or household gods (Gn 31³⁰, 1 S 19¹² 16; found in temples, Jg 17⁵ 18⁴; cf. Hos 3⁴); and patriarchal names, such as Abraham, Sarah, have been taken for the titles of pre-historic divinities. Undoubtedly Israel was in danger of worshipping foreign gods, but there is no trace of a Hebrew polytheism (Kautzsch). It will be seen that the results are almost entirely negative; and we must remain in doubt as to the patriarchal conception of God. It seems clear, however, that communion of the worshipper with God was considered to be effected by sacrifice.

4. Post-Mosaic conceptions of God.—The age of the Exodus was undoubtedly a great crisis in the theological education of Israel. Moses proclaimed Jahweh as the God of Israel, supreme among gods, alone to be worshipped by the people whom He had made His own, and with whom He had entered into covenant. But the realization of the truth that there is none other God but Jahweh came by slow degrees only; henotheism, which taught that Jahweh alone was to be worshipped by Israel, while the heathen deities were real but inferior gods, gave place only slowly to a true monotheism in the popular religion. The old name Micah (= 'Who is like Jahweh?', Jg 17¹) is one indication of this line of thought. The religion of the Canaanites was a nature-worship; their deities were personified forces of nature, though called 'Lord' or 'Lady' (Baal, Baalah) of the place where they were venerated (Guthe, EB ii. art. 'Israel,' § 6); and when left to themselves the Israelites gravitated towards nature-worship. The great need of the early post-Mosaic age, then, was to develop the idea of personality. The defective idea of individuality is seen, for example, in the putting of Achan's household to death (Jos 7²⁴), and in the wholesale slaughter of the Canaanites. (The defect appears much later, in an Oriental nation, in Dn 6²⁴, and is constantly observed by travellers in the East to this day.) Jahweh, therefore, is proclaimed as a personal God; and for this reason all the older writers freely use anthropomorphisms. They speak of God's arm, mouth, lips, eyes; He is said to move (Gn 3¹ 11¹ 18¹⁴), to wrestle (32^{24b}). Similarly He is said to 'repent' of an action (Gn 6⁶, Ex 32⁴; but see 1 S 15²⁹), to be grieved, angry, jealous, and gracious, to love and to hate; in these ways the intelligence, activity, and power of God are emphasized. As a personal God He enters into covenant with Israel, protecting, ruling, guiding them, giving them victory. The wars and victories of Israel are those of Jahweh (Nu 21¹⁴, Jg 5²³).

The question of images in the early post-Mosaic period is a difficult one. Did Moses tolerate images of Jahweh? On the one hand, it seems certain that the Decalogue in some form or other comes from Moses; the conquest of Canaan is inexplicable unless Israel had some primary laws of moral conduct (Otley, BL 2, p. 172 f.). But, on the other hand, the Second Commandment need not have formed part of the original Decalogue; and there is a very general opinion that the making of images of Jahweh was thought unobjectionable up to the 8th cent. B.C., though Kautzsch believes that images of wood and stone were preferred to metal ones because of the Canaanitish associations of the latter (Ex 34¹⁷, but see Jg 17¹); he thinks also that the fact of the Ark being the shrine of Jahweh and representing His presence points to its having contained an image of Jahweh (but see § 3 above), and that the ephod was originally an image of Jahweh (Jg 8²¹), though the word was afterwards used for a gold or silver casing of an image, and so in later times for a sort of waistcoat. In our uncertainty as to the date of the various sources of the Hexateuch it is impossible to come to a definite conclusion about this matter; and Moses, like the later prophets, may have preached a high doctrine which popular opinion did not endorse. To this view Barnes (Hastings' DB, art. 'Israel', ii. 509) seems to incline. At least the fact remains that images of Jahweh were actually used for many generations after Moses.

5. The conceptions of the Prophetic age.—This age is marked by a growth, perhaps a very gradual growth, towards a true monotheism. More spiritual conceptions of God are taught; images of Jahweh are denounced; God is unrestricted in space and time (e.g. 1 K 8²⁷), and is enthroned in heaven. He is holy (Is 6³)—separate from sinners (cf. He 7²⁶), for this seems to be the sense of the Hebrew word; the idea is as old as 1 S 6²⁰. He is the 'Holy One of Israel' (Is 1⁴ and often). He is Almighty, present everywhere (Jer 23²⁴), and full of love.—The prophets, though they taught more spiritual ideas about God, still used anthropomorphisms; thus, Isaiah saw Jahweh on His throne (Is 6¹), though this was only in a vision.—The growth of true monotheistic ideas may be traced in such passages as Dt 4³⁸, 39, 6⁴, 10¹⁴, 1 K 8²⁶, Is 37¹⁶, Jl 2²⁷; it culminates in Deutero-Isaiah (Is 43¹⁰ 'Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me'; 44⁶ 'I am the first and I am the last, and beside me there is no God'; so 45⁵). The same idea is expressed by the teaching that Jahweh rules not only His people but all nations, as in the numerous passages in Deutero-Isaiah about the Gentiles, in Jer 10¹, often in Ezekiel (e.g. 35⁹, 13 of Edom), Mal 1^{11, 14}, and elsewhere. The earlier prophets had recognized Jahweh as Creator (though Kautzsch thinks that several passages like Am 4¹³ are later glosses); but Deutero-Isaiah emphasizes this attribute more than any of his brethren (Is 40¹², 22, 28, 41⁴, 42⁵, 44²⁴, 45¹², 18, 48¹²).

We may here make a short digression to discuss whether the heathen deities, though believed by the later Jews, and afterwards by the Christians, to be no gods, were yet thought to have a real existence, or whether they were considered to be simply non-existent, creatures of the imagination only. In Is 14¹² (the Babylonian king likened to false divinities?) and 24² the heathen gods seem to be identified with the fallen angels (see Whitehouse, in Hastings' DB i. 592); so perhaps in Deutero-Isaiah (46¹¹). In later times they are often identified with demons. In Eth. Enoch (xix. 1) Uriel speaks of the evil angels leading men astray into sacrificing to demons as to gods (see Charles's note; and also xcix. 7). And the idea was common in Christian times; it has been attributed to St. Paul (1 Co 10²⁰; though 8⁴ points the other way, whether these verses are the Apostle's own words or are a quotation from the letter of the Corinthians). Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 9, 64, etc.), Tatian (Add. to the Greeks, 8), and Irenæus (Har. iii. 6⁵), while denying that the heathen deities are really gods, make them to have a real existence and to be demons; Athenagoras (Apol. 18, 28), Clement of Alexandria (Exh. to the Greeks, 2f.), and Tertullian (Apol. 10) make them to be mere men or beasts deified by superstition, or combine both ideas.

6. Post-exilic conceptions of God.—In the period from the Exile to Christ, a certain deterioration in the spiritual conception of God is visible. It is true that there was no longer any danger of idolatry, and that this age was marked by an uncompromising monotheism. Yet there was a tendency greatly to exaggerate God's transcendence, to make Him self-centred and self-absorbed, and to widen the gulf between Him and the world (Sanday, in Hastings' DB ii. 206). This tendency began even at the Exile, and accounts for the discontinuance of anthropomorphic language. In the Priest's Code (P) this language is avoided as much as possible. And later, when the LXX was translated, the alterations made to avoid anthropomorphisms are very significant. Thus in Ex 15¹ LXX the name 'Man of war' (of Jahweh) disappears; in Ex 19¹ LXX Moses went up not 'to Elohim,' but 'to the mount of God'; in Ex 24¹⁰ the words 'they saw Elohim of Israel' become 'they saw the place where the God of Israel stood.' So in the Targums man is described as being created in the image of the angels, and many other anthropomorphisms are removed.—The same tendency is seen in the almost constant use of 'Elohim' rather than of 'Jahweh' in the later books of OT. The tendency, only faintly marked in the later canonical books, is much more evident as time went on. Side by side with it is to be noticed the exaltation of the Law, and the inconsistent conception of God as subject to His own Law. In the Talmud He is represented as a great Rabbi, studying the Law, and keeping the Sabbath (Gilbert, in Hastings' DCG i. 582).

Yet there were preparations for the full teaching of the gospel with regard to distinctions in the Godhead. The old narratives of the Theophanies, of the mysterious 'Angel of the Lord' who appeared at one time to be 'God' and at another to be distinct from Him, would prepare men's minds in some degree for the Incarnation, or suggesting a personal unveiling of God (see Liddon, BL ii. i. β); even the common use of the plural name 'Elohim,' whatever its original significance (see § 2 above), would necessarily prepare them for the doctrine of distinctions in the Godhead, as would the quasi-personification of 'the Word' and 'Wisdom', as in Proverbs, Job, Wisdom, Sirach, and in the later Jewish writers, who not only personified but deified them (Scott, in Hastings' DB, Ext. vol. p. 308). Above all, the quasi-personification of the 'Spirit of God' in the prophetic books (esp. Is 48¹⁶, 63¹⁰) and in the Psalms (esp. 51¹¹), and the expectation of a superhuman King Messiah, would tend in the same direction.

7. Christian development of the doctrine of God.—We may first deal with the development in the conception of God's fatherhood. As contrasted with the OT, the NT emphasizes the universal fatherhood and love of God. The previous ages had scarcely risen above a conception of God as Father of Israel, and in a special sense of Messiah (Ps 2⁷); they had thought of God only as ruling the Gentiles and bringing them into subjection. Our Lord taught, on the other hand, that God is Father of all and loving to all; He is kind even 'toward the unthankful and evil' (Lk 6³⁵, cf. Mt 5⁴⁵). Jesus therefore used the name 'Father' more frequently than any other. Yet He Himself bears to the Father a unique relationship; the Voice at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration would otherwise have no meaning (Mk 1¹¹ 9⁷ and || Mt. Lk.). Jesus never speaks to His disciples of the Father as 'our Father'; He calls Him absolutely 'the Father' (seldom in Synoptics, Mt 11²⁷, 24³⁶ [RV] 28¹⁹ [see § 8], Mk 13³², Lk 10²², passim in Jn.), or 'my Father' (very frequently in all the Gospels, also in Rev 2²⁷ 3⁶), or else 'my Father and your Father' (Jn 20¹⁷). The use of 'his Father' in Mk 8³⁸ and || Mt. Lk. is similar. This unique relationship is the point of the saying that God sent His only-begotten Son to save the world (Jn 3¹⁶, 1 Jn 4⁹)—a saying which shows also the universal fatherhood of God, for salvation is offered to all men (so Jn 12³²). The passage Mt 11²⁷ (= Lk 10²²) is important as being 'among the earliest materials made use of by the Evangelists,' and as containing 'the whole of the Christology of the Fourth Gospel' (Plummer, ICC, 'St. Luke,' p. 282; for the latest criticism on it see Sanday, Criticism of the Fourth Gosp. p. 223f.). It marks the unique relation in which Jesus stands to the Father.—We have, then, in the NT three senses in which God is Father. (a) He is the Father of Jesus Christ. (b) He is the Father of all His creatures (cf. Ac 17²⁸, Ja 1¹⁷, He 12⁹), of Gentiles as well as of Jews; Mk 7²⁷ implies that, though the Jews were to be fed first, the Gentiles were also to be fed. He is the Father of all the Jews, as well as of the disciples of Jesus; the words 'One is your Father' were spoken to the multitudes also (Mt 23⁹). (c) But in a very special sense He is Father of the disciples, who are taught to pray 'Our Father' (Mt 6⁹); in the shorter version of Lk 11² RV, 'Father'), and who call on Him as Father (1 P 1¹⁷ RV). For Pauline passages which teach this triple fatherhood see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, iii. 1.

The meaning of the doctrine of the universal fatherhood is that God is love (1 Jn 4³), and that He manifests His love by sending His Son into the world to save it (see above).

8. Distinctions in the Godhead.—We should not expect to find the nomenclature of Christian theology in the NT. The writings contained therein are not a manual of theology; and the object of the technical terms invented or adopted by the Church was to explain the doctrine of the Bible in a form intelligible to the Christian learner. They do not mark a development of doctrine in times subsequent to the Gospel age. The use of the words 'Persons' and 'Trinity' affords an example of this. They were adopted in order to express the teaching of the NT that there are distinctions in the Godhead; that Jesus is no mere man, but that He came down from heaven to take our nature upon Him; that He and the Father are one thing (Jn 10³⁰, see below), and yet are distinct (Mk 13³²); that the Spirit is God, and yet distinct from the Father and the Son (Ro 8⁹, see below). At the same time Christian theology takes care that we should not conceive of the Three Persons as of three individuals. The meaning of the word 'Trinity' is, in the language of the Quicunque vult, that 'the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet they are not three Gods, but one God.'

The present writer must profoundly dissent from the view that Jesus' teaching about God showed but little advance on that of the prophets, and that the 'Trinitarian' idea as found in the Fourth Gospel and in Mt 28¹⁹ was a development of a later age, say of the very end of the 1st century. Confessedly a great and marvellous development took place. To whom are we to assign it, if not to our Lord? Had a great teacher, or a school of teachers, arisen, who could of themselves produce such an absolute revolution in thought, how is it that contemporary writers and posterity alike put them completely in the background, and gave to Jesus the place of the Great Teacher of the world? This can be accounted for only by the revolution of thought being the work of Jesus Himself. An examination of the literature will lead us to the same conclusion.

(a) We begin with St. Paul, as our earliest authority. The 'Apostolic benediction' (2 Co 13¹⁴) which, as Dr. Sanday remarks (Hastings' DB ii. 213), has no dogmatic object and expounds no new doctrine—indeed expounds no doctrine at all—unequivocally groups together Jesus Christ, God [the Father], and the Holy Ghost as the source of blessing, and in that remarkable order. It is inconceivable that St. Paul would have done this had he looked on Jesus Christ as a mere man, or even as a created angel, and on the Holy Ghost only as an influence of the Father. But how did he arrive at this triple grouping, which is strictly consistent with his doctrine elsewhere? We cannot think that he invented it; and it is only natural to suppose that he founded it upon some words of our Lord.

(b) The command to baptize into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost (Mt 28¹⁹), if spoken by our Lord,—whatever the exact meaning of the words, whether as a formula to be used, or as expressing the result of Christian baptism—would amply account for St. Paul's benediction in 2 Co 13¹⁴. But it has been strenuously denied that these words are authentic, or, if they are authentic, that they are our Lord's own utterance. We must carefully distinguish these two allegations. First, it is denied that they are part of the First Gospel. It has been maintained by Mr. Conybeare that they are an interpolation of the 2nd cent., and that the original text had: 'Make disciples of all the nations in my name, teaching them,' etc. All extant manuscripts and versions have our present text (the Old Syriac is wanting here); but in several passages of Eusebius (c. A.D. 260-340) which refer to the verse, the words about baptism are not mentioned, and in some of them the words 'in my name' are added. The allegation is carefully and impartially examined by Bp. Chase in JThSt vi. 483 ff., and is judged by him to be baseless. As a matter of fact, nothing is more common in ancient writers than to omit, in referring to a Scripture passage, any words which are not relevant to their argument. Dean Robinson (JThSt vii. 186), who controverts Bp. Chase's interpretation of the baptismal command, is yet entirely satisfied with his defence of its authenticity. Secondly, it is denied that the words in question were spoken by our Lord; it is said that they belong to that later stage of thought to which the Fourth Gospel is ascribed. As a matter of fact, it is urged, the earliest baptisms were not into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but in the name of Jesus Christ, or into the name of the Lord Jesus, or into Christ Jesus, or into Christ (Ac 2³⁸ 8¹⁶ 10⁴⁸ 19⁵, Ro 6³, Gal 3²⁷). Now it is not necessary to maintain that in any of these places a formula of baptism is prescribed or mentioned. The reverse is perhaps more probable (see Chase, l.c.). The phrases in Acts need mean only that converts were united to Jesus or that they became Christians (cf. 1 Co 10²); the phrase in Mt 28¹⁹ may mean that disciples were to be united to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost by baptism, without any formula being enjoined; or if we take what seems to be the less probable interpretation (that of Dean Robinson), that 'in the name' means 'by the authority of,' a similar result holds good. We need not even hold that Mt 28¹⁹ represents our Lord's ipsissima verba. But that it faithfully represents our Lord's teaching seems to follow from the use of the benediction in 2 Co 13¹⁴ (above), and from the fact that immediately after the Apostolic age the sole form of baptizing that we read of was that of Mt 28¹⁹, as in Didache 7 (the words quoted exactly, though in § 9 Christians are said to have been baptized into the name of the Lord), in Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 61 (he does not quote the actual words, but paraphrases, and at the end of the same chapter says that 'he who is illuminated is washed in the name of Jesus Christ'), and in Tertullian, adv. Prax. 26 (paraphrase), de Bapt. 13 (exactly), de Præscr. Hæc. 20 (paraphrase). Thus the second generation of Christians must have understood the words to be our Lord's. But the same doctrine is found also in numerous other passages of the NT, and we may now proceed briefly to compare some of them with Mt 28¹⁹, prefacing the investigation with the remark that the suspected words in that verse occur in the most Jewish of the Gospels, where such teaching is improbable unless it comes from our Lord (so Scott in Hastings' DB, Ext. vol. p. 313).

(c) That the Fourth Gospel is full of the doctrine of 'Father, Son, and Spirit' is allowed by all (see esp. Jn 14-16). The Son and the Spirit are both Paracletes, sent by the Father; the Spirit is sent by the Father and also by Jesus; Jesus has all things whatsoever the Father has; the Spirit takes the things of Jesus and declares them unto us. In Jn 10³⁰ our Lord says: 'I and the Father are one thing' (the numeral is neuter), i.e. one essence—the words cannot fall short of this (Westcott, in loc.). But the same doctrine is found in all parts of the NT. Our Lord is the only-begotten Son (see § 7 above), who was pre-existent, and was David's Lord in heaven before He came to earth (Mt 22⁴⁶: this is the force of the argument). He claims to judge the world and to bestow glory (Mt 25³⁴, Lk 22²⁹; cf. 2 Co 5¹⁰), to forgive sins and to bestow the power of binding and loosing (Mk 2¹⁰, Mt 28¹⁸ and 18¹⁸; cf. Jn 20²³); He invites sinners to come to Him (Mt 11²⁸; cf. 10²⁷, Lk 14²⁹); He is the teacher of the world (Mt 11²⁹); He casts out devils as Son of God, and gives authority to His disciples to cast them out (Mk 3¹⁴, 15). The claims of Jesus are as tremendous, and (in the great example of humility) at first sight as surprising, in the Synoptics as in Jn. (Liddon, BL v. iv.). Similarly, in the Pauline Epistles the Apostle clearly teaches that Jesus is God (see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, iii. 3, 4). In them God the Father and Jesus Christ are constantly joined together (just as Father, Son, and Spirit are joined in the Apostolic benediction, e.g. in 1 Co 13⁸. So in 1 P 1² we have the triple conjunction—'the foreknowledge of God the Father,' the sanctification of the Spirit, 'the blood of Jesus Christ.' The same conjunction is found in Jude 10¹. 'Praying in the Holy Spirit, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life'; cf. also 1 Co 12³⁻⁴, Ro 8¹⁴⁻¹⁷ etc.

The Holy Spirit is represented in the NT as a Person, not as a mere Divine influence. The close resemblance between the Lukan and the Johannine accounts of the promise of the Spirit is very noteworthy. St. Luke tells us of 'the promise of my Father,' and of the command to tarry in the city until the Apostles were 'clothed with power from on high' (Lk 24⁴⁹); this is interpreted in Ac 1⁵ as a baptism with the Holy Ghost, and one of the chief themes of Acts is the bestowal of the Holy Ghost to give life to the Church (Ac 2³⁸, 8¹⁸, 19² etc.). This is closely parallel to the promise of the Paraclete in Jn 14-16. Both the First and the Third Evangelists ascribe the conception of Jesus to the action of the Holy Ghost (Mt 1¹⁸⁻²⁰, Lk 1³⁵, where 'the Most High' is the Father, cf. Lk 6³⁵). At the baptism of Jesus, the Father and the Spirit are both manifested, the appearance of the dove being an indication that the Spirit is distinct from the Father. The Spirit can be sinned against (Mk 3²⁹ and || Mt. Lk.); through Him Jesus is filled with Divine grace for the ministry (Lk 4^{1-14, 18}), and casts out devils (Mt 12²⁸; cf. Lk 11²⁰ 'the finger of God'). The Spirit inspired David (Mk 12²⁹). So in St. Paul's Epistles He intercedes, is grieved, is given to us, gives life (see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, iii. 6). And the distinctions in the Godhead are emphasized by His being called the 'Spirit of God' and the 'Spirit of Christ' in the same verse (Ro 8⁹). That He is the Spirit of Jesus appears also from Ac 16⁷ RV, 2 Co 3¹⁷, Gal 4⁶, Ph 1¹⁹, 1 P 1¹¹.

This very brief epitome must here suffice. It is perhaps enough to show that the revelation which Jesus Christ made caused an immeasurable enlargement of the world's conception of God. Our Lord teaches that God is One, and at the same time that He is no mere Monad, but Triune. Cf. art. TRINITY. A. J. MACLEAN.

GOEL.—See AVENGER OF BLOOD, and KIN (NEXT OF).

GOG.—1. The 'prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' from the land of Magog (Ezk 38², and often in chs. 38, 39), whom Ezk. pictures as leading a great host of nations from the far North against the restored Israel, and as being ignominiously defeated, by J's intervention, upon the mountains of Canaan. Whence the name 'Gog' was derived we do not certainly know: the name reminds us of that of Gyges (Gr Guges, Assy. Gugu), the famous king of Lydia, of whom Hdt. (i. 8-14) tells us, and who, Ashurbanipal states (KIB ii. 173-5), when his country was invaded by the Gimirra (Cimmerians), expelled them with Assyrian help (c. B.C. 665); and it has been conjectured (Sayce) that this name might have reached Palestine as that of a distant and successful king, who might be made a typical leader of a horde of invaders from the North. That Gomer (= the Cimmerian), who was really his foe, appears in Ezk. among his allies, might be explained either from the vagueness of the knowledge which reached Pal., or because Ezk. had in view, not the historical 'Gog' but merely an ideal figure suggested by the historical 'Gog.' Upon the basis of Ezk 38, 39, 'Gog' and 'Magog' appear often in the later Jewish eschatology as leading the final, but abortive, assault of the powers of the world upon the Kingdom of God. Cf. Rev. 20⁷⁻⁹; in the Mishna, Eduyoth 2, 10; Sib. Orac. iii. 4, 319-322; and see further ref. in Schlüter, § 29. III. 4; Weber, Allsynag. Theol. (Index); Volz, Jüd. Eschat. p. 178 (and Index).

2. The eponym of a Reubenite family (1 Ch 5⁴). S. R. DRIVER.

GOIM is the Heb. word which in EV is variously rendered 'Gentiles,' 'nations,' 'heathen' (see Preface to RV of OT). In the obscure expression in Gn 14¹, where AV has 'king of nations,' RV retains Goim (possibly a corruption from Gufi [a people living to the E. of the little Zab]) as a proper name, although RVm offers the alternative rendering 'nations.' The same difference in rendering between AV and RV is found also in Jos 12²⁵. Possibly in Gn 14¹ the reference may be to the Ummam-manda, or 'hordes' of northern peoples, who from time to time invaded Assyria (so Sayce).

GOLAN.—One of the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan (Dt 4¹³, Jos 20⁹), assigned to the sons of Gershon (Jos 21²⁷, 1 Ch 6⁷¹), in the territory belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh in Bashan. Both the town, Golan, and a district, Gaulanitis, were known to Josephus (Ant. xiii. xv. 3, xvii. viii. 1). The latter is called by the Arabs Jaulán. The name seems to have been applied first to a city, and then to the district round about; etymologically, however, the root, meaning 'circuit,' would point to the opposite conclusion. The exact site of the city is very uncertain. Schumacher (Across the Jordan, 92) somewhat hesitatingly identifies it with the ruins of Sahem el-Jaulán, 17 miles E. of the Sea of Galilee. GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

GOLD.—See MINING AND METALS.

GOLGOTHA (Mt 27³³, Mk 15²², Jn 19¹⁷, from the Aram. Gulgatha, In Lk 23³³ the place is called Kranion (RV 'the skull,' AV 'Calvary')).—The situation was evidently outside the city (He 13¹²), but near it (Jn 19²⁰); it was a site visible afar off (Mk 15⁴⁰, Lk 23⁴⁰), and was probably near a high road (Mt 27³³).

Four reasons have been suggested for the name. (1) That it was a place where skulls were to be found, perhaps a place of public execution. This is improbable. (2) That the 'hill' was skull-shaped. This is a popular modern view. Against it may be urged that there is no evidence that Golgotha was a hill at all. See also below. (3) That the name is due to an ancient, and probably pre-Christian, tradition that the skull of Adam was found there. This tradition is quoted by Origen, Athanasius, Epiphanius, etc., and its survival to-day is marked by the skull shown in the Chapel of Adam under the 'Calvary' in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. (4) There is the highly improbable theory that the legend of the skull of Adam, and even the name Golgotha, really have their origin in the capitolium of Alia Capitolina, which stood on the site now covered by the Church of the Sepulchre.

Of the many proposed sites for Golgotha it may be briefly said that there is no side of the city which has not been suggested by some authority for 'the place of a skull'; but, practically speaking, there are only two worth considering, the traditional site and the 'green hill' or 'Gordon's Calvary.' The traditional site included in the Church of the Sepulchre and in close proximity to the tomb itself has a continuous tradition attaching to it from the days of Constantine. In favour of this site it may be argued with great plausibility that it is very unlikely that all tradition of a spot so important in the eyes of Christians should have been lost, even allowing all consideration for the vicissitudes that the city passed through between the Crucifixion and the days of Constantine. The topographical difficulties are dealt with in the discussion of the site of the second wall [see JERUSALEM], but it may safely be said that investigations have certainly tended in recent years to reduce them. With regard to the 'green hill' outside the Damascus gate, which has secured so much support in some quarters, its claims are based upon the four presuppositions that Golgotha was shaped like a skull, that the present skull-shaped hill had such an appearance at the time of the Crucifixion, that the ancient road and wall ran as they do to-day, and that the Crucifixion was near the Jewish 'place of stoning' (which is said by an unreliable local Jewish tradition to be situated here). All these hypotheses are extremely doubtful. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GOLIATH.—A giant, said to have been a descendant of the early race of Anakim. He was slain, in single combat, by David (or, according to another tradition, by Elhanan) at Ephes-dammim, before an impending battle between the Philistines and the Israelites. That this 'duel' was of a religious character comes out clearly in 1 S 17⁴⁵⁻⁴⁶, where we are told that the Philistine cursed David by his gods, while David replies: 'And I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts.' The fact that David brings the giant's sword as an offering into the sanctuary at Nob points in the same direction. Goliath is described as being 'six cubits and a span' in height, i.e. over nine feet, at the likeliest reckoning; his armour and weapons were proportionate to his great height. Human skeletons have been found of equal height, so that there is nothing improbable in the Biblical account of his stature. The flight of the Philistines on the death of their champion could be accounted for by their belief that the Israelite God had shown Himself superior to their god (but see 2 S 23⁹⁻¹², 1 Ch 11¹²); see, further, DAVID, ELHANAN.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

GOMER.—1. One of the sons of Japheth and the father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gn 10²¹, 1 Ch 1¹⁵), who along with Togarmah is included by Ezekiel in the army of Gog (Ezk 38⁹). Gomer represents the people termed Gimirra by the Assyrians, and Oimmerians by the Greeks. Their original home appears to have been north of the Euxine, but by the 7th cent. B.C. they had completely conquered Cappadocia and settled there.

2. Daughter of Diblaim, wife of the prophet Hosea (wh. see).

GOMORRAH.—See PLAIN [CITIES OF THE].

GOODMAN.—The only occurrence of this Eng. word in the OT is Pr 7¹⁹ 'the goodman is not at home.' The Heb. is simply 'the man'; but as the reference is to the woman's husband, 'goodman,' still used in Scotland for 'husband,' was in 1611 an accurate rendering. In the NT the word occurs 12 times (always in the Synop. Gospels) as the trans. of oikodespotes, 'master of the house.' The same Gr. word is translated 'householder' in Mt 13²⁷, 22 20¹ 21³, and 'master of the house' in Mt 10²⁵, Lk 13²⁵.

GOPHER WOOD (Gn 6¹⁴), of which the ark was constructed, was by tradition cypress wood, and this, or else the cedar, may be inferred as probable.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

GORGIAIS.—A general of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is described as 'a mighty man of the king's friends' (1 Mac 3³⁸), and a captain who 'had experience in matters of war' (2 Mac 8⁹). When Antiochus set out on his Parthian campaign (B.C. 166 or 165), his chancellor, Lysias, who was charged with the suppression of the revolt in Pal., despatched a large army to Judæa, under the command of Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. The fortunes of the war are described in 1 Mac 3⁴⁰ 4²⁵ 5¹⁴, 2 Mac 8¹²⁻²⁹ 10¹⁴, 12²²; Jos. Ant. xii. vii. 4, viii. 6.

GORTYNA.—The most important city in Crete, after Gnosus, situated about midway between the two ends of the island. It is named (1 Mac 15²³) among the autonomous States and communes to which were sent copies of the decree of the Roman Senate in favour of the Jews.

GOSHEN.—1. An unknown city in Judah (Jos 15²¹). 2. An unknown territory in S. Palestine, probably the environs of No. 1 (Jos 10⁴¹). 3. A division of Egypt in which the children of Israel were settled between Jacob's entry and the Exodus. It was a place of good pasture, on or near the frontier of Palestine, and plentiful in vegetables and fish (Nu 11⁵). It cannot with exactness be defined. Jth 1⁹ 10 is probably wrong in including the nomes of Tanis and Memphis in Goshen. The LXX reads 'Gesem of Arabia' in Gn 45¹⁰ 46²⁴, elsewhere 'Gesem.' Now Arabia is defined by Ptolemy, the geographer, as an Egyptian nome on the East border of the Delta of the Nile, and this seems to be the locality most probably contemplated by the narrator. It runs eastwards from opposite the modern Zagazig (Bubastis) to the Bitter Lakes. There seems to be no Egyptian origin for the name, unless it represented Kesem, the Egyptian equivalent of Phacusa (the chief town of the nome of Arabia according to Ptolemy). It may be of Semitic origin, as is suggested by the occurrence of the name, as noticed above, outside Egyptian territory.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

GOSPEL.—This word (lit. 'God-story') represents Greek euangelion, which reappears in one form or another in ecclesiastical Latin and in most modern languages. In classical Greek the word means the reward given to a bearer of good tidings (so 2 S 4¹⁰ 1.XX in pl.); but afterwards it came to mean the message itself, and so in 2 S 18²⁰. 22. 23 [LXX] a derived word is used in this sense. In NT the word means 'good tidings' about the salvation of the world by the coming of Jesus Christ. It is not there used of the written record. A genitive case or a possessive pronoun accompanying it denotes: (a) the person or the thing preached (the gospel of Christ, or of peace, or of salvation, or of the grace of God, or of God, or of the Kingdom, Mt 4²³ 9²⁴, Mk 1¹⁴, Ac 20²⁴, Ro 15¹⁹, Eph 1¹³ 6¹⁵ etc.); or sometimes (b) the preacher (Mk 1¹ (?), Ro 2¹⁶ 16²⁶, 2 Co 4⁴ etc.); or rarely (c) the persons preached to (Gal 2⁷). 'The gospel' is often used in NT absolutely, as in Mk 1¹⁵ 8³⁴ 14⁹ RV. 16¹⁵, Ac 15⁷, Ro 11²⁸, 2 Co 8¹⁴ (where the idea must not be entertained that the reference is to Luke as an Evangelist), and so 'this gospel,' Mt. 26¹³; but English readers should bear in mind that usually (though not in Mk 16¹⁵) the EV phrase 'to preach the gospel' represents a simple verb of the Greek. The noun is not found in Lxx., Heb., or the Catholic Epistles, and only once in the Johannine writings (Rev 14⁶, 'an eternal gospel'—an angelic message). In Ro 10¹⁶ 'the gospel' is used absolutely of the message of the OT prophets.

The written record was not called 'the Gospel' till a later age. By the earliest generation of Christians the oral teaching was the main thing regarded; men told what they had heard and seen, or what they had received from eye-witnesses. As these died out and the written record alone remained, the perspective altered. The earliest certain use of the word in this sense is in Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150): 'The Apostles in the Memoirs written by themselves, which are called Gospels,' Apol. i. 66; cf. 'the Memoirs which were drawn up by His Apostles and those who followed them,' Dial. 103), though some find it in Ignatius and the Didache. The earliest known titles of the Evangelic records (which, however, we cannot assert to be contemporary with the records themselves) are simply 'According to Matthew,' etc. A. J. MACLEAN.

GOSPELS.—Under this heading we may consider the four Gospels as a whole, and their relations to one another, leaving detailed questions of date and authorship to the separate articles.

1. The aims of the Evangelists.—On this point we have contemporary evidence in the Lukan preface (1¹⁻⁴), which shows that no Evangelist felt himself absolved from taking all possible pains in securing accuracy, that many had already written Gospel records, and that their object was to give a contemporary account of our Lord's life on earth. As yet, when St. Luke wrote, these records had not been written by eye-witnesses. But they depended for their authority on eye-witnesses (1²); and this is the important point, the names of the authors being comparatively immaterial. The records have a religious aim (Jn 20³¹). Unlike the modern biography, which seeks to relate all the principal events of the life described, the Gospel aims at producing faith by describing a few significant incidents taken out of a much larger whole. Hence the Evangelists are all silent about many things which we should certainly expect to read about if the Gospels were biographies. This consideration takes away all point from the suggestion that silence about an event means that the writer was ignorant of it (see Sanday, Criticism of Fourth Gospel, p. 71). Again, although, before St. Luke wrote, there were numerous Gospels, only one of these survived till Irenaeus' time (see § 4). But have the rest entirely vanished? It may perhaps be conjectured that some fragments which seem not to belong to our canonical Gospels (such as Lk 22^{at}, Jn 7^{at}, 8^{at}, Mk 16^{at}) are survivals of these documents. But this is a mere guess.

2. The Synoptic problem.—The first three Gospels in many respects agree closely with one another, and differ from the Fourth. Their topics are the same; they deal chiefly with the Galilean ministry, not explicitly mentioning visits to Jerusalem after Jesus' baptism until the last one; while the Fourth Gospel deals largely with those visits. In a word, the first three Gospels give the same general survey, the same 'synopsis,' and are therefore called the 'Synoptic Gospels,' and their writers the 'Synoptists.' But further, they agree very closely in words, arrangement of sentences, and in many other details. They have a large number of passages in common, and in many cases all three relate the same incidents in nearly the same words; in others, two out of the three have common matter. The likeness goes far beyond what might be expected from three writers independently relating the same series of facts. In that case we should look for likenesses in details of the narratives, but not in the actual words. A striking example is in Mt 9^{at}=Mk 2^{at}=Lk 5^{at}. The parenthesis ('Then saith he to the sick of the palsy') is common to all three—an impossible coincidence if all were independent. Or again, in Mt. and Mk. the Baptist's imprisonment is related parenthetically, out of its place (Mt 14^{at}, Mk 6^{at}), though in Lk. it comes in its true chronological order (Lk 3^{at}). The coincidence in Mt. and Mk. shows some dependence. On the other hand, there are striking variations, even in words, in the common passages. Thus the Synoptists must have dealt very freely with their sources; they did not treat them as unalterable. What, then, is the nature of the undoubted literary connexion between them?

(a) The Oral Theory.—It is clear from NT (e.g. Lk 1^{at}) and early ecclesiastical writers (e.g. Papias, who tells us that he laid special stress on 'the utterances of a living and abiding voice,' see Eusebius, HE iii. 39), that the narrative teaching of the Apostles was handed on by word of mouth in a very systematic manner. Eastern memories are very retentive, and this fact favours such a mode of tradition. We know that the Jews kept up their traditions orally (Mt 15^{at}, etc.). It is thought, then, that both the resemblances and the differences between the Synoptists may be accounted for by each of them having written down the oral tradition to which he was accustomed.

This is the 'Oral Theory,' which met with a great degree of support, especially in England, a generation or so ago. It was first systematically propounded in Germany by Gieseler, in 1818, and was maintained by Alford and Westcott, and lately by A. Wright. It is suggested that this theory would account for unusual words or expressions being found in all the Synoptics, as these would retain their hold on the memory. It is thought that the catechetical instruction was carried out very systematically, and that there were different schools of catechists; and that this would account for all the phenomena. The main strength of the theory lies in the objections raised to its rival, the Documentary Theory (see below), especially that on the latter view the freedom with which the later Evangelists used the earlier, or the common sources, contradicts any idea of inspiration or even of authority attaching to their predecessors. It is even said (Wright) that a man copying from a document could not produce such multitudinous variations in wording. The great objection to the Oral Theory is that it could not produce the extraordinarily close resemblances in language, such as the parentheses mentioned above, unless indeed the oral teaching were so firmly stereotyped and so exactly learnt by heart that it had become practically the same thing as a written Gospel. Hence the Oral Theory has fallen into disfavour, though there is certainly this element of truth in it, that oral teaching went on for some time side by side with written Gospels, and provided independent traditions (e.g. that Jesus was born in a cave, as Justin Martyr says), and indeed influenced the later Evangelists in their treatment of the earlier Gospels. It was only towards the end of the lives of the Apostles that our Gospels were written.

(b) The Documentary Theory, in one form, now obsolete, supposed that the latest of the Synoptists knew and borrowed from the other two, and the middle Synoptist from the earliest.

This theory, if true, would be a sufficient cause for the resemblances; but in spite of Zahn's argument to the contrary (Einleitung, ii. 400), it is extremely unlikely that Matthew knew Luke's Gospel or vice versa. To mention only one instance, the Birth-narratives clearly argue the independence of both, especially in the matter of the genealogies. Augustine's theory that Mark followed, and was the abreviator of, Matthew is now seen to be impossible, both because of the graphic and autoptic nature of Mk., which precludes the idea of an abreviator, and because in parallel passages Mk. is fuller than Mt., the latter having had to abbreviate in order to introduce additional matter.

The form of this theory which may now be said to hold the field, is that the source of the common portions of the Synoptics is a Greek written narrative, called (for reasons stated in art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO]) the 'Petrine tradition'—the preaching of St. Peter reduced to the form of a Gospel. The favourite idea is that our Mk. is itself the document which the other Synoptists independently used; but if this is not the case, at least our Mk. represents that document most closely. This theory would at once account for the close resemblances.

Here it may be as well to give at once a sufficient answer to the chief objection to all documentary theories (see above). The objection transfers modern ideas with regard to literary borrowing to the 1st century. As a matter of fact, we know that old writers did the very thing objected to; e.g. Genesis freely embodies older documents; the Didache (c. A.D. 120) probably incorporates an old Jewish tract on the 'Way of Life and the Way of Death,' and was itself afterwards incorporated and freely treated in later documents such as the Apostolic Constitutions (c. A.D. 375), which also absorbed and altered the Didascalia; and so the later 'Church Orders' or manuals were produced from the earlier. We have no right to make a priori theories as to inspiration, and to take it for granted that God inspired people in the way that commends itself to us. And we know that as a matter of fact written documents were in existence when St. Luke wrote (Lk 1^{at}). It is not then unreasonable to suppose that Mk. or something very like it was before the First and Third Evangelists when they wrote. A strong argument for the priority of Mk. will be seen if three parallel passages of the Synoptics be written out in Greek side by side, and the words and phrases in Mk. which are found in || Mt. or || Lk. be underlined; it will be found almost always that nearly the whole of Mk. is reproduced in one or both of the other Synoptics, though taken singly Mk. is usually the fullest in parallel passages. Mk. has very little which is peculiar to itself; its great value lying in another direction (see art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO] for other arguments). The conclusion is that it, or another Gospel closely resembling it, is a common source of Mt. and Lk. This accounts for the resemblances of the Synoptists; their differences come from St. Matthew and St. Luke feeling perfectly free to alter their sources and narrate incidents differently as seemed best to them. They had other sources besides Mk. Here it may be desirable to remark by way of caution that in so far as they use a common source, the Synoptists are not independent witnesses to the facts of the Gospels; in so far as they supplement that source, they give additional attestation to the facts. Yet an event spoken of by all three Synoptists in the same way is often treated as being more trustworthy than one spoken of by only one or by two. A real example of double attestation, on the other hand, is the reference in 1 Co 13^{at} to the 'faith that removes mountains,' as compared with Mt 17^{at} 21^{at}.

Another form of the Documentary Theory may be briefly mentioned, namely, that the common source was an Aramaic document, differently translated by the three Evangelists. This, it is thought, might account for the differences; and much ingenuity has been expended on showing how an Aramaic word might, by different pointing (for points take the place of vowels in Aramaic), or by a slight error, produce the differences in Greek which we find. But it is enough to say that this theory could not possibly account for the close verbal resemblances or even for most of the differences. A Greek document must be the common source.

(c) The non-Markan sources of Mt. and Lk.—We have now to consider those parts of Mt. and Lk. which are common to both, but are not found in Mk., and also those parts which are found only in Mt. or only in Lk. In the former the same phenomena of verbal resemblances and differences occur; but, on the other hand, the common matter is, to a great extent, treated in quite a different order by Mt. and Lk. This peculiarity is thought by some to be due to the source used being oral, even though the 'Petrine tradition,' the common source of the three, was a document. But the same objections as before apply here (e.g. cf. Mt 6²⁴, 27 = Lk 16¹², 12²⁸, or Mt 23³⁷⁻³⁹ = Lk 13³⁴, which are almost word for word the same). We must postulate a written Greek common source; and the differences of order are most easily accounted for by observing the characteristics of the Evangelists. St. Matthew aimed rather at narrative according to subject, grouping incidents and teachings together for this reason, while St. Luke rather preserved chronological order (cf. the treatment of the Baptist's imprisonment, as above). Thus in Mt. we have groups of sayings (e.g. the Sermon on the Mount) and groups of parables, not necessarily spoken at one time, but closely connected by subject. We may infer that St. Luke treated the document common to him and St. Matthew in a stricter chronological order, because he treats Mk. in that way. He introduces a large part of Mk. in one place, keeping almost always to its order; then he interpolates a long section from some other authority (Lk 9⁵¹-18¹⁴), and then goes back and picks up Mk. nearly where he had left it. Probably, therefore, Lk. is nearer in order to the non-Markan document than Mt.

Of what nature was this document? Some, following a clue of Papias (see art. MATTHEW [GOSPEL ACC. TO]), call it the 'Logia,' and treat it as a collection of teachings rather than as a connected history; it has been suggested that each teaching was introduced by 'Jesus said,' and that the occasion of each was not specified. This would account for differences of order. But it would involve a very unnecessary multiplication of documents, for considerations of verbal resemblances show that in the narrative, as well as in the discourses, a common non-Markan document must underlie Mt. and Lk.; and, whatever meaning be ascribed to the word logia, it is quite improbable that Papias refers to a record of sayings only. While, then, it is probable that discourses formed the greater part of the non-Markan document, we may by comparing Mt. and Lk. conclude that it described at least some historical scenes.—The document must have included the preaching of the Baptist, the Temptation, the Sermon on the Mount, the healing of the centurion's servant, the coming of John's messengers to Jesus, the instructions to the disciples, the Lord's Prayer, the controversy about Beelzebub, the denunciation of the Pharisees, and precepts about over-anxiety. It is very likely that it contained also an account of the Crucifixion and Resurrection, and many other things which are in Mk.; for in some of the passages common to all three Synoptists, Mt. and Lk. agree together against Mk. This would be accounted for by their having, in these instances, followed the non-Markan document in preference to the 'Petrine tradition.'

In addition there must have been other sources, oral or documentary, of Mt. and Lk. separately, for in some passages they show complete independence.

3. Relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Synoptics.—The differences which strike us at once when we compare Jn. with the Synoptics were obvious also to the Fathers.

Clement of Alexandria accounts for the fact of the differences by a solution which he says he derived from 'the ancient elders,' namely, that John, seeing that the external (lit. 'bodily') facts had already been sufficiently set forth in the other Gospels, composed, at the request of his disciples and with the inspiration of the Spirit, a 'spiritual' Gospel (quoted by Eusebius, HE vi. 14). By this phrase Clement clearly means a Gospel which emphasizes the Godhead of our Lord. The human side of the Gospel story had already been adequately treated. Elsewhere Eusebius (HE iii. 24) gives an old tradition that John had the Synoptics before him, and that he supplemented them. In all essential particulars this solution may be treated as correct. The main differences between John and the Synoptics are as follows:

(a) Geographical and Chronological.—The Synoptists lay the scene of the ministry almost entirely in Galilee and Peræa; St. John dwells on the ministry in Judæa. The Synoptists hardly note the flight of time at all; from a cursory reading of their accounts the ministry might have been thought to have lasted only one year, as some early Fathers believed, thus interpreting 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (Is 61², Lk 4¹⁹); though, if we carefully study the Synoptics, especially Lk., we do faintly trace three stages—in the wilderness of Galilee (a brief record), in Galilee (full description), and in Central Palestine as far as Jerusalem and on the other side of Jordan. During this last stage Jesus 'set his face' to go to Jerusalem (Lk 9⁵¹; cf. 2 K 12¹⁷, Ezk 21¹). But in Jn. time is marked by the mention of several Jewish feasts, notably the Passover, and we gather from Jn. that the ministry lasted either 2½ or 3½ years, according as we read in 5¹ 'a feast' (which could hardly be a Passover) or 'the feast' (which perhaps was the Passover). These differences are what we should expect when we consider that the Synoptic story is chiefly a Galilaean one, and is not concerned with visits to Jerusalem and Judæa until the last one just before the Crucifixion. Yet from incidental notices in the Synoptics themselves we should have guessed that Jesus did pay visits to Jerusalem. Every religious Jew would do so, if possible, at least for the Passover. If Jesus had not conformed to this custom, but had paid the first visit of His ministry just before the Crucifixion, we could not account for the sudden enmity of the Jerusalem Jews to Him at that time, or for the existence of disciples in Judæa, e.g., Judas Iscariot and his father Simon Iscariot (Jn 6⁷¹ RV), probably natives of Kerioth in Judæa; Joseph of Arimathea, 'a city of the Jews' (Lk 23⁴¹); the household at Bethany; and Simon the leper (Mk 14³). The owner of the ass and colt at Bethphage, and the owner of the room where the Last Supper was eaten, evidently knew Jesus when the disciples came with the messages. And if the Apostles had just arrived in Jerusalem for the first time only a few weeks before, it would be unlikely that they would make their headquarters there immediately after the Ascension. Thus the account in Jn. of a Judean ministry is indirectly confirmed by the Synoptics (cf. also Mt 23³⁷ 'how often').

(b) Proclamation of Jesus' Messiahship.—In the Synoptics, especially in Mk., this is a very gradual process. The evil spirits who announce it inopportunistically are silenced (Mk 1²⁷). Even after Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi at the end of the Galilaean ministry, the disciples are charged to tell no man (Mk 8³⁰). But in Jn., the Baptist begins by calling Jesus 'the Lamb of God' and 'the Son of God' (1³⁵, 36); Andrew, Philip, and Nathanael at once recognize him as Messiah (1⁴¹, 42, 43). Can both accounts be true? Now, as we have seen, a Judean ministry must have been carried on simultaneously with a Galilaean one; these would be kept absolutely separate by the hostile district of Samaria which lay between them (Jn 4⁴). Probably two methods were used for two quite different peoples. The rural population of Galilee had to be taught by very slow degrees; but Jerusalem was the home of religious controversy, and the inhabitants were acute reasoners. With them the question who Jesus was could not be postponed; this is shown by the way in which the Pharisees questioned the Baptist. To them, therefore, the Messiahship was proclaimed earlier. It is true that there would be a difficulty if the Twelve first learned about the Messiahship of Jesus at Caesarea Philippi. But this does not appear from the Synoptics. The Apostles had no doubt heard the questions asked in Judaea, and did know our Lord's claim to be Christ; but they did not fully realize all that it meant till the incident of Peter's confession.

(c) The claims of our Lord are said to be greater in Jn. than in the Synoptics (e.g. Jn. 10³⁰), and it is suggested that they are an exaggeration due to a later age. Certainly Jn. is a 'theological' Gospel. But in reality the claims of our Lord are as great in the Synoptics, though they may not be so explicitly mentioned. The claim of Jesus to be Lord of the Sabbath (Mk 2²⁸), to re-state the Law (Mt 5¹⁷, 21¹, RV, etc.), to be about to come in glory (Mk 8³⁸ 14⁶²), to be the Judge of the world (Mt 25³¹, etc.), the invitation 'Come unto me' (Mt 11²⁸), the assertion of the atoning efficacy of His death (Mk 10⁴⁵ 14²⁴)—cannot be surpassed (see also MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO], § 3). The self-assertion of the great Example of humility is equally great in all the Gospels, and is the great stumbling-block of all the thoughtful upholders of a purely humanitarian Christ.

(d) Other differences, which can here be only alluded to, are the emphasis in Jn. on the work of the Spirit, the Comforter; the absence in Jn. of set parables, allegories taking their place; and the character of the miracles, there being no casting out of devils in Jn., and, on the other hand, the miracle at Cana being unlike anything in the Synoptics. The only miracle common to the four Gospels is the feeding of the five thousand, which in Jn. is mentioned probably only to introduce the discourse at Capernaum, of which it forms the text (Jn 6). All these phenomena may be accounted for on Clement's hypothesis. The Fourth Evangelist had the Synoptics before him, and supplemented them from his own knowledge. And it may be remarked that, had Jn. been a late work written after the death of all the Apostles, the author would never have ventured to introduce so many differences from Gospels already long in circulation; whereas one who had been an eye-witness, writing at the end of his life, might well be in such a position of authority (perhaps the last survivor of the Apostolic company, whoever he was) that he could supplement from his own knowledge the accounts already in use.

The supplementary character of Jn. is seen also from its omission of matters to which the writer nevertheless alludes, assuming that his readers know them; e.g., Jesus' baptism (without the knowledge of which Jn 1³² would be unintelligible), the commission to baptize (cf. the Nicodemus narrative, Jn 3), the Eucharist (cf. Jn 6, which it is hardly possible to explain without any reference to Jesus' words at the Last Supper, for which it is a preparation, taking away their apparent abruptness), the Transfiguration (cf. 1¹⁴), the Birth of our Lord (it is assumed that the answer to the objection that Christ could not come from Nazareth is well known, 1¹⁶ 7¹¹ 8²³), the Ascension (cf. 6⁶² 20¹⁷), etc. So also it is often recorded in Jn. that Jesus left questions unanswered, and the Evangelist gives no explanation, assuming that the answer is well known (3⁴ 4¹¹ 13 6⁵¹ 7²⁶).

There are some well-known apparent differences in details between Jn. and the Synoptics. They seem to differ as to whether the death of our Lord or the Last Supper synchronized with the sacrificing of the Paschal lambs, and as to the hour of the Crucifixion (cf. Mk 15²⁵ with Jn 19¹⁴). Various solutions of these discrepancies have been suggested; but there is one solution which is impossible,—namely, that Jn. is a 2nd cent. 'pseudepigraphic' work. For if so, the first care that the writer would have would be to remove any obvious differences between his work and that of his predecessors. It clearly professes to be by an eye-witness (Jn 1¹⁴ 19³⁵). Either, then, Jn. was the work of one who wrote so early that he had never seen the Synoptic record,—but this is contradicted by the internal evidence just detailed,—or else it was written by one who occupied such a prominent position that he could give his own experiences without stopping to explain an apparent contradiction of former Gospels. In fact the differences, puzzling though they are to us, are an indication of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel.

4. Are the Gospels contemporary records?—We have hitherto considered them from internal evidence. We may, in conclusion, briefly combine the latter with the external attestation, in order to fix their date, referring, however, for details to the separate headings. It is generally agreed that the Fourth Gospel is the latest. Internal evidence shows that its author was an eye-witness, a Palestinian Jew of the 1st cent., whose interests were entirely of that age, and who was not concerned with the controversies and interests of that which followed it. If so, we cannot place it later than A.D. 100, and therefore the Synoptics must be earlier. Irenæus (c. A.D. 180) had already formulated the necessity of there being four, and only four, canonical Gospels; and he knew of no doubt existing on the subject. It is incredible that he could have spoken thus if Jn. had been written in the middle of the 2nd century. Tatian (c. A.D. 160) made, as we know from recent discoveries, a Harmony of our four Gospels (the Diategma), and this began with the Prologue of Jn. Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) is now generally allowed to have known Jn., though some hold that he did not put it on a level with the Synoptics. Again, it is hard to deny that 1 Jn. and the Fourth Gospel were written by the same author, and 1 Jn. is quoted by Papias (c. 140 or earlier), as we learn from Eusebius (HE iii. 39), and by Polycarp (Phil. 7, written c. A.D. 111). If so, they must have known the Fourth Gospel. Other allusions in early 2nd cent. writers to the Fourth Gospel and 1 Jn. are at least highly probable. Then the external evidence, like the internal, would lead us to date the Fourth Gospel not later than A.D. 100. This Gospel seems to give the results of long reflexion on, and experience of the effect of, the teaching of our Lord, written down in old age by one who had seen what he narrates. The Synoptics, to which Jn. is supplementary, must then be of earlier date; and this is the conclusion to which they themselves point. The Third Gospel, being written by a travelling companion of St. Paul (see art. LUKE [GOSPEL ACC. TO]), can hardly have been written after A.D. 80; and the Second, whether it be exactly the Gospel which St. Luke used, or the same edited by St. Mark the 'interpreter' of St. Peter (see art. MARK [GOSPEL ACC. TO]), must be either somewhat earlier than Lk. (as is probable), or at least, even if it be an edited form, very little later. Its 'autoptic' character, giving evidence of depending on an eye-witness, makes a later date difficult to conceive. Similar arguments apply to Mt. (see art. MATTHEW [GOSPEL ACC. TO]). Thus, then, while there is room for difference of opinion as to the names and personalities of the writers of the Gospels (for, like the historical books of OT, they are anonymous), critical studies lead us more and more to find in them trustworthy records whose writers had first-hand authority for what they state.

It may be well here to state a difficulty that arises in reviewing the 2nd cent. attestation to our Gospels. In the first place, the Christian literature of the period A.D. 100–175 is extremely scanty, so that we should not a priori expect that every Apostolic writing would be quoted in its extant remains. And, further, the fashion of quotation changed as the 2nd cent. went on. Towards the end of the century, we find direct quotations by name. But earlier this was not so. In Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin, and other early 2nd cent. writers, we find many quotations and references, but without names given; so that doubt is sometimes raised whether they are indebted to our canonical Gospels or to some other source, oral or written, for our Lord's words. It is clear that our canonical Gospels were not the only sources of information that these writers had; oral tradition had not yet died out, and they may have used other written records. To take an example, it is obvious that Justin knew the Sermon on the Mount; but when we examine his quotations from it we cannot be certain if he is citing Mt. or Lk. or both, or (possibly) an early Harmony of the two. It may be pointed out that if, as is quite possible, the quotations point to the existence of Harmonies before Tatian's, that fact in reality pushes back the external evidence still earlier. Many, or most, of the differences of quotation, however, may probably be accounted for by the difficulty of citing memoriter. When to quote accurately meant to undo a roll without stops or paragraphs, early writers may be pardoned for trusting too much to their memories. And it is noteworthy that as a rule the longer the quotation in these early writers, the more they conform to our canonical Gospels, for in long passages they could not trust their memories. The same peculiarity is observed in their quotations from the LXX.

Bearing these things in mind, we may, without going beyond Tatian, conclude with the highest degree of probability, from evidence which has undergone the closest scrutiny: (a) that our Mt. was known to, or was incorporated in a Harmony known to, Justin and the writer of the Didache (c. A.D. 120) and 'Barnabas'; and similarly (b) that our Mk. was known to Papias, Justin, Polycarp, and (perhaps) pseudo-Clement ('2 Clem. ad Cor.'). Hermas, and the author of the Gospel of pseudo-Peter and the Clementine Homilies, and Heracleon and Valentinus; (c) that our Lk. was known to Justin (very obviously), the Didache writer, Marcion (who based his Gospel on it), Celsus, Heracleon, and the author of the Clementine Homilies; and (d) that our Jn. was known to Justin, Papias, and Polycarp. A. J. MACLEAN.

GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL.—According to Lk. 1⁴, there were a number of accounts of the life and teachings of Jesus in circulation among the Christians of the 1st century. Among these were not only the sources of our canonical Gospels, but also a number of other writings purporting to come from various companions of Jesus and to record His life and words. In process of time these were lost, or but partially preserved. The Gospels were supplemented by others, until there resulted a literature that stands related to the NT Canon much as the OT Apocrypha stand related to the OT Canon. As a whole, however, it never attained the importance of the OT Apocrypha. Individual Gospels seem to have been used as authoritative, but none of them was ever accepted generally.

I. THE ORIGIN OF THE APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.—So voluminous is this literature, so local was the circulation of most of it, and so obscure are the circumstances attending its appearance, that it is impossible to make any general statement as to its origin. Few apocryphal Gospels reach us entire, and many are known to us only as names in the Church Fathers. It would seem, however, as if the literature as we know it might have originated: (a) From the common Evangelic tradition preserved in its best form in our Synoptic Gospels (e.g. Gospel according to the Hebrews, Gospel of the Egyptians). (b) From the homiletic tendency which has always given rise to stories like the Haggadah of Judaism. The Gospels of this sort undertake to complete the account of Jesus' life by supplying fictitious incidents, often by way of accounting for sayings in the canonical Gospels. At this point the legend-making processes were given free scope (e.g. Gospel of Nicodemus, Protevangelium of James, Gospel according to Thomas, Arabic Gospel of Infancy, Arabic Gospel of Joseph, Passing of Mary). (c) From the need of Gospel narratives to support various heresies, particularly Gnostic and ascetic (e.g. Gospels according to Peter, Philip, pseudo-Matthew, the Twelve Apostles, Basilides).

In this collection may be included further a number of other Gospels about which we know little or nothing, being in ignorance even as to whether they were merely mutilated editions of canonical Gospels or those belonging to the third class. The present article will consider only the more important and best known of these apocryphal Gospels.

II. CHARACTERISTICS OF THESE GOSPELS.—Even the most superficial reader of these Gospels recognizes their inferiority to the canonical, not merely in point of literary style, but also in general soberness of view. In practically all of them are to be found illustrations of the legend-making process which early overtook the Christian Church. They abound in accounts of alleged miracles, the purpose of which is often trivial, and sometimes even malicious. With the exception of a few sayings, mostly from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the teaching they contain is obviously a working up of that of the canonical Gospels, or clearly imagined. In the entire literature there are few sayings attributed to Jesus that are at the same time authentic and extra-canonical (see UNWRITTEN SAYINGS). These Gospels possess value for the Church historian in that they represent tendencies at work in the Church of the first four or five centuries. From the point of view of criticism, however, they are of small importance beyond heightening our estimation of the soberness and simplicity of the canonical narratives.

These Gospels, when employing canonical material, usually modify it in the interest of some peculiar doctrinal view. This is particularly true of that class of Gospels written for the purpose of supporting some of the earlier heresies. So fantastical are some of them, that it is almost incredible that they should ever have been received as authoritative. Particularly is this true of those that deal with the early life of Mary and of the infant Christ. In some cases it is not impossible that current pagan legends and folk-stories were attached to Mary and Jesus. Notwithstanding this fact, however, many of these stories, particularly those of the birth, girlhood, and death of Mary, have found their way into the literature and even the doctrine of the Roman Church. Of late there has been some attempt by the Curia to check the use of these works, and in 1884 Leo XIII. declared the Protevangelium of James and other works dealing with the Nativity of Jesus to be 'impure sources of tradition.'

III. THE MOST IMPORTANT GOSPELS.—1. The Gospel according to the Hebrews.—(1) The earliest Patristic statements regarding our NT literature contain references to events in the life of Jesus which are not to be found in our canonical Gospels. Eusebius declares that one of these stories came from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Clement of Alexandria and Origen, particularly the latter, apparently knew such a Gospel well. Origen quotes it at least three times, and Clement twice. Eusebius (HE iii. 25) mentions the Gospel as belonging to that class which, like the Shepherd of Hermas and the Didache, were accepted in some portions of the Empire and rejected in others. Jerome obtained from the Syrian Christians a copy of this Gospel, which was written in Aramaic, and was used among the sects of the Nazarenes and Ebionites, by which two classes he probably meant the Palestinian Christians of the non-Pauline churches. Jerome either translated this book from Heb. or Aram. into both Greek and Latin, or revised and translated a current Greek version.

(2) The authorship of the Gospel according to the Hebrews is in complete obscurity. It appears that in the 4th cent. some held it to be the work of the Apostle Matthew. Jerome, however, evidently knew that this was not the case, for it was not circulating in the West, and he found it necessary to translate it into Greek. Epiphanius, Jerome's contemporary, describes it as beginning with an account of John the Baptist, and commencing without any genealogy or sections dealing with the infancy of Christ. This would make it like our Gospel according to Mark, with which, however, it cannot be identified if it is to be judged by such extracts as have come down to us.

(3) The time of composition of the Gospel according to the Hebrews is evidently very early. It may even have been one form of the original Gospel of Jesus.

so-ordinate with the Logia of Matthew and the earliest section of the Book of Luke. Caution, however, is needed in taking this position, as the quotations which have been preserved from it differ markedly from those of any of the sources of our canonical Gospels which can be gained by criticism. At all events, the Gospel is to be distinguished from the Hebrew original of the canonical Gospel of Matthew mentioned by Papias (Euseb. HE iii. 39. 16, vi. 25. 4; Irenaeus, i. 1). On the whole, the safest conclusion is probably that the Gospel was well known in the eastern part of the Roman Empire in the latter half of the 2nd cent., and that in general it was composed of material similar to that of the canonical Gospels, but contained also sayings of Jesus which our canonical Gospels have not preserved for us.

The most important quotations from the Gospel are as follows:—

"If thy brother sin in word and give thee satisfaction, receive him seven times in the day. Simon, His disciple, said to Him, "Seven times in the day?" The Lord answered and said to him, "Yea, I say unto thee, until seventy times seven; for with the prophets also, after they were anointed with the Holy Spirit, there was found sinful speech" (Jerome, adv. Pelag. iii. 2).

"Also the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was recently translated by me into Greek and Latin, which Origen, too, often uses, relates after the resurrection of the Saviour: "But when the Lord had given the linen cloth to the priest's servant, He went to James and appeared to him. For James had taken an oath that he would not eat bread from that hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord, until he should see Him rising from that sleep."

"And again, a little farther on: "Bring me, saith the Lord, a table and bread." And there follows immediately: "He took the bread, and blessed, and brake, and gave to James the Just, and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread, inasmuch as the Son of Man hath risen from them that sleep" (Jerome, de Vir. Illus. ii.).

"In the Gospel according to the Hebrews . . . is the following story: "Behold, the Lord's mother and His brethren were saying to Him, John the Baptist baptizes unto the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But He said unto them, What sin have I done, that I should go and be baptized by him? unless perchance this very thing which I have said is an ignorance" (Jerome, adv. Pelag. iii. 2).

"In the Gospel which the Nazarenes are accustomed to read, that according to the Hebrews, there is put among the greatest crimes, he who shall have grieved the spirit of his brother" (Jerome, in Ezech. 187).

"In the Hebrew Gospel, too, we read of the Lord saying to the disciples, "And never," said He, "rejoice, except when you have looked upon your brother in love" (Jerome, in Ephes. 54).

"For those words have the same meaning with those others, "He that seeketh shall not stop until he find, and when he hath found he shall wonder, and when he hath wondered he shall reign, and when he hath reigned he shall rest" (Clem. of Alex. Strom. ii. 9. 45).

"And if any one goes to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there the Saviour Himself saith: "Just now my mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor" (Origen, in Joan. vol. ii. 6).

"It is written in a certain Gospel, the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, if any one likes to take it up not as having any authority but to shed light on the matter in hand: "The other," it says, "of the rich men said unto Him, Master, by doing what good thing shall I have life? He said to him, Man, do the Law and the Prophets. He answered unto him, I have. He said to him, Go, sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor, and come, follow Me. But the rich man began to scratch his head, and it pleased him not. And the Lord said unto him, How sayest thou, I have done the Law and the Prophets, since it is written in the Law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; and behold many brethren of thine, sons of Abraham, are clad in filth, dying of hunger, and thy house is full of good things, and nothing at all goes out from it to them. And He turned and said to Simon His disciple, who was sitting by Him: Simon, son of John, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Origen, in Mat. 154).

"The Gospel which has come down to us in Hebrew characters gave the threat as made not against him who hid (his talent), but against him who lived riotously; for (the parable) told of three servants, one who devoured his lord's substance with harlots and flute-girls, one who gained profit many fold, and one who hid his talent; and how in the issue one was accepted, one merely blamed, and one shut up in prison" (Euseb. Theoph. xxii.).

2. The Gospel of the Egyptians.—This Gospel is mentioned in the last quarter of the 2nd cent. by Clement of Alexandria, by whom it was regarded as apparently of some historical worth, but not of the same grade as our four Gospels. Origen in his Commentary on Luke mentions it among those to which the Evangelist referred, but does not regard it as inspired. Hippolytus says that it was used by an otherwise unknown Gnostic sect known as Naassenes. It was also apparently known to the writer of 2 Clement (ch. xii.).

The origin of the Gospel is altogether a matter of conjecture. Its name would seem to indicate that it circulated in Egypt, possibly among the Egyptians as distinguished from the Hebrew Christians. The probability that it represents the original Evangelic tradition is not as strong as in the case of the Gospel according to the Hebrews. At least by the end of the 2nd cent. it was regarded as possessed of heretical tendencies, particularly those of the Encratites, who were opposed to marriage. It is not impossible, however, that the Gospel of the Egyptians contained the original tradition, but in form sufficiently variant to admit of manipulation by groups of heretics.

The most important sayings of Jesus which have come down from this Gospel are from the conversation of Jesus with Salome, given by Clement of Alexandria.

"When Salome asked how long death should have power, the Lord (not meaning that life is evil and the creation bad) said, "As long as you women bear" (Strom. iii. 64.5).

"And those who opposed the creation of God through shameful abstinence allege also those words spoken to Salome whereof we made mention above. And they are contained, I think, in the Gospel according to the Egyptians. For they said that the Saviour Himself said, "I came to destroy the works of the female,"—the female being lust, and the works birth and corruption" (Strom. iii. 9. 63).

"And why do not they who walk any way rather than by the Gospel rule of truth adduce the rest also of the words spoken to Salome? For when she said, "Therefore have I done well in that I have not brought forth," as if it were not fitting to accept motherhood, the Lord replies, saying, "Eat every herb, but that which hath bitterness eat not" (ib.).

"Therefore Cassian says: "When Salome inquired when those things should be concerning which she asked, the Lord said, When ye trample on the garment of shame, and when the two shall be one, and the male with the female, neither male nor female" (Strom. iii. 13. 92).

3. The Gospel according to Peter.—This Gospel is mentioned by Eusebius (HE vi. 12) as having been rejected by Serapion, bishop of Antioch, in the last decade of the 2nd century. He found it in circulation among the Syrian Christians, and at first did not oppose it, but after having studied it further, condemned it as Docetic. Origen in his Commentary on Matthew (Book x. 17, and occasionally elsewhere) mentions it, or at least shows an acquaintance with it. Eusebius (HE iii. 3, 25) rejects it as heretical, as does Jerome (de Vir. Illus. i.).

In 1886 a fragment of this Gospel was discovered by M. Bouriant, and published with a transl. in 1892. It relates in some detail the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. It is particularly interesting as indicating how canonical material could be elaborated and changed in the interests of the Docetic heresy. Thus the words of Jesus on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" are made to read, "My power, my power, thou hast forsaken me." At the time of the resurrection the soldiers are said to have seen how "three men came forth from the tomb, and two of them supported one, and the cross followed them; and of the two the head reached unto the heavens, but the head of him that was led by them overpassed the heavens; and they heard a voice from the heavens saying,

"Thou hast preached unto them that sleep." And a response was heard from the cross, "Yea."

4. The Gospel of Nicodemus.—This Gospel embodies the so-called Acts of Pilate, an alleged official report of the procurator to Tiberius concerning Jesus. Tertullian (Apol. v. 2) was apparently acquainted with such a report, and some similar document was known to Eusebius (HE ii. 2) and to Epiphanius (Hær. i. 1); but the Acts of Pilate known to Eusebius was probably still another and heathen writing. Tischendorf held that the Acts of Pilate was known to Justin; but that is doubtful.

Our present Gospel of Nicodemus, embodying this alleged report of Pilate, was not itself written until the 5th cent., and therefore is of small historical importance except as it may be regarded as embodying older (but untrustworthy) material. As it now stands it gives an elaborate account of the trial of Jesus, His descent to Hades, resurrection, and ascension. Altogether it contains twenty-seven chapters, each one of which is marked by the general tendency to elaborate the Gospel accounts for homiletic purposes. Beyond its exposition of Jesus' descent into Hades it contains little of doctrinal importance. It is not improbable, however, that chs. 17–27, which narrate this alleged event, are later than chs. 1–16. The Gospel may none the less fairly be said to represent the belief in this visit of Jesus to departed spirits which marked the early and mediæval Church. It is also in harmony with the ante-Anselmic doctrine of the Atonement, in accordance with which Jesus gave Himself a ransom to Satan.

The first sixteen chapters abound in anecdotes concerning Jesus and His trial, in which the question of the legitimacy of Jesus' birth is established by twelve witnesses of the marriage of Mary and Joseph. It relates also that at the trial of Jesus a number of persons, including Nicodemus and Veronica, appeared to testify in His behalf. The accounts of the crucifixion are clearly based upon Lk 23. The story of the burial is further elaborated by the introduction of a number of Biblical characters, who undertake to prove the genuineness of the resurrection.

Although the Gospel of Nicodemus was of a nature to acquire great popularity, and has had a profound influence upon the various poetical and homiletic presentations of the events supposed to have taken place between the death and resurrection of Jesus, and although the Acts of Pilate has been treated more seriously than the evidence in its favour warrants, the Gospel is obviously of the class of Jewish Haggadah or legend. It is thus one form of the literature dealing with martyrs, and apparently never was used as possessing serious historical or doctrinal authority until the 13th century.

5. The Protevangelium of James.—This book in its present form was used by Epiphanius in the latter part of the 4th cent., if not by others of the Church Fathers. It is not improbable that it was referred to by Origen under the name of the Book of James. As Clement of Alexandria and Justin Martyr both referred to incidents connected with the birth of Jesus which are related in the Protevangelium, it is not impossible that the writing circulated in the middle of the 2nd century.

The Protevangelium purports to be an account of the birth of Mary and of her early life in the Temple, whither she was brought by her parents when she was three years of age, and where at twelve years of age she was married to Joseph, then an old man with children. It includes also an account of the Annunciation and the visit of Mary to Elisabeth, of the trial by ordeal of Joseph and Mary on the charge of having been secretly married, of the birth of Jesus in a cave, and accompanying miracles of the most extravagant sort. The writing closes with an account of the martyrdom of Zacharias and the death of Herod.

It is probable that the chapters dealing with the birth of Jesus are of independent origin from the others, although it is not improbable that even the remainder of the Protevangelium is a composite work, probably of the Jewish Christians, which has been edited in the interests of Gnosticism. The original cannot well be later than the middle of the 2nd cent., while the Gnostic revision was probably a century later.

From the critical point of view the Protevangelium is important as testifying to insistence in the middle of the 2nd cent. upon the miraculous birth of Jesus. It is also of interest as lying behind the two Latin Gospels of pseudo-Matthew and the Nativity of Jesus; although it may be fairly questioned whether these two later Gospels are derived directly from the Protevangelium or from its source.

6. The Gospel according to Thomas.—Hippolytus quotes from a Gospel according to Thomas which was being used by the Naassenes. The Gospel was also known to Origen and to Eusebius, who classes it with the heretical writings. It was subsequently held in high regard by the Manichæans. It exists to-day in Greek, Latin, and Syriac versions, which, however, do not altogether agree, and all of which are apparently abbreviated recensions of the original Gospel.

The Gospel of Thomas is an account of the childhood of Jesus, and consists largely of stories of His miraculous power and knowledge, the most interesting of the latter being the account of Jesus' visit to school, and of the former, the well-known story of His causing twelve sparrows of clay to fly.

The book is undoubtedly of Gnostic origin, and its chief motive seems to be to show that Jesus was possessed of Divine power before His baptism. The original Gospel of Thomas, the nature of which is, however, very much in dispute, may have been in existence in the middle of the 2nd century. Its present form is later than the 6th century.

7. The Arabic Gospel of the Childhood of Jesus.—The Arabic Gospel is a translation of a Syriac compilation of stories concerning the child Jesus. Its earlier sections are apparently derived from the Protevangelium, and its later from the Gospel of Thomas.

This Gospel supplies still further stories concerning the infancy of Jesus, and begins by declaring that Jesus, as He was lying in His cradle, said to Mary, 'I am Jesus, the Son of God, the Logos, whom thou hast brought forth.' The miracles which it narrates are probably the most fantastic of all in the Gospels of the infancy of Jesus. From the fact that it uses other apocryphal Gospels, it can hardly have been written prior to the 7th or 8th century.

8. The Gospel of Philip.—The only clear allusion to the existence of such a book is a reference in Pistis Sophia. From this it might be inferred that from the 3rd cent. such a Gospel circulated among the Gnostics in Egypt. It is of even less historical value than the Protevangelium.

9. The Arabic History of Joseph the Carpenter.—This Gospel undertakes to explain the non-appearance of Joseph in the account of the canonical Gospels. It describes in detail Joseph's death and burial, as well as the lamentation and eulogy spoken over him by Jesus. It is at some points parallel with the Protevangelium, but carries the miraculous element of the birth a step farther, in that it makes Jesus say of Mary, 'I chose her of my own will, with the concurrence of my Father and the counsel of the Holy Spirit.' Such a formulæ points to the 4th cent. as the time of composition, but it could hardly have been written later than the 5th cent., as Jesus is said to have promised Mary the same sort of death as other mortals suffer. The work is probably a re-working of Jewish-Christian material, and is not strongly marked by Gnostic qualities.

10. The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles.—This Gospel is identified by Jerome with the Gospel according to the Hebrews. This, however, is probably a mistake on his part. The Gospel comes down to us only in quotations in Epiphanius (Hær. xxx. 13-16, 22). To judge from these quotations, it was a re-writing of the canonical Gospels in the interest of some sect of Christians opposed to sacrifice. Jesus is represented as saying, 'I come to put an end to sacrifices, and unless ye cease from sacrificing, anger will not cease from you.' The same motive appears in its re-writing of Lk 22¹⁵, where the saying of Jesus is turned into a question requiring a negative answer. If these fragments given by Epiphanius are from a Gospel also mentioned by Origen, it is probable that it dates from the early part of the 3rd century.

11. The Passing of Mary.—This Gospel has come to us in Greek, Latin, Syriac, Sahidic, and Ethiopic versions. It contains a highly imaginative account of the death of Mary, to whose deathbed the Holy Spirit miraculously brings various Apostles from different parts of the world, as well as some of them from their tombs. The account abounds in miracles of the most irrational sort, and it finally culminates in the removal of Mary's 'spotless and precious body' to Paradise.

The work is evidently based on various apocryphal writings, including the Protevangelium, and could not well have come into existence before the rise of the worship of the Virgin in the latter part of the 4th century. It has had a large influence on Roman Catholic thought and art.

12. In addition to these Gospels there is a considerable number known to us practically only by name:—

(a) The Gospel according to Matthias (or pseudo-Matthew).—Mentioned by Origen as a heretical writing, and possibly quoted by Clement of Alexandria, who speaks of the 'traditions of Matthias'. If these are the same as the 'Gospel according to Matthias', we could conclude that it was known in the latter part of the 2nd cent., and was, on the whole, of a Gnostic cast.

(b) The Gospel according to Basilides.—Basilides was a Gnostic who lived about the middle of the 2nd cent., and is said by Origen to have had the audacity to write a Gospel. The Gospel is mentioned by Ambrose and Jerome, probably on the authority of Origen. Little is known of the writing, and it is possible that Origen mistook the commentary of Basilides on 'the Gospel' for a Gospel. It is, however, not in the least improbable that Basilides, as the founder of a school, re-worked the canonical Gospels, something after the fashion of Tatian, into a continuous narrative containing sayings of the canonical Gospels favourable to Gnostic tenets.

(c) The Gospel of Andrew.—Possibly referred to by Augustine, and probably of Gnostic origin.

(d) The Gospel of Apelles.—Probably a re-writing of some canonical Gospel. According to Epiphanius, the work contained the saying of Jesus, 'Be approved money-changers.'

(e) The Gospel of Barnabas.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree. A medieval (or Renaissance) work of some title has lately been published (see Ezp. T. xix. [1908], p. 263 ff.).

(f) The Gospel of Bartholomew.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree and in Jerome, but otherwise unknown.

(g) The Gospel of Cerinthus.—Mentioned by Epiphanius.

(h) The Gospel of Eve.—Also mentioned by Epiphanius as in use among the Borborites, an Ophite sect of the Gnostics.

(i) The Gospel of Judas Iscariot, used by a sect of the Gnostics—the Cainites.

(j) The Gospel of Thaddæus.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree, but otherwise unknown.

(k) The Gospel of Valentinus.—Used among the followers of that arch-heretic, and mentioned by Tertullian.

(l) The Fayyum Gospel Fragment.—It contains the words of Christ to Peter at the Last Supper, but in a different form from that of the canonical Gospels.

(m) The Logia, found by Grenfell and Hunt at Oxyrhynchus, contains a few sayings, some like and some unlike the canonical Gospels. Possibly derived from the Gospel of the Egyptians.

(n) The Descent of Mary.—Quoted by Epiphanius, and of the nature of a Gnostic anti-Jewish romance.

(o) The Gospel of Zacharias.—Subsequently incorporated into the Protevangelium.

Other Gospels were doubtless in existence between the 2nd and 6th centuries, as it seems to have been customary for all the heretical sects, particularly Gnostics, to write Gospels as support for their peculiar views. The oldest and most interesting of these was—

(p) The so-called Gospel of Marcion, which, although lost, we know as a probable re-working of Luke by the omission of the Infancy section and other material that in any way favoured the Jewish-Christian conceptions which Marcion opposed. This Gospel can be largely reconstructed from quotations given by Tertullian and others. The importance of the Gospel of Marcion as thus reconstructed is considerable for the criticism of our Third Gospel.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

GOTHOLIAS (1 Es 8³³).—Father of Jesaias, who returned with Ezra; called in Ezr 8⁷ Athaliah, which was thus both a male and a female name (2 K 11¹).

GOTHONIEL.—The father of Chabris, one of the rulers of Bethulia (Jth 6¹⁵).

GOULD (κτκδῶν, Jon 4⁹).—The similarity of the Heb. to the Egyp. kiki, the castor-oil plant, suggests this as Jonah's gourd. This plant, Ricinus communis, often attains in the East the dimensions of a considerable tree. The bottle-gourd, Cucurbita lagenaria, which is often trained over hastily constructed booths, seems to satisfy the conditions of the narrative much better.

Wild gourds (pakkū dh, 2 K 4³⁹) were either the common squirting-cucumber (Ecballium elaterium), one of the most drastic of known cathartics, or, more probably, the colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), a trailing vine-like plant with rounded gourds, intensely bitter to the taste and an irritant poison. GOVERNMENT.—The purpose of this article will be to sketch in outline the forms of government among the Hebrews at successive periods of their history. The indications are in many cases vague, and it is impossible to reconstruct the complete system; at no period was there a definitely conceived, still less a written, constitution in the modern sense. For fuller details reference should be made throughout to the separate articles on the officials, etc., mentioned.

We may at once set aside Legislation, one of the most important departments of government as now understood. In ancient communities, law rested on Divine command and immemorial custom, and could as a rule be altered only by 'fictions.' The idea of avowedly new legislation to meet fresh circumstances was foreign to early modes of thought. At no period do we find a legislative body in the Bible. Grote's dictum that 'The human king on earth is not a law-maker, but a judge,' applies to all the Biblical forms of government. The main functions of government were judicial, military, and at later periods financial, and to a limited extent administrative.

1. During the nomadic or patriarchal age the unit is the family or clan, and, for certain purposes, the tribe. The head of the house, owing to his position and experience, was the supreme ruler and judge, in fact the only permanent official. He had undisputed authority within his family group (Gn 22. 38²⁴, Dt 21¹⁸, Jg 11³⁴). Heads of families make agreements with one another and settle quarrels among their dependents (Gn 21²² 31⁴⁹); the only sanction to which they can appeal is the Divine justice which 'watches' between them (31⁴⁹, 49⁷). Their hold over the individual lay in the fact that to disobey was to become an outlaw; and to be an outcast from the tribe was to be without protector or avenger. The heads of families combined form, in a somewhat more advanced stage, the 'elders' (Ex 3¹⁶ 18²¹, Nu 22⁷); and sometimes, particularly in time of war, there is a single chief for the whole tribe. Moses is an extreme instance of this, and we can see that his position was felt to be unusual (Ex 2¹⁴ 4¹, Nu 16). It was undefined, and rested on his personal influence, backed by the Divine sanction, which, as his followers realized, had marked him out. This enables him to nominate Joshua as his successor.

2. The period of the 'Judges' marks a higher stage; at the same time, as a period of transition it appeared rightly to later generations as a time of lawlessness. The name 'Judges,' though including the notion of champion or deliverer, points to the fact that their chief function was judicial. The position was not hereditary, thus differing from that of king (Jg 9 ff. Gideon and Abimelech), though Samuel is able to delegate his authority to his sons (1 S 8¹). Their status was gained by personal exploits, implying Divine sanction, which was sometimes expressed in other ways; e.g. gift of prophecy (Deborah, Samuel). Their power rested on the moral authority of the strong man, and, though sometimes extending over several tribes, was probably never national. During this period the nomadic tribe gives way to the local; ties of place are more important than ties of birth. A town holds together its neighbouring villages ('daughters'), as able to give them protection (Nu 21²⁵⁻³², Jos 17¹¹). The elders become the 'elders of the city'; Jg 8^{6, 14}, 16 mentions officials (sārīm) and elders of Succoth, i.e. heads of the leading families, responsible for its government. In 11⁵ the elders of Gilead have power in an emergency to appoint a leader from outside.

3. The Monarchy came into being mainly under the pressure of Philistine invasion. The king was a centre of unity, the leader of the nation in war, and a judge (1 S 8²⁰). His power rested largely on a personal basis. As long as he was successful and strong, and retained the allegiance of his immediate followers, his will was absolute (David, Ahab, Jehu; cf. Jer 36. 37). At the same time there were elements which prevented the Jewish monarchy from developing the worst features of an Oriental despotism. At least at first the people had a voice in his election (David, Rehoboam). In Judah the hereditary principle prevailed (there were no rival tribes to cause jealousy, and David's line was the centre of the national hopes), but the people still had influence (2 K 14²¹ 21²⁴). In the Northern Kingdom the position of the reigning house was always insecure, and the ultimate penalty of misgovernment was the rise of a new dynasty. A more important check was found in the religious control, democratic in its best sense, exercised by the prophets (Samuel, Nathan, Elijah, Elisha, Jeremiah, etc.). The Jewish king had at least to hear the truth, and was never allowed to believe that he was indeed a god on earth. At the same time there is no constitutional check on misrule; the 'law of the kingdom' in Dt 17¹⁴ deals rather with moral and religious requirements, as no doubt did Jehoiada's covenant (2 K 11¹⁷). With the kingdom came the establishment of a standing army, David's 'mighty men' quickly developing into the more organized forces of Solomon's and later times. The command of the forces was essential to the king's power; cf. insurrection of Jehu 'the captain' (2 K 9), and Jehoiada's care to get control of the army (11⁵). Side by side with the power of the sword came the growth of a court, with its harem and luxurious entourage, its palace and its throne. These were visible symbols of the royal power, impressing the popular mind. The lists of officers (2 S 8¹⁶, 1 K 4) are significant; they indicate the growth of the king's authority, and the development of relations with other States. The real power of government has passed into the hands of the king's clientèle. His servants hold office at his pleasure, and, provided they retain his favour, there is little to limit their power. They may at times show independence of spirit (1 S 22¹⁷, Jer 36²⁵), but are usually his ready tools (2 S 11¹⁴; cf. the old and the young counsellors of Rehoboam, 1 K 12²⁶). The prophetic pictures of the court and its administration are not favourable (Am 3⁹ 4⁶, Is 5 etc.). The methods of raising revenue were undefined, and being undefined were oppressive. We hear of gifts and tribute (1 S 10²⁷, 2 S 8¹⁰, 1 K 4⁷, 21-22 10¹¹⁻²⁰), of tolls and royal monopolies (10¹⁸, 22-29), of forced labour (5¹³) and of the 'king's mowings' (Am 7), of confiscation (1 K 21), and, in an emergency, of stripping the Temple (2 K 18¹⁶). In time of peace the main function of the king is the administration of justice (2 S 15², 2 K 15⁶); his subjects have the right of direct access (2 K 8³). This must have lessened the power of the local elders, who no doubt had also to yield to the central court officials. 'The elders of the city' appear during this period as a local authority, sometimes respected and consulted (2 S 19¹¹, 1 K 20⁷, 2 K 23³), sometimes the obedient agents of the king's will (1 K 21⁸⁻¹¹, 2 K 10¹⁻⁵). 2 Ch 19¹¹ describes a judicial system organized by Jehoshaphat, which agrees in its main features with that implied by Dt 16¹⁸ 17¹⁸⁻¹⁹; there are local courts, with a central tribunal. In Dt. the elders appear mainly as judicial authorities, but have the power of executing their decisions (19¹² 21. 22¹⁶ etc.). The influence of the priesthood in this connexion should be noticed. The administration of justice always included a Divine element (Ex 18¹⁵, 19 21⁶ 22²; cf. word 'Torah'), and in the Deuteronomic code the priests appear side by side with the lay element in the central court (17⁹ 19¹⁷; cf. Is 28⁷, Ezk 44⁴ etc.). But the government is not yet theocratic. Jehoiada relies on his personal influence and acts in concert with the chiefs of the army (2 K 11. 12), and even after the Exile Joshua is only the fellow of Zerubbabel. The appointment of Levites as judges, ascribed to David in 1 Ch 23⁴ 26²⁹, is no doubt an anachronism. Cf. also art. JUSTICE (11.).

4. Post-exilic period.—Under the Persians Judah was a subdistrict of the great province west of the Euphrates and subject to its governor (Ezr 5⁸). It had also its local governor (Neh 5¹⁴), with a measure of local independence (Ezr 10¹⁴); we read, too, of a special official 'at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people' (Neh 11²⁴). The elders are prominent during this period both in exile (Ezk 8¹ 14¹ 20¹) and in Judah (Ezr 5⁹ 6⁷ 10³, Neh 2¹⁰). The chief feature of the subsequent period was the development of the priestly power, and the rise to importance of the office of the high priest. Under Greek rule (after b.c. 333) the Jews were to a great extent allowed the privileges of self-government. The 'elders' develop into a gerousia or senate—an aristocracy comprising the secular nobility and the priesthood (1 Mac 12⁹ 14²⁰); it is not known when the name 'Sanhedrin' was first used. The high priest became the head of the State, and its official representative, his political power receiving a great development under the Hasmonaean. Owing to the growing importance of the office, the Seleucids always claimed the power of appointment. In b.c. 142, Simon is declared to be 'high priest, captain, and governor for ever' (1 Mac 14²⁷⁻⁴⁷). The title 'ethnarch' (see GOVERNOR) is used of him and other high priests. Aristobulus becomes king (b.c. 105), and Alexander Jannaeus uses the title on coins (b.c. 104-78). Under Roman rule (b.c. 63) the situation becomes complicated by the rise to power of the Herodian dynasty. Palestine passed through the varying forms of government known to the Roman Imperial constitution. Herod the Great was its titular king, with considerable independence subject to good behaviour (rex socius). Archelaus forfeited his position (A.D. 6). Thenceforward Judaea was under the direct rule of a procurator (see next article), except from A.D. 41 to 44, when Agrippa I. was king. Antipas was 'tetrarch' of Galilee and Peraea; Mark's title of 'king' (6¹⁴) is corrected by Matthew and Luke. The position was less honourable and less independent than that of king. The high priest (now appointed by the Romans) and the Sanhedrin regained the power which they had lost under Herod; the government became once more an aristocracy (Jos. Ant. xx. x.). Except for the power of life and death the Sanhedrin held the supreme judicial authority; there were also local courts connected with the Synagogue (Mt 5²¹). Its moral authority extended to Jews outside Palestine. In the Diaspora, the Jews, tenacious of their national peculiarities, were in many cases allowed a large measure of self-government, particularly in judicial matters. In Alexandria, in particular, they had special privileges and an 'ethnarch' of their own (Jos. Ant. xiv. vii. 2). For the cities of Asia Minor, see Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches, chs. xi. xii.

For 'governments' (1 Co 12²⁸) see HELPS.

C. W. EMMET.

GOVERNOR.—This word represents various Heb. and Gr. words, technical and non-technical. In Gn 4²⁶ (Joseph, cf. 41⁴⁰) it is probably the Ta-te, the second after the king in the court of the palace; cf. 1 K 18³, Dn 2⁴⁸ for similar offices. It frequently represents an Assyrian word, pechah, used of Persian satraps in general (Est 3¹² 8⁹), and of Assyrian generals (2 K 18²⁴, cf. 1 K 20²⁴). It is applied particularly to Tattenai, the governor of the large Persian province of which Judaea was a sub-district (Ezr 5⁸ 6⁶ etc., cf. Neh 2⁷). It is also, like tirshatha (wh. see), applied to the subordinate governor of Judaea (Ezr 5¹⁴ [Sheshbazzar] 6⁷ [Nehemiah], Hag 1¹ 1¹⁴ [Zerubbabel]). The first passage shows that the subordinate pechah was directly appointed by the king.

In the NT the word usually represents Gr. hēgemōn, and is used of Pontius Pilate (Lk 3¹ etc.), of Felix (Ac 23²⁶), and of Festus (26³⁰). The proper title of these governors was 'procurator' (Tac. Ann. xv. 44), of which originally eparchos and then epitropos were the Gr. equivalents. Josephus, however, uses hēgemōn, as well as these words, for the governor of Judaea, so that there is no inaccuracy in its employment by NT writers. But, being a general word, it does not help us to decide the nature of the 'governorship' of Quirinius (Lk 2²). The procurator, originally a financial official, was appointed directly by the Emperor to govern provinces, such as Thrace, Cappadocia, and Judaea, which were in a transitional state, being no longer ruled by subject kings, but not yet fully Romanized, and requiring special treatment. The procurator was in a sense subordinate to the legate of the neighbouring 'province,' e.g. Cappadocia to Galatia, Judaea to Syria; but except in emergencies he had full authority, military, judicial, and financial. In 1 P 2¹⁴ the word is specially appropriate to any provincial governor, as 'sent' by the Emperor. In 2 Co 11³² it represents 'ethnarch,' a word apparently used originally of the ruler of a nation (ethnos) living with laws of its own in a foreign community; but as applied to Aretas it may mean no more than petty king. In Gal 4² it means 'steward' (RV), the 'tutor' controlling the ward's person, the steward his property (Lightfoot, ad loc.). In Ja 3⁴ RV has 'steersman.' The 'governor of the feast' (Jn 2⁸, RV 'ruler') was probably a guest, not a servant, chosen to control and arrange for the feast; it is doubtful whether he is to be identified with the 'friend of the bridegroom' or best man. C. W. EMMET.

GOZAN.—One of the places to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria on the capture of Samaria (2 K 17⁶ 18¹¹, 1 Ch 5²⁶; mentioned also in 2 K 19³, Is 37³⁷). Gozan was the district termed Guzanu by the Assyrians and Gauzanitis by Ptolemy, and it was situated on the Khābūr. L. W. KING.

GRACE (from Lat. gratia [=favour, either received from or shown to another], through the Fr. grace).—Of the three meanings assigned to this word in the Eng. Dict.—(1) 'pleasingness,' (2) 'favour,' (3) 'thanks' (the sense of favour received)—(1) and (2) belong to the Eng. Bible; (3) attaches to the equivalent Gr. charis, where it is rendered 'thank(s)' or 'thankfulness' (He 12²⁸ RVm.). The specific Biblical use of 'grace' comes under the second of the above significations; it is prominent in the NT. The OT usage requires no separate treatment. (2) is the primary meaning of the Hebrew original, rendered 'favour' almost as often as 'grace'; but (1) of the Greek charis, which at its root signified the gladdening, joy-bringing. Hence the correspondence between the common Greek salutation chaire(te) or chairein ('Joy to you!') and the Christian charis ('Grace to you!') is more than a verbal coincidence.

1. Of the sense charm, winsomeness (of person, bearing, speech, etc.)—a usage conspicuous in common Greek, and personified in the Charites, the three Graces of mythology—the prominent instances in the OT are Ps 45² ('Grace is poured on thy lips') and probably Zec 4⁷; add to these Pr 1³ 32² 4⁹ 22¹¹ 31³⁰ ('favour'). The same noun occurs in the Heb. of Pr 5¹⁰ 11¹⁶, and Ec 10¹², Pr 17³, under the adjectival renderings 'pleasant,' 'gracious,' 'precious,' and in Nah 3⁴ ('well-favoured'). For the NT, 'grace' is charm in Lk 4²², Col 4⁶; in Eph 4²⁹ there may be a play on the double sense of the word. Charm of speech is designated by charis in Sir 20¹³ 21¹⁶ 37², in the Apocrypha. In Ja 1¹¹ 'grace of the fashion' renders a single Greek word signifying 'fair-seemingness,' quite distinct from charis.

2. The OT passages coming under (2) above, employ 'grace' chiefly in the idiom 'to find grace (or favour),' which is used indifferently of favour in the eyes of J^r (Gn 6⁸) or of one's fellow-men (39⁹), and whether the finder bring good (39⁹) or ill (19⁹) desert to the quest. With this broad application, 'grace' means good-will, favourable inclination towards another—of the superior (king, benefactor, etc.) or one treated as such by courtesy, to the inferior—shown on whatever ground. In the Eng. NT, 'favour' is reserved for this wide sense of charis; see Lk 1³⁰ 2³⁸, Ac 2⁴⁷ 7¹⁰. 6²⁵; 'grace' has the same meaning in Lk 2⁴⁰, Ac 4³³. Zec 12¹⁰ is the one instance in which 'grace' in the OT approximates to its prevalent NT import; but the Heb. adj. for gracious, and the equivalent vb., are together used of J^r, in His attitude towards the sinful, more than twenty times, associated often with 'merciful,' etc.; see, e.g., Ex 33¹⁹ 34⁶, Ps 77⁹ 103⁸, Jl 2¹³, Jon 4¹⁰. The character in God which the OT prefers to express by mercy, signifying His pitiful disposition towards man as weak and wretched, the NT in effect translates into 'grace,' as signifying His forgiving disposition towards man as guilty and lost.

3. Christianity first made grace a leading term in the vocabulary of religion. The prominence and emphasis of its use are due to St. Paul, in whose Epp. the word figures twice as often as in all the NT besides. 'Grace' is the first word of greeting and the last of farewell in St. Paul's letters; for him it includes the sum of all blessing that comes from God through Christ: 'grace' the source, 'peace' the stream. In the Gospels, the Johannine Prologue (vv. 14-17; contrasted with 'law,' and co-extensive with 'truth') supplies the only example of 'grace' used with the Pauline fullness of meaning. This passage, and the Lukan examples in Acts (6⁸ 11²³ 13⁴ 14³ 15¹¹ 20²⁴ 22²), with the kindred uses in Hebrews, 1 and 2 Pet., Jude, 2 Jn., Rev., may be set down to the influence of Paulinism on Apostolic speech. There is little in earlier phraseology to explain the supremacy in the NT of this specific term; a new experience demanded a new name. 'Grace' designates the principle in God of man's salvation through Jesus Christ. It is God's unmerited, unconstrained love towards sinners, revealed and operative in Christ. Tit 2¹¹⁻¹⁴, interpreted by Ro 5¹⁻⁶, is the text which approaches nearest to a definition; this passage shows how St. Paul derived from God's grace not only the soul's reconciliation and new hopes in Christ (Ro 5¹⁻¹¹), but the whole moral uplifting and rehabilitation of human life through Christianity. St. Paul's experience in conversion gave him this watchword; the Divine goodness revealed itself to the 'chief of sinners' under the aspect of 'grace' (1 Co 15¹⁰, 1 Ti 1¹⁴⁻¹⁶). The spontaneity and generosity of God's love felt in the act of his salvation, the complete setting aside therein of everything legal and conventional (with, possibly, the added connotation of charm of which charis is redolent), marked out this word as describing what St. Paul had proved of Christ's redemption; under this name he could commend it to the world of sinful men; his ministry 'testifies the gospel of the grace of God' (Ac 20²⁴). Essentially, grace stands opposed to sin; it is God's way of meeting and conquering man's sin (Ro 5^{10f.} 6^{15f.} 10^{15f.}); He thus effects 'the impossible task of the Law' (Ro 7¹⁻⁸). The legal discipline had taught St. Paul to understand, by contrast, the value and the operation of the principle of grace; he was able to handle it with effect in the legalist controversy. Grace supplies, in his theology, the one and sufficient means of deliverance from sin, holding objectively the place which faith holds subjectively in man's salvation (Eph 2⁸, Tit 2¹¹). Formally, and in point of method, grace stands opposed to 'the law,' 'which worketh wrath' (Ro 3¹⁹⁻²⁰, 4¹⁵, Gal 2¹⁹⁻²¹ 5⁴); it supersedes the futile 'works' by which the Jew had hoped, in fulfilling the Law, to merit salvation (Ro 4²⁻⁸ 11⁸, Gal 2¹⁶⁻²⁰, Eph 2⁸). Grace excludes, therefore, all notion of 'debt' as owing from God to men, all thought of earning the Messianic blessings (Ro 4⁴) by establishing 'a righteousness of one's own' (Ro 10³); through it men are 'justified gratis' (Ro 3²⁴) and 'receive the gift of righteousness' (5¹⁷). In twenty-two instances St. Paul writes of 'the grace of God' (or 'his grace'); in fifteen, of 'the grace of Christ' ('the Lord Jesus Christ,' etc.). Ten of the latter examples belong to salutation-formulae (so in Rev 22³), the fullest of these being 2 Co 13¹⁴, where 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ' is referred to 'the love of God' as its fountain-head; in the remaining five detached instances the context dictates the combination 'grace of Christ' ('our Lord,' etc.).—Ro 5¹⁵, 2 Co 8¹ 12⁹, Gal 1⁶, 1 Ti 1¹⁴ (also in 2 P 3¹⁴). In other NT writings the complement is predominantly 'of God'; 1 P 5¹⁰ inverts the expression—the God of all grace.—Once—in 2 Th 1¹²—grace is referred conjointly to God and Christ. Christ is the expression and vehicle of the grace of the Father, and is completely identified with it (see Ju 1¹⁴ 17), so that God's grace can equally be called Christ's; but its reference to the latter is strictly personal in such a passage as 2 Co 8⁹. A real distinction is implied in the remarkable language of Ro 5¹⁵, where, after positing 'the grace of God' as the fundamental ground of redemption, St. Paul adds to this 'the gift in grace, viz. the grace of the one man Jesus Christ,' who is the counterpart of the sinful and baleful Adam: the generous bounty of the Man towards men, shown by Jesus Christ, served an essential part in human redemption.

Cognate to charis, and charged in various ways with its meaning, is the vb. rendered (RV) to grant in Ac 27²⁴, Gal 3¹⁸, Ph 1²¹, Phil 2², give in Ph 2⁹, freely give in Ro 8², 1 Co 12¹, and with 'wrong' or 'debt' for object, expressed or implied) forgive in Lk 7⁴¹, 2 Co 2¹⁰ 12¹³, Eph 4³², Col 2¹³ 3¹³.

There are two occasional secondary uses of 'grace,' derived from the above, in the Pauline Epp.: it may denote (a) a gracious endowment or bestowment, God's grace to men taking shape in some concrete ministry (so Eph 4⁷, in view of the following context, and perhaps Gal 2⁹; cf. Ac 7¹⁰)—for charis in this sense charisma (charism) is St. Paul's regular term, as in 1 Co 12⁴ etc.; and (b) a state of grace, God's grace realized by the recipient (Ro 5², 2 Ti 2¹). G. G. FINDLAY.

GRACIOUS.—This Eng. adj. is now used only in an active sense = 'bestowing grace,' 'showing favour.' And this is its most frequent use in AV, as Ex 33¹⁹ 'And [I] will be gracious to whom I will be gracious.' But it was formerly used passively also = 'favoured,' 'accepted,' as 1 Es 8²⁰ 'Yea, when we were in bondage, we were not forsaken of our Lord; but he made us gracious before the kings of Persia, so that they gave us food.' And from this it came to signify 'attractive,' as Pr 11¹⁶ 'a gracious woman retaineth honour,' lit. 'a woman of grace,' that is, of attractive appearance and manner; Lk 4²² 'the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth,' lit. as RV, 'words of grace,' that is, says Plummer, 'winning words'; he adds, 'the very first meaning of charis is comeliness, winsomeness.'

to the stem, and a shoot from a good tree is grafted upon it. Three years later it begins to bear fruit, its produce gradually increasing until about the fourteenth year. No tree under cultivation is allowed to grow ungrafted; the fruit in such case being inferior. Grafting is alluded to only once in Scripture (Ro 11¹⁷ etc.). St. Paul compares the coming in of the Gentiles to the grafting of a wild olive branch upon a good olive tree: a process 'contrary to nature.' Nowack (Heb. Arch. i. 238) says that Columella's statement that olive trees are rejuvenated and strengthened in this way (see Comm. on Romans, by Principal Brown and Godet, ad loc.), is not confirmed. Sanday-Headlam say (ICC on 'Romans,' p. 328): 'Grafts must necessarily be branches from a cultivated olive inserted into a wild stock, the reverse process being one which would be valueless, and is never performed.' 'The ungrafted tree,' they say, 'is the natural or wild olive,' following Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, 371-377. Prof. Theobald Fischer inclines to view the olive and the wild olive as distinct species; in this agreeing with some modern botanists (Der Ölbaum, 4 f.), a contrary opinion being held by others (p. 5). Sir William Ramsay, Expositor, vi. ix. [1905], 154 ff., states grounds on which the oleaster (Elaeagnus angustifolia) may be regarded as the plant intended. This is the type to which the cultivated olive tends to revert through centuries of neglect, as seen, e.g., in Cyrenaica. (Prof. Fischer does not admit this [Der Ölbaum, 69 f.].) When grafted with a shoot of the nobler tree it gives rise to the true olive. But the two are clearly distinguished by size, shape, and colour of leaves and character of fruit.

No one could mistake the oleaster for the olive; but the case is not clear enough to justify Ramsay in calling the oleaster the wild olive (Expositor, ut supra, 152). Dr. W. M. Thomson, whose accuracy Ramsay commends, citing him in favour of his own view (ib. 154), is really a witness on the other side, quite plainly holding that the wild olive is the ungrafted tree (LB iii. 33 ff.); and this is the universal view among olive growers in modern Palestine. The fruit of the wild olive is acid and harsh, containing little oil.

Prof. Fischer states that in Palestine it is still 'customary to re-invigorate an olive tree which is ceasing to bear fruit, by grafting it with a shoot of wild olive, so that the sap of the tree ennobles this wild shoot, and the tree now again begins to bear fruit' (Der Ölbaum, 9). He gives no authority. Ramsay accepts the statement without question (Expositor, ut supra, 19), and the value of his subsequent discussion rests upon the assumption of its truth. The assumption is precarious. The present writer can find no evidence that such an operation is ever performed. In response to inquiries made in the main olive-growing districts of Palestine, he is assured that it is never done; and that, for the purpose indicated, it would be perfectly futile.

Sanday-Headlam seem rightly to apprehend the Apostle's meaning. It is not their view that St. Paul proves a spiritual process credible 'because it resembles a process impossible in and contrary to external nature' (Ramsay, ib. 26 f.). He exhorts the Gentiles to humility, because God in His goodness has done for them in the spiritual sphere a thing which they had no reason to expect, since it, according to Sanday-Headlam, never, according to Ramsay, very seldom, is done in the natural. The language of St. Paul is justified in either case: it might be all the more effective if the former were true. Mr. Baring Gould's inference as to the Apostle's ignorance only illustrates his own blindness (Study of St. Paul, p. 275). See also art. OLIVE. W. EWING.

GRAPES.—See WINE AND STRONG DRINK.

GRASS.—(1) chaltstr—equivalent of Arab. khudra, which includes green vegetables; many references, e.g. 1 K 18², 2 K 19²³; tr. 'hay' in Pr 27²⁴, Is 15², and in Nu 11⁵ 'leeks'; refers to herbage in general. (2) deshe (Aram. dethe), Jer 14⁶ Pr 27²⁴, Job 38²⁷, Is 66¹⁴

(‘pasture land’). Dn 4¹⁶, 22 (‘tender grass’). (3) yereq, tr. ‘grass,’ Nu 22⁴. see HERB. (4) ‘ēseb, Dt 11¹⁶ 32² etc., but tr. ‘herb’ in other places; see HERB. (5) chorion, Mt 6³⁰, Mk 6³⁹ etc. Pasturage, as it occurs in Western lands, is unknown in Palestine. Such green herbage appears only for a few weeks, and when the rains cease soon perishes. Hence grass is in the OT a frequent symbol of the shortness of human life (Ps 90⁷ 103¹⁵, Is 40⁶; cf. 1 P 1²¹). Even more brief is the existence of ‘the grass upon the [mud-made] housetops, which withereth afore it groweth up’ (Ps 129⁶).

GREECE represents in English the Latin word Græcia, which is derived from Græci. This name Græci properly belonged only to a small tribe of Greeks, who lived in the north-west of Greece: but as this tribe was apparently the first to attract the attention of Rome, dwelling as it did on the other side of the Adriatic from Italy, the name came to be applied by the Romans to the whole race. The term Græcia, when used by Romans, is equivalent to the Greek name Hellas, which is still used by the Greeks to describe their own country. In ancient times Hellas was frequently used in a wide sense to include not only Greece proper, but every settlement of Greeks outside their own country as well. Thus a portion of the Crimea, much of the west coast of Asia Minor, settlements in Cyrene, Sicily, Gaul, and Spain, and above all the southern half of Italy, were parts of Hellas in this wide sense. Southern Italy was so studded with Greek settlements that it became known as Magna Græcia. After the conquests of Alexander the Great, who died 323 B.C., all the territory annexed by him, such as the greater part of Asia Minor, as well as Syria and Egypt, could be regarded as in a sense Hellas. Alexander was the chief agent in the spread of the Greek civilization, manners, language, and culture over these countries. The dynasties founded by his generals, the Seleucids and Ptolemys for example, continued his work, and when Rome began to interfere in Eastern politics about the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., the Greek language was already firmly established in the East. When, about three centuries after Alexander's death, practically all his former dominions had become Roman provinces, Greek was the one language which could carry the traveller from the Euphrates to Spain. The Empire had two official languages, Latin for Italy and all provinces north, south-west, and west of it; Greek for all east and south-east of Italy. The Romans wisely made no attempt to force Latin on the Eastern peoples, and were content to let Greek remain in undisputed sway there. All their officials understood and spoke it. Thus it came about that Christianity was preached in Greek, that our NT books were written in Greek, and that the language of the Church, according to all the available evidence, remained Greek till about the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D.

As Galilee was thickly planted with Greek towns, there can be little doubt that Jesus knew the language, and spoke it when necessary, though it is probable that He commonly used Aramaic, as He came first to ‘the lost tribes of Israel.’ With St. Paul the case was different. Most of the Jews of the Dispersion were probably unable to speak Aramaic, and used the OT in the Greek translation. These would naturally be addressed in Greek. It is true that he spoke Aramaic on one occasion (Ac 21⁴⁰) at least, but this occasion was exceptional. It was a piece of tact on his part, to secure the respectful attention of his audience. Probably only the inhabitants of the villages in the Eastern Roman provinces were unable to speak Greek, and even they could doubtless understand it when spoken. The Jews were amongst the chief spreaders of the language. Some of the successors of Alexander esteemed them highly as colonists, and they were to be found in large numbers over the Roman Empire, speaking in the first instance Greek (cf. Ac 2⁹). When they wrote books, they wrote them in Greek: Philo and Josephus are examples. It is not meant that Greek killed the native languages of the provinces: these had their purpose and subsisted.

The name Hellas occurs only once in the NT (Ac 20⁶). There it is used in a narrow sense of the Greek peninsula, exclusive even of Macedonia: it is in fact used in the sense of Achaia (wh. see). A. SOUTER.

GREEKS, GRECIANS.—Both these terms are used indifferently in AV of OT Apoc. to designate persons of Gr. extraction (1 Mac 1¹⁰ 6² 8⁹, 2 Mac 4³⁶ etc.). In NT the linguistic usage of EV makes a distinction between the terms ‘Greeks’ and ‘Grecians.’ ‘Greeks’ uniformly represents the word Hellenēs, which may denote persons of Gr. descent in the narrowest sense (Ac 16¹ 18⁴, Ro 1⁴), or may be a general designation for all who are not of Jewish extraction (Jn 12²⁰, Ro 1⁶ 10¹², Gal 3²⁸). ‘Grecians,’ on the other hand (Ac 6¹ 9²⁹), is AV tr. of Hellenistai, which means Gr.-speaking Jews (RV ‘Grecian Jews’). See preced. art. and DISPERSION. An interesting question is that of the correct reading of Ac 11²⁰. Were those to whom the men of Cyprus and Cyrene preached, Grecians or Greeks? In other words, were they Jews or Gentiles? The weight of MS authority is in favour of ‘Grecians,’ but it is held by many that internal evidence necessitates ‘Greeks.’

GREEK VERSIONS OF OT.—I. The Septuagint (LXX).—1. The Septuagint, or Version of the Seventy, has special characteristics which differentiate it strongly from all other versions of the Scriptures. Not only are its relations to the original Hebrew of the OT more difficult and obscure than those of any other version to its original, but, as the Greek OT of the Christian community from its earliest days, it has a special historical importance which no other version can claim, and only the Vulgate can approach. Its history, moreover, is very obscure, and its criticism bristles with difficulties, for the removal of which much work is still needed. The present article can aim only at stating the principal questions which arise in relation to it, and the provisional conclusions at which the leading students of the subject have arrived.

2. There is no doubt that the LXX originated in Alexandria, in the time of the Macedonian dynasty in Egypt. Greeks had been sporadically present in Egypt even before the conquest of the country by Alexander, and under the Ptolemys they increased and multiplied greatly. Hundreds of documents discovered in Egypt within the last few years testify to the presence of Greeks and the wide-spread knowledge of the Greek language from the days of Ptolemy Soter onwards. Among them, especially in Alexandria, were many Jews, to whom Greek became the language of daily life, while the knowledge of Aramaic, and still more of literary Hebrew, decayed among them. It was among such surroundings that the LXX came into existence. The principal authority on the subject of its origin is the Letter of Aristeas (edited by H. St. J. Thackeray in Swete's Introduction to the OT in Greek [1900], and by P. Wendland in the Teubner series [1900]). This document, which purports to be written by a Greek official of high rank in the court of Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus, B.C. 285–247), describes how the king, at the suggestion of his librarian, Demetrius of Phaleron, resolved to obtain a Greek translation of the laws of the Jews for the library of Alexandria; how, at the instigation of Aristeas, he released the Jewish captives in his kingdom, to the number of some 100,000, paying the (absurdly small) sum of 20 drachmas apiece for them to their masters; how he then sent presents to Eleazar, the high priest at Jerusalem, and begged him to send six elders out of each tribe to translate the Law; how the 72 elders were sent, and magnificently entertained by Ptolemy, and were then set down to their work in the island of Pharos; and how in 72 days they completed the task assigned to them. The story is repeated by Josephus (Ant. xii. ii.) from Aristeas in a condensed form. In later times it received various accretions, increasing the miraculous character of the work; but these additions have no authority.

3. That the Letter of Aristeas is substantially right in assigning the original translation of the Law to the time of one of the early Ptolemys there is no reason to doubt; but the story has the air of having been considerably written up, and it is impossible to say precisely where history stops and fiction begins. Demetrius of Phalerum was librarian to Ptolemy I., but was in disgrace under his successor, and died about 283; hence he can hardly have been the prime mover in the affair. But if not, the writer of the Letter cannot have been the person of rank in Ptolemy's court that he represents himself to be, and the credit of the document is severely shaken. It cannot be depended on for accuracy in details, and it is necessary to turn to the internal evidence for further information. It will be observed that Aristeas speaks only of 'the Law,' i.e. the Pentateuch; and there is no reason to doubt that this was the first part of the OT to be translated, and that the other books followed at different times and from the hands of different translators. A lower limit for the completion of the work, or of the main part of it, is given in the prologue to Sirach (written probably in B.C. 132), where the writer speaks of 'the law itself and the prophets and the rest of the books' (sc. the Hagiographa) as having been already translated. It may therefore be taken as fairly certain that the LXX as a whole was produced between B.C. 285 and 150.

4. Its character cannot be described in a word. It is written in Greek, which in vocabulary and accidence is substantially that koine dialekto, or Hellenistic Greek, which was in common use throughout the empire of Alexander, and of which our knowledge, in its non-literary form, has been greatly extended by the recent discoveries of Greek papyri in Egypt. In its syntax, however, it is strongly tinged with Hebraisms, which give it a distinct character of its own. The general tendency of the LXX translators was to be very literal, and they have repeatedly followed Hebrew usage (notably in the use of pronouns, prepositions, and participial constructions) to an extent which runs entirely counter to the genius of the Greek language. [For examples, and for the grammar of the LXX generally, see the Introduction to Selections from the Septuagint, by F. C. Conybeare and St. George Stock (1905).] The quality of the translation differs in different books. It is at its best in the Pentateuch, which was probably both the first and the most deliberately prepared portion of the translation. It is at its worst in the Prophets, which presented the greatest difficulties in the way of interpretation. Neither the Greek nor the Hebrew scholarship of the translators was of a high order, and they not infrequently wrote down words which convey no rational meaning whatever. Something has been done of late to distinguish the work of different translators. [See the articles of H. St. J. Thackeray in JThSt iv. 245, 398, 578, viii. 262, the results of which are here summarized.] It has been shown that Jer. is probably the work of two translators, who respectively translated chs. 1-28 and 29-51 (in the Greek order of the chapters), the latter, who was an inferior scholar, being responsible also for Baruch. Ezek. likewise shows traces of two translators, one taking chs. 1-27 and 40-48, the other 28-39. The Minor Prophets form a single group, which has considerable affinities with the first translators of both Jer. and Ezekiel. Isaiah stands markedly apart from all these, exhibiting a more classical style, but less fidelity to the Hebrew. 1 Kings (= 1 Sam.) similarly stands apart from 2-4 Kings, the latter having features in common with Judges.

5. Some other features of the LXX must be mentioned which show that each book, or group of books, requires separate study. In Judges the two principal MSS (Codd. A and B, see below, § 10) differ so extensively as to show that they represent different recensions. In some books (notably the latter chapters of Ex., 3 K 4-11, Pr 24-29, Jer 25-51) the order of the LXX differs completely from that of the Hebrew, testifying to an arrangement of the text quite different from that of the Massoretes. Elsewhere the differences are not in arrangement but in contents. This is especially the case in the latter chapters of Jos., 1 Kings (= 1 Sam.) 17-18, where the LXX omits (or the Heb. adds) several verses; 3 K 8 and 12, where the LXX incorporates material from some fresh source; Ps 151, which is added in the LXX; Job, the original LXX text of which was much shorter than that of the Massoretic Hebrew; Esther, where the Greek has large additions, which now appear separately in our Apocrypha, but which are an integral part of the LXX; Jer., where small omissions and additions are frequent; and Daniel, where the LXX includes the episodes of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, and the Song of the Three Children, which have now been relegated (in obedience to Jerome's example) to the Apocrypha.

6. The mention of the Apocrypha suggests the largest and most striking difference between the LXX and the Hebrew OT, namely, in the books included in their respective canons; for the Apocrypha, as it stands to-day in our Bibles, consists (with the exception of 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh) of books which form an integral part of the LXX canon, but were excluded from the Hebrew canon when that was finally determined about the end of the 1st century [see CANON OF OT]. Nor did these books stand apart from the others in the LXX as a separate group. The historical books (1 Esdras, Tob., Judith, and sometimes Mac.) have their place with Chron., Ezr., Neh.; the poetical books (Wisd., Sir.) stand beside Prov., Eccles., and Cant.; and Baruch is attached to Jeremiah. The whole arrangement of the OT books differs, indeed, from the stereotyped order of the Massoretic Hebrew. The latter has its three fixed divisions—(i) the Law, i.e. the Pentateuch; (ii) the Prophets, consisting of the Former Prophets (Jos., Judg., 1-4 Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets); (iii) the Hagiographa, including Chron., Ps., Job, Prov., Ruth, Cant., Eccles., Lam., Esth., Dan., Ezr., Nehemiah. But the LXX attaches Ruth to Judges, Chron. and Ezr.-Neh. to Kings, Baruch and Lam. to Jer., and Dan. to the three Greater Prophets. Its principle of arrangement is, in fact, different. In place of divisions which substantially represent three different stages of canonization, it classifies the books in groups according to the character of their subject-matter—Law, History, Poetry, and Prophecy. The details of the order of the books differ in different MSS and authoritative lists, but substantially the principle is as here stated; and the divergence has had considerable historical importance. In spite of the dissent of several of the leading Fathers, such as Origen and Athanasius, the LXX canon was generally accepted by the early Christian Church. Through the medium of the Old Latin Version it passed into the West, and in spite of Jerome's adoption of the Hebrew canon in his Vulgate, the impugned books made their way back into all Latin Bibles, and have remained there from that day to this. [For an explanation of the curious misapprehension whereby 1 Esdras (on which see § 17) was excepted from this favourable reception in the Latin printed Bibles and relegated to an appendix, see an article by Sir H. Howorth in JThSt vii. 343 (1906).] In the Reformed Churches their fate has been different; for the German and English translators followed Jerome in adopting the Hebrew canon, and relegated the remaining books to the limbo of the Apocrypha. The authority attaching to the LXX and Massoretic canons respectively is a matter of controversy which cannot be settled offhand; but the fact of their divergence is certain and historically important.

7. If the LXX had come down to us in the state in which it was at the time when its canon was complete (say in the 1st cent. B.C.), it would still have presented to the critic problems more than enough, by reason of its differences from the Hebrew in contents and arrangement, and the doubt attaching to its fidelity as a translation; but these difficulties are multiplied tenfold by the modifications which it underwent between this time and the date to which our earliest MSS belong (4th cent. A.D.). It has been shown above that the LXX was the Bible of the Greek-speaking world at the time when Christianity spread over it. It was in that form that the Gentile Christians received the OT; and they were under no temptation to desert it for the Hebrew Bible (which was the property of their enemies, the Jews), even if they had been able to read it. The LXX consequently became the Bible of the early Christian Church, to which the books of the NT were added in course of time. But the more the Christians were attached to the LXX, the less willing became the Jews to admit its authority; and from the time of the activity of the Rabbinical school of Jamnia, about the end of the 1st cent., to which period the fixing of the Massoretic canon and text may be assigned with fair certainty, they definitely repudiated it. This repudiation did not, however, do away with the need which non-Palestinian Jews felt for a Greek OT; and the result was the production, in the course of the 2nd cent., of no less than three new translations. These translations, which are known under the names of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, are described below (§§ 16-18); here it is sufficient to say that they were all translated from the Massoretic OT, and represent it with different degrees of fidelity, from the pedantic verbal imitation of Aquila to the literary freedom of Symmachus. By the beginning of the 3rd cent. there were, therefore, four Greek versions of the OT in the field, besides portions of others which will be mentioned below.

8. Such was the state of things when Origen (A.D. 185-253), the greatest scholar produced by the early Church, entered the field of textual criticism. His labours therein had the most far-reaching effect on the fortunes of the LXX, and are the cause of a large part of our difficulties in respect of its text to-day. Struck by the discrepancies between the LXX and the Heb., he conceived the idea of a vast work which should set the facts plainly before the student. This was the Hexapla, or sixfold version of the OT, in which six versions were set forth in six parallel columns. The six versions were as follows—(1) the Hebrew text; (2) the same transliterated in Greek characters; (3) the version of Aquila, which of all the versions was the nearest to the Hebrew; (4) the version of Symmachus; (5) his own edition of the LXX; (6) the version of Theodotion. In the case of the Psalms, no less than three additional Greek versions were included, of which very little is known; they are called simply Quinta, Sexta, and Septima. Elsewhere also there is occasional evidence of an additional version having been included; but these are unimportant. A separate copy of the four main Greek versions was also made, and was known as the Tetrapla. The principal extant fragment of a MS of the Hexapla (a 10th cent. palimpsest at Milan, containing about 11 Psalms) omits the Hebrew column, but makes up the total of six by a column containing various isolated readings. The only other fragment is a 7th cent. leaf discovered at Cairo in a genizah (or receptacle for damaged and disused synagogue MSS), and now at Cambridge. It contains Ps 22¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 20-23, and has been edited by Dr. C. Taylor (Cairo Genizah Palimpsests, 1900). Origen's Hebrew text was substantially identical with the Massoretic; and Aq., Symm., and Theod., as has been stated above, were translations from it; but the LXX, in view of its wide and frequent discrepancies, received special treatment. Passages present in the LXX, but wanting in the Heb., were marked with an obelus (— or ÷); passages wanting in the LXX, but present in the Heb., were supplied from Aq. or Theod., and marked with an asterisk (*); the close of the passage to which the signs applied being marked by a metabelus (: or √ or ∞). In cases of divergences in arrangement, the order of the Heb. was followed (except in Prov.), and the text of the LXX was considerably corrected so as to bring it into better conformity with the Heb. The establishment of such a conformity was in fact Origen's main object, though his conscience as a scholar and his reverence for the LXX did not allow him altogether to cast out passages which occurred in it, even though they had no sanction in the Hebrew text as he knew it.

9. The great MSS of the Hexapla and Tetrapla were preserved for a long time in the library established by Origen's disciple, Pamphilus, at Caesarea, and references are made to them in the scholia and subscriptions of some of the extant MSS of the LXX (notably α and Q). So long as they were in existence, with their apparatus of critical signs, the work of Origen in confusing the Gr. and Heb. texts of the OT could always be undone, and the original texts of the LXX substantially restored. But MSS so huge could not easily be copied, and the natural tendency was to excerpt the LXX column by itself, as representing a Greek text improved by restoration to more authentic form. Such an edition, containing Origen's fifth column, with its apparatus of critical signs, was produced early in the 4th cent. by Pamphilus, the founder of the library at Caesarea, and his disciple Eusebius; and almost simultaneously two fresh editions of the LXX were published in the two principal provinces of Greek Christianity, by Hesychius at Alexandria, and by Lucian at Antioch. It is from these three editions that the majority of the extant MSS of the LXX have descended; but the intricacies of the descent are indescribably great. In the case of Hexaplaric MSS, the inevitable tendency of scribes was to omit, more or less completely, the critical signs which distinguished the true LXX text from the passages imported from Aq. or Theod.; the versions of Aq., Theod., and Symm. have disappeared, and exist now only in fragments, so that we cannot distinguish all such interpolations with certainty; Hexaplaric, Hesychian, and Lucianic MSS acted and reacted on one another, so that it is very difficult to identify MSS as containing one or other of these editions; and although some MSS can be assigned to one or other of them with fair confidence, the majority contain mixed and undetermined texts. The task of the textual critic who would get behind all this confusion of versions and recensions is consequently very hard, and the problem has as yet by no means been completely solved.

10. The materials for its solution are, as in the NT, threefold—Manuscripts, Versions, Patristic Quotations; and these must be briefly described. The earliest MSS are fragments on papyrus, some of which go back to the 3rd century. About 16 in all are at present known, the most important being (i) Oxyrhynchus Pap. 656 (early 3rd cent.), containing parts of Gn 14-27, where most of the great vellum MSS are defective; (ii) Brit. Mus. Pap. 37 (7th cent.), sometimes known as U, containing the greater part of Ps 10-34 [it is by a mere misunderstanding that Heinrich, followed by Rahlfs, quotes the authority of Wilken for assigning this MS to the 4th cent.; Wilken's opinion related to another Psalter-fragment in the British Museum (Pap. 230)]; (iii) a Leipzig papyrus (4th cent.), containing Ps 30-55, the first five being considerably mutilated; (iv) a papyrus at Heidelberg (7th cent.), containing Zec 4⁶-Mal 4⁵. A papyrus at Berlin, containing about two-thirds of Gen., and said to be of the 4th or 5th cent., is not yet published.

The principal vellum uncial MSS, which are of course the main foundation of our textual knowledge, are as follows. See also Text of NT.

A or S. Codex Sinaiticus, 4th cent., 43 leaves at Leipzig, 156 (besides the whole NT) at St. Petersburg, containing fragments of Gen. and Num., 1 Ch 9⁸-19¹⁷, 2 Es 9⁸ to end, Esth., Tob., Judith, 1 and 4 Mac., Is., Jer., La 1-2²⁰, Joel, Obad., Jon., Nah.-Mal., and the poetical books. Its text is of a very mixed character. It has a strong element in common with B, and yet is often independent of it. In Tob. it has a quite different text from that of A and B, and is perhaps nearer to the original Heb. Its origin is probably composite, so that it is not possible to assign it to any one school. Its most important correctors are C² and C³, both of the 7th cent., the former of whom states, in a note appended to Esth., that he collated the MS with a very early copy, which itself had been corrected by the hand of Pappilius.

A. Codex Alexandrinus, 5th cent., in the British Museum; complete except in Ps 49⁸-79¹⁸ and smaller lacunae; chiefly in Gen., 3 and 4 Mac. are included. The Psalter is liturgical, and is preceded by the Epistle of Athanasius on the Psalter, and the Hypothesis of Eusebius; the Canticles are appended to it. The text is written by at least two scribes; the principal corrections are by the original scribes and a reviser of not much later date. It is almost certainly of Egyptian origin, and has sometimes been supposed to represent the edition of Hesychius, but this is by no means certain yet. In Judges it has a text wholly different from that of B, and in general the two MSS represent different types of text; the quotations from the LXX in the NT tend to support A rather than B.

B. Codex Vaticanus, 4th cent., in the Vatican; complete, except for the loss of Gn 11-48²³, 2 K 23-10-13, Ps 105²⁷-137⁷, and the omission of 1-4 Maccabees. Its character appears to differ in different books, but in general Hort's description seems sound, that it is closely akin to the text which Origen had before him when he set about his Hexapla. It is thus of Egyptian origin, and is very frequently in accord with the Bohairic version. Recently Rahlfs has argued that in Ps. it represents the edition of Hesychius, but his proof is very incomplete; for since he admits that Hesychius must have made but few alterations in the pre-Origenian Psalter, and that the text of B is not quite identical with that which he takes as the standard of Hesychius (namely, the quotations in Cyril of Alexandria), his hypothesis does not seem to cover the phenomena so well as Hort's. The true character of B, however, still requires investigation, and each of the principal groups of books must be examined separately.

C. Codex Ephraemi rescriptus, 5th cent., at Paris; 64 leaves palimpsest, containing parts of the poetical books.

D. The Cotton Genesis, 5th cent., in the British Museum; an illustrated copy of Gen., almost wholly destroyed by fire in 1731, but partially known from collations made previously.

G. Codex Sarravianus, 5th cent., 130 leaves at Leyden, 22 at Paris, and one at St. Petersburg, contains portions of the Octateuch in a Hexaplar text, with Origen's apparatus (incompletely reproduced, however) of asterisks and obeli.

L. The Vienna Genesis, 6th cent., in silver letters on purple vellum, with illustrations; contains Gen. incomplete.

N-V. Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae, 8th or 9th cent., partly in the Vatican and partly at Venice; contains portions of the OT, from Lv 13⁸-4 Mac. Of importance chiefly as having been used (in conjunction with B) for the standard edition of the LXX printed at Rome in 1587.

Q. Codex Marchalianus, 6th cent., in the Vatican; contains the Prophets, complete. Written in Egypt; its text is believed to be Hesychian, and it contains a large number of Hexaplaric signs and readings from the Hexapla in its margins, which are of great importance.

R. Codex Veronensis, 6th cent., at Verona; contains Psalter, in Greek and Latin, with Canticles.

T. Zürich Psalter, 7th cent., written in silver letters, with gold initials, on purple vellum; the Canticles are included. R and T represent the Western text of the Psalms, as the Leipzig and London papyrus Psalters do the Upper Egyptian text, and B the Lower Egyptian.

A MS of Deut. and Jos., of the 6th cent., found in Egypt and now at the University of Michigan, is to be published shortly.

The other uncial MSS are fragmentary and of lesser importance. Of minuscule MSS over 300 are known, and some of them are of considerable importance in establishing the texts of the various recensions of the LXX. Most of them are known mainly from the collations of Holmes and Parsons, which are often imperfect; the Cambridge Septuagint, now in progress, will give more exact information with regard to selected representatives of them.

11. The Versions of the LXX do not occupy so prominent a position in its textual criticism as is the case in the NT, but still are of considerable importance for identifying the various local texts. The following are the most important—

(a) The Bohairic version of Lower Egypt, the latest of the Coptic versions, and the only one which is complete. The analysis of its character is still imperfect. It is natural to look to it for the Hesychian text, but it is doubtful how far this can be assumed, and in the case of the Minor Prophets it has been denied by Deissmann as the result of his examination of the Heidelberg papyrus. In the Psalms it agrees closely with B, in the Major Prophets rather with A^Q.

(b) The Sahidic version of Upper Egypt; Job and Ps. are extant complete, and there are considerable fragments of other books. In Ps. the text agrees substantially with that of the papyrus Psalter, and is said to be pre-Origenian but considerably corrupted. In Job also it is pre-Origenian, and its text is shorter by one-sixth than the received text; scholars still differ as to which is the truer representation of the original book. The fragments of the other books need fuller examination. A MS of Prov. in a third Coptic dialect (Middle Egyptian) has quite recently been discovered, and is now in Berlin; but no details as to its character have been published.

(c) The Syriac versions. The Old Syriac, so important for the NT, is not known to have existed for the OT. The Peshitta appears to have been made from the Hebrew, but to have been subsequently affected by the influence of the LXX, and consequently is not wholly trustworthy for either. The most important Syriac version of the OT is the translation made from the LXX column of the Hexapla by Paul of Tella in A.D. 616-617, in which Origen's critical signs were carefully preserved; an 8th cent. MS at Milan contains the Prophets and the poetical books, while Ex. and Ruth are extant complete in other MSS, with parts of Gen., Numb., Josh., Judg., and 3 and 4 Kings. The other historical books were edited in the 16th cent. from a MS which has since disappeared. This is one of the most important sources of our knowledge of Origen's work.

(d) The Latin versions. These were two in number, the Old Latin and the Vulgate. On the origin of the OL, see Text of the NT. The greater part of the Heptateuch (Gn 16²-Jg 20⁸, but with mutilations) is extant in a MS at Lyons of the 5th-6th cent. The non-Massoretic books (our Apoc.), except Judith and Tob., were not translated by Jerome, and consequently were incorporated in the Vulg. from the OL; Ruth survives in one MS, the Psalms in two, and Esther in several; and considerable fragments of most of the other books are extant in palimpsests and other incomplete MSS. In addition we have the quotations of Cyprian and other early Latin Fathers. The importance of the OL lies in the fact that its origin goes back to the 2nd cent., and it is consequently pre-Hexaplar. Also, since its affinities are rather with Antioch than with Alexandria, it preserves readings from a type of text prevalent in Syria, that, namely, on which Lucian subsequently based his edition. This type of text may not be superior to the Alexandrian, but at least it deserves consideration. On the OL, see Kennedy in Hastings' DB, and Burkill's The Old Latin and the Itala (1896). On the Vulgate, see art. s.v. Since it was, in the main, a re-translation from the Hebrew, it does not (except in the Psalter) come into consideration in connexion with the LXX.

The remaining versions—Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Arabic, Gothic, Slavonic—are of minor importance, and need not be described here.

12. The evidence of the Fathers has been less fully used for the LXX than for the NT, but its importance in distinguishing and localizing types of text is increasingly recognized.

Origen is of particular importance for his express statements on textual matters, though his declared acceptance of the Hebrew as the standard of truth has to be remembered in weighing his evidence. Much the same may be said of Jerome. Fathers who had no interest in textual criticism are often more valuable as witnesses to the type of text in use in their age and country. Thus Cyril of Alexandria gives us an Egyptian text, which may probably be that of Hesychius. Theodoret and Chrysostom, who belong to Antioch, represent the Syrian text, i.e. the edition of Lucian. Cyprian is a principal witness for the African Old Latin. The Apostolic Fathers, notably Clement of Rome and Barnabas, carry us farther back, and contribute some evidence towards a decision between the rival texts represented by A and B, their tendency on the whole being in favour of the former; and the same is the case with Irenaeus, Justin, and Clement of Alexandria, though their results are by no means uniform. This field of inquiry is not worked out yet.

13. With these materials the critic has to approach the problem of the restoration of the text of the LXX. Ideally, what is desirable is that it should be possible to point out the three main editions, those of Origen, Lucian, and Hesychius, and thence to go back to the text which lies behind them all, that of the pre-Origenian LXX. Some progress has been made in this direction. Some MSS are generally recognized as being predominantly Lucianic; some readings are certainly known to be Hexaplar; but we are still far from an agreement on all points. Especially is this the case with the edition of Hesychius. Some scholars have identified it (notably in the Prophets) with the text of A, which, however, seems certainly to have been modified by the influence of Origen. More recently the tendency has been to find it in B; but here it is still open to question whether B is not mainly both pre-Hesychian and pre-Origenian. It would be unjustifiable to pretend at present that certainty has been arrived at on these points. And with regard to the great bulk of MSS, it is clear that their texts are of a mixed character. In the Psalms it would appear that the edition of Lucian was, in the main, adopted at Constantinople, and so became the common text of the Church; but in regard to the other books, the common text, which appears in the bulk of the later MSS, cannot be identified with any of the three primary editions. The influence of the Hebrew, especially after the example of Origen, was constantly a disturbing factor; and it is certain that criticism has still much to do before it can give us even an approximately sound text of the LXX.

14. And when that is done, the question of the relation of the LXX to the Hebrew still remains. No other version differs so widely from its presumed original as the LXX does from the Massoretic Hebrew; but it is by no means easy to say how far this is due to the mistakes and liberties of the translators, and how far to the fact that the text before them differed from the Massoretic. That the latter was the case to some not inconsiderable extent is certain. Readings in which the LXX is supported against the Massoretic by the Samaritan version must almost certainly represent a divergent Hebrew original; but unfortunately the Samaritan exists only for the Pentateuch, in which the variants are least. Elsewhere we have generally to depend on internal evidence; and the more the LXX is studied in detail, the less willing, as a rule, is the student to maintain its authority against the Hebrew, and the less certain that its variants really represent differences in the original text. The palpable mistakes made by the translators, the inadequacy of their knowledge of Hebrew, the freedom with which some of them treated their original,—all these go far to explain a large margin of divergence; and to these must be added divergences arising, not from a different Hebrew text, but from supplying different vowel points to a text which originally had none. All these factors have to be taken into account before we can safely say that the Hebrew which lay before the LXX translators must have been different from the Massoretic text; and each passage must be judged on its own merits. An instructive lesson may be learnt from the recent discovery of the original Hebrew of Sirach, which has revealed a quite unsuspected amount of blundering, and even wilful alteration, on the part of the Greek translator. The testimony of the LXX must therefore be received with extreme caution; and although there is no reason to doubt that it contains much good grain, yet it is also certain that much skill and labour have still to be exercised in order to separate the grain from the chaff. In passing, it may be said that there appears to be no sound basis for the charge, often brought by early Christian writers, that the Jews made large alterations in the Heb. text for doctrinal and controversial reasons.

II. Aquila (Aq.).—15. Of the rival Greek versions which, as mentioned in § 7, came into being in the 2nd cent., the first was that of Aquila, a Gentile of Sinope, in Pontus, who was converted first to Christianity and then to Judaism. He is said to have been a pupil of Rabbi Akiba, and to have flourished in the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 117–138). His translation of the OT was made in the interests of Jewish orthodoxy. The text which subsequently received the name of Massoretic had practically been fixed by the Jewish scholars at the end of the 1st cent., and Aquila followed it with slavish fidelity. All thought for the genius and usage of the Greek language was thrown aside, and the Greek was forced to follow the idiosyncrasies of the Hebrew in defiance of sense and grammar. Aq. would consequently be an excellent witness to the Hebrew text of the 2nd cent., if only it existed intact; but we possess only small fragments of it. These consist for the most part (until recently, wholly) of fragments of Origen's third column preserved in the margins of Hexaplar MSS (such as Q), but they have been supplemented by modern discoveries. The Milan palimpsest of the Hexapla (see § 8) contains the text of Aq. for 11 Psalms; but though discovered by Mercati in 1896, only a small specimen of it has yet been published. The Cambridge fragment published by Dr. Taylor gives the text of Ps 22¹⁰⁻²³. In 1897 Mr. F. C. Burkitt discovered three palimpsest leaves of a MS of Aq. (5th–6th cent.) among a large quantity of tattered MSS brought, like the last-mentioned fragment, from Cairo; and these, which contain 3 K 20⁷⁻¹⁷ and 4 K 23¹¹⁻²⁷, were published in 1897. Further fragments, from the same source and of the same date, published by Dr. C. Taylor (1900), contain Ps 101^{10-103¹³} and in 1900 Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt published Gn 11¹⁻⁶ in the versions of the LXX and Aq. from a papyrus of the 4th cent. in the collection of Lord Amherst. These discoveries confirm our previous knowledge of the characteristics of Aq.; and it is noteworthy that in the Cambridge MSS of Aq. the Divine Tetragrammaton is written in the old Hebrew characters.

III. Theodotion (Theod.).—16. The origin of this version must be ascribed to a desire (similar to that which actuated Origen) on the part of the Christians to have a Greek version of the OT which should correspond better than the LXX with the current Hebrew text, and yet not be so closely identified with their Jewish opponents and so disregarded of the genius of the Greek language as Aquila. Theodotion, though sometimes described as a Jewish proselyte, appears rather to have been an Ebionitic Christian, who lived at Ephesus about the middle of the 2nd cent.; and his version found favour with the Christians, much as Aq. did with the Jews. This version follows in the main the authorized Hebrew, but is much more free than Aq., and agrees more with the LXX. Hence when Origen, in the execution of his plan for bringing the LXX into accord with the Hebrew, had to supply omissions in the LXX, he had recourse to Theod. for the purpose. Further, the LXX version of Dan. being regarded as unsatisfactory, the version of Theod. was taken into use instead, and so effectually that the LXX of this book has survived in but one single MS. It is probable, however, that Theod. was not wholly original in this book, for there are strong traces of Theodotianic readings in the NT (Hebrews and Apocalypse), Hermas, Clement, and Justin; whence it seems necessary to conclude that Theod. based his version on one which had been previously in existence side by side with the LXX.

17. Besides this complete book and the extracts from the Hexapla and the Milan palimpsest (the Theodotion column in the Cambridge MS is lost), there is some reason to believe that still more of Theod. has survived than was formerly supposed. It is well known that the book which appears in our Apocrypha as 1 Esdras, and in the Greek Bible as 'Εσδρας Α', is simply a different recension of the canonical book of Ezra (with parts of 2 Chron. and Nehemiah), which in the Greek Bible appears (with Neh.) as 'Εσδρας B'. 'Εσδρας B' faithfully represents the Massoretic Hebrew; 'Εσδρας A' is freely paraphrastic, and contains some additional matter (1 Es 31-5). Josephus, who knew the LXX, but not, of course, Theod., plainly follows 'Εσδ. A'; and it has been argued by Whiston (in 1722) and Sir H. Howorth (Soc. Bibl. Arch., May 1901-Nov. 1902) that 'Εσδ. A' is the original LXX version, and 'Εσδ. B' the version of Theod., which, as in Dan., has ousted its predecessor from general use. The theory is not at all improbable (and there is some evidence that in the Hexapla, where Theod. of course had its own column, the text in the LXX column was 'Εσδ. A'), but it still needs confirmation by a linguistic comparison between 'Εσδ. A' and Theodotion's Dan., which it is hoped will shortly be made. Sir H. Howorth further suggests that the version of Chron. which now appears in the LXX is really that of Theod., the original LXX having in this case completely disappeared. Chron. is certainly closely connected with 'Εσδ. B', and the suggestion deserves full examination; but in the absence of an alternative version, or of any reference to one, it will be more difficult to establish.

IV. Symmachus (Symm.).—18. Of Symm. there is less to say. Like Theodotion, he has been called an Ebionite, and, like both Theodotion and Aquila, he has been said to be a proselyte to Judaism; the former statement is probably true. His work was known to Origen by about A.D. 228, and was probably produced quite at the end of the 2nd century. From the literary point of view, it was the best of all the Greek versions of the OT. It was based, like Aq. and Theod., on the Massoretic Hebrew, but it aimed at rendering it into idiomatic Greek. Consequently, it neither had the reputation which Aq. acquired among the Jews, nor was it so well fitted as Theod. to make good the defects, real or supposed, of the LXX among the Christians; and its historical importance is therefore less than that of its rivals. The extant materials for its study are practically the same as in the case of Aq., namely, the two fragments of MSS of the Hexapla [the Cambridge fragment contains the Symm. column for Ps 22¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 20-24; the precise extent of the Milan MS is not known], and the copious extracts from the Hexapla in the margins of certain MSS and the quotations of the Fathers.

LITERATURE.—By far the best work on the LXX in any language is Dr. H. B. Swete's Introd. to the OT in Greek (1900), which includes full references to all the literature of the subject before that date. See also Nestle's article in Hastings' DB, and his Septuagintastudien (1886-1907). A popular account with a description of all the uncial MSS is given in Kenyon's Our Bible and the Ancient MSS, pp. 48-92 (1895; revised ed., 1898). The most important recent works are Rahlf's Septuaginta-Studien (I., 1904, on the text of Kings; II., 1907, on Ps.), and R. L. Ottley's Book of Isaiah according to the Septuagint (2 vols., 1904-6). The remains of the Hexapla are collected in F. Field's Origenis Hexaplorum quae supersunt (Oxford, 1875). Ceriani's study of the Codex Marchalianus and Deissmann's of the Heidelberg Prophets-papyrus make important contributions to the classification of the MSS. An English translation of the LXX was printed by C. Thomson at Philadelphia (1808), and has recently been reprinted by S. F. Pells; another by Sir L. Brenton was published in 1844.

Editions.—The LXX was first printed in the Complutensian Polyglot (1514-17, published 1521), but first published by Aldus (1519). The standard edition is that issued at Rome by Pope Sixtus v. in 1587. This, by excellent fortune, was based mainly on the Codex Vaticanus (B), with the help of the Venice MS (V), and others. Hence the TR of the Greek OT, unlike that of the NT, has always rested on the authority of good MSS, though these were not very critically employed. An edition based on the Codex Alexandrinus (A) was published at Oxford by Grabe in 1707-20. The textual criticism of the LXX rests upon the great edition of R. Holmes and J. Parsons (Oxford, 1798-1827), who printed the Sixtine text with an apparatus drawn from 20 uncial and 277 minuscule MSS, besides versions. Unfortunately several of the collations made by their assistants were not up to modern standards of accuracy. Tischendorf published a revised text, with various readings from a few of the leading uncials (1850; 7th ed., 1887); but the foundation of recent textual study of the LXX was laid by the Cambridge manual edition in 3 vols. by Swete (1887-94; revised, 1895-99). In this the text is printed from B, when available, otherwise from A or S, and the textual apparatus gives all the variants in the principal uncial MSS. A larger edition giving the same text, but with the addition of the evidence of all the uncials, a considerable number of carefully selected and representative minuscules, and the principal versions and patristic quotations, is being prepared by A. E. Brooke and N. Maclean, and Genesis has already appeared (1906).

GREEN, GREENISH.—See COLOURS, § 1.

GREETING.—See SALUTATION.

GREYHOUND.—See DOG.

GRINDER.—The 'grinders' of Ec 12³ are women grinding at the mill. But in Job 29^{17m} the 'grinders' are the molar teeth. Holland, Pliny, xi. 37, says, 'The great grinders which stand beyond the eye-teeth, in no creature whatsoever do fall out of themselves.'

GRISLED.—See COLOURS, § 1.

GROUND.—See EARTH.

GROVE.—Apart from Gn 21³³, to be presently mentioned, 'grove' is everywhere in AV a mistaken tr., which goes back through the Vulgate to the LXX, of the name of the Canaanite goddess Asherah. The 'groves,' so often said to have been, or to be deserving to be, 'cut down,' were the wooden poles set up as symbols of Asherah. See further the art. ASHERAH.

In Gn 21³³ the grove which AV makes Abraham plant in Beer-sheba was really 'a tamarisk tree' (so RV), a tree which also figures in the story of Saul, 1 S 22³ 31¹³ (both RV).

GRUDGE.—Ps 59¹⁵ 'Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied.' The word 'grudge' formerly stood for dissatisfaction expressed aloud, i.e. murmur, grumble; but by 1611 it was becoming confined to the feeling rather than the open expression, so that it occurs in AV less frequently than in the older versions. Besides Ps 59¹⁵ it has the older meaning in Wis 12⁷, Sir 10²⁵, and Ja 5⁹ 'grudge not one against another' (RV 'murmur not').

GUARD BODY-GUARD.—The former is used in EV almost exclusively for the body-guard of royal and other high-placed personages, such as Nehemiah (Neh 4²¹) and Holofernes (Jth 12⁷). 'Body-guard' occurs only 1 Es 3⁴ RV of the 'guard' (AV) of Darius. The members of the body-guard of the Pharaoh of Gn 37³⁶ and of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25⁸ etc.) are, in the original style, 'slaughterers (of animals for food),' not as RVm 'executioners.' Those composing the body-guard of the Hebrew kings, on the other hand, are styled 'runners' (1 S 22¹⁷ RV and marg., 2 K 10²⁵ 11⁴ etc.), one of their duties being to run in front of the royal state-chariot (cf. 2 S 15¹, 1 K 1⁵). In 1 K 14²⁸ we hear of a guard-chamber. The office of 'the captain of the guard' was at all times one of great dignity and responsibility. David's body-guard consisted of foreign mercenaries, the Cherethites and Pelethites (see p. 122ⁿ), commanded by Benaiah (2 S 20²³ compared with 23²³). The famous Prætorian guard of the Roman emperors is mentioned in Ph 1¹³ RV; also Ac 28¹⁶ AV in a passage absent from the best texts and RV.

GUDGODAH.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites (Dt 10⁷), whence they proceeded to Jotbathah. There can be little doubt that Hor-haggidgad in the itinerary of Nu 33³³ indicates the same place.

GUEST, GUEST-CHAMBER.—See HOSPITALITY.

GUILT.—1. Guilt may be defined in terms of relativity. It is rather the abiding result of sin than sin itself (see Pearson's Exposition of the Creed, ed. James Nichols, p. 514 f.). It is not punishment, or even liability to punishment, for this presupposes personal consciousness of wrong-doing and leaves out of account the attitude of God to sin unwittingly committed (Lv 5¹⁵; cf. Lk 12¹⁸, Ro 5¹²; see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 144). On the other hand, we may describe it as a condition, a state, or a relation; the resultant of two forces drawing different ways (Ro 7¹⁴). It includes two essential factors, without which it would be unmeaning as an objective reality or entity. At one point stands personal holiness, including whatever is holy in man; at another, personal corruption, including what is evil in man. Man's relation to God, as it is affected by sin, is what constitutes guilt in the widest sense of the word. The human struggle after righteousness is the surest evidence of man's consciousness of racial and personal guilt, and an acknowledgment that his position in this respect is not normal.

We are thus enabled to see that when moral obliquity arising from or reinforced by natural causes, adventitious circumstances, or personal environment, issues in persistent, wilful wrong-doing, it becomes or is resolved into guilt, and involves punishment which is guilt's inseparable accompaniment. In the OT the ideas of sin, guilt, and punishment are so inextricably interwoven that it is impossible to treat of one without in some way dealing with the other two, and the word for each is used interchangeably for the others (see Schultz, OT Theol. ii. p. 306). An example of this is found in Cain's despairing complaint, where the word 'punishment' (Gn 4¹³ EV) includes both the sin committed and the guilt attaching thereto (cf. Lv 26⁴¹).

2. In speaking of the guilt of the race or of the individual, some knowledge of a law governing moral actions must be presupposed (cf. Jn 9¹¹ 15²² 34). It is when the human will enters into conscious antagonism to the Divine will that guilt emerges into objective existence and crystallizes (see Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, Eng. tr. p. 203 ff.). An educative process is thus required in order to bring home to the human race that sense of guilt without which progress is impossible (cf. Ro 3²⁰ 7⁷). As soon, however, as this consciousness is established, the first step on the road to rebellion against sin is taken, and the sinner's relation to God commences to become fundamentally altered from what it was. A case in point, illustrative of this inchoate stage, is afforded by Joseph's brothers in their tardy recognition of a guilt which seems to have been latent in a degree, so far as their consciousness was concerned, up to the period of threatened consequences (Gn 42²¹; cf. for a similar example of strange moral blindness, on the part of David, 2 S 12¹⁵). Their subsequent conduct was characterized by clumsy attempts to undo the mischief of which they had been the authors. A like feature is observable in the attitude of the Philistines when restoring the sacred 'ark of the covenant' to the offended Jehovah. A 'guilt-offering' had to be sent as a restitution for the wrong done (1 S 6³, cf. 2 K 12¹⁹). This natural instinct was developed and guided in the Levitical institutions by formal ceremony and religious rite, which were calculated to deepen still further the feeling of guilt and fear of Divine wrath. Even when the offence was committed in ignorance, as soon as its character was revealed to the offender, he became thereupon liable to punishment, and had to expiate his guilt by restitution and sacrifice, or by a 'guilt-offering' (AV 'trespass offering,' Lv 5¹⁵ 6¹⁴). To this a fine, amounting to one-fifth of the value of the wrong done in the case of a neighbour, was added and given to the injured party (6⁵, Nu 5⁶). How widely diffused this special rite had become is evidenced by the numerous incidental references of Ezekiel (40³⁹ 42¹³ 44³⁰ 46³⁰); while perhaps the most remarkable allusion to this service of restitution occurs in the later Isaiah, where the ideal Servant of Jehovah is described as a 'guilt-offering' (53¹⁰).

3. As might be expected, the universality of human guilt is nowhere more insistently dwelt on or more fully realized than in the Psalms (cf. Ps 14³ and 53³, where the expression 'the sons of men' reveals the scope of the poet's thought; see also Ps 36 with its antithesis—the universal long-suffering of God and the universal corruption of men). In whatever way we interpret certain passages (e.g. Ps 69²⁸ 109²⁸) in the so-called imprecatory Psalms, one thought at least clearly emerges, that wilful and persistent sin can never be separated from guiltiness in the sight of God, or from consequent punishment. They reveal in the writers a sense 'of moral earnestness, of righteous indignation of burning zeal for the cause of God' (see Kirkpatrick 'Psalms' in Cambr. Bible for Schools and Colleges, p. lxxv.). The same spirit is to be observed in Jeremiah's repeated prayers for vengeance on those who spent their time in devising means to destroy him and his work (cf. 11¹⁸, 18¹⁸, 20¹⁸, etc.). Indeed, the prophetic books of the OT testify generally to the force of this feeling amongst the most powerful religious thinkers of ancient times, and are a permanent witness to the validity of the educative functions which it fell to the lot of these moral teachers to discharge (cf. e.g. Hos 10²², Jl 1⁴, Am 4², Mic 3², Hag 2²¹, Zec 5², etc.).

4. The final act in this great formative process is historically connected with the life and work of Jesus Christ. The doctrine of the Atonement, however interpreted or systematized, involves belief in, and the realization of, the guilt of the entire human race. The symbolic Levitical rite in which 'the goat for Azazel' bore the guilt (EV 'iniquities,' Lv 16²²) and the punishment of the nation, shadows forth clearly and unmistakably the nature of the burden laid on Jesus, as the Son of Man. Involved, as a result of the Incarnation, in the limitations and fate of the human race, He in a profoundly real way entered into the conditions of its present life (see Is 53³, where the suffering Servant is said to bear the consequences of man's present position in regard to God; cf. 1 P 2⁴). Taking the nature of Adam's race, He became involved, so to speak, in a mystic but none the less real sense, in its guilt, while Gethsemane and Calvary are eternal witnesses to the tremendous load willingly borne by Jesus (Jn 10¹⁸) as the price of the world's guilt, at the hands of a just and holy but a loving and merciful God (Jn 3¹⁶, Ro 5⁸, Eph 2¹⁴, 1 Th 1¹⁰, Rev 15³; cf. Ex 34⁷).

'By submitting to the awful experience which forced from Him the cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" and by the Death which followed, He made our real relation to God His own, while retaining—and, in the very act of submitting to the penalty of sin, revealing in the highest form—the absolute perfection of His moral life and the steadfastness of His eternal union with the Father' (Dale, The Atonement, p. 425).

It is only in the life of Jesus that we are able to measure the guilt of the human race as it exists in the sight of God, and at the same time to learn somewhat, from the means by which He willed to bring it home to the consciousness of men, of the full meaning of its character as an awful but objective reality. Man's position in regard to God, looked on as the result of sin, is the extent and the measure of his guilt.

'Only He, who knew in Himself the measure of the holiness of God, could realize also, in the human nature which He had made His own, the full depth of the alienation of sin from God, the real character of the penal averting of God's face. Only He, who sounded the depths of human consciousness in regard to sin, could, in the power of His own inherent righteousness, condemn and crush sin in the flesh. The suffering involved in this is not, in Him, punishment or the terror of punishment; but it is the full realizing, in the personal consciousness, of the truth of sin, and the disciplinary pain of the conquest of sin; it is that full self-identification of human nature, within range of sin's challenge and sin's scourge, with holiness as the Divine condemnation of sin, which was at once the necessity—and the impossibility—of human penitence. The nearest—and yet how distant!—an approach to it in our experience we recognise, not in the wild sin-terrified cry of the guilty, but rather in those whose profound self-identification with the guilty overshadows them with a darkness and a shame, vital indeed to their being, yet at heart tranquil, because it is not confused with the blurring consciousness of a personal sin' (Moberly, Atonement and Personality, p. 130).

5. The clearest and most emphatic exposition of the fruits of the Incarnation, with respect to human guilt, is to be found in the partly systematized Christology of St. Paul, where life 'in the Spirit' is asserted to be the norm of Christian activity (Ro 8¹⁴). 'There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus' (8¹) is a reversal of the verdict of 'Guilty' against the race (cf. Col 3¹, 1 Th 2¹⁶), in so far as man accepts the conditions of the Christian life (cf. Gal 5¹⁷). Where the conditions are not fulfilled, he is not included in the new order, for 'if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' His guilt is aggravated by 'neglecting so great salvation' (He 2³; cf. Jn 15²²⁻²⁴, Mt 11²⁰), and the sentence pronounced against the disobedience of the enlightened is, humanly speaking at least, irreversible (He 6⁴, 10²⁹).

GUILT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

GULF.—The only instance of the use of this word in the Bible occurs in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16²⁶; cf. Nu 16³⁰ where the word 'pit' is the translation of Hades or Sheol). Some commentators have discovered in Jesus' employment of this term ('chasm'), as well as in His assertion of the possibility of conversation, an approval in general terms of a current Rabbinical belief that the souls of the righteous and of the wicked exist after death in different compartments of the same under world (see J. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. iii. p. 175). It is not possible, however, to construct a theory of Jesus' belief as to the intermediate state from evidence so scanty. Indeed, signs are not lacking that on this occasion He employs the language of metaphor in order, to guard against placing His imprimatur on useless and materialistic speculations. The expressions 'from afar' (v. 23) and 'a great gulf' (v. 26) do not harmonize with the idea of holding a conversation; and it seems plain that they form but subsidiary portions of a parable by which He means to teach a lesson of purely ethical import. There is, moreover, an evident implication in the context that the gulf is not confined to the world beyond the grave. Having reminded the Rich Man of the contrast between his condition and that of Lazarus in their earthly lives, and of its reversal in their respective conditions at present, Abraham is made to say, 'In all these things (see RVm) there has been and remains fixed a great chasm' (cf. Plummer 'St. Luke' in ICC, ad loc.). The chasm is not only between the conditions of the two men's lives; it has its foundation in their characters, modified, no doubt, and influenced by the circumstances in which each lived. The impassable nature of the chasm can be explained only on the ground that it is the great moral division separating two fundamentally different classes of men.

J. R. WILLIS.

GUNI.—1. The eponym of a Naphtalite family, Gn 46²⁴=1 Ch 7¹³ (cf. Nu 26⁴⁸ where the gentilic Gunites occurs). 2. A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5¹³). Probably we should also read 'the Gunité' for 'Jonathan' in 2 S 23²⁴; and for 'the Gizonite' in 1 Ch 11⁴.

GUR.—An 'ascent' by Ibleam and Beth-haggan (2 K 9²⁷). Possibly these two are the modern Yebla and Beit Jenn. But see IBLEAM.

GUR-BAAL ('dwelling of Baal').—An unknown locality named in 2 Ch 26⁷.

GUTTER.—See HOUSE, § 5.

H

HAASHASTARI.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4⁴⁹).

HABAI AH ('J' hath hidden').—The head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel, but, being unable to trace their genealogy, were not allowed to serve (Ezr 2⁶¹); called in Neh 7⁴⁸ Hobaiah, and in 1 Es 5³⁸ Obdia.

HABAKKUK.—The eighth of the Minor Prophets. Except for legends, e.g. in Bel and the Dragon (vv. 32-42), nothing is known of him outside the book that bears his name.

1. The Book of Habakkuk, read as it now stands, must be dated shortly after the appearance of the Chaldeans on the stage of world-history, seeing that their descent on the nations is imminent. It is probably later than the battle of Carchemish, where Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians in B.C. 605, and earlier than the first Judean captivity in 597. If dated about the year 600, it falls in the reign of Jehoiakim, in the period of reaction that followed the defeat and death of Josiah at Megiddo (608). That event, apparently falsifying the promises of the recently discovered law-book, had led to a general neglect of its ethical claims, and to a recrudescence of the religious abuses of the time of Manasseh (cf. 2 K 23²⁷, Jer 19⁴, 25 etc.). The one immovable article of faith held by the Judean nation seems to have been the inviolability of Jerusalem (cf. Jer 7¹⁻¹⁸ etc.). The book appears to be the work of a prophet living in Jerusalem. It may be divided into six sections, the first four containing two dialogues between Jahweh and the prophet, while the last two contain confident declarations springing from and expanding the Divine reply.

(1) 1¹⁻⁴. Habakkuk, compelled to live in the midst of violent wrong-doing, contempt of religion manifesting itself in the oppression of the righteous by the wicked, complains strongly of the silence and indifference of God.

(2) 1⁵⁻¹¹. He receives an answer that a new and startling display of the Divine justice is about to be made. The Chaldeans, swift, bitter, and terrible, are to sweep down and overwhelm the whole world. No fortress can resist their onslaught. The incredibility of this must lie, not in the fact that the Chaldeans are the aggressors, but rather that Jerusalem, spared so long, is now to share the fate of so many other cities.

(3) 1¹²⁻¹⁷. Some time may now be supposed to elapse before the next prophecy is spoken. During this period the prophet watches the progress of the Chaldeans, who have now (2¹⁷) penetrated into Palestine. His observation raises a new and insoluble problem. This reckless, insolent, cruel, insatiable conqueror is worse than those he has been appointed to chastise. How can a holy God, so ready to punish the 'wicked' in Israel, permit one who deserves far more the name of 'wicked' to rage unchecked? Are wrong and violence to possess the earth for ever?

(4) 2¹⁻⁴. The prophet, retiring to his watch-tower, whence he looks out over the world, to see it in ruins, receives an oracle which he is bidden to write down on tablets for all to read. He is told that the purpose of God is hastening to its fulfilment, and is encouraged to wait for it. Then follows the famous sentence, 'Behold, his soul is puffed up, it is not upright in him: but the just shall live in his faithfulness.' The meaning of this is plain. Tyranny is self-destructive, and carries within itself the seeds of doom. But while the evil-doer passes away, the just man, steadfast in the face of all contradiction, shall live, and last out the storm of judgment.

(5) 2^s-3^o. Content with this message, the prophet utters, triumphantly, a five-fold series of woes against the pride, the greed, the cruel building enterprises, the sensuality, the idolatry, of the heathen power.

(6) Ch. 3. Finally, in a magnificent lyric, which, as its heading and close prove, has been adapted for use in the Temple worship, the prophet sings the glorious redeeming acts of God in the past history of the people, and in the certainty of His immediate appearance, bringing hopeless ruin on the enemy, declares his unwavering trust.

So read, this short book is seen to be a human document of unique value. It marks the beginnings of Hebrew reflective thought as to the workings of Providence in history, afterwards so powerfully expressed in Job and in the later prophets.

2. Many modern scholars are unable to accept this explanation of these three chapters. It is argued that the use of the word 'wicked' in different senses in 1st and 1st is unnatural, and awkward. Further, it is urged that the descriptions of the conqueror in chs. 1 and 2 do not suit the Chaldeans well at any time, and are almost impossible at so early a stage of their history as the one named. Accordingly, some have treated 1st-11 as a fragment of an older prophecy, and place the bulk of chs. 1 and 2 towards the close of the Exile, near the end of the Chaldean period. Others place 1st-11 between 2^d and 2^d, considering that the whole section has been misplaced. The rest of the chapters are then referred to another oppressor, either Assyria or Egypt, whom the Chaldeans are raised up to punish; and ch. 3 is ascribed to another author. Others again would alter the word 'Chaldeans,' and treat it as an error for either 'Persians' or 'Chittim.' In the second case the reference is to the Greeks, and the destroyer is Alexander the Great. Without attempting to discuss these views, it may be said that none of them supplies any satisfactory explanation of 1st-4, in referring Habakkuk's complaint to wrongs committed by some heathen power. The mention of 'law' and 'judgment,' 1st, seems to point decisively to internal disorders among the prophet's own countrymen. The double use of the word 'wicked' may well be a powerful dramatic contrast. The speed with which the enemy moves, said by some to be altogether inapplicable to the Chaldeans, may be illustrated by the marvellously rapid ride of Nebuchadnezzar himself, from Pelusium to Babylon, to take the kingdom on the death of his father. Troops of Scythian cavalry, at the service of the highest bidder after the disbanding of their own army, were probably found with the Chaldeans. The question cannot be regarded as settled, a fuller knowledge of Chaldean history at the opening of the 7th cent. being much to be desired.

Most scholars regard ch. 3 as a separate composition. It is urged that this poem contains no allusions to the circumstances of Habakkuk's age, that the enemy in v. 14, rejoicing to devour the poor secretly, cannot be a great all-conquering army, that the disasters to flocks and herds (vv. 17-19) are quite different from anything in chs. 1 and 2. It is conjectured that the poem, under Habakkuk's name, had a place in a song-book, and was afterwards transferred, with the marks of its origin not effaced, to the close of this prophetic book. These considerations are of great weight, though it may be recalled that the poetical part of the Book of Job ends somewhat similarly, with a theophany little related to the bulk of the book. Whether the chapter belongs to Habakkuk or not, its picture of the intervention of God Himself, in His own all-powerful strength bringing to nought all the counsels of His enemies, is a fitting close to the book.

WILFRID J. MOULTON.

HABAZZINIAH.—The grandfather of Jaazaniah, one of the Rechabites who were put to the proof by the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 35⁹).

HABERGEON (Ex 28³² 39³² AV).—An obsolete term replaced in RV by the modern 'coat of mail.' Cf. Job 41³² AV, RV 'pointed shaft,' and see ARMOUR, 2 (c). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HABOR.—A river flowing through the district of Gozan, on the banks of which Israelites were settled when deported from Samaria (2 K 17⁴ 18¹¹, 1 Ch 5²⁶). It is a tributary of the Euphrates, the Chaboras of the Greeks, the modern Khābūr. L. W. KING.

HACALIAH.—The father of Nehemiah (Neh 1¹ 10¹).

HACHILAH (1 S 23¹⁹ 26¹ 3).—A hill in which David hid, and on which, during his pursuit, Saul pitched his camp, near the wilderness of Ziph. Ziph is mod. Tell ez-Zūf, to the S. of Hebron. Conder suggests that Hachilah may be the hill Dahr el-Kōla, but this is perhaps rather far to the east. W. EWING.

HACHMONI, HACHMONITE.—Both represent one and the same Heb. word, but in 1 Ch 27²² the latter is translated as a prop. name, 'Jehiel the son of Hachmoni,' whereas in 1 Ch 11¹¹ Jashobeam is called 'a Hachmonite.' We should probably render it in both cases as a gentile name. In 2 S 23³, which is parallel to 1 Ch 11¹¹, we have 'the Tahchemonite,' which is probably a textual error (see ADINO, JOSHEU-BASSHEBETH).

HADAD.—1. The name of a Semitic divinity (also written Adad, and Dadda for Adāda), the equivalent of Rimmon (wh. see) among the Aramæans of Damascus and apparently worshipped by all the Aramæan peoples, as well as among both South-Arabian and North-Arabian tribes, and also among the Assyrians. In Assyria and Babylonia, however, his cult, combined with that of Rammān, was apparently not native, but introduced from the Aramæans of the west. Hadad, like Rimmon (Rammān), was the god of the air and of thunder and lightning. The word seems to be derived from Arabic hadda, 'to smite, crush.' The name of this deity is not found alone in the Bible, but appears in several compounds, Benhadad, Bildad, and those which follow this article. It is possible, also, that Adramelech of 2 K 19¹⁷ and Is 37³⁸ should be read Adadmelech, 'Adad is king.'

2. The eighth son of Ishmael, 1 Ch 1³⁰, and also Gn 25¹⁵ according to RV and the best readings. 3. The fourth of the eight ancient kings of Edom, Gn 36³⁵; cf. 1 Ch 1⁴⁶. 4. The eighth of the kings of Edom in the same list as the last-named, 1 Ch 1⁵⁰ (in Gn 36³⁵ miswritten Hadar). 5. The son of a king of Edom in the 10th cent. B.C. (1 K 11⁴⁶). He escaped the massacre of Edomites perpetrated by Joab, David's general, and fled (according to the received reading) to Egypt, whose king befriended him, and gave him his sister-in-law as his wife. After the death of David he returned to Edom, and his efforts seem to have rescued Edom from the yoke of king Solomon. It is probable that in v. 17¹⁷ instead of Misraim (Egypt) Misri should be read in the Hebrew as the name of a region west of Edom, which in the old MSS was several times confounded with the word for Egypt. The reference to Pharaoh (v. 18¹⁸) would then have been a later addition. J. F. M'CURDY.

HADADEZER.—The name of a king of Zoban (wh. see) in the time of David, 2 S 8³⁴, 1 K 11³². In 1 Ch 18³⁴ the same king is called less correctly Hadar-ezer. He was at the head of the combination of the Aramæans of Northern Palestine against David, was repeatedly defeated, and finally made tributary. The word means 'Adad is (my) helper' (cf. Heb. Eliezer, Ebenezer, Azariah, etc.). It is found on the Black Obelisk of the Assyrian Shalmaneser II. under the more Aramaic form Adadiri, as the equivalent of Benhadad of Damascus, who led the great combination, including Ahab of Israel, against the Assyrians in B.C. 854.

J. F. M'CURDY.

HADADRIMMON.—A proper name occurring in Zec 12¹¹ 'as the mourning of Hadadrinmon in the valley of Megiddon.' It has usually been supposed to be a place-name. According to a notice by Jerome, it would be equivalent to Megiddo itself. The word, however, is a combination of the two names of a divinity (see HADAD). An equally good translation would be 'as the mourning for Hadadrinmon,' and it has been plausibly conjectured that it is the weeping for Tammuz referred to in Ezk 8¹⁴, that is here meant. In this case the old Semitic deity Hadad-Rimmon would by the 2nd cent. B.C. have become confounded with Tammuz. There is no ground for supposing an allusion to the mourning for king Josiah, which, of course, took place in Jerusalem, not in the valley of Megiddo.

J. F. M'CURDY.

HADAR (Gn 36³⁰).—See HADAD, 4.

HADAREZER.—See HADADEZER.

HADASHAH.—A town in the Shephelah of Judah (Jos 15³⁷); site unknown.

HADASSAH ('myrtle').—The Jewish name of Esther (Est 2⁷ only). See ESTHER.

HADES.—The Lat. term for the Heb. Sheol, the abode of departed spirits. It was conceived of as a great cavern or pit under the earth, in which the shades lived. Just what degree of activity the shades possessed seems to have been somewhat doubtful. According to the Greeks, they were engaged in the occupations in which they had been employed on earth. The Hebrews, however, seem rather to have thought of their condition as one of inactivity. (See SHEOL and GEHENNA.) RV has 'Hades' for AV 'hell' when the latter = 'realm of the dead.'

SHAILER MATHEWS.

HADID.—Named along with Lod and Ono (Ezr 2³³ = Neh 7⁷), peopled by Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh 11¹⁴), probably to be identified also with Adida of 1 Mac 12³³ 13¹⁴. It is the modern Hadithet in the low hills, about 3½ miles N.E. of Lydda.

HADLAI.—An Ephraimite (2 Ch 28¹³).

HADORAM.—1. The fifth son of Joktan (Gn 10²⁷, 1 Ch 1²¹). 2. The son of Tou, king of Hamath (1 Ch 18¹⁰). In the parallel passage, 2 S 8¹⁴, Hadoram wrongly appears as Joram. 3. 2 Ch 10¹⁸. The parallel passage, 1 K 12¹⁸, has preserved the more correct form Adoram.

HADRAOH.—A place in Syria mentioned in Zec 9¹ as being, at the time of the writing of that passage, confederate with Damascus. Hadrach is undoubtedly identical with Halarikka of the Assyrian inscriptions. It was the object of three expeditions by Assur-dan III., and Tiglath-pileser III. refers to it in the account of his war with 'Azariah the Judean.'

W. M. NESBIT.

HAFT.—'Haft,' still used locally for 'handle,' occurs in Jg 3²² 'the haft also went in after the blade.'

HAGAB (Ezr 2⁴⁶).—His descendants returned with Zerubbabel. The name is absent from the parallel list in Neh 7; it appears in 1 Es 5⁴⁰ as Accaba.

HAGABA (Neh 7⁴⁸).—The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel. See next article.

HAGABAH.—The slightly different form in which the last-mentioned name appears in Ezr 2⁴⁶; in 1 Es 5⁴⁰ Aggab.

HAGAR (prob. 'emigrant' or 'fugitive') was Sarah's Egyptian maid (Gn 16¹ 21⁹). Her story shows that Sarah renounced the hope of bearing children to Abraham, and gave him Hagar as concubine. Her exultation so irritated Sarah that the maid had to flee from the encampment, and took refuge in the wilderness of Shur (16⁷ 25¹⁰), between Philistia and Egypt. Thence she was sent back by 'the angel of the Lord'; and soon after her return she gave birth to Ishmael. After the weaning of Isaac, the sight of Ishmael aroused Sarah's jealousy and fear (21⁹); and Abraham was reluctantly persuaded to send away Hagar and her son. Again 'the angel of God' cheered her; and she found her way southwards to the wilderness of Paran (21²¹), where her son settled.

This story is compacted of traditions gathered from the three great documents. J yields the greater part of Gn 16¹⁻¹⁴ and E of 21⁹⁻²¹, while traces of P have been found in 16⁷. 15¹. The presence of the story in sources where such different interests are represented is in favour of its historicity; and instead of the assumption that Hagar is but the conjectural mother of the personified founder of a tribe, the more obvious explanation is that she was the actual ancestress of the people of Ishmael. Whatever anthropological interest attaches to the passages (see ISHMAEL), their presence may be defended on other grounds, the force of which a Hebrew would be more likely to feel. They serve to show the purity and pride of Jewish descent, other tribes in the neighbourhood being kindred to them, but only offshoots from the parent stock. The Divine guidance in Jewish history is emphasized by the double action of the angel in the unfolding of Hagar's career.

The story is an important part of the biography of Abraham, illustrating both the variety of trials by which his faith was perfected and the active concern of God in even the distracted conditions of a chosen household. Further interest attaches to the narrative as containing the earliest reference in Scripture to 'the angel of Jehovah' (Gn 16⁷), and as being the first of a series (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Naaman) in which the regard of God is represented as singling out for blessing persons outside Israel, and thus as preparing for the universal mission of Christ. There is but one other important allusion to Hagar in the OT. She is mentioned in Gn 25¹² in a sketch of the family of Ishmael (so in Bar 3² the Arabians are said to be her sons); and she has been assumed with much improbability to have been the ancestress of the Hagrites or Hagarenes of 1 Ch 5¹⁰ and Ps 83⁶ (see HAGRITES). In Gal 4²², Paul applies her story allegorically, with a view to show the superiority of the new covenant. He contrasts Hagar the bondswoman with Sarah, and Ishmael 'born after the flesh' with Isaac 'born through promise'; thence freedom and grace appear as the characteristic qualities of Christianity. There is good MS authority for the omission of 'Hagar' in v. 2, as in RVin; in which case the meaning is that Sinai is a mountain in Arabia, the land of bondmen and the country of Hagar's descendants. Even if the reading of the text stands, the meaning of the phrase will not be very different. 'This Hagar of the allegory is or represents Sinai, because Sinai is in Arabia, where Hagar and her descendants dwelt.'

HAGARENES.—See HAGRITES.

HAGGADAH.—See TAI MUD.

HAGGAI.—A prophet whose writings occupy the tenth place in the collection of the Minor Prophets.

1. The man and his work.—The sphere of his activity was the post-exilic community, his ministry (so far as may be gathered from his writings) being confined to a few months of the second year of Darius Hystaspes (B.C. 520). His name is perhaps a short form of Haggiah (1 Ch 6³⁰), as Mattenai (Ezr 10³⁰) is of Mattaniah (10³⁰), and may mean 'feast of J', though possibly it is merely an adjective signifying 'festal' (from hag; cf. Barzilai from barzel). According to late traditions, he was born in Babylon, and went up with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, where he died. In his prophetic work he was associated with Zechariah (Ezr 5¹ 6¹⁴); and the names of the two are prefixed to certain Psalms in one or more of the Versions (to Ps 137 in LXX alone, to Ps 111 (112) in Vulg. alone, to Ps 125, 126 in Pesh. alone, to Ps 146, 147, 148 in LXX and Pesh., to Ps 145 in LXX, Vulg., and Pesh.).

His prophecies were evoked by the delay that attended the reconstruction of the Temple. The Jews, on returning to Palestine in the first year of Cyrus (536), at once set up the altar of the Lord (Ezr 3^a), and in the following year laid the foundation of the Temple (3^{a-10}). The work, however, was almost immediately suspended through the opposition of the Samaritans (i.e. the semi-pagan colonists of what had once been the Northern Kingdom, 2 K 17^{a-41}), whose wish to co-operate had been refused (Ezr 4¹⁻⁵); and, this external obstruction being reinforced by indifference on the part of the Jews themselves (Hag 1^a), the site of the Temple remained a waste for a period of 15 years. But in the second year of Darius (B.C. 520), Haggai, aided by Zechariah (who was probably his junior), exhorted his countrymen to proceed with the rebuilding; and as the result of his exertions, in the sixth year of Darius (B.C. 516) the Temple was finished (Ezr 6¹⁵).

2. The book.—The prophecies of Haggai consist of four sections, delivered at three different times.

(1) Ch. 1, on the 1st day of the 6th month (Aug.-Sept.), is the prophet's explanation of the prevalent scarcity, which (like the famines mentioned in 2 S 21 and 1 K 17. 18) is accounted for by human sin, the people being more concerned to beautify their own dwellings than to restore the house of the Lord. The admonition, coupled with a promise of Divine assistance, had its effect, and the work of reconstruction was renewed.

(2) Ch. 2¹⁻⁹, on the 21st day of the 7th month (Sept.-Oct.), has in view the discouragement experienced when the old men who had seen the glory of the first Temple contrasted with it the meanness of the second: the prophet declares that within a short while the wealth of the nations will be gathered into the latter (cf. Is 60), and its splendour will eventually exceed that of its predecessor. Haggai's anticipations were perhaps connected with the disturbances among the Persian subject States in the beginning of Darius' reign. The downfall of the Persian rule, which they threatened, might be expected, like the previous overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus, to redound to the advantage of Israel.

(3) Ch. 2¹⁰⁻¹², on the 24th of the 9th month (Nov.-Dec.), is a further attempt to explain the reason of the continued distress, and to raise hopes of its removal. The people's sacrifices and exertions cannot (it is contended) at once counteract the effects of their previous neglect, for the ruinous state of the Temple is a more penetrating source of pollution than holy things and acts are of sanctification; but henceforth the Lord's blessing will attend them (cf. Zec 8⁹⁻¹²).

(4) Ch. 2²⁰⁻²³, on the same day as the preceding, is an address to Zerubbabel, who in the impending commotion will be preserved by the Lord as a precious signet-ring (cf. Ca 8⁶, and contrast Jer 22^a).

The Book of Haggai reflects the condition of its age, and offers a contrast to the earlier prophets in the absence of any denunciation of idolatry, the practice of which had been largely eradicated from the Jews of the Exile by their experiences. It resembles the prophecies of Zechariah and Malachi (both post-exilic) in laying more stress upon the external side of religion than do the pre-exilic writings. But, unlike the books of Zechariah and Malachi, it does not contain any rebuke of moral and social offences, but is devoted to the single purpose of promoting the rebuilding of the Temple, which was then essential to the maintenance of Israel's religious purity. The style of Haggai is plain and unadorned, and is rendered rather monotonous by the reiteration of certain phrases (especially 'saith the Lord of hosts').

G. W. WADE.

HAGGEDOLIM (RV and AVm: AV and RVm 'the great men').—Father of Zabdiel (Neh 11¹⁴).

HAGGI ('born on a festival').—Son of Gad, Gn 46¹⁵, Nu 26¹⁵ (P); patronymic, Haggites, Nu 26¹⁵.

HAGGIAH ('feast of J').—A Levite descended from Merari (1 Ch 6³⁰).

HAGGITES.—See HAGGI.

HAGGITH ('festal').—The mother of Adonijah (2 S 3⁴, 1 K 15^{21a}).

HAGIOGRAPHIA.—See CANON OF OT, § 8.

HAGRI.—Father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11³⁸). The parallel passage, 2 S 23³⁴, reads 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadite,' which is probably the correct text.

HAGRITE.—Jazir the Hagrite was 'over the flocks' of king David (1 Ch 27³¹). See next article.

HAGRITES, HAGARITES, HAGARENES.—A tribe of Arabian or Aramæan origin inhabiting territory to the east of Gilead. Twice they were the object of campaigns by the trans-Jordanic Israelite tribes, by whom they were crushingly defeated and expelled from their land (1 Ch 5^{6-10, 20}). Because the name appears only in very late passages, Bertheau and others have conjectured that it was a late appellation for Bedouin in general. It has been supposed to mean 'Descendants of Hagar—hence to be synonymous with 'Ishmaelites.' But this is unlikely, since the Hagrites are named along with other tribes which, according to this theory, they included. The Hagrites are mentioned among a group of Aramæan tribes in an inscription of Tiglath-pileser III.

HAHIROTH.—See PI-HAHIROTH.

HAIL.—See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

HAIR.—The usual word in OT is se'ar, in NT thrix. Black hair was greatly admired by the Hebrews (Ca 4⁵¹ 7^a). Women have always worn the hair long, baldness or short hair being to them a disgrace (Is 3³⁴, Ezk 16⁷, 1 Co 11¹⁵, Rev 9⁸). Absalom's hair was cut once a year (2 S 14²⁶; cf. rules for priests, Ezk 44²⁰), but men seem to have worn the hair longer than is seemly among us (Ca 5² 11). In NT times it was a shame for a man to have long hair (1 Co 11¹⁶). This probably never applied to the Arabs, who still wear the hair in long plaits. The locks of the Nazirite were, of course, an exception (Jg 16¹³ etc.). The Israelites were forbidden to cut the corners of their hair (Lv 19²⁷ 21⁵). In neighbouring nations the locks on the temples, in front of the ears, were allowed to grow in youth, and their removal was part of certain idolatrous rites connected with puberty and initiation to manhood. These peoples are referred to as those that 'have the corners polled' (Jer 9³⁶ RV). The practice was probably followed by Israel in early times, and the prohibition was required to distinguish them from idolaters. One curious result of the precept is seen among the orthodox Jews of to-day, who religiously preserve the love-locks which, in the far past, their ancestors religiously cut.

The Assyrians wore the hair long (Herod. i. 195). In Egypt the women wore long hair. The men shaved both head and beard (Gn 41¹⁴), but they wore imposing wigs and false beards, the shape of the latter indicating the rank and dignity of the wearer (Herod. ii. 36, iii. 12; Wilk. Anc. Egypt. ii. 324, etc.). Josephus says that young gallants among the horsemen of Solomon sprinkled gold dust on their long hair, 'so that their heads sparkled with the reflexion of the sunbeams from the gold' (Ant. viii. vii. 3). Jezebel dressed her hair (2 K 9³⁰). Judith arranged her hair and put on a head-dress (Jth 10⁵). St. Paul deprecates too much attention to 'braided hair' (1 Ti 2⁹, cf. 1 P 3³). Artificial curls are mentioned in Is 3²¹. The fillet of twisted silk or other material by which the hair was held in position stands for the hair itself in Jer 7²⁹. Combs are not mentioned in Scripture; but they were used in Egypt (Wilk. op. cit. ii. 349), and were doubtless well known in Palestine. The barber with his razor appears in Ezk 5¹ (cf. Chagiga 4b, Shab. § 6). Herod the Great dyed his hair black, to make himself look younger (Jos. Ant. xvi. viii. 1). We hear of false hair only once, and then it is used as a disguise (ib., Vii. 11). Light ornaments of metal were worn on the hair (Is 3¹⁸): in modern times coins of silver and gold are commonly worn; often a tiny bell is hung at the end of the tress. It is a grievous insult to cut or pluck the hair of head or cheek (2 S 10¹⁸, Is 7²⁰ 50⁶, Jer 48³⁷). Letting loose a woman's hair is a mark of abasement (Nu 5¹⁸ RV); or it may indicate self-humiliation (Lk 7³⁸). As a token of grief it was customary to cut the hair of both head and beard (Is 15², Jer 16⁶ 41⁵, Am 8¹⁰), to leave the beard untrimmed (2 S 19²⁴), and even to pluck out the hair (Ezr 9³). Tearing the hair is still a common Oriental expression of sorrow. Arab women cut off their hair in mourning.

The hair of the lifelong Nazirite might never be cut (Jg 13⁵, 1 S 11¹). The Nazirite for a specified time cut his hair only when the vow was performed. If, after the period of separation had begun, he contracted defilement, his head was shaved and the period began anew (Nu 6²⁹). An Arab who is under vow must neither cut, comb, nor cleanse his hair, until the vow is fulfilled and his offering made. Then cutting the hair marks his return from the consecrated to the common condition (Wellhausen, Skizzen, iii. 167). Offerings of hair were common among ancient peoples (W. R. Smith, RS² 324ff.; Wellhausen, op. cit. 118 f.). It was believed that some part of a man's life resided in the hair, and that possessors of hair from his head maintained a certain connexion with him, even after his death. Before freeing a prisoner, the Arabs cut a portion of his hair, and retained it, as evidence that he had been in their power (Wellh. op. cit. 118). Chalid b. al-Walid wore, in his military head-gear, hair from the head of Mohammed (ib. 146).

The colour of the hair was observed in the detection of leprosy (Lv 13¹⁰ etc.). Thorough disinfection involved removal of the hair (14⁸ 9). The shaving of the head of the slave-girl to be married by her captor marked the change in her condition and prospects (Dt 21¹²; W. R. Smith, Kinship², 209). Swearing by the hair (Mt 5³⁶) is now generally confined to the beard. The hoary head is held in honour (Pr 16³¹, Wis 2⁹ etc.), and white hair is associated with the appearance of Divine majesty (Dn 7⁹, Rev 1¹⁴).

W. EWING.

HAJEHUDIJAH occurs in RVm of 1 Ch 4¹⁸ in an obscure genealogical list. It is probably not a proper name, but means 'the Jewess' (so RV and AVm). AV reads Jehudijah.

HAKKATAN ('the smallest').—The head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 8¹²); called in 1 Es 5³⁸ Akatan.

HAKKOZ.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁸). 2. The eponym of a priestly family (1 Ch 24¹⁰, Ezr 2⁶¹ 7⁶³, Neh 3¹ 21); called in 1 Es 5³⁸ Akkos. They were unable to prove their pedigree.

HAKUPHA.—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁶¹, Neh 7⁶³); called in 1 Es 5³¹ Achippa.

HALAH.—One of the places to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria on the capture of Samaria (2 K 17¹⁸ 18¹⁴, 1 Ch 5²⁶). It was situated in the region of Gozan (wh. see), but it has not yet been satisfactorily identified.

L. W. KING.

HALAK, or the 'smooth mountain,' Jos 11¹⁷ 12⁷ (only).—This eminence has not been identified, but its approximate locality is indicated by the words 'that goeth up to Seir'; and it formed the southern limit of Joshua's conquests.

HALAKHAH.—See TALMUD.

HALHUL.—A city of Judah (Jos 15²⁸). It is the modern Halhul, a large village 4 miles north of Hebron.

HALI.—A city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Jos 19²⁸). The site is doubtful. It may be the ruin 'Alia on the hills N.E. of Achzib, about 13 miles N.E. of Acre.

HALICARNASSUS was one of the six Dorian colonies on the coast of Caria. Though excluded from the Dorian confederacy (Hexapolis) on account of some ancient dispute (Herod. i. 144), it was a very important city in respect of politics, commerce, literature, and art. It was one of the States to which the Roman Senate sent letters in favour of the Jews in B.C. 139 (1 Mac 15²³). It must therefore have been a free and self-governing city at that time. The decree of the city passed in the first cent. B.C., granting to the Jews religious liberty and the right to build their pros-euchai beside the sea (Jos. Ant. xiv. x. 23), attests the existence of an early Jewish colony in the city; and this was natural, as Halicarnassus was a considerable centre of trade owing to its favourable position on a bay opposite Cos, on the north-west side of the Ceramic Gulf. The city extended round the bay from promontory to promontory and contained, among other buildings, a famous temple of Aphrodite.

The site of Halicarnassus is now called Hodrum (i.e. 'fortress'), from the Castle of St. Peter which was built by the Knights of St. John (whose headquarters were in Rhodes), under their Grand Master de Naillac A.D. 1404.

HALL.—See PRÆTORIUM.

HALLEL.—The name given in Rabbinical writings to the Pss 113–118—called the 'Egyptian Hallel' in distinction from the 'Great Hallel' (Pss 120–136), and from Pss 146–148, which are also psalms of Hallel character. The Hallel proper (Pss 113–118) was always regarded as forming one whole. The word Hallel means 'Praise,' and the name was given on account of the oft-recurring word Hallelujah ('Praise ye the Lord') in these psalms. The 'Hallel' was sung at the great Jewish festivals—Passover, Tabernacles, Pentecost, and Chanukkah ('Dedication' of the Temple).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HALLELUJAH.—A Hebrew expression, used liturgically in Hebrew worship as a short doxology, meaning 'praise ye Jah.' With one exception (Ps 135³) it occurs only at the beginning or the end of psalms, or both: at the beginning only in Pss 111. 112; at the beginning and end in Pss 106. 113. 135. 146. 147. 148. 149, and 150; at the end only in Pss 104. 105. 115. 116. 117.

In the LXX, however, the Gr. (transliterated) form of the expression occurs only at the beginning of psalms as a heading and this would seem to be the more natural usage. The double occurrence in the Heb. text may in some cases be explained as due to accidental displacement (the heading of the following psalm being attached to the conclusion of the previous one).

As a liturgical heading the term served to mark off certain well-defined groups of psalms which were probably intended in the first instance for synagogue use, and may once have existed as an independent collection. With the exception of Ps 135, these groups (in the Heb. text) are three in number, viz. 104–106; 111–113. 115–117; and 146–150. But in the LXX a larger number of psalms is so distinguished, and the consequent grouping is more coherent, viz. 105–107; 111–119 (135–136); 146–150. In the synagogue liturgy the last-mentioned group (146–150), together with 135–136, has a well-defined place in the daily morning service, forming an integral part of the great 'Benediction of Song' (in certain parts of the early Church, also, it was customary to recite the 'Hallelujah' psalms daily).

The 'Hallel' (Pss 113–118), which forms a liturgical unit in the synagogue liturgy, is the most complete example of 'Hallelujah' psalms in collected form. (In the LXX, notice all the individual psalms of this group are headed 'Alleluia').

All the psalms referred to exhibit unmistakable marks of late composition, which would accord with their distinctively synagogal character. Like other Jewish liturgical terms (e.g. 'Amen'), 'Hallelujah' passed from the OT to the NT (cf. Rev 19¹), from the Jewish to the Christian Church (cf. esp. the early liturgies).

and so to modern hymnody. Through the Vulgate the form 'Alleluia' has come into use. The AV and RV, however, render 'Praise ye the Lord.'

G. H. BOX.

HALLOHESH.—An individual or a family mentioned in connexion with the repairing of the wall (Neh 3¹²) and the sealing of the covenant (10²⁴).

HALLOW.—To 'hallow' is either 'to make holy' or 'to regard as holy.' Both meanings are very old. Thus Wycliff translates Jn 17¹⁷ 'Halwe thou hem in treuthe,' and Dt 32⁴ 'Ye halwide not me amonge the sonnes of Yreel' (1388, 'Israel'). In the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6⁹, Lk 11²), the only places where 'hallow' occurs in the NT the meaning is 'regard as sacred.' All the Eng. versions have 'hallowed' in these verses except the Rhemish (Rom. Cath.), which has 'sanctified'; but in the modern editions of this version the change has been made to 'hallowed.'

HALT.—This Eng. word is used (1) literally, as a verb 'to be lame, to limp,' or as an adj. 'lame.' Cf. Tindale's tr. of Mt 11⁴ 'The blind se, the halt go, the lepers are censed.' Or (2) figuratively 'to stumble, fail,' as Jer 20¹⁰ 'All my familiars watched for my halting.' From this comes the meaning (3) 'to be undecided, waver,' 1 K 18²¹ 'How long halt [lit. 'limp,' as on unequal legs] ye between two opinions?' The Revisers have introduced (4) the mod. meaning 'to stop,' Is 10²² 'This very day shall he halt at Nob.'

HAM.—The original (?) use of the name as = Egypt appears in Ps 78⁵⁴ 105²³, 27 106²². It has been derived from an Egyptian word kem, 'black,' in allusion to the dark soil of Egypt as compared with the desert sands (but see HAM (LAND OF)). Hām came to be considered the eponymous ancestor of a number of other peoples, supposed to have been connected with Egypt (Gn 10⁶⁻²⁰). His 'sons' (v.) are the peoples most closely connected either geographically or politically. Great difficulty is caused by the fusion (in J) of two quite distinct traditions in Gn 9. 10. (i.) Noah and his family being the sole survivors of the Flood, the whole earth was populated by their descendants (9^{18f.}), and the three sons people the whole of the known world—the middle, the southern, and the northern portions respectively (ch. 10). (ii.) Canaan, and not Hām, appears to be Noah's son, for it is he who is cursed (9²⁰⁻²⁷). The purpose of the story is to explain the subjugation of the people represented under the name 'Canaan' to the people represented under the names 'Shem' and 'Japheth.' To combine the two traditions a redactor has added the words, 'and Hām is the father of Canaan' in v. 18, and 'Hām the father of' in v. 22. (i.) The peoples connected, geographically, with Hām include Egypt (Mizraim), and the country S. of it (Cush), the Libyans (Put), and 'Canaan' (see CANAANITES). The descendants of these four respectively are so described in most cases from their geographical position, but at least one nation, the Caphtorim, from its political connexion with Egypt (see Driver on 9¹⁴). (ii.) In the second tradition Shem, Japheth, and Canaan stand—not for large divisions of the world, but—for certain much smaller divisions within the limits of Palestine. 'Shem' evidently stands for the Hebrews, or for some portion of them (see 10²¹ in the other tradition), and 'Japheth' for some unknown portion of the population of Palestine who dwell 'in the tents of Shem' (9²⁷), i.e. in close conjunction with the Hebrews. 'Canaan' (in the other tradition, 10¹⁹) inhabited the coast lands on the W., and the Arabah on the S.E. But there is no evidence that the peoples in these districts were ever in complete subjection to the Hebrews such as is implied in 'a slave of slaves' (9²⁶). Some think that the three names represent three grades or castes [cf. the three grades in Babylonia, who hold distinct legal positions in the Code of Hammurabi—amelu ('gentleman'), mushkenu ('commoner,' or 'poor man'), and ardu ('slave')].

A. H. M'NEILE.

HAM.—According to Gn 14⁸, the district inhabited by the Zuzim (wh. see). The locality is unknown.

J. F. M'CURDY.

HAM, LAND OF.—A poetical designation of Egypt used in the Psalms in reference to the sojourn there of the Children of Israel (Ps 105²³, 27 106²²). So also 'the tabernacles (RV 'tents') of Ham' (Ps 78⁵⁴) stands for the dwellings of the Egyptians. The Egyptian etymologies that have been proposed for Hām are untenable, and the name must be connected with that of the son of Noah.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

HAMAN (Ad. Est 12⁶ 16¹⁰, 17 Aman), the son of Hammedatha, appears in the Bk. of Est. as the enemy of the Jews, and the chief minister of Ahasuerus. On his plot against the Jews and its frustration by Esther see art. ESTHER.

In later times, at the Feast of Purim, it seems to have been customary to hang an effigy of Haman; but as the gibbet was sometimes made in the form of a cross, riots between Jews and Christians were the result, and a warning against insults to the Christian faith was issued by the emperor Theodosius II. (Cod. Theod. xvi. viii. 18; cf. 21).

HAMATH.—A city on the Orontes, the capital of the kingdom of Hamath, to the territory of which the border of Israel extended in the reign of Solomon (1 K 8⁶⁵), who is related to have built store-cities there (2 Ch 8⁴). Jeroboam II., the son of Joash, restored the kingdom to this northern limit (2 K 14²⁵, 28), and it was regarded as the legitimate border of the land of Israel (Nu 34⁸, Jos 13³), and was employed as a geographical term (Nu 13²¹, cf. Jg 3³). The Hamathite is mentioned last of the sons of Canaan in the table of nations (Gn 10¹⁸, 1 Ch 1¹⁴). During the time of David, Toi was king of Hamath (2 S 8⁹); the greatness of the city is referred to by the prophet Amos (Am 6²), and it is classed by Zechariah with Damascus, Tyre and Zidon (Zec 9¹⁴). The city was conquered by Tiglath-pileser III. and Sargon, and part of its inhabitants were deported and the land was largely colonized by Assyrians; its capture and subjugation are referred to in the prophetic literature (Is 10⁹, Jer 49²²; cf. also 2 K 18³⁴, Is 36¹⁹, 2 K 19³⁵). Hamath is mentioned as one of the places to which Israelites were exiled (Is 11¹⁴), and it was also one of the places whose inhabitants were deported to colonize Israelite territory on the capture of Samaria (2 K 17²⁴, 30). See ASHIMA.

L. W. KING.

HAMATH-ZOBAB (or 'Hamath of Zobah'). A city in the neighbourhood of Tadmor, conquered by Solomon (2 Ch 8⁴). Some have conjectured that it is identical with Hamath (wh. see), and that Zobab is used here in a broader sense than usual. On the other hand, it may be another Hamath situated in the territory of Zobah proper.

W. M. NESBIT.

HAMMATH ('hot spring').—1. 'Father of the house of Rechab' (1 Ch 2⁵⁶). 2. One of the 'fenced' cities of Naphtali (Jos 19³⁵), probably the same as Hammon of 1 Ch 6⁷⁶ and Hammoth-dor of Jos 21³². It is doubtless the Hamata of the Talmud, the Emmaus or Ammathus of Jos. (Ant. xviii. ii. 3), and the modern Hammām, 35 minutes' walk S. of Tiberias, famous for its hot baths.

HAMMEAH, THE TOWER OF (Neh 3¹² 39).—A tower on the walls of Jerus., near the tower of Hananel (wh. see), between the Sheep-gate on the east and the Fish-gate on the west. These two towers were probably situated near the N.E. corner of the city (cf. Jer 31³⁸, Zec 14¹⁰). The origin of the name 'tower of Hammeah,' or 'tower of the hundred' (RVm), is obscure. It has been suggested that the tower was 100 cubits high, or that it was approached by 100 steps, or that it required a garrison of 100 men.

HAMMEDATHA (Est 3¹, 10 8⁵ 9¹⁰, 16; in Ad. Est 12⁶ 16¹⁰, 17 Amadathus).—The father of Haman. The name is probably Persian; possibly the etymology is madh = 'moon'—data = 'given.'

HAMMELECH occurs as a proper name in AV and RVm of Jer 36²⁸ 38⁴, but there is little doubt that the rendering ought to be 'the king,' as in RV and AVm.

HAMMER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, §§ 1. 2. 3.

HAMMIPHKAD (AV Miphkad), Neh 3¹.—See JERUSALEM, II. 4, and MIPHKAD.

HAMMOLECHETH ('the queen?').—The daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Ch 7¹⁷).

HAMMON ('hot spring').—1. A town in Naphtali (1 Ch 6⁷⁵), prob. identical with Hammath (wh. see). 2. A town in Asher (Jos 19²³). Its site is uncertain.

HAMMOTH-DOR.—A Levitical city in Naphtali (Jos 21¹²), probably identical with Hammath (wh. see).

HAMMUEL.—A Simeonite of the family of Shaul (1 Ch 4²⁵).

HAMMURABI.—See ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, II. 1 (b).

HAMONAH ('multitude').—The name of a city to be built in commemoration of the defeat (?) of Gog (Ezk 39¹⁶).

HAMON-GOG ('Gog's multitude').—The name to be given to the valley (outside the Holy Land) where Gog and all his multitude are to be buried (Ezk 39¹¹, 12).

HAMOR ('he-ass').—Some think that the name points to a totem clan, such as there is reason to believe existed among the early Canaanite, and other Semitic, peoples. He is 'the father of Shechem' (Gn 33¹⁹ 34, Jos 24²², Jg 9²³); but in the first and last two of these passages, the inhabitants of Shechem are called 'the sons of Hamor' and 'the men of Hamor.' It would seem, therefore, that Hamor is not to be considered an historical individual, but the eponymous ancestor of the Hamorites [cf. 'the sons of Heth'—the Hittites, Gn 23³, who were a branch of the Hivites (34²); and 'the father of Shechem' means the founder of the place Shechem (cf. 1 Ch 2^{60f}).

Gn 34 contains a composite narrative. According to P (vv. 1. 2a. 4. 8. 9-10. 11-12. 20-24. 25 (partly) 27-29), Hamor negotiates with Jacob and his sons for the marriage of Shechem and Dinah, with the object of amalgamating the two peoples; circumcision is imposed by the sons of Jacob upon the whole Hamorite tribe, and then they attack the city, slaying all the males and carrying off the whole of the spoil. In the remaining verses of the chapter, the earlier narrative (J) pictures a much smaller personal affair, in which Shechem loves, and is ready to marry, Dinah; he only is circumcised, and he and Hamor alone are slain by Simeon and Levi—an incident to which Gn 49⁶⁻⁷ appears to refer. It is probable that not only Hamor, but also Dinah, Simeon, and Levi, stand for tribes or communities. See, further, under these names.

There is a curious fusion of traditions in Ac 7¹⁶, where Jacob 'and our fathers' are said to have been 'laid in the tomb which Abraham bought for a money price from the sons of Emmor in Sychem.' Abraham bought a tomb in Machpelah, not in Shechem (Gn 23^{17f}), and Jacob was buried in it (50¹²). Of the latter's sons, Joseph alone is related in the OT to have been buried in the tomb bought from the sons of Hamor (Jos 24²⁸).

A. H. McNEILE.

HAMRAN (1 Ch 14¹).—An Edomite. In Gn 36²⁸ the name is more correctly given as Hemdan.

HAMUL ('spared').—A son of Perez and grandson of Judah (Gn 46¹²—1 Ch 2⁴, Nu 26¹). The gentile Hemulites occurs in Nu 26¹¹.

HAMUTAL (2 K 23³¹ and 24¹⁸, Jer 52¹).—Mother of the kings Jehoshaz and Zedekiah, sons of Josiah.

HANAN.—1. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in reading and explaining the Law to the people (Neh 8⁷; in 1 Es 9¹⁸ Ananias); probably the same as the signatory to the covenant (10¹⁰). 2. The son of Zaccur the son of Mattaniah, one of the four treasurers appointed by Neh. over the storehouses in which the tithes were kept (Neh 13¹⁹). 3. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8²³). 4. The youngest son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁸—9⁴¹). 5. One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11⁴⁸). 6. The son of Igdaliah. His sons had a chamber in the Temple (Jer 35⁵). 7. The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7⁴⁹); called Anan in 1 Es 5⁴⁰. 8. 9. Two of 'the chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²², 23).

HANANEL ('El is gracious').—The name of a tower on the wall of Jerusalem. It is four times mentioned in OT; in Neh 3¹ in connexion with the repairing, and in 12³⁹ in connexion with the dedication, of the walls; in Jer 31³⁸ and Zec 14¹⁰ as a boundary of the restored and fortified Jerusalem. In both the passages in Neh. it is coupled with the tower of Hammeah (wh. see), and some have supposed it to be identical with the latter.

HANANI.—1. A brother, or more prob. near kinsman of Neh., who brought tidings to Susa of the distressed condition of the Jews in Pal. (Neh 1²). Under Neh. he was made one of the governors of Jerus. (7²). 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25⁴). 3. The father of Jehu the seer (1 K 16¹). Hanani reproved Asa for entering into alliance with Syria, and the angry king cast him into prison (2 Ch 16⁷). 4. A priest of the sons of Immer who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁰); called Ananias in 1 Es 9²¹. 5. A chief musician mentioned in connexion with the dedication of the walls of Jerus. (Neh 12³⁶).

HANANIAH ('Jahweh has been gracious').—1. One of the sons of Shashak, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8²⁴, 25). 2. One of the sons of Heman, who could prophesy with harps, with psalteries, and with cymbals' (1 Ch 25⁴), though their special function seems to have been the use of the horn (vv. 1. 4. 5). 3. One of king Uzziah's captains (2 Ch 26¹¹). 4. The 'lying prophet,' son of Azzur the prophet, a Gibeonite, who was condemned by Jeremiah, in the reign of Zedekiah, for prophesying falsely. The prophecy of Hananiah was to the effect that king Jeconiah and the captives in Babylon would all return in two years' time, bringing back with them the vessels of the Lord's house which Nebuchadnezzar had carried away (cf. Dn 1¹ 2). He expressed this in symbolic fashion by taking the 'bar' (cf. Jer 27²) from Jeremiah's neck and breaking it, with the words, 'Thus saith the Lord: Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon within two full years from off the neck of all the nations' (Jer 28¹¹). In reply Jeremiah declares this prophecy to be false, and that because Hananiah has made the people to trust in a lie, he will die within the year. The words of Jeremiah come to pass: Hananiah dies in the seventh month (v. 17). 5. Father of Zedekiah, one of the princes of Judah (Jer 36¹²). 6. Grandfather of Irijah, who assisted Jeremiah (37¹³). 7. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3¹⁹). 8. A priest, head of the house of Jeremiah, who returned with Nehemiah from Babylon (Neh 12¹⁹). 9. Governor of 'the castle,' who, together with Hanani, was appointed by Nehemiah to the 'charge over Jerusalem' (Neh 7²). 10. The friend of Daniel, who received the name Shadrach from the 'prince of the eunuchs' (Dn 1⁷, 11). Several others also bear this name, but they are not of importance (see Ezr 10²⁸, Neh 3², 10²⁸ 12⁴; these are not necessarily all different people).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HAND is EV tr. of Heb. yad, 'the open hand,' kaph, 'the closed hand,' and Gr. cheir, 'hand.' Sometimes it is idiomatic, e.g. 'at hand' (Is 13⁸ etc., Heb. qārōb).

Mt 26¹⁸ etc., Gr. engys, lit. 'near'). In determining the directions in the Orient, the face is turned to the east, not to the north as with us. So it comes that yāmīn, 'right hand,' and semōl, 'left hand,' like the Arab, yāmīn and shimāl, denote respectively 'south' and 'north.'

In prayer the hands were stretched up (Ex 17¹¹, 1 K 8²², Ps 28² etc.). To lift the hand to God signified a vow (Gn 14²²). To put the hand under the thigh of one to whom a vow was made, constituted a binding form of oath (Gn 24¹ 47²⁹). Blessing was conveyed by laying hands upon the head (Gn 48¹⁴). Out of this probably grew the practice in ordination—see LAYING ON OF HANDS. To 'fill the hand' (Ex 28⁴ etc.) was to set apart to the priesthood. Sin was supposed to be conveyed to the head of the victim for sacrifice (Ex 29¹⁰ etc.), especially to that of the scapegoat (Lv 16²¹ etc.), by laying on of the priests' hands. Washing the hands was a declaration of innocence (Dt 21⁶, Ps 26⁶, Mt 27²⁴ etc.). Clean hands were a symbol of a righteous life (Job 22²⁹, Ps 18²⁰ 24⁴ etc.). To smite the hands together was a sign of anger (Nu 24¹⁰). To pour water on another's hands was to be his servant (2 K 3²¹). To join hand in hand was to conspire together (Pr 11²¹ etc.). To strike hands sealed a compact (Pr 6⁴ etc.). Folded hands betoken slumber (Pr 24²³). Left-handedness seems to have been common among the Benjamites (Jg 20¹⁶), and once it was of signal service (Jg 3¹⁵ 2¹).

'The hand of the Lord,' and 'a mighty hand' (Dt 2¹⁵ 4³⁴ etc.), stand for the resistless power of God. 'The hand of the Lord upon' the prophet signifies the Divine inspiration (Ezk 8¹ 37¹ etc.). 'The good hand of the Lord' (Ezr 7⁶ etc.), 'my hand' and 'my Father's hand' (Jn 10²⁶ 29), denote the providential, preserving care of God.

It appears that certain marks or cuttings in the hand were evidence of what deity one served (Is 44⁵ RVm, cf. Gal 6¹⁷). The mark of the beast 'upon their hand' (Rev 20⁴) is probably an allusion to this custom. See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, and MARKS.

In court the accuser stands on the right hand (Ps 109⁶, Zec 3³). The left hand bears the shield, leaving the right side exposed in battle. The protector, therefore, stands on the right hand (Ps 109¹ etc.). Perhaps on this account honour attaches to the right hand, the place given to the most favoured guest. The seat of the Redeemer's glory is at the right hand of God (Ps 110¹, Lk 22²⁹, Ro 8³⁴ etc.).

Thrice (1 S 15², 2 S 18¹, Is 56⁶) yād clearly means 'monument' or 'memorial,' probably a stone block or pillar; a hand may have been carved upon it, but this is uncertain.

W. EWING.

HANDBREADTH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HANDKERCHIEFS, only Ac 19¹², soudaria, a loan-word from the Latin, elsewhere rendered 'napkin,' for which see DRESS, § 5 (a).

HANDSTAVES.—Only Ezk 39⁶, either clubs or the equally primitive throw-sticks; see ARMOUR ARMS, § 1.

HANES is associated with Zoan in a difficult context, Is 30⁴. Some would place it in Lower Egypt, with Anysis in Herodotus, and Khininshi in the annals of Ashurbanipal; but there can be little doubt that it is the Egyptian Hnēs (Heraopolis Magna) on the west side of the Nile, just south of the Fayyum. Hnēs was apparently the home of the family from which the 22nd Dyn. arose, and the scanty documents of succeeding dynasties show it to have been of great importance: in the 25th and 26th Dyns. (c. B.C. 715-600) the standard silver of Egypt was specifically that of the treasury of Harshafe, the ram-headed god of Hnēs, and during the long reign of Psammetichus I. (c. 660-610) Hnēs was the centre of government for the whole of Upper Egypt. The LXX does not recognize the name of the city, and shows a wide divergence of reading: 'for there are in Tanis princes, kicked messengers.' F. LL. GRIFFITH.

HANGING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10; GALLOWS.

HANGING, HANGINGS.—1. The former is AV's term for the portière closing the entrance to the court of the Tent of Meeting (Ex 35¹⁷ etc.), for the similar curtain at the entrance to the Tent itself (26³¹, etc.), and once for the 'veil' or hanging separating the Holy of Holies from the rest of the Tabernacle. In the last passage, Nu 3⁴, we should probably read, as in 4⁵, 'the veil of the screen,' 'screen' being RV's substitute for 'hanging' throughout.

RV, however, retains 'hangings' as the tr. of a different original denoting the curtains 'of fine twined linen' which surrounded the court (Ex 27⁶ etc.). See, for these various 'hangings,' the relative sections of the art, TABERNACLE.

2. In a corrupt passage, 2 K 23⁷, we read of 'hangings for the grove,' or rather, as RV, of 'hangings for the Asherah' (cf. RVm), woven by the women of Jerusalem. The true text is probably Lucian's, which has 'tunics,' the reference being to robes for an image of the goddess Asherah (wh. see). In the religious literature of Babylonia there is frequent reference to gifts of sheepskins, wool, etc., as clothing 'for the god' (ana lubushti ili).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HANNAH ('grace').—The wife of Elkanah, and mother of Samuel. She came year by year to the sanctuary at Shiloh praying that she might become a mother; on one occasion she made a vow that if God would hear her prayer and grant her a 'man child,' she would dedicate him 'to the Lord all the days of his life.' Eli, the high priest, mistakes the silent movement of her lips as she prays, and accuses her of drunkenness; but when he finds out the mistake he has made, he gives her his blessing, and prays that her petition may be granted. Hannah returns home in peace, and in faith. In due time she gives birth to Samuel; when she has weaned him she brings him to Shiloh and dedicates him to God. It is on this occasion that the 'song' contained in 1 S 2¹⁻¹⁰ is put into her mouth. Afterwards she comes to visit him once a year, bringing him each time a 'little robe.' Hannah bore her husband three sons and two daughters after the birth of Samuel (see ELKANAH, SAMUEL).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HANNATHON.—A place on the N. border of Zebulun. Jos 19⁴. The site is uncertain.

HANNIEL ('grace of God').—1. Son of Ephod, and Manasseh's representative for dividing the land (Nu 34²³). 2. A hero of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7²⁹).

HANOCH.—1. A grandson of Abraham by Keturah, and third of the sons of Midian (Gn 25⁴). 2. The eldest son of Reuben, and head of the family of the Hanochites (Gn 46⁹, Ex 6¹⁴, Nu 26⁵, 1 Ch 5³).

HANUN ('favoured').—1. The son of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. Upon the death of the latter, David sent a message of condolence to Hanun, who, however, resented this action, and grossly insulted the messengers. The consequence was a war, which proved most disastrous to the Ammonites (2 S 10¹⁶, 1 Ch 19¹⁶). 2. The name occurs twice in the list of those who repaired the wall and the gates of Jerusalem (Neh 3¹⁵ 20).

HAP, HAPLY.—The old word 'hap,' which means chance, is found in Ru 2³ 'Lest hap was to light on a part of the field belonging to Boaz.' The Heb. is literally 'her chance chanced' (AVm, 'he hap happened'). 'Haply' is 'by hap.' 'Happily' is the same word under a different spelling, and had formerly the same meaning, though it now means 'by good luck.' In AV the spelling is now always 'haply,' but in the first edition it was 'happily' in 2 Co 9⁸ 'Lest happily if they of Macedonia come with mee, and find you unprepared, wee (that wee say not, you) should bee ashamed in this same confident boasting.'

HAPHARAIM.—A town in Issachar (Jos 19¹⁹). The Onomasticon places it 6 Roman miles N. of Legio. It is probably Khīrbet el-Farīyah, an ancient site with noteworthy tombs, to the N.W. of el-Lejjūn.

W. EWING.

HAPPIZZEZ.—The head of the 18th course of priests (1 Ch 24¹⁶).

HARA.—Mentioned in 1 Ch 5²⁶ as one of the places to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria on the capture of Samaria. But in the corresponding accounts (2 K 17¹⁸ 18¹¹) Hara is not mentioned, and most probably the name 'Hara' in 1 Ch 5²⁶ is due to a corruption of the text. There is much to be said for the suggestion that the original text read hārē Mādai, 'mountains of Media,' corresponding to the cities of Media of the parallel passages (LXX 'the Median mountains'); and that Mādai dropped out of the text, and hārē, 'mountains of,' was changed to the proper name Hara.

L. W. KING.

HARADAH.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites mentioned only in Nu 33²⁴. It has not been identified.

HARAN.—1. Son of Terah, younger brother of Abram, and father of Lot, Gn 11²⁶ (P), also father of Milcah and Iscah, v. 29 (J). 2. A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 23⁹).

HARAN.—A city in the N.W. of Mesopotamia, marked by the modern village of *Harra*n, situated on the Bēlikh, a tributary of the Euphrates, and about nine hours' ride S.E. of Edessa (Urfa). Terah and his son Abram and his family dwelt there on their way from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan (Gn 11³¹ 12⁵; cf. Ac 7²), and Terah died there (Gn 11³²; cf. Ac 7⁴). Nahor, Abram's brother, settled there; hence it is called 'the city of Nahor' in the story of Isaac and Jacob (cf. Gn 24¹⁰ 27⁴⁶). Its position on one of the main trade-routes between Babylonia and the Mediterranean coast rendered it commercially of great importance (cf. Ezk 27²²). It was the chief seat of the worship of Sin, the moon-god, and the frequent references to the city in the Assyrian inscriptions have to do mainly with the worship of this deity and the restoration of his temple. It is probable that Haran rebelled along with the city of Ashur in B.C. 763, and a reference to its subsequent capture and the suppression of the revolt may be seen in 2 K 19¹²; Sargon later on restored the ancient religious privileges of which the city had been then deprived. The worship of the moon-god at Haran appears to have long survived the introduction of Christianity.

L. W. KING.

HARARITE.—An epithet of doubtful meaning (possibly 'mountain-dweller,' but more probably 'native of [an unknown] Harar') applied to two of David's heroes. 1. Shammah the son of Agee (2 S 23³¹, 32, 1 Ch 11³⁴ where Shagee should probably be Shammah). 2. Ahiam the son of Sharar (2 S 23³³ [RV Ararite], 1 Ch 11³⁵).

HARBONA (Est 1¹⁰) or HARBONAH (7⁹).—The third of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of king Ahasuerus. It was on his suggestion that Haman was hanged upon the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai.

HARD.—Besides other meanings which are still in use, 'hard' sometimes means close: Jg 9⁵² 'And Abimelech . . . went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire'; Ps 63⁸ 'My soul followeth hard after thee'; Ac 18⁷ 'Justus . . . whose house joined hard to the synagogue.' Cf. Job 17¹ In Coverdale, 'I am harde at deatnes dore.'

Hardness is used in Jth 16¹⁰ for courage: 'the Medes were daunted at her hardness' (RV 'boldness').

Hardly means either 'harshly,' as Gn 16⁸ 'Sarai dealt hardly with her,' or 'with difficulty,' as Ex 13⁴ 'Pharaoh would hardly let us go'; Mt 19²⁴ 'a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven'; Lk 9⁶² 'bruising him, hardly departeth from him'; Ac 27⁴ 'And, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens.' So Adams (II Peter 1⁴) 'He that hath done evil once, shall more hardly resist it at the next assault.'

Hardness for modern 'hardship' occurs in 2 Ti 2³ 'endure hardness as a good soldier.' Cf. Shakespeare, Cymb. iii. vi. 21—

'Hardness ever

Of hardness is mother.'

HARDENING.—Both in the OT (1 S 6⁸) and in the NT (Ro 9¹⁷) Pharaoh's hardening is regarded as typical. In Exodus, two explanations are given of his stubbornness: (1) 'Pharaoh hardened his heart' (8¹⁵, 32); (2) 'the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh' (9¹²). The former statement recognizes man's moral responsibility, and is in accord with the exhortation, 'Harden not your hearts' (Ps 95⁸, He 3⁸). To the latter statement St. Paul confines his thought when he insists on the sovereignty of God as manifested in the election of grace (Ro 9¹⁸); but having vindicated the absolute freedom of the Divine action, the Apostle proceeds to show that the Divine choice is neither arbitrary nor unjust. The difficulty involved in combining the two statements is philosophical rather than theological. The attempt to understand the relation between the human will and the Divine seems to lead of necessity to an antinomy which thought has not as yet succeeded in transcending' (Denney, EGT ii. 663). The same Divine action softens the heart of him who repents and finds mercy, but hardens the heart of him who obstinately refuses to give heed to the Divine call. 'The sweet persuasion of His voice respects thy sanctity of will.' The RV rightly renders Mk 3⁵ 'being grieved at the hardening of their heart'; grief is the permanent attitude of the Saviour towards all in whom there is any sign of this 'process of moral ossification which renders men insensible to spiritual truth' (Swete, Com. in loc.).

J. G. TASKER.

HARE (Lv 11⁵, Dt 14⁷).—Four species of hare are known in Palestine, of which the commonest is the Lepus syriacus. The hare does not really 'chew the cud,' though, like the coney, it appears to do so; it was, however, unclean because it did not 'divide the hoof.' Hares are to-day eaten by the Arabs.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HAREPH.—A Judahite chief (1 Ch 26¹).

HARHAIAH.—Father of Uziah, a goldsmith who repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3⁸).

HARHAS.—Ancestor of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 K 22¹⁴); called Hasrah in 2 Ch 34¹².

HARHUR.—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7⁴⁴); called in 1 Es 5⁴ Asur.

HARIM.—1. A lay family which appears in the list of the returning exiles (Ezr 2³²—Neh 7³²); of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10⁴¹); and of those who signed the covenant (Neh 10²⁷). 2. A priestly family in the same lists (Ezr 2³⁹—Neh 7⁴²—1 Es 5⁵ Harim; Ezr 10²¹, Neh 10⁶). The name is found also among 'the priests and Levites that went up with Zerubbabel' (Neh 12⁴, where it is miswritten Rehum), among the heads of priestly families in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12¹⁵); and as the third of the 24 courses (1 Ch 24⁴). To which family Malchijah the son of Harim, one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3¹), belonged cannot be determined.

HARIPH.—A family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7⁴⁴) and signed the covenant (Neh 10¹⁹)—Ezr 2¹⁸ Jorah, 1 Es 5¹⁸ Arasphurith; one of David's companions in 1 Ch 12¹⁸ is termed a Haruphite (Kethibh), or Hariphite (Qerē). The latter reading, if correct, perhaps points to a connexion with Hariph.

HARLOT (Heb. zōnāh, 'ishshāh nokriyyāh [lit. 'strange woman'], qedeshāh, Gr. pornē) in EV denotes unchaste women, especially those devoted to immoral service in idol sanctuaries, or given to a dissolute life for gain. We find evidence of their existence in very early times (Gn 38). From the name 'strange woman' in Pr 6²⁴ 23²⁷ etc. (cf. 1 K 11⁴, Ezr 10² etc.), we may perhaps infer that in later times they were chiefly foreigners. By songs (Is 23¹⁴) and insinuating arts (Pr 6²⁴ etc.) they captivated the unwary. They acted also as decoys to the dens of robbery and murder (Pr 7²², 27 etc.). Wealth was lavished upon them (Ezk 16³³, 39 23²⁸ etc.; cf. Lk 15³⁰). Apart from breaches of the marriage vows, immoral relations between the sexes were deemed venial (Dt 22²⁸). A man might not compel his daughter to sin (Lv 19²⁹), but apparently she was free herself to take that way. Children of harlots were practical outlaws (Dt 23², Jg 11¹², Jn 8⁴¹), and in NT times the harlot lived under social ban ('It 21²² etc.).

The picture takes a darker hue when we remember that in ancient Syria the reproductive forces of nature were deified, and worshipped in grossly immoral rites. Both men and women prostituted themselves in the service of the gods. The Canaanite sanctuaries were practically gigantic brothels, legalized by the sanctions of religion. The appeal made to the baser passions of the Israelites was all too successful (Am 2⁷, Hos 4¹³ etc.), and it is grimly significant that the prophets designate apostasy and declension by 'whoredom.' There were therefore special reasons for the exceptional law regarding the priest's daughter (Lv 21⁹). Religious prostitution was prohibited in Israel (Dt 23¹⁷), and all gain from the unholy calling as Temple revenue was spurned (see Driver, Deut., in loc.). The pure religion of J^h was delivered from this peril only by the stern discipline of the Exile. A similar danger beset the early Church, e.g. in Greece and Asia Minor: hence such passages as Ro 12¹⁶, 1 Co 6¹², Gal 5¹⁹ etc., and the decree of the Apostolic Council (Ac 15²⁰, 29). W. EWING.

HAR-MAGEDON.—The name of the place in which, according to Rev 16¹⁶ (AV Armageddon), the kings of the lower world are to be gathered together by the Dragon, the Beast, and the false prophet, to make war upon God. The most generally accepted location makes this to be the mountains of Megiddo, that is to say, those surrounding the plain of Megiddo, in which so many great battles of the past were fought. The difficulty with this explanation is that one would expect the plain rather than the mountains to be chosen as a battle-field. Another explanation finds in the word a survival of the name of the place in which the gods of Babylonia were believed to have defeated the dragon Tiamat and the other evil spirits. Such a view, however, compels a series of highly speculative corrections of the text, as well as various critical suppositions regarding the structure of the Book of Revelation. While the reference is apocalyptic, it seems probable on the whole that the word perpetuates Megiddo as the synonym of the battle-field—whether above the earth or in the under world—on which the final victory over evil was to be won. SHAILER MATHEWS.

HARMON.—Am 4² (RV; AV 'the palace'). No place of the name of Harmon is known. The text appears to be hopelessly corrupt.

HARMONIES OF THE GOSPELS.—The beginnings of works of this class go back to very early days. Tatian's Diatesaron (2nd cent.) is of the nature of a Gospel Harmony. The Sections of Ammonius (3rd cent.) arrange the Gospels in four parallel columns. The Sections and Canons of Eusebius (4th cent.) develop still further the plan of Ammonius, enabling the reader to discover at a glance the parallel passages in the Gospels. In the 5th cent. Euthalius, a deacon of Alexandria, besides adopting the division into sections, applied the method of numbered lines to the Acts and Epistles.

The following are the principal modern Harmonies: A. Wright, Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, with Various Readings and Critical Notes (Macmillan, 1903); Huck, *Synopsis der drei ersten Evangelien*³ (Tübingen, 1906); Tischendorf, Synopsis evangelica, ex iv. Evangelii ordine chronologico concinnata et brevi commentario illustrata (Leipzig, 1891); C. C. James, *Harmony of the Gospels in the words of the RV*² (Cambridge, 1901).

J. S. BANKS.

HARNEPHER.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁸).

HARNESSES.—See, generally, ARMOUR, which RV substitutes in most places for AV 'harness.' Similarly 'harnessed' (Ex 13¹⁸) becomes 'armed,' and the 'well harnessed' camp of 1 Mac 4⁷ becomes 'fortified.' For 'the joints of the harness' of 1 K 22³⁴ RVm substitutes 'the lower armour and the breastplate,' the former being probably 'the tassels or jointed appendages of the cuirass, covering the abdomen' (Skinner, Cent. Bible, in loc.). The only passage where 'harness' as a verb has its modern signification is Jer 46⁴ 'harness the horses,' the verb in the original being that used in Gn 46²⁹, Ex 14⁴ etc. for yoking the horses to the chariot. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HAROD.—A spring, not a well as in AV, near the mountains of Gilboa (wh. see), where Gideon tested his men (Jg 7¹), and which was probably the site of Saul's camp before his fatal battle with the Philistines (1 S 29¹). It has been very generally identified with the copious 'Ain Jalud in the Vale of Jezreel, E. of Zer'in. The water rises in a natural cavern and spreads itself out into a considerable pool, partially artificial, before descending the valley. It is one of the most plentiful and beautiful fountains in Palestine, and one that must always have been taken into account in military movements in the neighbourhood. The 'fountain in Jezreel' (1 S 29¹) may have been the 'Ain el-Meyūteh just below Zer'in (Jezreel); but this and another neighbouring spring are of insignificant size compared with 'Ain Jalud. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HARODITE.—A designation applied in 2 S 23²⁵ to two of David's heroes, Shammah and Elika. The second is wanting in LXX and in the parallel list in 1 Ch 11²⁷. In the latter passage, by a common scribal error 'the Harodite' has been transformed into the 'Harorite.' 'The Harodite' was probably a native of 'Ain-harod (Jalud), Jg 7¹. See preceding article.

HAROEH ('the seer').—A Judahite (1 Ch 2²²). Perhaps the name should be corrected to Resiah (cf. 1 Ch 4⁷).

HARORITE.—See HARODITE.

HAROSHETH.—A place mentioned only in the account of the fight with Sisera (Jg 4², 10¹⁶). From it Sisera advanced, and thither he fled. It has been identified with the modern Tell el-Harathiyyeh, which is 16 miles N.N.W. from Megiddo. But this is uncertain; nor do we know why the descriptive epithet 'of the Gentiles' is added. W. F. CORB.

HARP.—See MUSIC and MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

HARROW.—In 2 S 12³¹—a passage which had become corrupt before the date of 1 Ch 20³—as rendered in EV, David is represented as torturing the Ammonites 'under harrows of iron.' The true text and rendering, however, have reference to various forms of forced labour (see RVm), and the 'harrows' become 'picks of iron' or some similar instrument.

The Heb. verb tr. 'harrow' in Job 39¹⁰ is elsewhere correctly rendered 'break the clods' (Hos 10⁴; also Is 28²⁴, but Amer. RV has here 'harrow'). In Hastings' DB ii. 306 several reasons were given for rejecting the universal modern rendering of the original by 'harrow.' This conclusion has since been confirmed by the discovery of the original Hebrew of Sir 38²² where 'who setteth his mind to "harrow" in the furrows' would be an absurd rendering. There is no evidence that the Hebrews at any time made use of an implement corresponding to our harrow. Stiff soil was broken up by the plough or the mattock. Cf. AGRICULTURE, § 1.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HARSHA.—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁵², Neh 7⁴²); called in 1 Es 5²³ Chares.

HARSITH.—The name of a gate in Jerusalem (Jer 19¹ RV). RVm has 'the gate of potsherd', i.e. where they were thrown out. AV, deriving the word from heres 'sun,' has 'the east gate,' AVm 'the sun gate.' This gate led into the Valley of Hinnom.

HART, HIND (ayyd, ayyādh, and ayyēth).—This is the fallow-deer, the ayyd of the Arabs, Cervus dama. It is not common in W. Palestine to-day, but evidently was so once (1 K 4²²): it is mentioned as a clean animal in Dt 12¹⁵, 22 etc. Its habits when pursued are referred to in Ps 42¹ and Lk 1⁶. The 'fallow-deer' of Dt 14⁵ and 1 K 4²² refers to the roe (wh. see). The hind is mentioned in Gn 49¹, Job 39¹, Ps 29³ etc. Its care of its young (Jer 14⁵), the secrecy of its hiding-place when calving (Job 39¹), and its timidity at such times (Ps 29³) are all noticed. In Gn 49¹ Naphtali is compared to 'a hind let loose,' although many prefer to render a 'slender terebinth.' E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HARUM.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁸).

HARUMAPH.—Father of Jediah, who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3¹⁰).

HARUPHITE.—See HARIPH.

HARUZ.—Father of Meshullemeth, mother of Amon king of Judah (2 K 21¹⁹).

HARVEST.—See AGRICULTURE.

HASADIAH ('J' is kind').—A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²⁰).

HASHABIAH.—1. 2. Two Levites of the sons of Merari (1 Ch 6⁴ 9⁴, Neh 11¹⁴). 3. One of the sons of Jeduthun (1 Ch 25⁴). 4. A Hebronite (1 Ch 26³⁰). 5. The 'ruler' of the Levites (1 Ch 27¹⁷). 6. A chief of the Levites in the time of Josiah (2 Ch 35⁹); called in 1 Es 1⁹ Sabias. 7. One of the Levites who were induced to return under Ezra (Ezr 8¹⁹); called in 1 Es 8¹⁰ Asebias. 8. One of the twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels (Ezr 8²⁴); called in 1 Es 8²⁴ Assamias. 9. The 'ruler of half the district of Kellah,' who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3¹⁷), and sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹¹ 12²⁴ 25). 10. A Levite (Neh 11²²). 11. A priest (Neh 12²¹). In all probability these eleven are not all distinct, but we have not sufficient data to enable us to effect the necessary reduction of the list.

HASHABNEIAH.—1. Father of a builder of the wall (Neh 3¹⁰). 2. A Levite (Neh 9⁴). It is possible that we ought to identify this name with Hashabiah of Ezr 8¹⁹ 25, Neh 10¹¹ 11²² 12²⁴.

HASHBADDANAH.—One of the men who stood on the left hand of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8⁴); called in 1 Es 9⁴ Nabarias.

HASHEM.—See GIZONITE, JASHEN.

HASHMONAH.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only in Nu 33²⁹ 30.

HASHUBAH.—A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²⁰).

HASHUM.—1. The eponym of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2¹⁹ 10²⁴, Neh 7²² 10¹⁵); called in 1 Es 9²³ Asom. 2. One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand at the reading of the Law (Neh 8⁴); called in 1 Es 9⁴ Lothasubus.

HASIDEANS (AV Hasideans; Heb. chasidim, 'the pious').—A group of religiousists in Judaea (1 Mac 2⁴²) to be distinguished from the priestly party who had come under the influence of Hellenism. The Hasideans were devoted to the Law, and refused to compromise in any way with the Hellenizing policy enforced by Antiochus iv. They furnished the martyrs of the persecution under that monarch. Strictly speaking, they were not a political party, and probably lived in the smaller Jewish towns, as well as in Jerusalem. They joined with Mattathias in his revolt against the Syrians, but were not interested in the political outcome of the struggle, except as it gave them the right to worship Jehovah according to the Torah. After Judas had cleansed the Temple, they separated themselves from the Hasmonæan or Maccabæan party, and united with them only temporarily, when they found that under Alcimus the Temple worship was again threatened. Their defection from Judas was largely the cause of his downfall.

Although their precise relation to the Scribal movement cannot be stated, because of lack of data, it is clear that the Hasideans must have included all the orthodox scribes and were devotees to the growing Oral Law. They were thus the forerunners of the Pharisees and probably of the Essenes, which latter party, although differing from them in rejecting animal sacrifice, probably preserved their name. Both the Pharisees and the Essenes represented a further development of views and practices which the Hasideans embodied in germ. SHAILER MATHEWS.

HASMONÆANS.—See MACCABEES.

HASRAH.—See HARHAS.

HASSENAAH.—His sons built the Fish-gate (Neh 3³). Their name, which is prob. the same as Hasenuah, seems to be derived from some place Senaah (cf. Ezr 2², Neh 7³⁸). See SENAHA.

HASSENUAH.—A family name found in two different connexions in the two lists of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerusalem (1 Ch 9⁷, Neh 11⁹). Cf. preced. article.

HASSHUB.—1. 2. Two builders of the wall (Neh 3¹¹ 23). 3. One of those who signed the covenant (Neh 10²²). 4. A Levite of the sons of Merari (1 Ch 9⁴, Neh 11¹⁴).

HASSOPHERETH.—See SOPHERETH.

HASUPHA.—The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2¹², Neh 7⁴⁶); called in 1 Es 5²³ Asipha.

HAT.—See DRESS, § 5 (a).

HATOHET (Ps 74⁴ RV).—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 1.

HATHACH.—A eunuch appointed by the king to attend on queen Esther. By his means Esther learned from Mordecai the details of Haman's plot against the Jews (Est 4⁵ 6. 9. 10).

HATHATH.—A son of Othniel (1 Ch 4¹²).

HATIPHA.—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2²⁴, Neh 7⁴⁶); called in 1 Es 5²³ Atipha.

HATITA.—Eponym of a guild of porters (Ezr 2²⁴, Neh 7⁴⁶); called in 1 Es 5²³ Ateta.

HATRED.—Personal hatred is permitted in the OT, but forbidden in the NT (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁸). Love is to characterize the Christian life (Mt 22³⁷⁻⁴⁰). The only hatred it can express is hatred of evil (He 1⁹, Jude 2, Rev 2¹⁷). In Lk 14²⁶ and Jn 12²⁵ the use of the verb 'hate' by Jesus is usually explained as Oriental hyperbole, and we are gravely assured that He did not mean hate, but only love less than some other thing. It would seem fairer to suppose that He meant what He said and said what He meant; but that the hatred He enjoined applied to the objects mentioned only so far as they became identified with the spirit of evil and so antagonistic to the cause of Christ. D. A. HAYES.

HATTIL.—Eponym of a family of 'the children of Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2²⁷, Neh 7⁴⁹); called in 1 Es 5²³ Agia.

HATTUSH.—1. A priestly family that went up with Zerubbabel (Neh 12²) and signed the covenant (Neh 10¹). 2. A descendant of David, who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8² [read with 1 Es 8²⁹ 'of the sons of David, Hattush the son of Shecaniah']; see also 1 Ch 3² (but if we accept the LXX reading here, a younger Hattush must be meant)). In 1 Es. the name is Attus. 3. A builder at the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3¹⁰).

HAUNT.—In older English 'haunt' conveyed no reproach, but meant simply to spend time in or frequent a place. Thus Tindale translates Jn 3²² 'After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the Jews' land, and there he haunted with them and baptized.' So 1 S 30¹, Ezk 26¹⁷, and the subst. in 1 S 23²² 'know and see his place where his haunt is.'

HAURAN.—A man 'far gone in years and no less also in madness,' who endeavoured to suppress a tumult in Jerusalem provoked by the sacrileges of Lysimachus, brother of the apostate high priest Menelaus (2 Mac 4¹⁰).

HAURAN ('hollow land').—The district S.E. from Mt. Hermon; in particular the fertile basin, about 50 miles square and 2000 feet above sea-level, between the Jaulán and Lejā. Only in Ezk 47¹⁶ is the name mentioned, and there as the ideal border of Canaan on the east. The modern Arabs call essentially the same district d-Hauran. The name occurs also in the ancient inscriptions of Assyria. In Græco-Roman times the same general region was known as Auranitis; it was bounded on the N. by Trachonitis, and on the N.W. by Gaulanitis and Batanæa. All these districts belonged to Herod the Great. Upon his death they fell to Philip (Lk 3¹). Troglodytes doubtless once occupied the E. portion; it is now inhabited by Druzes. The entire territory is to-day practically treeless.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

HAVILAH.—A son of Cush according to Gn 10⁷, 1 Ch 1⁹, of Joktan according to Gn 10²⁸, 1 Ch 1²⁸. The river Pison (see EDEN [GARDEN OF]) is said to compass the land of Havilah (Gn 2¹¹), and it formed one of the limits of the region occupied by the sons of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁸) in which also Saul smote the Amalekites (1 S 15⁸). It has been suggested that it formed the N.E. part of the Syrian desert, but it may with greater probability be identified with central and N.E. Arabia.

L. W. KING.

HAVVOTH-JAIR.—The precise meaning of Havvoth is uncertain, but it is taken usually to mean 'tent-villages.' In Nu 32⁴ these villages are assigned to Gilead, but in Dt 3¹⁴ and Jos 13³⁰ to Bashan. The difficulty is caused by the attempt of the editors in the last two passages to harmonize the reference in Numbers with the tradition about the sixty fortresses of 1 K 4¹³. There is no doubt that the Jair of Numbers and the Jair of Judges are identical.

W. F. COBB.

HAWK.—Some eighteen species of hawk are known to exist in Palestine. The common kestrel (Falco tinnunculus) and the sparrow-hawk (Accipiter nisus) are the commonest. The traveller through the land sees them everywhere. Hawks were 'unclean' birds (Lv 11¹⁴, Dt 14¹¹). The migratory habits of many species of Palestine hawks are referred to in Job 39²⁶.

HAZAEI usurped the throne of Syria (c. 844 B.C.) by murdering Ben-hadad II. (Hazaei's successor was probably Ben-hadad III., the Mari' of the inscriptions.) The form and fragmentary character of the OT references to Hazaei demand caution in drawing conclusions from them. According to 1 K 19¹⁶, Elijah is sent to anoint Hazaei king of Syria; he is regarded as Jahweh's instrument who is to punish the Baal-worshippers in Israel (v. 18). The next mention of him describes how Ben-hadad, Hazaei's predecessor, who is ill, sends Hazaei to Elisha, to inquire whether he will recover

(2 K 8⁷); at the interview which Hazaei has with the Israelite prophet, the murder of the Syrian king is arranged, and Elisha designates Hazaei as his successor on the throne. Both these passages introduce Hazaei somewhat abruptly; in each case the Israelite prophet goes to Damascus; and each passage has for its central point the question of Hazaei's succeeding to the throne of Syria; these considerations (not to mention others) suggest that the passages come from different sources, and are dealing with two accounts of the same event.

The next mention of Hazaei shows him fighting at Ramoth-gilead against the allied armies of Joram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 8²⁸, 29, 9¹⁴, 16); the narrative here breaks off to deal with other matters, and does not say what the result of the fighting was, but from 2 K 10³² it is clear not only that Hazaei was victorious then, but that he continued to be so for a number of years (see, further, 2 K 12¹⁷, cf. Am. 1³⁻⁴); indeed, it was not until his death that the Israelites were once more able to assert themselves.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HAZAIH.—A descendant of Judah (Neh 11⁴).

HAZAR-ADDAR.—A place on the southern border of Canaan, west of Kadesh-barnea (Nu 34¹). It appears to be the same as Hezron of Jos 15², which in the latter passage is connected with but separated from Addar.

HAZAR-ENAN (once Ezk 47¹⁷ Hazar-enon).—A place mentioned in Nu 34⁹ as the northern boundary of Israel, and in Ezk 47¹⁷ 48¹ as one of the ideal boundaries. It was perhaps at the sources of the Orontes. See also HAZER-HATTICON.

HAZAR-GADDAH.—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15²⁷).

HAZARMAVETH.—The eponym of a Joktanite clan (Gn 10²⁸ = 1 Ch 1²⁸), described as a 'son' of Joktan, fifth in order from Shem. Its identity with the modern Hadramaut is certain. It was celebrated for its traffic in frankincense.

HAZAR-SHUAL.—A place in S. Judah (Jos 15²⁸ = 1 Ch 4²⁴) or Simeon (Jos 19⁴), re-peopled by Jews after the Captivity (Neh 11²⁷). It may be the ruin Sa'weh on a hill E. of Beersheba.

HAZAR-SUSAH (in 1 Ch 4²¹ Hazar-susim).—A city in Simeon (Jos 19⁴ = 1 Ch 4²¹). The site is unknown. There is a ruin Susin, W. of Beersheba.

HAZAR-SUSIM.—See HAZAR-SUSAH.

HAZAZON-TAMAR (? 'pruning of the palm,' Gn 14⁷).—It is identified with En-gedi (2 Ch 20²). The name is preserved in Wādī Hasaseh, N. of Ain Jidy. Gn 14⁷, however, seems to place it to the S.W. of the Dead Sea.

W. EWING.

HAZEL (Gn 30²⁷).—See ALMOND.

HAZER-HATTICON ('the middle Hazer').—A place named among the boundaries of (ideal) Israel (Ezk 47¹⁶). It is described as 'by the border of Hauran.' If the MT be correct, Hazer-hatticon is quite unknown; but there can be no reasonable doubt that we ought to emend to Hazar-enon as in vv. 17, 18 and 48¹.

HAZERIM.—In AN a place-name, but rightly replaced by 'villages' in RV (Dt 2²).

J. F. M'CURDY.

HAZEROTH.—A camping-ground of Israel, the second station northward in the journey from Sinai (Nu 11²⁸ 12¹⁶ 33¹⁷, and probably Dt 1¹). It is usually identified with the beautiful wady of Ain el-Khadrah, about 30 miles north-east of Jebel Musa.

J. F. M'CURDY.

HAZIEL.—A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 23⁹).

HAZO.—The eponym of a Nahorite clan (Gn 22²⁰). It is no doubt identical with Hazā, which along with Bazā is mentioned in an inscription of Esarhaddon.

HAZOR.—1. The city of Jabin (Jos 11¹ etc.), in Naphtali (Jos 19²⁸), S. of Kedesh (1 Mac 11⁴⁸, 47 etc.

HAZOR-HADATTAH

called in To 1st Asher), overlooking Lake Semechonitis = el-Haleh (Jos. Ant. v. v. 1). The name probably lingers in Jebel et Merj el-Hadreh, about 7 miles N. of Safed. It was taken and destroyed by Joshua. Solomon fortified it (1 K 9¹⁵). It was taken by Tiglath-pileser III. (2 K 15²⁰). 2. A town in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15²⁵), unidentified. 3. A town also in the Negeb (Jos 15²⁵), identical with Kerioth-hezron. 4. A place in Benjamin, N. of Jerusalem (Neh 11³⁰), probably Khirbet Hazzur, between Beit Haninah and Neby Samw'el. 5. The kingdoms of Hazor, named with Kedar (Jer 49²⁸ etc.), an Arabian district, possibly on the border of the desert.

W. EWING.

HAZOR-HADATTAH.—The text (Jos 15²⁵) is not beyond suspicion. If it is correct, the name may mean 'new Hazor.' The place was in the Negeb of Judah, but the site is unknown.

HAZZELEPONI.—A female name in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 4²).

HE.—The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 5th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

HEAD.—Not the head but the heart was regarded as the seat of intellect; it was, however, the seat of life, and was naturally held in honour. Hence phrases such as 'keeper of my head' (1 S 28²; cf. Ps 140⁷), 'swearing by the head' (Mt 5³⁴), and the metaphorical use, common to all languages, as equivalent to 'chief.' In Dt 28¹³, Is 9¹⁴, we find 'head and tail' as a proverbial expression. Christ is the head of the Church (Eph 4⁸, Col 1¹³ 2¹⁹), as man is of the woman (Eph 5²³). To lift up the head is to grant success (Ps 27⁶ 110⁷, Gn 41¹⁴, where there is an obvious ironical parallel in v. 1⁹). The hand on the head was a sign of mourning (2 S 13¹⁹, Jer 27³); so dust or ashes (2 S 12¹, La 2¹⁰); or covering the head (2 S 15³⁰, Jer 14³). On the other hand, to uncover the head, i.e. to loose the turban and leave the hair in disorder, was also a sign of mourning (see AV and RVm, Lv 10⁶ 13⁶, Ezk 24¹⁷). Similarly shaving the head, a common practice in the East (Job 1²⁰, Is 15² 22³, Ezk 7¹⁸, Am 8¹⁰); it was forbidden to priests (Lv 21⁵), and, in special forms, to all Israelites (19⁷, Dt 14¹). It might also mark the close of a period of mourning (Dt 21¹²), or of a Nazirite's vow (Nu 6⁵, Ac 18¹⁸), or of a Levite's purification (Nu 8⁷). In Dt 32⁴² there is a reference to the warrior's long hair, RVm. Laying hands on the head was (a) part of the symbolism of sacrifice (Lv 16²¹), (b) a sign of blessing (Gn 48¹⁴), (c) a sign of consecration or ordination (Nu 27²², Ac 6⁶). In 2 K 2³ the reference seems to be to the pupil sitting at the feet of his master. 'Head' is also used, like 'face,' as a synonym for 'self' (Ps 7¹⁰; and probably Pr 25², Ro 12¹⁰).

C. W. EMMET.

HEADBAND.—In 1 K 20³⁸ 41 RV this is the correct rendering of the word tr. 'ashes' in AV. Beyond the fact that it covered the wearer's forehead its form is unknown. A different word, tr. 'headbands,' Is 32⁰ AV, more probably represents 'sashes,' as in RV; it is used again in Jer 2²² for the sash or girdle (EV 'attire' with which a bride 'girds' herself (Is 49¹⁸ RV, the cognate verb).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HEADSTONE, more correctly 'head stone,' Zec 4⁷ etc. See CORNER, CORNER-STONE.

HEADTIRE, TIRE.—The former is found in AV, as one word, only 1 Es 3⁴, for the kidaris, the stiff upright headdress of the Persian kings. In RV headtire supplants AV's bonnet (wh. see). 'The tire of thine head' of Ezk 24¹⁷ AV becomes in RV 'thy headtire,' but 'tires' is retained in v. 23. For the 'round tires like the moon' of Is 3¹⁸ AV, the crests of RV, see ORNAMENTS, and for the Hebrew headgear generally, see DRESS, § 6.

HEADY.—This form of the English word has been displaced by 'headstrong.' It occurs in 2 Ti 3¹, where the same Gr. word is used as is translated 'rashly'

HEART

(RV 'rash') in Ac 19²⁴. Bp. Hall (Works, ii. 109) says, 'We may offend as well in our heddye acceleration, as in our delay.'

HEALTH.—The word formerly covered (a) healing, (b) spiritual soundness, (c) general well-being. For (a) cf. Pr 12¹⁸ 13¹⁷, Jer 8²⁴, where it represents the word usually translated 'healing.' (b) In Ps 42¹ 43³ 67⁷, and frequently in Pr. Bk. Version, it stands for the word otherwise tr. 'salvation' or 'help.' In these usages it is active. (c) The wider passive use, including general well-being of body and soul, not merely the absence of disease, is illustrated by Ac 27²⁴, 3 Jn 1². Cf. General Confession, 'There is no health in us.' See MEDICINE.

C. W. EMMET.

HEART.—1. Instances are not wanting in the OT of the employment of this word in a physiological sense, though they are not numerous. Jacob, for example, seems to have suffered in his old age from weakness of the heart; a sudden failure of its action occurred on receipt of the unexpected but joyful news of Joseph's great prosperity (Gn 45²). A similar failure proved fatal in the case of Eli, also in extreme old age (1 S 4¹³⁻¹⁸; cf. the case of the exhausted king, 28²⁰). The effect of the rending of the pericardium is referred to by Hosea as well known (13⁶); and although the proverb 'a sound (RVm 'tranquil') heart is the life of the flesh' (Pr 14³⁰) is primarily intended as a psychological truth, the simile is evidently borrowed from a universally recognized physiological fact (cf. 42²). The aphorism attributed to 'the Preacher' (Ec 10²) may be interpreted in the same way; the 'right hand' is the symbol of strength and firmness, and the left of weakness and indecision (cf. 2¹⁴). Nor does it appear that OT writers were ignorant of the vital functions which the heart is called on to discharge. This will be seen by their habit of using the word metaphorically as almost a synonym for the entire life (cf. Ps 22² 69², Is 1⁵, where 'head' and 'heart' cover man's whole being).

2. The preponderating use of the word is, however, psychological; and it is in this way made to cover a large variety of thought. Thus it is employed to denote the centre of man's personal activities, the source whence the principles of his action derive their origin (see Gn 6⁵ 8²¹, where men's evil deeds are attributed to corruption of the heart). We are, therefore, able to understand the significance of the Psalmist's penitential prayer, 'Create in me a clean heart' (Ps 51¹⁰), and the meaning of the prophet's declaration, 'a new heart also will I give you' (Ezk 36²⁶; cf. 11¹⁹). The heart, moreover, was considered to be the seat of the emotions and passions (Dt 10⁴, 1 K 8²⁸, Is 30²²; cf. Ps 104¹⁶, where the heart is said to be moved to gladness by the use of wine). It was a characteristic, too, of Hebraistic thought which made this organ the seat of the various activities of the intellect, such as understanding (Job 34¹⁰ 34, 1 K 4²⁹), purpose or determination (Ex 14¹, 1 S 7³, 1 K 8¹⁸, Is 10⁷), consciousness (Pr 14¹⁰, where, if EV be an accurate tr. of the original text, the heart is said to be conscious both of sorrow and of joy; cf. 1 S 2¹), imagination (cf. 1 K 1¹, Gn 8²¹), memory (Ps 31¹², 1 S 21¹²; cf. Lk 2¹⁹ 4¹⁸). The motions of the conscience are said to proceed from the heart (Job 27⁹), and the counterpart of the NT expression 'branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron' (1 Ti 4² RV) is found in the OT words 'I will harden his heart' (Ex 4¹; cf. Dt 2³⁰, Jos 11²⁰ etc.). Closely connected with the idea of conscience is that of moral character, and so we find 'a new heart' as the great desideratum of a people needing restoration to full and intimate relationship with God (Ezk 18³¹; cf. Dt 6⁶, 1 K 11⁴). It is, therefore, in those movements which characterize repentance, placed in antithesis to outward manifestations of sorrow for sin, 'Render your heart and not your garments' (Jl 2²³).

3. Moving along in the direction thus outlined, and not forgetting the influence of the Apocryphal writings on later thought (cf. e.g. Wis 8¹⁹ 17¹¹, Sir 42¹⁸ etc.), we shall be enabled to grasp the religious ideas enshrined in the teaching of the NT. In the recorded utterances of Jesus, so profoundly influenced by the ancient writings of the Jewish Church, the heart occupies a very central place. The beatific vision is reserved for those whose hearts are 'pure' (Mt 5⁸; cf. 2 Ti 2²², 1 P 1²² RVm). The heart is compared to the soil on which seed is sown; it contains moral potentialities which spring into objective existence in the outward life of the receiver (Lk 8¹⁵; cf., however, Mk 4¹⁵⁻²⁰, where no mention is made of this organ; see also Mt 13¹⁹, in which the heart is referred to, as in Is 6¹⁰, as the seat of the spiritual understanding). Hidden within the remote recesses of the heart are those principles and thoughts which will inevitably spring into active life, revealing its purity or its native corruption (Lk 6⁴⁵; cf. Mt 12³⁴, 15^{18f.}). It is thus that men's characters reveal themselves in naked reality (1 P 3⁴). It is the infallible index of human character, but can be read only by Him who 'searcheth the hearts' (Ro 8²⁷; cf. 1 S 16⁷, Pr 21², Lk 16¹⁵). Human judgment can proceed only according to the unerring evidence tendered by this resultant of inner forces, for 'by their fruits ye shall know them' (Mt 7²⁰). The more strictly Jewish of the NT writers show the influence of OT thought in their teaching. Where we should employ the word 'conscience' St. John uses 'heart,' whose judgments in the moral sphere are final (1 Jn 3^{20f.}). Nor is St. Paul free from the influence of this nomenclature. He seems, in fact, to regard conscience as a function of the heart rather than as an independent moral and spiritual organ (Ro 2¹⁵, where both words occur; cf. the quotation He 10¹⁶). In spite of the fact that the last-named Apostle frequently employs the terms 'mind,' 'understanding,' 'reason,' 'thinkings,' etc., to express the elements of intellectual activity in man, we find him constantly reverting to the heart as discharging functions closely allied to these (cf. 'the eyes of your heart,' Eph 1¹⁸; see also 2 Co 4⁶). With St. Paul, too, the heart is the seat of the determination or will (cf. 1 Co 7³⁷, where 'steadfast in heart' is equivalent to will-power). In all these and similar cases, however, it will be noticed that it is man's moral nature that he has in view; and the moral and spiritual life, having its roots struck deep in his being, is appropriately conceived of as springing ultimately from the most essentially vital organ of his personal life.

HEAVEN.—In the cosmic theory of the ancient world, and of the Hebrews in particular, the earth was flat, lying between a great pit into which the shades of the dead departed, and the heavens above in which God and the angels dwelt, and to which it came to be thought the righteous went, after having been raised from the dead to live for ever. It was natural to think of the heavens as concave above the earth, and resting on some foundation, possibly of pillars, set at the extreme horizon (2 S 22⁸, Pr 8²⁷⁻³⁰).

The Hebrews, like other ancient peoples, believed in a plurality of heavens (Dt 10¹⁴), and the literature of Judaism speaks of seven. In the highest, or Aravoth, was the throne of God. Although the descriptions of these heavens varied, it would seem that it was not unusual to regard the third heaven as Paradise. It was to this thr³ St. Paul said he had been caught up (2 Co 12²).

This series of superimposed heavens was regarded as filled by different sorts of superhuman beings. The second heaven in later Jewish thought was regarded as the abode of evil spirits and angels awaiting punishment. The NT, however, does not commit itself to these precise speculations, although in Eph 6¹² it speaks of spiritual hosts of wickedness who dwell in heavenly places (cf. Eph 2²). This conception of heaven as being above a flat earth underlies many religious expressions which are still current. There have been various attempts to locate heaven, as, for example, in Sirius as the central sun of our system. Similarly, there have been innumerable speculations endeavouring to set forth in sensuous form the sort of life which is to be lived in heaven. All such speculations, however, lie outside of the region of positive knowledge, and rest ultimately on the cosmogony of pre-scientific times. They may be of value in cultivating religious emotion, but they belong to the region of speculation. The Biblical descriptions of heaven are not scientific, but symbolical. Practically all these are to be found in the Johannine Apocalypse. It was undoubtedly conceived of eschatologically by the NT writers, but they maintained a great reserve in all their descriptions of the life of the redeemed. It is, however, possible to state definitely that, while they conceived of the heavenly condition as involving social relations, they did not regard it as one in which the physical organism survived. The sensuous descriptions of heaven to be found in the Jewish apocalypses and in Mohammedanism are altogether excluded by the sayings of Jesus relative to marriage in the new age (Mk 12²⁵), and those of St. Paul relative to the 'spiritual body.' The prevailing tendency at the present time among theologians, to regard heaven as a state of the soul rather than a place, belongs likewise to the region of opinion. The degree of its probability will be determined by one's general view as to the nature of immortality. SHAILER MATHEWS.

HEAVE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.

HEAVINESS.—The Eng. word 'heaviness' is used in AV in the sense of 'grief,' and in no other sense. Thus Pr 10¹ 'A wise son maketh a glad father; but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.' Compare Coverdale's tr. of Ps 30⁵ 'heynesse maye well endure for a night, but joye commeth in the mornynge,' whence the Prayer Bk. version 'heaviness may endure for a night.'

HEBER.—1. A man of Asher (Gn 46¹⁷, Nu 26⁴⁵, 1 Ch 7³¹, etc.). The gentilic name Heberites occurs in Nu 26⁴⁵. 2. The Kenite, according to Jg 4¹⁷ 5²⁴, husband of Jael. He separated himself (Jg 4¹¹) from his Bedouin caste of Kenites or nomad smiths, whose wanderings were confined chiefly to the south of Judah, and settled for a time near Kedesh on the plain to the west of the Sea of Galilee. 3. A man of Judah (1 Ch 4¹⁵). 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8³⁷).

HEBREW.—See EBER; TEXT VERSIONS AND LANGUAGES OF OT.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO.—Introductory.—At first sight it is not easy to understand why this treatise has been designated an Epistle. The only direct references by the writer to the character of his work are found in 13²², where he styles it a 'word of exhortation' (cf. Ac 13⁹, 4 Mac 1¹), and speaks of having written '(a letter) unto you in few words' (this verb seems to be more justly treated in AV than in RV). The general salutation of 13²⁴ is similar to what is found in most of the NT Epistles (cf. Ro 16²⁵, 1 Co 16¹⁹, 2 Co 13¹², Ph 4²¹, Col 4¹⁰, etc.). At the same time, there are numerous personal references scattered throughout the writing (13⁷ 5¹¹ 4¹ 10¹⁰ 6⁸ etc.), and in most cases the author places himself on the same level with those to whom he is writing (3¹⁹ 8¹⁸, 11⁴⁰ 10¹⁰ etc.). In spite of the formality which might characterize this writing as a theological essay, it is evident that the early instinct of the Church in regarding it as essentially an Epistle is substantially sound and correct (cf. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 49 f.). Of course, the title 'The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews' (EV) is without early textual authority. The oldest MSS have merely the superscription 'to Hebrews,' just as they have in the case of other NT epistles ('to Romans,' etc.). The only other early description to which it is necessary to refer in this place is that given to it by Tertullian, who expressly quotes it by the title of 'Barnabas to the Hebrews' (de Pud. 20). It seems to have been unanimously accepted from the very earliest period that the objective of the Epistle was correctly described by this title. Whether, however, this conclusion was based on sound traditional evidence or was merely arrived at from the internal character of the writing itself, must be left to research or conjecture; for we must not suppose that the words 'to Hebrews' form any part of the original document.

1. Authorship.—Notwithstanding the fact that this writing was known by the most ancient Christian writers, at all events by those belonging to the Church in Rome, it is noteworthy that all traces as to its authorship seem to have been lost very soon. The only information, with regard to this question, to be gleaned from the Roman Church is of the negative character that it was not written by St. Paul. Indeed, the Western Church as a whole seems to have allowed its presence in the Canon only after a period of uncertainty, and even then to have regarded it as of secondary importance because of its lack of Apostolic authority.

The Muratorian Fragment does not include it in its catalogue, and implicitly denies its Pauline authorship ('The blessed Apostle Paul himself, following the example of his predecessor John, wrote only to seven Churches by name,' etc., see Westcott, Canon of the NT, App. C.), as does also Caius. Of more direct value are the testimonies of Hippolytus and Irenaeus, both of whom were acquainted with the Epistle, but denied that St. Paul wrote it (cf. Eusebius, HE v. 26, vi. 20; see Salmon's Introd. to NT, p. 47). The Churches of North Africa and Alexandria, on the contrary, have their respective positive traditions on this question. The former, as has been noted already, attributed the writing to Barnabas—a theory preserved by Tertullian alone, and destined to fall into complete oblivion until quite recent times (cf. e.g. Zahn, Einführung, ii. p. 116 f.).

The Alexandrian belief in the authorship of St. Paul, indirectly at least, dates as far back as the closing years of the 2nd century. Clem. Alex. goes so far as to suggest that St. Paul wrote it originally in Hebrew, suppressing his name from motives of expediency, and that St. Luke translated it for the use of those who understood only Greek. Origen, who had his own doubts as to the reliability of the local tradition, nevertheless upheld St. Paul as the ultimate author; and his influence undoubtedly had powerful weight in overcoming the Western hesitation. At all events, by the 5th cent. it was almost universally held to be the product of St. Paul's literary activity; and this belief was not disturbed until the revival of learning in the 16th cent., when again a wide divergence of opinion displayed itself.

Erasmus, the first to express the latent feelings of uncertainty, conjectured in a characteristically modest fashion that Clement of Rome was possibly the author. Luther, with his usual boldness and independence, hazarded the unsupported guess that its author was Apollon (cf. Farrar, The Early Days of Christianity, ch. xvii.; and Bleek, Introd. to NT ii. pp. 91 ff.). Calvin wavered between St. Luke and Clement, following, no doubt, some of the statements of Origen as to traditions current in his day (see Eusebius, HE vi. 25).

In the midst of such conflicting evidence it is impossible to feel certain on the question of authorship; nor need we experience uneasiness on this head. The authenticity and inspiration of a book are not dependent upon our knowing who wrote it. In the case of our Epistle, it is the subject-matter which primarily arrests the attention. The writer is holding before the minds of his readers the Son of God, who, as man, has spoken 'at the end of these days' (1²). It seems to be suitable to his theme that he should retire behind the veil of anonymity; for he speaks of One who is the 'effulgence' of the Divine Glory, 'and the very image of his substance' (v. 3).

itself in order to arrive at a decision as to the kind of person likely to have penned such a document (cf. art. 'Hebrews' in Hastings' DB, vol. ii. 338a). The author seems to have a personal and an intimate knowledge of the character and history of those whom he addresses (cf. 6⁹, 10³⁴ 13⁷⁻¹⁹). It is quite possible, of course, that this may have been gained through the medium of others, and that he is speaking of a reputation established and well known. When we consider, however, the numerous instances in which close ties of relationship betray themselves, we are forced to the conclusion that the writer and his readers were personally known to each other. Timothy was a mutual friend (13²²), although it is confessed that both the author and those addressed belong to the second generation of Christians (2³). There is, moreover, a constant use of the first personal pronoun (1² 2¹⁷, 9 3⁶, 14 4², 14 6¹², 81 9²⁴ 10¹⁰, 10-23, 30 11² 13¹⁰), even in places where we should have expected that of the second person (e.g. 12¹, 23 13¹²). To the present writer the words translated 'that I may be restored speedily unto you' (13¹⁹) seem to convey the meaning that he had been amongst them once, although Westcott is inclined to see here but a suggestion of 'the idea of service which he had rendered and could render to his readers' (Ep. to the Hebrews, in loc., see also Introd. pp. lxxv-vi and Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, p. 312). If thus he were a close personal acquaintance, these reminiscences of their former endurance, and of the faithfulness of those through whose instrumentality they had embraced the Christian faith, gain force and point (cf. 10²² 13⁷). There is moreover, a tone of authority throughout, as if the writer had no fear that his words would be resented or misinterpreted (12¹⁴, 13¹ 10²⁸, 23 5¹², 31² etc.).

To these notes of authorship must be added the evidence of wide literary culture observable throughout the Epistle. This characteristic has been, and is, universally acknowledged. The author did not use the Hebrew OT, and in the single quotation where he varies from the LXX we gather, either that he was acquainted with the Epistle to the Romans, or that he gives a variant reading preserved and popularized by the Targ. Onk. (cf. 10⁴⁰ and Ro 12¹⁹). There is no other NT writer who displays the same rhetorical skill in presenting the final truths of the Christian religion in their world-wide relations (cf. 1¹⁻⁴ 2¹⁴⁻¹⁸ 6¹⁷⁻²⁰ 11¹⁻⁴⁰ etc.). His vocabulary is rich and varied, and in this respect stands closer to the writings of St. Luke than to any other of the NT books. 'The number of words found in the Epistle which have a peculiar Biblical sense is comparatively small' (Westcott, ib. Introd. xlv.). For these and similar reasons it is generally believed that our author was a scholar of Hellenistic training, and most probably an Alexandrian Jew of philosophic temperament and education (see Bacon, Introd. to NT, p. 141).

2. Destination, circumstances of readers, date.—When we ask ourselves the question, Who were the people addressed in this Epistle?, we are again met with a confusing variety of opinion. The chief rival claimants to this honour are three: Palestine, which has the most ancient tradition in its favour, and which is countenanced by the superscription; Alexandria; and Rome, where the Epistle first seems to have been known and recognized. One conclusion may, at any rate, be accepted as certain: the addressees formed a definite homogeneous body of Christians. The writer has a local Church in view, founded at a specific period, and suffering persecution at a definite date (note the tense of the verbs, 'ye were enlightened,' 'ye endured,' 10²²). He addresses this Church independently of its recognized 'leaders' (13²⁴). In his exhortation to patience and endurance he reminds his readers of the speedy return of Jesus, as if they had already begun to despair of the fulfilment of that promise (10³⁴; cf. 2 P 3², Rev 3², 2 Th 2¹²). He had been with them at some period prior to his writing, and he hoped once again to visit them with Timothy as his companion (13¹⁹, 23). Their spiritual growth was arrested just at the point where he had looked for vigour and force (5^{11ff}, 6^{1ff}), and this resulted in moral degeneracy (5¹¹ 12³ 31²), and in neglect of that ordinance which promotes social intercourse and Christian fellowship (10²⁶). As a Church, too, they were in a position to help their poorer brethren (6¹⁰), and he expected them to continue that help in the future (6¹¹)—a feature of early Christian activity which reminds us of the poverty of the Church in Judaea (cf. Ac 11²⁹ 24¹⁷, Ro 15²⁶, 1 Co 16^{1ff}, etc.). To the present writer this allusion of itself presents a formidable, if not a fatal, objection to the theory that Palestine was the destination of our Epistle. This conclusion is strengthened by the elegant Greek in which the Epistle is written, and by the writer's use of the LXX instead of the Hebrew OT. On the other hand, the only direct internal evidence pointing to the readers' relations with Rome is found in the salutation, 'They of Italy salute you' (13²⁴). It is true that this is sufficient to establish a connexion; but it would be futile to deny that it is capable of a double explanation—that the Epistle was written either from or to Italy. The former seems at first sight the more natural interpretation of the words (cf. Col 4¹⁶) and we are not surprised to find such scholars as Theodoret and Primasius expressing their belief that our author here discloses the place from which he writes. Indeed, on the supposition that 'they of Italy' were the writer's companions who were absent with him from Rome, the words do not seem the most felicitous method of expressing their regards. It would be natural to mention some at least of their names in sending greetings from them to their brethren, with whom they must have been on terms of the most intimate fellowship (cf. Ro 16^{18ff}, 1 Co 16¹⁹). Besides, if he wrote from Rome we have a natural explanation, amounting to a vera causa, of the fact that our Epistle was known there from the very first; for it must not be supposed that a writing like this was allowed to go forth without copies having been made beforehand (for a supposed instance of this kind in the case of St. Luke's writings, see Blass, Ev. sec. Lucam, and Acta Apostolorum, especially the Præfatio and Prolegomena respectively, where that scholar contends that the remarkable textual variations in these writings can be explained only by the theory of a second edition of each).

Nor can the claim of Alexandria to be the destination of the Epistle be said to have much force. The argument on which this theory is mainly based has to do with the discrepancies between the writer's descriptions of Levitical worship and that which obtained in the Jewish Temple in accordance with the Mosaic code (cf. e.g. 9^{1ff}, 7²⁷, etc.). It has been supposed that he had in his mind the temple of Onias at Leontopolis in Egypt. This, however, is pure conjecture (cf. Westcott, ib. Introd. p. xxxix.), and is contradicted by the historical evidence of the late date at which the Epistle seems to have been known in Alexandria, and by the fact that its authorship was completely hidden from the heads of the Church in that place. We are thus reduced to the balancing of probabilities in selecting an objective for our Epistle, and in so doing we have to ask ourselves the much canvassed question, What were the antecedents of the readers? Were they Gentile or Jewish converts? Until a comparatively recent date it was believed universally that the writer had Jewish Christians before his mind. A formidable array, however, of NT critics, especially Continental, now advocate the theory that, in spite of appearances to the contrary, the original readers of our Epistle were Gentiles or mainly Gentiles (e.g. von Soden, Jülicher, Welzäcker, Pfeiderer, M'Giffert, Bacon, etc.). Certainly among the Christians of the first two or three generations there must have been a large number of proselytes who were well acquainted with the Levitical ceremonial, and to whom the description of the furniture of the Tabernacle would have been perfectly intelligible (9^{2ff}; cf. vv. 1^{1ff}, 19^{1ff}, 10^{1ff}, etc.). That the addressees included Jews cannot be denied (see 6^{1ff}, 13⁹⁻¹⁶, etc.). At the same time, it would be futile to base an argument for the purely Jewish destination of the Epistle upon such passages as speak of OT prophetic revelations having been made to 'the fathers' (11), or of 'the seed of Abraham' (21⁶) as constituting the basis of Jesus' human nature. A similar identification is made by St. Paul in writing to the Church in Rome (Ro 4¹⁻²⁵), where undoubtedly there was a large admixture of Gentile Christians. Moreover, Clement of Rome again and again refers to 'our fathers,' though he too is writing to a Church largely Gentile (see cc. 4, 31, 62, etc.). It is also well to remember that the Christian Churches, for a century at least after they had begun to take definite shape as organized bodies, were dependent, to a very large extent, upon the OT Scriptures for their spiritual nourishment and guidance. These were to them the chief, if not the only, authoritative record of God's revelation of Himself and His purposes to the world. It was perfectly natural, therefore, that St. Paul should presuppose a wide knowledge of OT history, and, indeed, of the Jewish interpretations of that history (cf. Ro 5^{12ff}, 1 Co 15²², 2 Co 3^{1ff}, 6^{1ff}, Gal 3²⁹), on the part of his Gentile readers, just as Clement of Rome does.

When we turn to our Epistle, we are struck at once by the fact that the writer is not moving in, or thinking of, a living practical Leviticalism. He is dealing with Mosaism in its ideal conditions. The ritualism about which he addresses his readers seems to be, not that which actually obtained in the later Temple services (cf. e.g. 7²⁷ 10^{1ff} 9²¹), but that splendid theoretical ceremonial every detail of which was believed to be a type and a shadow 'of the good things to come' (9¹¹; cf. W. R. Smith's art. 'Hebrews' in EBR). Indeed, the typological and allegorizing elements in the Epistle claim for it almost peremptorily a non-Eastern objective; and though the present writer cannot see his way to accept Zahn's conclusion that the addressees formed a compact body of Jewish Christians within a large Gentile community of believers, he is ready to yield to his exhaustive study of the problem when he points to Rome as offering the fewest objections, on the whole, to be the destination of the writing (Einkl. in das NT, ii. p. 146 ff.).

Accepting this conclusion as at least a provisional, and it may be a temporary, solution of the difficult question arising out of the objective of our Epistle, we shall find several allusions to the existing conditions of life in the Church addressed. Nor shall we be left completely in the dark as to the probable date of its composition. Looking first for incidental remarks, independently of the locale of the readers, we find several hints pointing to a comparatively late period in the history of the early Church. Both writer and readers were separated by at least a generation from the first circle of believers (22). The readers, moreover, had been long enough under the influence of the Christian faith to give our author grounds for hope that they could occupy the position of teachers and of 'perfect' ('full grown,' RV) professors of their religion (5^{11ff}; note the verb translated 'ye are become,' which expresses the end of a lengthened process of degeneracy). This hope was bitterly disappointed, although he is careful to recall a period when their love was warm and their Christian profession an active force in their lives (6^{1ff}). Basing his appeal on this memory, he strives to encourage them to revert to their former earnestness ('diligence,' EV 6¹¹); and, in order to prevent that dulness to which they had already given way from developing further, he urges them to take for a pattern those Christian teachers who had already spent their lives in the service of the faith (8¹²). It is probable that their own rulers of the preceding generation had signaled their fidelity to Christ by enduring martyrdom for His sake (cf. Westcott, Ep. to Heb., in loc.). The first freshness of their enthusiasm for the gospel was wearing off, and some at least amongst them were in danger of a complete lapse from Church membership (10²⁶). The cause of this temptation is not far to seek. In an earlier period of their history they had 'endured a great conflict of sufferings' (10^{32b}), and the writer hints at another and a similar experience, of which the beginnings were making themselves felt (cf. 12²¹; note the warning tone in 10³⁶ exhorting to the cultivation of patience). Persecution on this occasion had not as yet burst with its full fury upon them (12⁴). That he sees it fast coming is evident from the writer's continually appealing for an exhibition of fortitude and patient endurance (12¹⁵, 11¹, etc.). Indeed, he understands the dangers to which a Church, enjoying a period of freedom from the stress of active opposition (in this case peace for the Church had lasted, in the opinion of the present writer, for close on thirty years [see Robertson's Hist. of Christ. Church, vol. i. p. 7 f.]), is exposed when brought face to face with a sudden storm of persecution and relentless hatred (12⁵, 7¹). He seems to fear apostasy as the result of moral relaxation (12²¹), and encourages his readers by telling them of the liberation of Timothy from his imprisonment for the faith (13²³). It is not impossible that one of his reasons for writing directly to the Church, instead of addressing it through 'them that had the rule over them' (13²⁴), was that he feared a similar fate for the latter, or that, like himself, they were compulsorily separated from their brethren (13¹⁹) by the persecuting authorities. Now, if we accept Rome as the destination of our Epistle, and see in 13⁷ an allusion to the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, and at the same time remember that we have the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthian Church as its terminus ad quem, we have reduced the limits of the date of its composition to the period between the Neronian and Domitianic persecutions. Rather we should say, following some of the allusions referred to above, that it was written at the beginning of the latter crisis; in other words, the date would be within the closing years of the 8th and the opening years of the 9th decade of the 1st cent. A.D. The fact that Timothy was alive when our author wrote does not militate against this date, as he seems to have been a young man when converted through the instrumentality of St. Paul (cf. 1 Co 16¹¹, 1 Ti 4¹², 2 Ti 2²⁵).

Besides the danger to the faith arising from physical sufferings and persecutions, another and a more deadly enemy seems to have been threatening to undermine the foundations of the Church at this period. After the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, Jewish Rabbinism seems to have been endowed with a new and vigorous life. Hellenistic Judaism, with its syncretistic tendencies and its bitter proselytizing spirit, must have appealed very strongly to that class of Christians for whom an eclectic belief always has a subtle charm (cf. the warning 'Be not carried away by divers and strange teachings,' and the reference to the distinctions regarding 'meats' in 13⁴, which forcibly remind us of St. Paul's language in Col 2¹⁶; for an exhaustive survey of the extent and number of proselytes to Judaism, and the eagerness with which this work was pursued, see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 291-327).

3. Purpose and contents.—In order to counteract this deadly influence, the writer sets about proving the final and universalistic character of the Christian revelation. It is with this practical aim that he takes his pen in hand, and he himself gives its true designation to his literary effort when he styles it 'a word of encouragement' (13²²). At the same time, it is evident that our author moves on a high plane both of thought and of language. No other NT writer seems to have grasped so fully the cosmological significance attaching to the earthly life and experiences of Jesus (5⁷, 4¹⁴ 2¹¹, 11¹), or to have set forth so clearly His present activity on behalf of 'all them that obey him' (5⁹ 2¹⁰ 7²⁶ 9¹¹, 2⁴, cf. Ro 8³⁴). For him the Incarnation has bridged once and for all the hitherto impassable gulf separating God and man, and has made intelligible for man the exhortation 'Let us draw near' to God, for a 'new and living way' has been 'dedicated for us' through His flesh (10^{20b}, cf. 7¹⁹). It may be said, indeed, that the author regards Christianity as the final stage in the age-long process of religious evolution. The Levitical institutions, with their elaborate ceremonialism, constituted the preceding and preparatory step in the Divine plan of world-salvation. This too was good in its way, and necessary, but of course imperfect. It did its duty as a good servant, faithfully and well, but had to give way when the 'heir of all things' (1²) came to claim His inheritance (cf. 3¹).

In order to establish emphatically the pre-eminence of Christianity over all that went before, the Epistle opens with a series of comparisons between Christ and the great representatives of the former dispensation. (a) In the 'old time' the messages of God were delivered 'by divers portions and in divers manners' through the prophets, but now 'at the end of these days' He has spoken His final word 'in a Son' (1¹⁴). (b) The Law of Moses was revealed through the mediation of angels and was 'steadfast' (2²); but angels were employed in service 'on behalf of those who are to inherit salvation' (1¹⁴), whereas the revelation through the medium of the Son who was 'made a little lower than the angels' was correspondingly of a higher order than that which had these beings as intermediaries (1¹⁴ 2⁹). (c) The great lawgiver Moses occupied but the position of servant, and therefore holds a subordinate place to that of the Son in the Divine scheme of redemption (3²⁻⁴). (d) Finally, as Christ is personally superior to Aaron, so His office is essentially more profound and efficacious than that which typified it.

This last comparison is elaborated at much greater length than the others (8¹-10³), and indeed in its argumentative treatment is developed into a contrast. The discussion here is simple but effective. All recognize that 'without blood-shedding there is no forgiveness' (9²²), but Aaron and his successors went into the holy place 'with blood not their own' (9²³), the blood of bulls and of goats, which cannot possibly take away sins (10⁴). Moreover, the first requisite to the high-priestly service of atonement is that a sin-offering had to be made for the officiating priest himself before he offered for the people (9⁷ 5²). The temporary makeshift character of these ordinances was shown and acknowledged by the fact that they had to be constantly repeated ('once in the year', 9⁷, cf. 10³). They had in themselves no moral uplifting force, cleansing the consciences of, and perfecting, 'them that draw nigh' (10¹). On the other hand, Christ entered into 'the holy place once for all through His own blood' (9¹²), and, though He is able to sympathize with our weaknesses, having been tempted in all things according to the likeness of our temptations, yet He remained sinless (4¹⁴). He needed not to offer on His own behalf, for temptation and suffering proved to Him but stages in the process of perfecting His Sonship (2¹⁰ 5¹¹, 7²⁶). In describing the personal character of the high priest suited to our needs the writer is at the same time describing the character of the sacrifice which Christ offered, for 'he offered up himself' (7²⁶). In order to obviate any objection likely to be made against the irregularity of a priesthood outside the Levitical order, he has already pointed to an OT case in point, and here he strengthens his plea by quoting from a Psalm universally recognized as Messianic. Melchizedek was a priest who had no genealogical affinity with the tribe of Levi, and yet he was greater than Aaron (7¹⁻¹⁰); and it was said by God of His own Son that He should be a 'priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek' (5⁶ 7¹⁷).

We have said above that the central thought of our Epistle is the discovery by Christianity of a way, hitherto hidden from the eyes of man, of access to God (cf. 4¹⁴ 10¹⁹ 7¹⁹, 2¹). Once this was accomplished, nothing further remained to be done (10¹³) but to enter on that path which leads to the 'Sabbath-rest reserved for the people of God' (4⁹). We may now ask the question: What are the author's conceptions with regard to the Being and Personality of the High Priest upon whose functions he sets such value? In other words, What are the chief features of the Christology of the Epistle? We have not to proceed far in the study of our Epistle before we are brought face to face with a thought which dominates each discussion of the relative claims of Christ and the OT ministers of revelation and redemption. It is upon His Sonship that the superiority of Jesus is based. Neither the prophets nor the ministering angels, neither Moses nor Aaron, could lay claim to that relationship which is inherent in the Person of Jesus Christ. In consequence of the unique position occupied by 'the Son of God' (4¹⁴; cf. 1² 6 3⁶ 5⁸ 7²⁸ 10²⁹), it follows that the dispensation ushered in by Him is above all that went before it. The latter was but the dim outline ('shadow'), not even the full representation ('the very image') 'of the good things which were to be' (10¹). Regarded as a means of revealing God to man, this superiority is self-evident, as the Son is above both prophets and angels. Looked on as a mediatorial scheme of redemption and of reconciliation, it stands immeasurably above that whose representatives were Moses the lawgiver and Aaron the priest.

It is evident from what has been said that this feature of the Personality of Jesus is transcendent and unique. It is also evident that sonship in a general sense is not unknown to the author (cf. 2¹⁰ 12⁵ 17¹). As if to preclude all misunderstanding of his meaning, he at the outset defines his belief when he represents the Son as 'the heir of all things' and the agent of God's creative activity (3¹; cf. Jn 1³), the effulgence of His glory and the very image of His Person. Not only do we see in these words the definition of a faith which confesses Jesus as the great world-sustaining power (1³); there is also implied, so far as a non-technical terminology can do so, belief in the eternity of His Being. It is true that the term 'first-begotten' (1⁴) does not necessarily carry the idea of eternity with it, or even the statement that He is the Maker of the ages (1²). On the other hand, we must remember that these are but supplemental to the grand Christological confession of v. 3, which excludes the notion of the non-existence of the Son at any time in the ages of eternity. The shining of light is coeval with the light itself, and the impress of the seal on wax is the exact reproduction of the original engraving. It is true that we have here no systematic declaration of Christological belief. The time had not yet come for the constructive theologian. At the same time, it is difficult to see how the author could have framed a more emphatic expression of his belief that Jesus the Son of God is a Divine Person from eternity to eternity (cf. 7²⁸). The grand and final scene in the Divine process of self-revelation is painted in words of magnificent solemnity, referred to incidentally, and repeated again and again. As the Son of God, Jesus had a Divine inheritance into which He entered, after His work of redemption was completed on earth, by sitting down on the right hand of the Majesty on High (1³; cf. 1¹³ 2⁶ 4¹⁴ 6²⁰ 7²⁶, Lk 22⁶⁹, Mk 16¹⁹).

In his reference to the work of the Son in 'making purification for sins' (1³) the author implies at once his belief in the humanity of the Son. Although he gives us no direct clue to the extent of his knowledge of the conditions under which the Incarnation was effected, he leaves us in no doubt not only that the manhood of the Son is a reality, but that for the work of redemption it was necessary that it should be so. The fact that his allusions to this doctrine are always indirect point to the conclusion that he expected his readers to be familiar with it as an indisputable article of the Christian faith. Besides, he reinforces his arguments by a running commentary upon those Psalms wherein he sees prophetic expressions of the humiliation of the Christ (cf. 2⁷ 9 10 16 18 57). Incorporated with them we have numerous references to the earthly experiences of Jesus. The manner of His death (12², cf. 2¹ 4¹⁵), His general temptations (2¹⁸ 4¹⁵), and, in particular, that of Gethsemane (5⁷, where the author boldly refers to Jesus' prayer to His Father in the face of an awful calamity, and the cause which occasioned that prayer), His work as preacher of salvation, and the delegation by Him of the work of proclamation to those who heard Him (1² 2⁹), His protracted struggle with implacable religious enemies (12³)—all point to our author's minute acquaintance with the historical facts of Jesus' life.

No attempt is made by the writer to minimize the extent and character of Jesus' earthly sufferings and the limitations to which He was subjected. It seems as if, above all things, he is anxious to impress his readers with their stern reality, and as if they, in their turn, were tempted to despise the salvation which was wrought out through such humiliation (2⁹). For him this humiliation is filled with a moral and spiritual significance of the most vital importance. In His constant endurance and His ultimate triumph Jesus has left an abiding example to all who suffer temptation and persecution (12²; cf. the expression 'we behold him,' etc., 2⁹). The power of this example is the greater because of the oneness of Jesus and His people (cf. 2¹¹), by which their endurance and witness become the embodiment and extension of His work in this respect (cf. 5¹² 13⁷ 12¹). The spiritual significance of the earthly life of Jesus is no less real and splendid. 'It was fitting' that Jesus should be perfected 'through sufferings' (2¹⁰ 17), not only because He thereby attained to the captaincy of salvation, becoming merciful and faithful (2¹⁷) and sympathizing (4¹⁵), but because the ability to help 'his brethren' (cf. 2¹¹ 17) springs from the double fact that He is one with them in His experiences, and at the same time victorious over sin ('apart from sin,' 4¹⁵, cf. 7²⁶ 9²⁸) as they are not. The profound synthesis of the humiliation and the glory of Jesus thus effected by our author is enhanced as it reaches its climax in the bold assertion that development in character was a necessary element in His earthly life (5⁸; cf. the words 'perfected for evermore,' 7²⁸).

In order that his readers may fully appreciate the character of the work accomplished by the life and death of Jesus, the writer proceeds to answer objections which may be raised against the propriety of His discharging the priestly functions of mediation and atonement. This he does by a twofold process of reasoning. First, reverting to the language of the great Messianic Psalm, he demonstrates the superiority in point of order, as in that of time, of the priesthood of Melchizedek to that of Aaron (5⁸ 10 7¹⁷ etc.). Next he shows how the ideals dimly foreshadowed by the functions of the Aaronic priesthood have become fully and finally realized in the priesthood of Jesus (8⁴ 9⁹ 14¹⁷). There are certain characteristics in the Melchizedekian order which, by an allegorical method of interpretation, are shown to be typical in the sublime sense of the priesthood of Christ. It was (a) royal, (b) righteous, (c) peaceful, (d) personal, (e) eternal (7¹⁷). A high priest having these ideal attributes realized in himself answers to man's fallen condition, and they all meet in the Person of the Son 'perfected for evermore' (cf. 7²⁸). No mention is made of the sacrificial aspect of Melchizedek's work, but this is implied in the subsequent assertion that our high priest 'offered up himself once for all' (7²⁷). Indeed, it may be said that the latter characteristic is inseparable from the above-mentioned five, for the priesthood which realizes in itself the ethical ideals here outlined will inevitably crown itself by the act of self-sacrifice. The argument is then transferred from the Melchizedekian to the Levitical order, where the last-named function found detailed expression in the Mosaic ritual institutions. Here an answer is given to the question, 'What has this man to offer?' The Aaronic priests offered sacrifices continually, and in his description of the functions

Incidental to their position we seem to hear echoes of contrasts out of the very parallelisms instituted. The Levitical priest is not (a) royal; he 'is appointed' to fulfil certain obligations (8³, cf. 5¹); he is not (b) essentially righteous; he has, before he fulfils his mediatorial functions, first to offer for his own sins (8⁷, cf. 5³); his work does not conduce to (c) peace, for 'conscience of sins' is still, in spite of priestly activity, alive, and 'perfection' is not thereby attained (10¹⁴); his priesthood is not (d) personal; it is an inherited authority 'made after the law of a carnal commandment' (7¹⁶), and the personal equation is shown to be eliminated by the fact that it is the blood of goats and calves that he offers (9¹²); finally, it is not (e) eternal; its ordinances were temporary, 'imposed until a time of reformation' (9¹⁰). In every instance 'the more excellent ministry' (8⁹) of Jesus is substantiated, while the repeated assertions of the sacrificial character of His priestly work, by the emphatic declarations that He is not only the Priest but the Sacrifice (7²⁷ 9¹², 26), show the difficulty the writer must have felt in sustaining a comparison which is summed up in an antithesis ('once in the year' 9⁷, and 'eternal' 9¹²). The whole discussion may be regarded as an a fortiori argument on behalf of the superiority of the priesthood of Jesus. The ritual of the Day of Atonement is selected as the basis of his contention, and it was here that the Levitical ceremonial was at its noblest (9¹⁻⁷). Even here the above-mentioned antithesis is observable; the Levitical ministry was discharged in a Tabernacle which was but 'a copy and shadow of the heavenly things' (8⁹), while that of Christ fulfils itself in 'the true tabernacle' (8²), where alone are displayed the eternal realities of priestly sacrifice and mediation. The offering of Himself is not merely the material sacrifice of His body on the cross, though that is a necessary phase in His ministerial priesthood (cf. 2⁸, 14); it is the transcendent spiritual act of One who is sinless ('through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without blemish', 9¹⁴ 7²⁶ 4¹⁵). This gives the offering its eternal validity ('once for all', 7²⁷ 9¹² 10¹⁰), and although 'the sacrifice of Himself' was consummated 'at the end of the ages', its force and value reach back to 'the foundation of the world' (9²⁶, cf. 9¹⁵), and continue for all the time that is to come (7²⁶ 9²⁴).

Two other interdependent ideas remain to be briefly considered. It has already been said that our author may be described as a theological evolutionist, and in no sphere of his thought is this more evident than in his ideas of salvation and of faith. Salvation is not so much the present realization of the redemptive value of Christ's atoning work as a movement commencing here and now towards that realization in all its fullness. It is true that faith is for him the power to bring the unseen realities into touch with the present life (11¹⁴). At the same time, the dominant conception of salvation in the writer's mind is the fruition of hopes originated and vitalized by the teaching and experiences of Jesus. Future dominion in a new world ordered and inhabited in perfect moral harmony (see Westcott, Ep. to Heb., on 2⁶) awaits those who neglect not 'so great salvation' (2³). The basis upon which this lordship rests is the actualized crowned Kingship of the Man Jesus, which is at once the guarantee and the rationale of the vision (2²⁶). Immediately following this view another conception arises dealing with the realization, in the future, of a dominion based upon conquest. Death and the author of death are the enemies which Jesus has 'brought to nought'; and not only has He done this, but He delivers those who all their life were in bondage 'through fear.' The perfect humanity of Jesus is again the avenue along which this goal is reached. No other way is possible, and in Him all may find their servitude transmuted into freedom and dominion (cf. 2¹⁴⁻¹⁵). Once more, arguing from the imperfect realization by the Israelites, under Joshua, of their hopes, the author points out that what they looked for in vain is a type of a higher thing which is now actually awaiting 'the people of God.' Salvation consists in entering into that eternal Sabbath-rest where Jesus has gone before, and where the presence of God is (cf. 4¹⁰). The pivotal conception round which these ideas revolve is the unity of Christ and man, the likeness in all things, sin alone excepted, which was effected by the Incarnation.

Our author's habit of looking on faith as an active force in men's lives displays the same tendency to make the future rather than the present the field of his vision. At the same time, it would be a great mistake to imagine that the present is outside the scope of his thought. Obedience, however, is the word and thought preferred by him when he speaks of the present grounds of salvation (5¹⁴, cf. 11⁸). Faith is for him a force working towards ethical ideals, a power which enables men of every nation and class to live lives of noble self-denial for righteousness' sake, 'as seeing him who is invisible' (cf. 11¹⁻⁴⁰ 4⁶ 6¹² 10³⁹). Of this faith Jesus is 'the author and perfecter' (12²), and here, too, we get a glimpse of that quickening Divine humanity upon which the writer lays such constant stress, and which is the source of the effort demanded from his readers when he asks them to imitate their former rulers in a faith which issued in a glorious martyrdom. J. R. WILLIS.

HEBRON ('association').—1. The third son of Kohath, known to us only from P (Ex 6¹⁴, Nu 3¹⁹, 27) and the Chronicler (1 Ch 6², 18 15³ 23¹², 19). The Hebronites are mentioned at the census taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3²⁷), and appear again at the later census in the plains of Moab (26⁵⁸); cf. also 1 Ch 15⁵ 23¹⁹ 26²³, 30¹. 2. A son of Mareshah and father of Korah, Tappuah, Rekem, and Shema (1 Ch 24⁴²).

HEBRON.—A very ancient city in Palestine, 20 miles S.S.W. from Jerusalem. It is in a basin on one of the highest points of the Judæan ridge, being about 3040 ft. above sea-level. A note of its antiquity is given in Nu 13²², which states that it was 'seven years older than Zoan in Egypt.' Its original name seems to have been Kiriath-arba (i.e. probably Tetrapolis, or 'Four Cities'), and it was a stronghold of the Anakim. In the time of Abraham, however (whose history is much bound up with this place), we read of Hittites here. From Ephron the Hittite he purchased the cave of Machpelah for the burial of Sarah his wife (Gn 23). This allusion has given rise to much controversy. At the time of the entry of the Israelites it was held by three chieftains of great stature, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi (Nu 13²²). On the partition of the country it was allotted to the tribe of Judah, or rather to the Calebites (Jos 14¹² 15¹⁴), who captured it for the Israelite immigrants. The city itself was allotted to the Kohathite Levites, and it was set apart as a city of refuge (Jos 20⁷). Here David reigned seven and a half years over Judah (2 S 5⁵), till his capture of Jerusalem from the Jebusites fixed there the capital of the country. It was here also that the rebellious Absalom established himself as king (2 S 15⁷). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁹). After the Captivity it was for a time in the hands of the Edomites (though from Neh 11²⁸ it would appear to have been temporarily colonized by the returned Jews), but was re-captured by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5⁴⁴). In the war under Vespasian it was burned. In 1167 it became the see of a Latin bishop; in 1187 it was captured for the Muslims by Saladin.

The modern town contains about 10,000 inhabitants. Its chief manufactures are glassware and leather water-skins. In the centre is the Haram or mosque, formerly a Crusaders' church, built over the reputed cave of Machpelah. The modern name is Khalil er-Rahmân, 'the friend of the Merciful'—the Muslim title of Abraham. 'Abraham's oak' is shown near the city, but this is as apocryphal as the ascription of a cistern called 'Sarah's oath.' There is a remarkable stone-built enclosure near by called Rāmat el-Khatti; it has been attempted to show this to be Samuel's Ramah; probably, however, it is nothing more important than a Muslim khan, built out of earlier materials. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

HEDGE.—(1) mesukah, a thorn hedge (Is 5⁹). (2) gāḏēr or gēḏerah—probably a stone wall (Ps 89⁴⁰ etc.). (3) phragmos (Gr.), Mt 21³³, Mk 12¹, Lk 14²⁸—a 'partition' of any kind. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HEGAI or HEGE (Est 2⁸, 1², 2³).—A eunuch of Ahasuerus, and keeper of the women, to whom the maidens were entrusted before they were brought in to the king.

HEGEMONIDES (2 Mac 13²⁴).—An officer left in command of the district from Ptolemais to the Gerrenians, by Lysias when he was forced to return to Syria to oppose the chancellor Philip (B.C. 162).

HEIFER.—The heifer was used in agriculture (Jg 14¹⁸, Jer 50¹¹, Hos 10¹¹), and in religious ritual (Gn 15⁹, 1 S 16², Nu 19²¹ etc.). Israel is compared to a heifer in Hos 4¹⁶, and so is Egypt in Jer 46²⁰, and Chaldaea in Jer 50¹¹. See also Ox, RED HEIFER.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HEIR.—See INHERITANCE.

HELAIH.—One of the wives of Ashhur the 'father' of Tekoa (1 Ch 4⁸, 7).

HELAM.—The Aramæans from beyond the river, whom Hadarezer summoned to his aid, came to Helam (2 S 10¹⁶) and were there met and defeated by David (v. 17). So far as the form of the word is concerned, helam in v. 16 might mean 'their army.' There can, however, be little doubt that the LXX, Pesh. and Targ. are right in taking it as a proper name. Upon the ground of the LXX some introduce Helam also in Ezk 47¹⁸. In this case it must have lain on the border between Damascus and Hamath.

HELBAAH.—A town of Asher (Jg 1³¹). Its identity is quite uncertain.

HELBON.—A place celebrated in old times for the excellence of its wines (Ezk 27¹⁸). It is identified with Halbūn, about 12 miles N. of Damascus. Grapes are still grown extensively on the surrounding slopes.

HELDAI.—1. The captain of the military guard appointed for the twelfth monthly course of the Temple service (1 Ch 27¹⁰). He is probably to be identified with 'Heleb the son of Baanah the Netophathite,' one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23²⁹). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11³⁰) the name is more correctly given as Heled. The form Heldai is supported by Zec 6¹⁰, and should probably be restored in the other two passages. 2. According to Zec 6¹⁰, one of a small band who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to those of the exiles who had returned under Zerubbabel. From these gifts Zechariah was told to make a crown for Joshua the high priest, which was to be placed in the Temple as a memorial of Heldai and his companions. In v. 14 Helem is clearly an error for Heldai.

HELEB (2 S 23²⁹).—See HELDAI, 1.

HELED (1 Ch 11³⁰).—See HELDAI, 1.

HELEK.—Son of Gilead the Manassite, Nu 26³⁰, Jos 17⁷ (P). Patronymic, Helekites, Nu 26³⁰.

HELEM.—1. A man of Asher (1 Ch 7³⁸).—2. See HELDAI, 2.

HELEPH.—A town on the border of Naphtali (Jos 19³²). Although mentioned in the Talmud (Megillah, i. 1, Heleph has not been identified.

HELEZ.—1. One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23²⁹). He is described as 'the Palitite, i.e. a native of Bethpelet in the Negeb of Judah (cf. Jos 15⁷, Neh 11³⁸). But in the two parallel lists (1 Ch 11³⁷ and 27¹⁰) both the Hebrew text and the LXX read 'the Pelonite.'

The former reading is further inconsistent with 1 Ch 27¹⁰, where Helez is expressly designated as 'of the children of Ephraim.' He was in command of the military guard appointed for the seventh monthly course of the Temple service. See PELONITE. 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 2³⁰).

HELL.—1. The father of Joseph, in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3²). 2. An ancestor of Ezra (2 Es 1²); omitted in parallel passages, 1 Es 8⁷, Ezr 7¹.

HELIODORUS.—The chancellor of Seleucus iv. Philopator. At the instigation of Apollonius he was sent by the king to plunder the private treasures kept in the Temple of Jerus.; but was prevented from carrying out his design by an apparition (2 Mac 3⁷). In B.C. 175, Heliodorus murdered Seleucus, and attempted to seize the Syrian crown; but he was driven out by Eumenes of Pergamus and his brother Attalus; and Antiochus Epiphanes, brother of Seleucus, ascended the throne. There is commonly supposed to be a reference to Heliodorus in Dn 11²⁰, but the interpretation of the passage is doubtful. Further, he is frequently reckoned as one of the ten or the three kings of Dn 7¹¹.

HELKAI.—A priest (Neh 12¹⁵).

HELKATH.—A Levitical city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Jos 19²⁸, 21¹¹). The site is uncertain. The same place, owing probably to a textual error, appears in 1 Ch 6⁷⁸ as Hukok.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM.—The name given to the spot at Gibeon where the fatal combat took place between the twelve champions chosen on either side from the men of Abner and Joab (2 S 2¹⁶). The name means 'the field of sword edges.'

HELKIAS.—1. The high priest Hilkiah in Josiah's reign. He is mentioned in 1 Es 1⁵—2 Ch 35⁸ as a governor of the Temple, subscribing handsomely to Josiah's great Passover; in 1 Es 8¹ (cf. Ezr 7¹) as the great-grandfather of Ezra; and in Bar 1⁷ as father of Joakim, who was governor of the Temple in the reign of Zedekiah. 2. A distant ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1¹). 3. The father of Susanna (Sus 1³⁹).

HELL.—See ESCHATOLOGY, GEHENNA, HADES, SHEOL.

HELLENISM.—See EDUCATION, GREECE.

HELMET.—See ARMOUR, § 2 (b).

HELON.—Father of Eliab, the prince of Zebulun at the first census, Nu 1², 27⁷³, 29¹⁰, 10¹⁶ (P).

HELPS.—Ac 27¹⁷ 'they used helps, undergirding the ships.' The reference is to 'cables passed round the hull of the ship, and tightly secured on deck, to prevent the timbers from starting, especially amidships, where in ancient vessels with one large mast the strain was very great. The technical English word is frapping, but the process has only been rarely employed since the early part of the century, owing to improvements in shipbuilding' (Page's Acts of the Apostles; see Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, p. 105).

HELPS.—In 1 Co 12²⁸ St. Paul, in order to show the diversity in unity found in the Church as the body of Christ, gives a list of services performed by various members of the churchly body. In the course of his enumeration he uses two Gr. nouns (antitēmpseis and kybernēseis) employed nowhere else in the NT, and rendered in EV 'helps,' 'governments.' 'Helps' may suggest a lowly kind of service, as of one who acts as assistant to a superior. The usage of the Gr. word, however, both in the LXX and in the papyri, points to succour given to the needy by those who are stronger; and this is borne out for the NT when the same word in its verbal form occurs in St. Paul's exhortation to the elders of the Ephesian Church to 'help the weak' (Ac 20³⁸ RV). 'Helps' in this list of churchly gifts and services thus denotes such attentions to the poor and afflicted as were specially assigned at a later time to the office of the deacon; while 'governments' (RVm 'wise counsels') suggests that rule and guidance which afterwards fell to presbyters or bishops.

We are not to think, however, that there is any reference in this passage to deacons and bishops as Church officials. The fact that 'helps' are named before 'governments,' and especially that abstract 'erms' are used instead of concrete and personal ones as in the earlier part of the list, shows that it is functions, not offices, of which the Apostle is thinking throughout. The analogy of Ac 20³⁸, moreover, where it is presbyters (v. 17 RVm) or bishops (v. 28 RV) that are exhorted to help the weak, is against the supposition that in an Ep. so early as 1 Cor. 'helps' and 'governments' corresponded to deacons and bishops. 'Helps,' as Hort says (Chr. Ecclesia, p. 159), are 'anything that could be done for poor or weak or outcast brethren, either by rich or powerful or influential brethren, or by the devotion of those who stood on no such eminence.' 'Governments,' again, refers to 'men who by wise counsels did for the community what the steersman or pilot does for the ship.'

J. C. LAMBERT.

HELVE.—Dt 19⁴: a word nearly obsolete, equivalent to 'handle.'

HEM.—See FRINGES.

HEMAN.—A Horite clan of Edom (Gn 36²²). 1 Ch 1³⁸ has Homam, but the LXX in both places Heman. Many scholars follow the LXX, others identify with Humatme south of Petra, or Hamam near Maon.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

HEMAN.—There appear at first to be three different men of this name in the OT. 1. A legendary wise man whose wisdom Solomon excelled (1 K 4³¹). 2. A son (or clan) of Zerach of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 2²), probably also alluded to in the title of Ps 88 as Heman the Ezrahite, Ezrah being another form of Zerach. 3. A Korahite singer of the time of David, said to be the son of Joel the son of Samuel (1 Ch 6³³; cf. also 15¹⁷, 19 16⁴ 25¹⁻⁴). As Chronicles in a number of cases confuses the genealogy of Judah with that of Levi (cf., e.g., 1 Ch 2², 43 with 6²), and as the wise men of 1 K 4³¹ are legendary, it is probable that the three Hemans are the same legendary ancestor of a clan celebrated for its music and wisdom. This view finds some support in the fact that the title of Ps 88 makes Heman both an Ezrahite (Judahite) and a Korahite (Levite).

GEORGE A. BARTON.

HEMDAN.—See HAMRAN.

HEMLOCK.—See GALL, WORMWOOD.

HEV.—See COCK.

HEN.—In Zec 6¹⁴ 'Hen the son of Zephaniah' is mentioned amongst those whose memory was to be perpetuated by the crowns laid up in the Temple (so AV, RV). Some would substitute for 'Hen' the name 'Joshua' [Josiah] found in v. 10.

HENA.—A word occurring in conjunction with Ivvah (2 K 18³⁴ 19⁴, Is 37³³). Both are probably place-names. Büsching has identified Hena with the modern Ana on the Euphrates; and Sachau supposes that Ivvah is 'Imm' between Aleppo and Antioch. The Targum, however, takes the words as verb-forms, and reads 'he has driven away and overturned.' Hommel regards them as divine star-names (cf. Arab. al-han'a and al-awwad). Cheyne emends the text, striking out Hena, and reading Ivvah as 'Azzah' (= Gaza). W. M. NESSITT.

HENADAD.—A Levite (Ezr 3², Neh 3¹⁸, 24 10⁹).

HENNA.—See CAMPHIRE.

HEPHER.—1. Son of Gilead the Manassite, and father of Zelophehad, Nu 26²⁸ 27¹, Jos 17¹⁴ (P). Patronymic, Hepherites (Nu 26²⁸). 2. One of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 4⁴). 3. A Mecherathite, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11³⁸). 4. A Canaanite royal city, named immediately before Aphek (Jos 12¹⁷). The site is uncertain. The land of Hopher is mentioned in 1 K 4¹¹ along with Socoh.

HEPHZI-BAH ('she in whom is my delight').—1. The mother of Manasseh, king of Judah (2 K 21¹). 2. Symbolic name of the Zion of Messianic times (Is 62⁴).

HERALD.—The word occurs only in Dn 3⁴ as tr. of Aram. kārōz (probably = Gr. kēryx). The herald is the mouthpiece of the king's commands (cf. Gn 41⁴, Est 6³). It is found also in RVm of 1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹, 2 P 2⁸, of St. Paul and Noah as heralds of God. The cognate Gr. verb and noun are regularly used in NT of 'preaching.' 'Crier' occurs in Sir 20¹⁸. There is no instance in the Bible of the employment of 'heralds' in war.

C. W. EMMET.

HERB.—(1) yārāq, yereq, twice tr. 'green thing' (Ex 10¹⁵, Is 15²); gan yārāq, 'garden of herbs,' Dt 11¹⁰, 1 K 21¹². (2) zēb, herbage in general, Gn 1¹¹ (cf. Arab. ushb). See GRASS. (3) deshe is six times tr. 'herb' (Dt 32², 2 K 19²⁸, Job 38¹⁷, Ps 37¹, Is 37²⁷ 66¹⁴). (4) ōrōth, 2 K 4³⁸ 'herbs.' This is explained to be the plant colewort, but may have been any eatable herbs that survived the drought. The expressions 'dew of herbs' (Is 26¹⁹ AV) and 'upon herbs' (Is 18⁴ AV) are obscure. In the NT we have the Gr. terms botanē (He 6⁷ 'grass') and luchanon = yereq (Mt 13³¹).

See also BITTER HERBS. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HERCULES is mentioned by this name only in 2 Mac 4¹⁹ 30, where Jason, the head of the Hellenizing party in Jerus. (B.C. 174), sent 300 silver drachmas (about £12, 10s.) to Tyre as an offering in honour of Hercules, the tutelary deity of that city. Hercules was worshipped at Tyre from very early times, and his temple in that place was, according to Herod, ii. 44, as old as the city itself, 2300 years before his own time. As a personification of the sun he afforded an example of the nature-worship so common among the Phœn., Egypt., and other nations of antiquity.

HERD.—See CATTLE, OX, SHEEP.

HEREAFTER.—In Mt 26⁴ 'Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,' the meaning of 'hereafter' is 'from this time' (RV 'henceforth'). So Mk 11¹⁴, Lk 22²⁹, Jn 1¹ 14²⁰. Elsewhere the meaning is 'at some time in the future,' as Jn 13⁷ 'What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter.'

HEREDITY, which may be defined as 'the hereditary transmission of qualities, or even acquirements,' so far as it is a scientific theory, is not anticipated in Holy Scripture. That men are 'made of one' (Ac 17²⁶ RV) is a fact of experience, which, in common with all literature, the Bible assumes. The unsophisticated are content to argue from like to like, that is, by analogy. But the modern doctrine of heredity, rooted as it is in the science of biology, involves the recognition of a principle or law according to which characters are transmitted from parents to offspring. Of this there is no trace in the Bible. Theology is therefore not directly interested in the differences between Weismann and the older exponents of Evolution.

1. In the OT, which is the basis of the doctrine of the NT, there is no dogmatic purpose, and therefore no attempt to account for the fact that 'all flesh' has 'corrupted his way upon the earth' (Gn 6¹²), and that 'there is none that doeth good' (Ps 14¹). A perfectly consistent point of view is not to be expected. Not a philosophical people, the Hebrews start from the obvious fact of the unity of the race in the possession of common flesh and blood (Job 14¹ 15¹⁴), the son being begotten after the image of the father (Gn 5²; cf. He 2¹⁴). This is more especially emphasized in the unity of the race of Abraham, that 'Israel after the flesh' (1 Co 10¹⁸), whose were the fathers and the promises (Ro 9⁴, 5). But the Bible never commits itself to a theory of the generation or procreation of the spirit, which is apparently given by God to each individual (Gn 2⁷ 7², Job 33⁴), constitutes the personality ('life' 2 S 1⁹, 'soul' Nu 5⁶), and is withdrawn at death (Ec 12⁷). This is the source of Ezekiel's emphasis on individual responsibility (18), a criticism of the proverb concerning sour grapes (v.²), which was made to rest on an admitted principle of the Mosaic covenant, the visitation upon the children of the fathers' sins (Ex 20⁵). This principle involves corporate guilt; which, though sometimes reduced to a pardonable weakness inseparable from flesh (Ps 78³⁹ 103¹⁴, Job 10⁹), and therefore suggestive of heredity, yet, as involving Divine wrath and punishment, cannot be regarded as a palliation of transgression (Ex 34⁷, Ps 71¹, Ro 11²). Sin in the OT is disobedience, a breach of personal relations, needing from God forgiveness (Ex 34⁶ 7, Is 43²⁵); and cannot therefore be explained on the principle of hereditary transmission. Moreover, the unity of Israel is as much one of external status as of physical nature, of the inheritance of the firstborn no less than of community in flesh and blood (Ex 4²²; cf. Gn 25²² 27³⁶). Similarly Adam is represented as degraded to a lower status by his sin, as cast out of the garden and begetting children in banishment from God's presence.

2. Such are the materials from which NT theology works out its doctrine of original sin, not a transmitted tendency or bias towards evil, but a submission to the power of the devil which may be predicated of the whole race. [See art. SIN.] J. G. SIMPSON.

HERES.—1. A mountain from which the Danites failed to expel the Amorites (Jg 1³⁴). It is probably connected with Beth-shemesh (1 K 4², 2 Ch 28¹⁸) or Ir-shemesh (Jos 19⁴¹), on the boundary between Judah and Dan. 2. In Jg 8¹³ (RV) 'the ascent of Heres' is mentioned as the spot from which Gideon returned after the defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna. Both the topography and the text of the narrative are doubtful. See also IR-HA-HERES, TIMNATH-HERES, TIMNATH-SERAH.

HERESH.—A Levite (1 Ch 9¹⁵).

HERESY.—The word 'heresy' (Gr. haireisis) is never used in the NT in the technical sense in which we find it by the first quarter of the 2nd cent., as a doctrinal departure from the true faith of the Church, implying a separation from its communion. The usual NT meaning of haireisis is simply a party, school, or sect; and sect is the word by which it is most frequently rendered. In Acts this is the invariable use. Thus it is applied to the parties of the Pharisees and Sadducees (5¹⁷ 15⁵ 26⁴), precisely as in Jos. (Ant. XIII. v. 9). Similarly it is used of the followers of Christ, though not by themselves (24¹⁴ 28²²). In 24¹⁴ St. Paul substitutes 'the Way' for his accusers' term 'a sect.' The reason may partly have been that in his own usage haireisis, while still bearing the general sense of 'party,' had come to convey a reproach as applied to Christians.

There was nothing that distressed St. Paul more than the presence of strife and party-feeling among his converts. The unity of the Church as the body of Christ was one of his ruling ideas (1 Co 12¹², Ro 12⁵, Eph 1¹⁰ 5²⁹, Col 1¹⁸ 2¹⁹); and the existence of factions, as fatal to the sense of unity, was strongly deprecated and condemned (Gal 5²⁰, 1 Co 11¹⁹; cf. 'heretic,' Tit 3¹⁰). 'Heresy' was division or schism (1 Co 11¹⁸ 19 shows that 'heresy' and 'division' [Gr. schisma] were practically synonymous); and 'schism' was a rending or cleaving of the body of Christ (12²⁵ 27). It was not doctrinal aberration from the truth, however, but practical breaches of the law of brotherly love that the Apostle condemned under the name of 'heresy' (see esp., as illustrating this, 1 Co 11¹⁸).

Outside of Acts and the Pauline Epp., haireisis is used in the NT only in 2 P 2¹. In this, probably the latest of the NT writings, we see a marked advance towards the subsequent ecclesiastical meaning of the word. The 'damnable (RV 'destructive') heresies' here spoken of spring not merely from a selfish and factious spirit, but from false teaching. As yet, however, there seems to be no thought of the existence of heretical bodies outside of the general Christian communion. The heresies are false teachings (v.¹) leading to 'licentious doings' (v.²), but they are 'brought in,' says the writer, among you. J. C. LAMBERT.

HERETH.—A forest which was one of the hiding-places of David (1 S 22⁵). The reference may be to the wooded mountain E. of Adullam, where the village of Kharas now stands.

HERMAS.—A Christian at Rome, saluted in Ro 16¹⁴. The name is a common one, especially among slaves. Origen identifies this Hermas with the celebrated author of The Shepherd, a book considered by many in the 2nd cent. to be on a level with Scripture. For the disputed date of the book, which professes to record visions seen in the episcopate of Clement (c. A.D. 90–100), but which is said in the Muratorian Fragment (c. 180–200?) to have been written in the episcopate of Pius (not before A.D. 139), see Salmon's Introd. to the NT, Lect. xxvi. But Origen's identification is very improbable, the dates being scarcely compatible, and the name so common.

A. J. MACLEAN.

HERMES.—One of those greeted in Ro 16¹⁴, possibly a slave in Cæsar's household. Hermes was a very common slave's name (Lightfoot, Philipp. p. 176).

A. J. MACLEAN.

HERMOGENES.—A companion of St. Paul, who, with Phygelus and 'all that are in Asia,' deserted him (2 Ti 1¹⁵). The defection may probably have occurred at a time long past when St. Paul wrote (note RV). The AV refers to a defection at Rome, perhaps of natives of the province Asia in the city; but the aorist is against this.

A. J. MACLEAN.

HERMON.—The highest mountain in Syria (9050 ft. high), a spur of the Anti-Lebanon. Its name means 'apart' or 'sanctuary,' and refers to its ancient sanctity (cf. Ps 89¹²); and the name 'mount Baal-hermon,' Jg 3³). Meagre traces of ruins remain on its summit, probably connected, at least partly, with a former high place. According to Dt 3³, it was called Sirion by the Sidonians and Senir (wh. see) by the Amorites. It may have been the scene of the Transfiguration (Mk 9⁹). The summit has three peaks, that on the S.E. being the highest. Snow lies on the top throughout the year, except in the autumn of some years; but usually there is a certain amount in the ravines. The top is bare above the snow-line; below it is richly wooded and covered with vineyards. The Syrian bear can sometimes be seen here; seldom, if ever, anywhere else. The modern name is Jebel ash-Sheikh, 'the Mountain of the Chief.'

HERMONITES.—A mistaken tr. in Ps 42⁵ AV, corrected in RV to Hermans, and referring to the three peaks of the summit of Hermon (wh. see).

HEROD.—The main interest attaching to the Herods is not concerned with their character as individual rulers. They acquire dignity when they are viewed as parts of a supremely dramatic situation in universal history. The fundamental elements in the situation are two. First, the course of world-power in antiquity, and the relation between it and the political principle in the constitution of the Chosen People. Second, the religious genius of Judaism, and its relation to the political elements in the experience of the Jews.

A glance at the map shows that Palestine is an organic part of the Mediterranean world. When, under the successors of Alexander, the centre of political gravity shifted from Persia to the shores of the Great Sea, the door was finally closed against the possibility of political autonomy in the Holy Land. The kingdom of the Seleucids had a much larger stake in the internal affairs of the country than the Persian Empire thought of claiming. For one thing, the political genius of the Greeks demanded a more closely knit State than the Persian. For another, the fact that Palestine was the frontier towards Egypt made its political assimilation to Northern Syria a military necessity. The Maccabean War gave rise to the second Jewish State. But it was short-lived. Only during the disintegration of the house of Seleucus could it breathe freely. The moment Rome stretched out her hands to Syria its knell was rung.

The Hasmonæan house was obliged to face a hopeless foreign situation. World-politics made a career impossible. In addition, it had to face an irreconcilable element in the constitution of Judaism. The rise of the Pharisees and the development of the Essenes plainly showed that the fortune of the Jews was not to be made in the political field. In truth, Judaism was vexed by an insoluble contradiction. The soul of this people longed for universal dominion. But efficient political methods for the attainment of dominion were disabled by their religion. The Hasmonæan house was caught between the upper and the nether millstone.

The foundations of the Herodian house were laid by Antipater, an Idumæan (Jos. Ant. xiv. i. 3). Apparently the Idumæans, converted by the sword, were never Jewish to the core. More than once the Pharisees flung the reproach 'half-Jew' in the teeth of Herod. Antipater was a man of undistinguished family, and fought his way up by strength and cunning. The decay of the Hasmonæan house favoured his career. Palestine needed the strong hand. The power of Syria and the power of Egypt were gone. Rome was passing through the decay of the Senatorial régime. The Empire had not appeared to gather up the loose ends of provincial government. Pompey's capture of Jerusalem had shattered what little was left of Hasmonæan prestige. Yet Rome was not ready to assume direct control of Palestine.

1. Herod the Great.—Antipater's son, Herod, had shown himself before his father's death both masterful and merciless. His courage was high, his understanding capable of large conceptions, and his will able to adhere persistently to a distant end of action. His temperament was one of headlong passion; and when, in the later period of his life, the power and suspiciousness of the tyrant had sapped the real magnanimity of his nature, it converted him into a butcher, exercising his trade upon his own household as well as upon his opponents. His marriage with Mariamme, the heiress of the Hasmonæan house, and his league with Rome, indicate the story of his life. His marriage was one both of love and of policy. His league was a matter of clear insight into the situation. He was once driven out of Palestine by an alliance between the Hasmonæan house and the Parthians (Jos. Ant. xiv. xlii. 9, 10). But, backed by Rome, he returned with irresistible force. Mutual interest made the alliance close. Herod served the Empire well. And Augustus and his successors showed their appreciation. They stood by Herod and his descendants even when the task was not wholly pleasing.

Josephus calls Herod a man of extraordinary fortune. He was rather a man of extraordinary force and political discernment. He owed his good fortune largely to himself, manifesting powers which might have made him, in a less difficult field, fully deserving of his title 'the Great.' He enjoyed the life-long favour of Augustus and his minister Agrippa. He made life and property in Palestine safe from every foe but his own tyranny. And though he showed himself a brutal murderer of Mariamme and his own children, not to speak of the massacre of the Innocents (Mt 2), it must be remembered that Jerusalem was a hot-bed of intrigue. This does not justify him, but it explains his apparently insensate blood-lust.

His sympathy with Hellenism was a matter of honest conviction. The Empire was slowly closing in on Palestine. An independent Jewish power was impossible. The man who ruled the country was bound to work in the interest of Rome. Hellenism in the Holy Land was the political order of the day. So Herod built cities and gave them imperial names. He built amphitheatres, patronized the Greek games and, so far as his temperament and opportunities permitted, Greek literature. At the same time, while he was but 'half-Jew,' he sincerely desired to do large things for Judaism. He was a stout defender of the rights of the Jews in the Diaspora. He rebuilt the Temple with great splendour. But his supreme gift to the Jews, a gift which they were not capable of appreciating, was a native Palestinian power, which, whatever its methods, was by profession Jewish. When he died, after a long reign (B.C. 37 to A.D. 4), and the Jews petitioned the Emperor for direct Roman rule (Jos. Ant. xvii. ii. 2), they showed their incompetence to read the signs of the times. Roman rule was a very different thing from Persian rule. When it came, the iron entered into the soul of Judaism.

2. Archelaus.—After some delay Herod's will was carried out. His sons were set up in power,—Archelaus over Judæa and Idumæa, Antipas over Galilee and Peræa, Philip over Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. To Archelaus had fallen the greatest prize, and at the same time the hardest task. Having maintained himself till the year 6 of our era, his misgovernment and weakness, co-operating with the impossible elements in Judaism, caused his downfall and exile. The Jews now had their own wish. Judæa came under direct Roman rule. A tax was levied. Judas of Gamala rose in rebellion. He was easily put down. But the significance of his little rebellion was immense. For now was born what Josephus calls 'the fourth philosophical sect' amongst the Jews (Ant. xvii. i. 6). The Zealots dragged into the light the self-contradiction of Judaism. The Jews could not build a State themselves. Their principles made it impossible for them to keep the peace with their heathen over-lord. Conflict was inevitable.

3. Herod Antipas, called 'the tetrarch' (Mt 14¹, Lk 3¹⁹, Ac 13¹), had better fortune. Our Lord described him as a 'fox' (Lk 13³²). The name gives the clue to his nature. He was a man of craft rather than strength. But cunning served him well, and he kept his seat until the year 39. The corroding immorality of his race shows itself in his marriage with Herodias, his brother's wife, and the wanton offence thereby given to Jewish sensibilities. (See JOHN THE BAPTIST.) His lust proved his undoing. Herodias, an ambitious woman, spurred him out of his caution. In rivalry with Herod Agrippa, he asked of Caligula the royal title. This exciting suspicion, his doings were looked into and he was banished.

4. Philip (Lk 3¹) seems to have been the best among the sons of Herod. And it was his good fortune to rule over an outlying country where the questions always rife in Jerusalem were not pressed. His character and his good fortune together gave him a long and peaceful rule (d. A.D. 34).

5. Another Philip (son of Herod the Great and Mariamme) is mentioned in Mt 14² || Mk 6¹⁷ as the first husband of Herodias.

6. In Herod Agrippa I. the Herodian house seemed at one time to have reached the highwater-mark of power. He had served a long apprenticeship in the Imperial Court, where immorality, adaptability, and flattery were the price of position. That he was not altogether unmanned is proved by his dissuading Caligula from his insane proposal to set up a statue of himself in the Temple; for, in setting himself against the tyrant's whim, he staked life and fortune (Jos. Ant. xviii. viii.). In high favour with Caligula's successor, he came to Jerusalem in the year 39, and was welcomed by the Jews with open arms. He continued to hold the Imperial favour, and his territory was expanded until his rule had a wider range than that of his grandfather. His reign was the Indian summer of Judaism. Even the Pharisees thought well of him. When he was at Rome he lived as one who knew Rome well. But in Jerusalem he wore his Judaism as a garment made to order. He was quite willing to gratify the Jews by putting leading Christians to death (Ac 12). In high favour both at Jerusalem and at Rome, he seemed to be beyond attack. But the veto put on his proposal to rebuild the walls of his capital showed clearly that he was on very thin ice. And the pagan streak in him was sure, sooner or later, to come to light. The story of his death, wherein the Book of Acts (12²⁰⁻²³) and Josephus (Ant. xix. viii. 2) substantially agree, brings this out. At Caesarea he paraded himself before a servile multitude as if he were a little Caesar, a god on earth. Smitten by a terrible disease, he died in great agony (A.D. 42). Jews and Christians alike looked on his end as a fitting punishment for his heathenism. The house of Herod was 'half-Jew' to the last.

7. Herod Agrippa II., son of the last named, before whom St. Paul delivered the discourse contained in Ac 26.

[The genealogical table will bear out the opinion that Herod and his family brought into history a very considerable amount of vigour and ability.]

HENRY S. NASH.

HERODIANS.—The name of a political party among the Jews, which derived its name from the support it gave to the dynasty of Herod. Perhaps they hoped for the restoration of the national kingdom under one of the sons of Herod. The Herodians appear in the Gospels on two occasions (Mk 3⁶, Mt 22⁶ || Mk 12¹³) as making common cause with the Pharisees against Jesus.

HERODIAS.—See HEROD, No. 3, and JOHN THE BAPTIST.

HERODION.—A Christian mentioned in Ro 16¹¹, apparently a Jew, and perhaps a freedman of the Herods.

HERON.—The Heb. word anāphāh designates an unclean bird (Lv 11¹⁹, Dt 14¹⁶), not otherwise mentioned in the Bible, but sufficiently well known to be taken as a type of a class. The occurrence of this name immediately after stork, and followed by the expression 'after her kind,' makes it probable that the EV rendering is correct. The heron belongs to the same group as the stork, and no fewer than six species of the genus Ardea alone are found in Palestine.

HESHBON is the modern Hesbān, finely situated close to the edge of the great plateau of Eastern Palestine. The extensive ruins, mainly of Roman times, lie on two hills connected by a saddle. The site commands views, E. and S., of rolling country; N., of hills, including e.g. that on which el-'Al (Elealeh) lies; and W., in the distance, of the hills of Judah, and nearer, through a gap in the near hills, of the Jordan valley, which lies some 4000 feet below, the river itself being barely 20 miles distant. Allotted to Reuben (Jos 13¹⁷), Heshbon appears in the OT most frequently as being, or having been, the capital of Sihon (wh. see), king of the Amorites (Dt 2²⁶ and often), or, like many other towns in this neighbourhood, in the actual possession of the Moabites (Is 15¹ 16¹¹, Jer 48³ 44¹), to whom, according to Nu 21²⁶, it had belonged before Sihon captured it. Jer 49³, which appears to make Heshbon an Amorite city, is probably corrupt (cf. Driver, Book of the Prophet Jeremiah). According to Josephus (Ant. xiii. xv. 4), it was in the hands of the Jews in the time of Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 104-78). The pools in Heshbon, mentioned in Ch 7⁴, were perhaps pools near the spring which rises 600 feet below the city, and in the neighbourhood of which are traces of ancient conduits.

G. B. GRAY.

HESHMON.—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15⁷).

HETH.—A 'son' of Canaan, Gn 10¹⁸ (J) = 1 Ch 1⁸. The wives of Esau are called in Gn 27⁴⁶ (R) 'daughters of Heth'; and in Gn 23¹⁰ 25¹⁸ 49² (all P) 'children of Heth,' i.e. Hittites, are located at Mamre. See, further, HITTITES.

HETHLON.—A place mentioned by Ezekiel (47¹⁸ 48¹) as situated on the ideal northern boundary of Israel. Furrer identifies it with the present Heitela, N.E. of Tripoli; and von Kasteren and others favour Adlun, north of the mouth of the Kasimiyeh.

W. M. NESBIT.

HEXATEUCH.—The first five books of the OT were known in Jewish circles as 'the five-fifths of the Law.' Christian scholars as early as Tertullian and Origen adopted the name Pentateuch, corresponding to their Jewish title, as a convenient designation of these books. 'The Law' was regarded as a unique and authoritative exposition of all individual and social conduct within Israel: a wide gulf seemed to divide it from the Book of Joshua, which inaugurated the series of historical books known as 'the Latter Prophets.' As a matter of fact, this division is wholly artificial. The five books of the Law are primarily intended to present the reader not with a codification of the legal system, but with some account of the antiquities and origins of Israel, as regards their religious worship, their political position, and their social arrangements. From this standpoint, nothing could be more arbitrary than to treat the Book of Joshua as the beginning of an entirely new series: 'its contents, and, still more, its literary structure, show that it is intimately connected with the Pentateuch, and describes the final stage in the history of the Origines of the Hebrew nation' (Driver, LOT 103). Critics have accordingly invented the name Hexateuch to emphasize this unity; and the name has now become universally accepted as an appropriate description of the first six volumes of the OT. In this article we propose to consider (I.) the composition, (II.) the criticism, and (III.) the characteristics of the Hexateuch.

I. COMPOSITION OF THE HEXATEUCH.—1. The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch was for long regarded as an unquestioned fact. The basis of this belief was the Jewish tradition of their origin which the Church took over with the books themselves. But this wide-spread and long-prevailing tradition cannot be sustained after an impartial investigation of all the facts. Indeed, the Pentateuch itself never claims such an authorship.

The account of the death of Moses and Joshua must, of course, have been added by a later writer. The description of Moses' character in Nu 12¹ cannot be the comment of the legislator himself; while the appreciation of his character which closes Deuteronomy (34⁹) suggests that a long line of prophets had intervened between the writer's own time and Moses' death. Similarly, Gn 12¹ is a reminder to the readers that the Canaanites were the original inhabitants of Palestine—a fact which it would have been obviously needless for Moses to record, but which subsequent generations might have forgotten. Again, in Gn 38¹ a reference is made to the time 'before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' which is explicable only as the comment of an author who lived under the monarchy. The words contain no hint of any predictive suggestion such as might be held to dispute the legitimacy of the same inference being drawn from the law of the kingdom (Dt 17¹⁴), though even then it would be difficult to deny that, if Moses provided for the contingency of a monarchical constitution, the form in which his advice is recorded is largely coloured by reminiscences of the historical situation in the reign of Solomon.

Certain passages do, indeed, lay claim to Mosaic authorship—e.g. the defeat of the Amalekites (Ex 17¹⁴) and the Book of the Covenant (Ex 24¹), the central part of the Deuteronomic legislation, i.e. chs. 12-26 (Dt 31¹⁰).

(In the same way Jos 24²⁶ refers to the preceding section, not to the whole book.) In fact, the care with which the writers or editors felt it necessary to emphasize a Mosaic origin for certain sections, is the surest indication that it never occurred to them to attribute the remaining portions of the book either to Moses or to Joshua, and that they wished their readers to exercise as much discrimination as themselves in such matters. How did the belief in the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch arise? Probably it was a natural inference from the language of Deuteronomy. There is absolutely nothing to suggest his name as the probable author of the four earlier books; but when once Deuteronomy was added to the collection, the name of Moses was transferred from that book to the whole work; much as, at a later period, the name of David was prefixed to the Psalter, though there has practically never been any doubt as to the inclusion of many post-Davidic psalms in that anthology of religious poems.

2. The indirect evidence of the Hexateuch, however, is of more importance; and the multitudinous repetitions, divergences, and even contradictions thus brought to light furnish a convincing proof that the books of the Hexateuch are the result of complicated literary processes, and cannot by any possibility be ascribed to a single author. It will be well to consider these phenomena as they concern respectively the legal and the historical sections of the Hexateuch.

(a) The demonstration that in the Hexateuch we have at least three independent bodies of law, corresponding to the requirements of as many distinct historical situations, may be considered one of the most brilliant, as it is also one of the most certain, of the achievements of Biblical criticism.

(i.) The Book of the Covenant (=C), Ex 20-23.—In these laws we catch a glimpse of primitive Israel. They are directed to the simple needs of an agricultural community. In religious matters, three feasts are mentioned when the sanctuary must be visited; and sacrifice may be done to Jehovah in any place, upon rough altars of earth or unheaven stone.

(ii.) The Deuteronomic Code (=D) gives unmistakable evidence of an advanced civilization. Seven feasts are mentioned; and their original agricultural character is wholly subordinated to their religious significance; the permission as to the numerous localities where Jehovah might be met and worshipped is arbitrarily and emphatically abrogated.

(iii.) The Levitical legislation, or Priestly Code (=P), presupposes rather than anticipates a completely altered situation. The consciousness of sin, and the need of forgiveness, had taken the place of the earlier spirit of joyous festivity which came at stated times 'to see Jehovah' (an expression judiciously altered by orthodox scribes in later times into 'to be seen by, or to appear before Jehovah'). Accordingly P describes with the utmost fulness the ritual of the Day of Atonement; this 'culminating institution of the Levitical system' is apparently unknown to all previous legislation. P, moreover, is in open conflict with D on the subject of the priesthood. In pre-exilic days the Levites were priests, even if one family, that of Aaron, may have enjoyed a special pre-eminence; but P takes the utmost pains to distinguish 'the priests, the sons of Aaron,' from 'the Levites,' the subordinate ministers of the sanctuary—a fact which practically proves the composition of the Priestly Code to have been subsequent to the reforms indicated by Ezekiel. Further innovations may be observed in the means adopted for the provision of the priesthood. Thus, while in D the worshipper himself consumes the firstlings, though of course the priest receives his due, in P the worshipper has no part or lot therein, as they are unreservedly appropriated for the support of the officiating minister. Other differences have also been detected.

Now these divergences might conceivably be susceptible of being explained away by harmonistic ingenuity, were not the conclusions they suggest borne out by corroborative testimony drawn from two independent quarters.

Historically it can be shown that these different codes correspond to different stages of Israel's development. It can be shown that D was unknown before Josiah, and P before the Exile. A minute and patient investigation of such contemporary evidence as we possess in the historical books has proved conclusively that many of the laws of the Pentateuch as a whole were for centuries wholly unknown to the religious leaders or social reformers of the country. It has also been shown that on two occasions far-reaching changes were taken in hand on the lines, and on the basis, of those two later codes, embodied in Deuteronomy and Leviticus.

Linguistically it has become no less evident that each code has its own peculiar terminology, its own stylistic idiosyncrasies, its own characteristic mode of presentation. The continual recurrence of remarkable words, phrases, and even sentences, in each of the three codes, coupled with the fact that this distinctive phraseology and vocabulary is strictly confined to that particular code, and does not reappear in either of the others, practically excludes the possibility of their emanating from the same author.

It may therefore be held to be beyond reasonable dispute that the legal portions of the Hexateuch are incompatible either with unity of authorship or with an even approximately contemporaneous promulgation. Language shows that they are not the work of the same legislator; history is equally decisive against their being the product of a single age.

(b) Passing from the legal to the narrative portion of the Hexateuch, we are confronted with a problem even more intricate and involved.

(i.) There are frequent repetitions. Continually we see the clearest traces of the same event being twice recorded. We may instance the story of Creation, the Flood, the history of Joseph, the Plagues of Egypt, the giving of quails and the sending of manna, the history of the spies, the rebellion of Korah, the appointment of Joshua, the conquest of Canaan. The names of various personages and famous sanctuaries are explained twice and even thrice. These examples must by no means be considered exhaustive; they could be multiplied almost indefinitely. It might, of course, be argued that the author deliberately repeated himself, but—

(ii.) These repetitions are marked by a corresponding change of language, and a difference of representation in the events they describe. We shall take the latter, the material differences, first.

The second story of Creation (Gn 2⁴⁻⁵) seems to know nothing of the six days, and gives an order of the creative acts (man—vegetation—animals—woman) evidently opposed to that given in the first chapter.

In the two accounts of the Flood (6¹⁻¹² 7¹⁻⁵), the former states that two of every sort of beast entered the ark (6¹⁰ 7¹⁵), while the latter states with equal explicitness that for one couple of unclean beasts, seven couples of clean animals were to be admitted (7² 3). One account gives the duration of the Flood as 61 days; the other as a year and 10 days.

In Joseph's history, while one writer explains that at Reuben's suggestion he was thrown into a pit from which he was stolen by the Midianites, the other records how Judah took the lead in selling him to the Ishmaelites (37¹²⁻²⁸ the exact division is uncertain).

The narrative of the plagues (Ex 7¹⁴⁻¹¹) is marked by a series of systematic differences, relating to four distinct points—(1) the terms of the command addressed to Moses; (2) the demand made of Pharaoh; (3) the description of the plague; (4) the formula expressive of Pharaoh's obstinacy' (Driver, l.c. p. 25).

In the story of the spies (Nu 13. 14), the two accounts are so clear and complete that they can be extricated from each other without much difficulty and present us with two wholly independent narratives. In one, the spies explore only the south of Judah, and returning praise the fertility of the land, but dread the strength of the inhabitants; Caleb alone dissents from their counsel of despair, and is alone exempted from the punishment of exclusion from the Holy Land. In the other, the spies penetrate to the extreme north, and on their return expatiate on the sterility of the soil; Joshua is associated with Caleb both in the vain task of pacification and in the ensuing promise.

We may take as a final instance the rebellion of Korah (Nu 16. 17), where it seems that three narratives have been combined. In one, Dathan and Abiram, of the tribe of Reuben, head a political rebellion against the civil domination of Moses, and are swallowed up alive by the earth; in the second, Korah and two hundred and fifty princes of the congregation protest against the limitation of priestly rites to the tribe of Levi, and are consumed by fire; in the third, Korah is the spokesman of an ecclesiastical agitation fostered by the Levites against the exclusive privileges enjoyed by Aaron and the Aaronic priesthood.

These differences of representation are invariably accompanied by a change of language and of characteristic expression—so that out of inextricable confusion there are gradually seen to emerge three literary entities corresponding to the three great legal strata.

(1) Deuteronomy (=D) stands almost alone; but there are several Deuteronomistic additions in the Book of Joshua, conceived in that spirit of bitter hostility to the heathen which was considered an indispensable accompaniment of meritorious zeal.

(2) The main body of the work corresponds to the Book of the Covenant, which is contained in its pages. Laborious investigations have established the fact that this is not a homogeneous document, but a composite work. Two writers have been distinguished; and from the fact that one uses 'Jahweh,' the other 'Elohim' as the ordinary title for God, they have been called respectively the Jahwist and the Elohist, contracted into J and E—while the combination of those histories which seems to have been effected at a comparatively early date is known as JE.

(3) The framework of the entire history is due to the author of the Priestly Code, and this document, which supplies the schematic basis for the arrangement of the whole work, is accordingly known as P.

In conclusion, we should mention H, which stands for the Law of Holiness (Lv 17-26), a collection of moral and ceremonial precepts plainly anterior to the work of P in which it is embodied. There is also the redactor or editor (= R), who fused the different narratives together into one smooth and connected whole.

Even this enumeration does not exhaust the capacity of critics to distinguish yet other sources used in the composition of the Hexateuch. The excessive subtlety and arbitrary methods by which some writers have succeeded in detecting the existence, and defining the precise limits, of multitudinous authors, editors, and revisers, often resting their hypotheses on no surer foundation than the extremely precarious basis of subjective preferences, must be pronounced rather a caricature than a legitimate development of critical inquiry.

II. CRITICISM OF THE HEXATEUCH.—It is the task of criticism to discover the respective dates, and to determine the mutual relations of the component parts of the Hexateuch.

1. Spasmodic attempts have been made throughout the 17th cent. towards a critical study of the Hexateuch; but to Jean Astruc, physician to Louis XIV., belongs the honour of being the first to deal with the subject in a scientific and systematic form (1753). He it was who first noted in Genesis the alternation of Divine names, and attributed this phenomenon to the two main sources from which he concluded Genesis was compiled. This discovery was developed by Eichhorn, and became known as the Document Hypothesis. Eichhorn observed that the variation of Divine names was regularly accompanied by other characteristic differences both from a linguistic and an historical standpoint. Further investigation revealed the presence of two sources, both employing the title 'Elohim.' This theory of a Second Elohist, from which at first many erroneous inferences were drawn, has established itself in the domain of Biblical criticism as a no less unassailable conclusion than the original discovery of Astruc himself.

2. These unexpected discoveries in the text of Genesis naturally suggested the critical analysis of the remaining books of the Hexateuch. But the absence of any such distinctive criterion as the use of the two Divine names made progress difficult. Geddes, however, in Scotland (1800) and Vater in Germany (1802) essayed the task. The latter, in particular, developed a consistent theory, known as the Fragment Hypothesis. He held that the perpetual repetitions and varying phraseology characteristic of the different sections, were susceptible of rational explanation only as an agglomeration of unconnected fragments, subsequently collected and not inharmoniously patched together by an industrious historian of Israel's early literature and antiquities. He believed that Deuteronomy originated in the time of David; and that it formed the kernel round which the rest of the Pentateuch was gradually added.

3. The chief weakness of this second theory (itself a natural exaggeration of the first) lay in the fact that it entirely ignored those indications of a unifying principle and of a deliberate plan which are revealed by an examination of the Hexateuch as a whole. It was the great merit of de Wette to make this abundantly clear. But he also inaugurated an era of historical as opposed to, or rather as complementary to, literary criticism. He led the way in instituting a careful comparison between the contemporary narratives and the Pentateuchal legislation. As a result of this examination, he became convinced that Deuteronomy presented a picture of Israel's life and worship unknown in Israel before the time of Josiah's reformation. Only a short step separated this conclusion from the identification of D with the law-book discovered in the Temple in Josiah's reign and adopted by that monarch as the basis of his reforms (2 K 22). The elimination of D considerably simplified, but did not finally solve, the main problem. A reaction against de Wette's (at first) exclusively historical methods in favour of literary investigations resulted in establishing the connexion that subsisted between the Elohist of Genesis and the legislation of the middle books. This was considered the Grundschrift or primary document, which the Jahwistic writer supplemented and revised. Hence this theory is known as the Supplement Hypothesis, which held the field until Hupfeld (1853) pointed out that it ascribed to the Jahwist mutually incompatible narratives, and a supplementary position quite foreign to his real character.

4. We thus come to the Later Document Theory. Hupfeld's labours bore fruit in three permanent results.

(1) There are two distinct Elohist documents underlying Genesis—those chapters which have undergone a Jahwistic redaction (e.g. 20-22) being due to an entirely different author from the writer of Gn 1. (2) The Jahwist must be regarded as an independent source no less than the Elohist. (3) The repetitions and divergences of the Jahwist entirely disprove the Supplement Theory, and show that he is probably not even acquainted with the Elohist, but furnishes a self-contained, complete, and independent account. Hupfeld found a valuable ally in Nöldeke, who, while introducing some minor modifications, showed how the Elohist framework could be traced throughout the entire Hexateuch, and how it might easily be recognized by observing the recurrence of its linguistic peculiarities and the fixity of its religious ideas.

5. The Graf-Wellhausen Theory.—It will be observed that although criticism had begun to disentangle the component parts of the Hexateuch, no effort was made to inaugurate an inquiry into the mutual relations of the different documents. Still less does it seem to have occurred to any one to regard these three literary stratifications as embodiments, as it were, of various historical processes through which the nation passed at widely different periods. A provisional solution had been reached as to the use and extent of the different sources. Graf (1866) instituted a comparison between these sources themselves; and, assuming the identity of D with Josiah's law-book as a fixed point from which to commence investigations, concluded, after an exhaustive inquiry, that while D presupposes the Jahwistic laws in Ex 20-23. 34, the bulk of the Levitical legislation (i.e. P or the Elohist Grundschrift) must have been unknown to the writer. Testing this result by external evidence, he concluded that P could not have been produced before the Exile, and that in all probability it was compiled by Ezra.

Some details of Graf's theory rendered it especially vulnerable; but it was adopted by Wellhausen, whose Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1883) may be regarded as the culminating point of Biblical criticism. In his opinion—and in general we may consider his views on the main question indisputable—a comparison of the laws with the evidence supplied by the prophetic and historical books shows that 'the three great strata of laws embodied in the so-called books of Moses are not all of one age, but correspond to three stages in the development of Israel's institutions.' Moreover, he justly pointed out that there were no valid grounds to distinguish between the legal and the historical sections: JE, which is mainly narrative, yet embodies the Sinaitic legislation; Deuteronomy gives a full historical presentation; the Priestly Code supplies the framework of the whole. The chronological order of these codes may now be considered beyond dispute—Jahwistic, Deuteronomy, Priestly Code. 'When the codes are set in their right places the main source of confusion in the study of the Old Testament is removed, the central problem of criticism is solved, and the controversy between modern criticism and conservative tradition is really decided' (W. R. Smith, OTJC 388).

III. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HEXATEUCH.—It now remains to note the characteristics of the different documents, distinguishing not merely their literary differences but also their religious standpoint. Perhaps it will be simplest to begin with Deuteronomy, which, being more self-contained, also exhibits more unmistakably the clearest evidence of independent thought and language, and whose approximate age, moreover, can be determined with a precision little short of absolute certainty.

(1) D.—From 2 K 22. 23 we learn that a book of the Law discovered in the Temple created an immense sensation, and provided the basis for the national reformation undertaken by king Josiah in the year B.C. 621 at the instance of the prophetic party. The old theory was that this 'Book of the Covenant' was really the Pentateuch, composed ages before, long fallen into complete oblivion, at length accidentally re-discovered, and finally adopted as the rule of national righteousness. But this view is wholly untenable.

(i.) It is incredible that the whole Pentateuch should have disappeared so utterly, or been so wholly forgotten. The book discovered in the Temple made so great an impression because to every one concerned it brought an entirely new message.

(ii.) History has shown clearly that a very large part of the Pentateuch—the Levitical legislation—did not come into being, or at any rate into force, till very many years later; and that, therefore, these laws could not by any possibility have been included in this newly discovered work.

(iii.) We may add that the account mentions that 'all the words of the book' were read out loud twice on one day. The manifest impossibility of such a feat with reference to the entire Pentateuch has driven conservative critics to suggest a theory of appropriate selections; but this arbitrary supposition is little better than a dishonest evasion.

(iv.) Finally, the 'Book of the Covenant' is a title never given to the entire Pentateuch, but only to certain of its constituent elements.

If negative evidence proves that the law-book thus discovered was only a part of the Pentateuch, positive reasons leave practically no room for doubt that this part of the Law was identical with Deuteronomy.

(i.) The name 'Book of the Covenant' can refer only to Ex 24' or to Deuteronomy. The other title 'Book of the Law' is repeatedly used in D itself as its own appropriate and familiar designation.

(ii.) But we can best judge of the contents and character of Josiah's law-book by observing its effect. The discovery of the book led to two important consequences. (a) An entire reform of the whole system of Israelite religion, the abolition of local sanctuaries, and the centralisation of all sacrificial worship in the Temple at Jerusalem. (b) The celebration of a great Passover strictly in accordance with the ceremonies prescribed in the new book, by the entire people.

Stylistically and linguistically, the distinguishing characteristics of D are very marked. 'In vocabulary, indeed, it presents comparatively few exceptional words; but particular words and phrases, consisting sometimes of entire clauses, recur with extraordinary frequency, giving a distinctive colouring to every part of the work' (Driver, op. cit. 99). So much so, indeed, that it is possible to recognize immediately a passage of Deuteronomist authorship, or written under Deuteronomist influence. (For a convenient conspectus of such words and phrases the reader is referred to the careful synopsis, ib. 99-102.) The style is free and flowing; long and stately periods abound; but there is no affectation or monotony in the persuasive eloquence with which the writer urges the claims of Jahweh upon Israel.

Theologically, the distinctive feature of D is the law of the one sanctuary, which is perpetually enforced with solemn warnings; but it is, after all, only an external method of realizing the inmost thought of the book—the greatness of God's love in the election and redemption of Israel, and the response for which He looks in the entire devotion of the human heart. This truly prophetic theme is handled with such warmth and tenderness as to justify its happily chosen designation as 'the Gospel of the OT.'

(2) P.—If D represents the prophetic formulation of Mosaic legislation, viewed in the light of the subsequent history and religious experiences of four centuries, so does P show us how, a hundred years later, when the theocracy found practical embodiment in the realization of priestly ideals, the early history of Israel was interpreted in accordance with the requirements of a later age. Just as the law of the one sanctuary in Deut. is the practical application of Isaiah's doctrine concerning the sanctity and inviolability of Zion, so the separation of the Levites from the priests, which is perpetually emphasized throughout Leviticus, is really the outcome of Ezekiel's suggestion as to the best solution of the difficulty which arose when, in consequence of Josiah's reformation, the high places were suppressed, and the priests who served them were consequently dispossessed of all means of subsistence. It was Ezekiel's idea that the Levites, though previously enjoying full priestly rights, should forfeit their privileges in consequence of their participation in the idolatrous practices which had characterized the worship at the high places, and should be degraded to the performance of menial duties connected with the cultus established at Jerusalem. A comparison of the theology and of the historical circumstances presupposed by P practically demonstrates its origin to be later than Ezekiel. Of course this refers only to its literary production, not to all its contents, some of which (e.g. the 'Law of Holiness') are plainly derived from a much more ancient source. It is, however, a mistake to view P as simply a code dealing with ritual regulations, or as the religious law-book of the restored community. The author, writing from a priestly standpoint, aims at giving a complete and systematic account of the 'origins,' both political and religious, of his nation. Accordingly chronological lists, enumeration of names, and other similar statistics constitute a prominent feature of his narrative; and by those signs throughout the entire Hexateuch it becomes easy to distinguish the writer. As a rule, he is content to give a mere outline of the history, unless it becomes necessary to explain the origin of some ceremonial institution. In representing God's converse with men, he shrinks from using the forcible, familiar language which earlier writers employed without scruple. Anthropomorphisms are rare, angels and dreams are not mentioned. On the other hand, P nowhere deals with those deeper spiritual problems—the origin of evil, the purpose of election, the idea of a universal mission, the Messianic hope—which were so marked a feature in Israel's religious consciousness, and which both claimed and received sympathetic, if not systematic, treatment from the other authors of the Hexateuch.

The style of P is scarcely less distinctive than that of D. It is 'stereotyped, measured, and prosaic.' There is a marked absence of the poetical element; and a no less marked repetition of stated formulae. Even the historical sections are marked by a quasi-legal phraseology, while the methodical completeness with which details are described, and directions given, tends at times to degenerate into monotonous prolixity.

There can be no doubt that P with its systematic chronology furnishes the historical and literary framework of the Hexateuch; but the obvious deduction that it was therefore the earliest document, to which the others were in process of time attached, has been proved erroneous by a comparison and combination of historical, literary, and theological considerations. We must, however, remember that 'although there are reasons'—and reasons which cannot seriously be controverted—'for supposing that the Priests' Code assumed finally the shape in which we have it, in the age subsequent to Ezekiel, it rests ultimately upon an ancient traditional basis. . . . The laws of P, even when they included later elements, were still referred to Moses—no doubt because in its basis and origin Hebrew legislation was actually derived from him, and was only modified gradually' (Driver, op. cit. 154).

(3) JE.—We now come to the remaining portions of the Hexateuch—which for convenience' sake are known as the work of JE. One is naturally suspicious of any needless multiplication of writers or documents; but the critical analysis of JE forces us to the conclusion that it is really a composite work, embodying two distinct traditions combined with no little skill by a subsequent editor. From a literary no less than from a linguistic standpoint, diversities and even divergences appear which convert doubt into certainty. Yet the compilation has a character of its own, and principles of its own, which may be termed prophetic in distinction from those which find expression in the Priestly Code. Both the documents from which JE was compiled traverse pretty much the same ground, and were probably composed at about the same time. This would largely account for their frequent similarities; and of course it would have been the editor's aim to remove any glaring discrepancies. We thus find the whole narrative characterized by a kind of superficial homogeneity, and also by the same general religious beliefs and hopes. But notwithstanding these considerations, the original independence of the two documents is so manifest in the greater part of the narrative that it has become an almost unanimously accepted conclusion of Hexateuchal criticism. The two sources are distinguished in three ways. They often tell a different tale; they employ different language; they proclaim a different message.

It is in the history of the patriarchs that we first become aware of different accounts of the same transaction (neither of which can be referred to P) standing side by side, although the independence is so marked that it passes into irreconcilable divergences. Similar phenomena abound throughout the Hexateuch. When once the possibility of two documents was suspected, stylistic distinctions, themselves hitherto unsuspected, began to confirm this conclusion. The use of 'Jahweh' by the one writer, of 'Elohim' by the other, furnished a simple criterion, which was not, however, uniformly available, especially after Genesis. But other differences, not sufficient in themselves to prove diversity of authorship, were yet collected in sufficient numbers to lend strong support to the hypothesis which had been arrived at on quite different grounds. But the distinctions are by no means merely literary artifices. While E arose in Northern Israel, as is evidenced by the interest the author manifests in the Northern sanctuaries, J appears to have originated in the kingdom of Judah (cf. the prominent part that distinctively Southern stories occupy in the course of the patriarchal history, and the pre-eminence of Judah, rather than Reuben, among the sons of Jacob). J is a patriot, and takes a loving pride in Israel's early history; but he is not content with the mere facts, he seeks a philosophy of history. He embodies in his narrative his reflexions on the origin of sin, and on the character of Israel's God. He not merely recounts the election of the patriarchs, but realizes that the election is according to purpose, and that God's purpose embraces humanity. The whole patriarchal story is 'instinct with the consciousness of a great future' (Driver), which takes the form of a mission in, if not to, the world. The style of J is free and flowing, vivid and picturesque. His delineation of character, his introduction of dialogue, his powerful description of scenes from common life, if somewhat idealistic, are yet so natural and graceful as to give the impression of unsurpassable charm. Speaking of Jahweh, he is untrammelled by theological scruples, and uses anthropomorphic and even anthropopathic expressions with frequency and without reserve.

E—the Elohist or Ephraimite source—is more restrained in his language, more didactic in his history, more theological in his religious beliefs. The prophetic element is strongly brought out. Abraham is expressly called a prophet, Miriam a prophetess. The function of Moses is prophetic in all but in name; the seventy elders receive prophetic inspiration; Joseph receives the spirit of Elohim; and Balaam's prophetic office is recognized. E, moreover, both in his historical and in his legal sections, emphasizes the importance of a high ethical standard. God speaks through angels and human agents, reveals Himself in dreams. By this means the bold but forceful language of J is toned down in conformity with the demands or fears of a more timorous orthodoxy. It is a curious fact that E ignores Israel's mission to the world; indeed, the author takes little or no interest in the affairs of other nations, or in the universal significance of Israel's history or Israel's hope. It is the theocracy in Israel that engages all his attention, and his work may be considered as drawing from the early history of the national ancestors a much needed lesson for the age in which he wrote—a lesson of the importance of high ethical standards, and of the reverence and worship due to the exalted Being who was Israel's God.

Which of those two histories was the first to be committed to writing is a subject upon which critics are not agreed; but there is a general consensus of opinion that both authors wrote after the establishment of the monarchy. The usual date fixed is the century before a.c. 750. It must not, however, for a moment be imagined that the date of an event being recorded in a regular historical work is contemporaneous with its actual occurrence, and there is no valid reason for throwing discredit upon the narratives or representations of JE because it was not till many years later that oral tradition concerning them became crystallized in a written record.

It may legitimately be asked to what extent the criticism of the Hexateuch affects our belief in the inspiration of the sacred books. Our answer is that we have gained immeasurably. (1) Assuming the whole Hexateuch to have been composed by Moses, the divergences and alterations throughout the entire legislation are so numerous and manifold as to lay the work of the great lawgiver open to the charge of endless inconsistency and 'arbitrary experimentalizing.' (2) The history of the chosen nation was, on the traditional view, perfectly unintelligible. For many centuries the majority of the laws given ex hypothesi at Sinai were not only impracticable but even unknown. Now we see how at each stage of the nation's religious development God raised up men inspired by His Spirit to interpret the past in the light of present requirements, and the present by the aid of past experience; men who were commissioned to develop past legislation into a living message, to show how the Mosaic legislation contained within itself germs productive of an inextinguishable life, ever ready to renew itself in such laws or forms as were required to secure the preservation of the nation and the religious ideals for which it stood. It is true that the Hexateuch has been analyzed into many component parts; yet it was not by one man's mouth, but 'in many fragments and in many manners, that God spoke of old to the fathers' (He 1¹); and it is the realization of this progressive revelation in olden days which, more than anything else, enables Christians to grasp the majesty of that supreme and final dispensation wherein the same God has spoken once for all to us in His Son. ERNEST A. EDGILL.

HEZEKIAH.—1. One of the most prominent kings of Judah. He came to the throne after his father Ahaz, about B.C. 714. The assertions that Samaria was destroyed in his sixth year and that Sennacherib's invasion came in his fourteenth year are inconsistent (2 K 18¹⁰⁻¹³). The latter has probability on its side, and as we know that Sennacherib invaded Palestine in 701 the calculation is easily made.

Politically Hezekiah had a difficult task. His father had submitted to Assyria, but the vassalage was felt to be severe. The petty kingdoms of Palestine were restive under the yoke, and they were encouraged by the Egyptians to make an effort for independence. There was always an Egyptian party at the court of Jerusalem, though at this time Egypt was suffering from internal dissensions. In the East the kingdom of Babylon under Merodach-baladan was also making trouble for the Assyrians. Hezekiah seems to have remained faithful to the suzerain for some years after his accession, but when, about the time of Sennacherib's accession (705), a coalition was formed against the oppressor he joined it. We may venture to suppose that about this time he received the embassy from Merodach-baladan (2 K 20¹⁻¹⁷, Is 39¹⁻⁸), which was intended to secure the co-operation of the Western States with Babylon in the effort then being made. Isaiah, as we know from his own discourses, was opposed to the Egyptian alliance, and apparently to the whole movement. The Philistines were for revolt; only Padi, king of Ekron, held out for his master the king of Assyria. For this reason Hezekiah invaded his territory and took him prisoner. If, as the Biblical account seems to intimate (2 K 18¹), he incorporated the conquered land in his own kingdom, the gain was not for a long time. In 701 Sennacherib appeared on the scene, and there was no possibility of serious resistance. The inscriptions tell us that the invaders captured forty-six walled towns, and carried 200,000 Judahites into slavery. The Egyptian (some suppose it to be an Arabian) army made a show of coming to the help of its allies, but was met on the border and defeated. Hezekiah was compelled to release the captive Padi, who returned to his throne in triumph. Sennacherib was detained at Lachish by the stubborn resistance of that fortress, and could send only a detachment of his troops to Jerusalem. With it went an embassy, the account of which may be read in 2 K 18. 19 and Is 36. 37. The laconic sentence: 'Hezekiah sent to the king of Assyria at Lachish, saying: I have offended; that which thou puttest on me will I bear' (2 K 18¹⁴) shows that abject submission was made. The price of peace was a heavy one—three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold. To pay it, all the gold and silver that could be found was gathered together, even the Temple doors (v. 16) being stripped of their precious metal.

In our accounts we read of a great destruction which came upon the Assyrian army (2 K 19³⁵, Is 37³⁶). Whether Sennacherib was not satisfied with the submission of Hezekiah, or whether a second campaign was made which the historian has confused with this one, is not yet certainly known. There was a second expedition of Sennacherib's to the west some years later than the one we have been considering. At that time, it may be, the pestilence broke out and made the army too weak for further operations. It is clear that the people of Jerusalem felt that they had had a remarkable deliverance. Hezekiah's sickness is dated by the Biblical writer in the time of this invasion, which can hardly be correct if the king lived fifteen years after that experience.

The account of Hezekiah's religious reforms is more sweeping than seems probable for that date. There seems no reason to doubt, however, that he destroyed the brazen serpent, which had been an object of worship in the Temple (2 K 18⁴). The cleansing of the country sanctuaries from idolatry, under the influence of Isaiah, may have been accomplished at the same time. The expansions of the Chronicler (2 Ch 29ff.) must be received with reserve.

2. An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1¹), possibly to be identified with the king of the same name. 3. Head of a family of exiles who returned, Ezr 2¹⁸ = Neh 7²¹ (cf. 10¹⁷). H. P. SMITH.

HEZION.—Father of Tabrimmon, and grandfather of Benhadad, the Syrian king (1 K 15¹⁸). It has been plausibly suggested that Hezion is identical with Rezon of 1 K 11²³, the founder of the kingdom of Damascus, and an adversary to Solomon.

HEZIR.—1. The 17th of the priestly courses (1 Ch 24¹⁰). 2. A lay family, which signed the covenant (Neh 10²²).

HEZRO or HEZRAI.—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23³⁴, 1 Ch 11²⁷).

HEZRON.—1. The eponymous head of a Reubenite family (Gn 46⁹, Ex 6¹⁴, Nu 26⁵ = 1 Ch 5³). 2. The eponymous head of a Judahite family (Gn 46¹², Nu 26¹¹ = Ru 4¹²⁻¹⁹, 1 Ch 26. 9. 13. 21. 24. 28. 41). This Hezron appears also in the NT in the genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1³, Lk 3³²). The gentile name Hezronites occurs in Nu 26⁶ referring to the descendants of No. 1, and in v. 21 referring to those of No. 2 above. 3. A town in the south of Judah (Jos 15²)—Hasar-addar of Nu 34⁴.

HIDDAL.—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23³⁰). He is called Hurai in the parallel list 1 Ch 11²².

HIDDEKEL.—The river Tigris, mentioned as the third river of Paradise (Gn 2¹⁴), and as 'the great river' by the side of which Daniel had his vision (Dn 10⁴). The Heb. Hiddēqel was taken from the Bab. name for the Tigris, Idiglat or Diglat, which was in turn derived from its Sumerian name, Idigna. L. W. KING.

HIEL.—The name of a certain Bethelite who in the days of Ahab fortified Jericho, and possibly sacrificed his two sons to appease the gods of the disturbed earth (1 K 16³⁴). Some obscure event is here applied as a comment on the curse on Jericho pronounced by Joshua. W. F. COBB.

HIERAPOLIS ('holy city') is mentioned in the Bible only in Col 4¹³, in association with the neighbouring towns Laodicea and Colossæ. All three were situated in the valley of the Lycus, a tributary of the Mæander, in Phrygia. Hierapolis on the north side being about 6 miles from the former and 12 miles from the latter. (The best map of this district is at p. 472 of Ramsay's Church in the Roman Empire.) It probably belonged originally to the tribe Hydrelitæ, and derived its title from the medicinal hot springs there, which revealed plainly to the ancient mind the presence of a divinity.

The water is strongly impregnated with alum, and the calcareous deposit which it forms explains the modern name Pambuk-Kallesi (Cotton Castle). Another sacred attribute of the city was a hole, about the circumference of a man's body, from which noxious vapours issued: Strabo (in the time of Augustus) had seen sparrows stifled by them. The city owed all its importance in NT times to its religious character. It had not been visited by St. Paul, but derived its Christianity from his influence (cf. Ac 19¹⁰ and Col.). Legend declares that the Apostles Philip and John preached there, and this appears trustworthy. The fight between native superstition and the enlightenment brought by Christianity must have been very bitter. The city remained important throughout the Empire, and was the birth-place of Epictetus, the Stoic. A. SOUTER.

HIEREEL (1 Es 9¹¹) = Jehiel of Ezr 10²¹.

HIEREMOTH.—1. 1 Es 9²⁷ = Ezr 10²⁸ Jeremoth. 2. 1 Es 9³⁰ = Ezr 10²⁸ Jeremoth (RVm 'and Ramoth').

HIERMAS (Es 9²⁸) = Ezr 10²⁸ Ramiah.

HIERONYMUS.—A Syrian officer in command of a district of Pal. under Antiochus v. Eupator, who harassed the Jews after the withdrawal of Lysias in B.C. 165 (2 Mac 12²).

HIGGAION.—See PSALMS (Titles).

HIGH PLACE, SANCTUARY.—The term 'sanctuary' is used by modern students of Semitic religion in two senses, a wider and a narrower. On the one hand, it may denote, as the etymology suggests, any 'holy place,' the sacredness of which is derived from its association with the presence of a deity. In the narrower sense 'sanctuary' is used of every recognized place of worship, provided with an altar and other apparatus of the cult, the special designation of which in OT is bāmāh, EV 'high place.' In this latter sense 'sanctuary' and 'high place' are used synonymously in the older prophetic literature, as in Am 7⁹ 'the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste.'

1. In the wider sense of 'sanctuary,' as above defined, any arbitrarily chosen spot may become a holy place, if tradition associates it with a theophany, or visible manifestation of a Divine being. Such, indeed, was the origin of the most famous of the world's sanctuaries (see 2 S 24¹⁸⁻²⁰). On the other hand, certain objects of nature—springs and rivers, trees, rocks and, in particular, mountains—have been regarded with special reverence by many primitive peoples as 'the homes or haunts of the gods.' Thus the belief in the peculiar sacredness of springs and wells of 'living water' is one that has survived to our own day, even among advanced races. It was to this belief that the ancient sanctuary of Beersheba (which see) owed its origin. A similar belief in sacred trees as the abode of superhuman spirits or numina has been scarcely less tenacious. The holy places which figure so conspicuously in the stories of the patriarchs are in many cases tree-sanctuaries of immemorial antiquity, such as 'the terebinth of Moreh,' at Shechem, under which Abram is said to have built his first altar in Canaan (Gn 12⁶; cf. 13¹⁸).

More sympathetic to the modern mind is the choice of mountains and hills as holy places. On mountain-tops, men, from remote ages, have felt themselves nearer to the Divine beings with whom they sought to hold converse (cf. Ps 121¹). From OT the names of Horeb (or Sinai), the 'mountain of God' (Ex 3¹), of Ebal and Gerizim, of Carmel and Tabor (Hos 5¹), at once suggest themselves as sanctuaries where the Hebrews worshipped their God.

2. From these natural sanctuaries, which are by no means peculiar to the Hebrews or even to the Semitic family, we may now pass to a fuller discussion of the local sanctuaries or 'high places,' which were the recognized places of worship in Israel until near the close of the seventh century B.C. Whatever may be the precise etymological significance of the term bāmāh (plur. bāmōth), there can be no doubt that 'high place' is a sufficiently accurate rendering. Repeatedly in OT the worshippers are said to 'go up' to, and to 'come down' from, the high places. The normal situation of a high place relative to the city whose sanctuary it was is very clearly brought out in the account of the meeting of Samuel and Saul at Ramah (1 S 9¹¹⁻¹²). It is important, however, to note that a local sanctuary, even when it bore the name bāmāh, might be, and presumably often was, within the city, and was not necessarily situated on a height. Thus Jeremiah speaks of 'high places' (bāmōth) in the valley of Topheth at Jerusalem (7²¹ 19⁴ RV; cf. Ezk 6²), and the high place, as we must call it, of the city of Gezer, presently to be described, lay in the depression between the two hills on which the city was built.

With few exceptions the high places of OT are much older, as places of worship, than the Hebrew conquest. Of this the Hebrews in later times were well aware, as is shown by the endeavour on the part of the popular tradition to claim their own patriarchs as the founders of the more famous sanctuaries. Prominent among these was the 'king's sanctuary' (Am 7¹³ RV) at Bethel, with its companion sanctuary at Dan; scarcely less important were those of Gilgal and Beersheba, and 'the great high place' at Gibeon (1 K 3⁴). In the period of the Judges the chief sanctuary in Ephraim was that consecrated by the presence of the ark at Shiloh (Jg 21¹⁹, 1 S 1³ etc.), which was succeeded by the sanctuary at Nob (1 S 21¹). But while these and others attracted worshippers from near and far at the time of the great festivals, it may safely be assumed that every village throughout the land had, like Ramah, its local bāmāh.

3. In taking over from the Canaanites the high places at which they worshipped Baal and Astarte, the Hebrews made little or no change in their appearance and appointments. Our knowledge of the latter gleaned from OT has of late years been considerably extended by excavations and discoveries in Palestine. By these, indeed, the history of some of the 'holy places' of Canaan has been carried back to the later Stone Age. Thus the excavations at Gezer, Taanach, and elsewhere have laid bare a series of rock surfaces fitted with cup-marks, which surely can have been intended only for the reception of sacrificial blood. The sanctuary of the Gezer cave-dwellers measures 90 by 80 feet, and 'the whole surface is covered with cup-marks and hollows ranging from a few inches to 5 or 6 feet in diameter.' From one part of this primitive altar—a similar arrangement was found at Taanach—a shoot or channel had been constructed in the rock for the purpose of conveying part of the blood to a cave beneath the rock, in which was found a large quantity of the bones of pigs (PEFS, 1903, 317 ff.; 1904, 112 f.; Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 1907, 92 ff.). This cave was evidently regarded as the abode of chthonic or earth deities.

The excavations at Gezer have also furnished us with by far the most complete example of a high place of the Semitic invaders who took possession of the country about the middle of the third millennium B.C., and whose descendants, variously named Canaanites and Amorites, were in turn partly displaced by, partly incorporated with, the Hebrews. The high place of Gezer consists of a level platform about 33 yards in length, lying north and south across the middle of the tell. Its most characteristic feature is a row of standing stones, the pillars or mazzebāhs of OT, of which eight are still in situ. They range in height from 5 ft. 5 in. to 10 ft. 6 in., and are all 'unhewn blocks, simply set on end, supported at the base by smaller stones.' The second and smallest of the series is regarded by Mr. Macalister as the oldest and most sacred, inasmuch as its top has become smooth and polished by repeated anointings with blood or oil, perhaps even by the kisses of the worshippers (cf. 1 K 19¹⁸, Hos 13²).

It is impossible within present limits to describe fully this important discovery, or to discuss the many problems which it raises (see, for details, PEFS, 1903, 23 ff.; Macalister, Bible Sidelights from the Mound of Gezer, 54 ff.; Vincent, op. cit. 109 ff., all with plans and illustrations). It must, however, be added that 'all round the feet of the columns and over the whole area of the high place the earth was discovered to be a regular cemetery, in which the skeletons of young infants, never more than a week old, were deposited in jars'—evidence of the sacrifice of the firstborn (Macalister, op. cit. 73 f.). Similar ancient high places, but on a smaller scale, have been found at Tell es-Safi (perhaps the ancient Gath), and in the north of Palestine, by the Austrian and German explorers, of whose discoveries an excellent summary is given by Father Vincent in his recently published work above cited.

Several examples of another type of high place have been discovered on a rocky summit overlooking Petra; the most complete is that described in Hastings' DB iv. 396. Still another type of Semitic sanctuary with temple, presenting many features of interest, is minutely described and illustrated by Flinders Petrie in his Researches in Sinai, 1906, chs. vi. vii. x.

4. Combining the materials furnished by these recent discoveries with the OT data, we find that the first essential of a Hebrew high place was the altar. This might consist merely of a heap of earth or unhewn stones, as commanded by Ex 20²⁵; or, as shown by surviving examples (see ALTAR, § 2), it might be hewn out of the solid rock and approached by steps. Against this more elaborate type the legislation of Ex 20²⁵ was intended as a protest. Equally indispensable to the proper equipment of a high place (cf. Dt 12¹, Hos 10¹ RV etc.) were the stone pillars or mazzēbāhs, the symbols of the deity (see PILLAR), and the wooden tree-stumps or poles, known as ashēdāhs (which see). To these must be added a laver or other apparatus for the ceremonial ablutions of the worshippers. If the sanctuary possessed an image of the deity, such as the golden bulls at Dan and Bethel, or other sacred object—an ark, an ephod, or the like—a building of some sort was required to shelter and protect it. Such was Micah's 'house of gods' (Jg 17²), and the 'houses of high places' of 1 K 12³¹ RV. The ark was housed at Shiloh in a temple (1 S 1⁹ 3²), and a similar building is presupposed at Nob (21⁶). Every sanctuary of importance presumably had a dining-hall (9² RV 'guest-chamber'), where the worshippers joined in the sacrificial feast (cf. 1⁴).

5. At these local sanctuaries, and at these alone, the early Hebrews worshipped J^h their God. The new sanctuary established by David at the threshing-floor of Araunah, where afterwards the Temple of Solomon was erected, was at first but another added to the list of Hebrew high places. At these, from Dan to Beersheba, sacrifices were offered by individuals, by the family (1 S 1⁹), and by the clan (20⁶); there men ate and drank 'before the Lord' at the joyful sacrificial meal. Thither were brought the tithes and other thankofferings for the good gifts of God; thither men resorted to consult the priestly oracle, to inquire of the 'Lord' in cases of difficulty; and there justice was administered in the name of J^h. At the local sanctuary, when a campaign was impending, the soldiers were consecrated for 'the wars of J^h' (see WAR). There, too, the manslayer and certain others enjoyed the right of asylum. But there was a darker side to the picture. The feasts were not seldom accompanied by excess (Am 2⁸, Is 28⁷; cf. 1 S 1¹²); prostitution even was practised with religious sanction (Dt 23¹⁸, 1 K 14²⁴).

6. 'The history of the high places is the history of the old religion of Israel' (Moore). As the Hebrews gradually became masters of Canaan, the high places to which the local Baals and Astartes had been worshipped became, as we have seen, the legitimate sanctuaries of J^h, in harmony with the universal experience of history as to the permanence of sacred sites through all the changes of race and religion. At these the most zealous champions of the religion of J^h were content to worship. It was inevitable, however, that in the circumstances heathen elements should mingle with the purer ritual of Jahweh worship. It is this contamination and corruption of the cultus at the local sanctuaries that the eighth-century prophets attack with such vehemence, not the high places themselves. In Hosea's day the higher aspects of the religion of J^h were so completely lost sight of by the mass of the people, that this prophet could describe the religion of his contemporaries as unadulterated heathenism, and their worship as idolatry.

While this was the state of matters in the Northern Kingdom, the unique position which the sanctuary at Jerusalem had acquired in the south, and the comparative purity of the cultus as there practised, gradually led, under the Divine guidance, to the great thought that, as J^h Himself was one, the place of His worship should also be one, and this place Jerusalem. The Book of Deuteronomy is the deposit of this epoch-making teaching (see esp. 12⁵). Whatever may have been the extent of Hezekiah's efforts in this direction, it was not until the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah (622–621 B.C.) that effective measures were taken, under the immediate impulse of Deuteronomy, for the destruction of the high places and the suppression of the worship which for so many centuries had been offered at the local shrines (2 K 23²⁴). But the break with the ideas and customs of the past was too violent. With the early death of Josiah the local cults revived, and it needed the discipline of the Exile to secure the victory of the Deuteronomic demand for the centralization of the cultus.

7. To men inspired by the ideals of Dt. we owe the compilation of the Books of Kings. For them, accordingly, the worship at the local sanctuaries became illegal from the date of the erection of Solomon's Temple—'only the people sacrificed in the high places, because there was no house built for the name of the Lord until those days' (1 K 3² RV). From this standpoint the editors of Kings pass judgment on the successive sovereigns, by whom 'the high places were not taken away' (1 K 15¹⁴ RV and off.). This adverse judgment is now seen to be unhistorical and undeserved.

HIGH PRIEST.—See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

HILKIAH ('Jah [is] my portion,' or 'portion of Jah').—A favourite priestly name. 1. Father of Eliakim, Hezekiah's chief of the household (2 K 18¹⁸ etc. = Is 36³ etc., Is 22²⁰⁻²²). 2. A priest of Anathoth, probably of the line of Eli (see 1 K 2²⁶⁻²⁷), father of Jeremiah (Jer 1¹); he is not to be identified with the next. 3. The high priest in B.C. 621, who 'found' during the repairs of the Temple and brought to Josiah's notice, through Shaphan, 'the book of the law' (2 K 22¹¹ = 2 Ch 34¹⁻¹⁹), which occasioned the reformation of religion thereafter effected (2 K 23¹⁻²⁴ = 2 Ch 34^{23-35¹⁹}). Hilkiah headed the deputation sent to consult Huldah on this discovery (2 K 22¹³⁻²⁰ = 2 Ch 34²³⁻²⁸); and presided over the subsequent purification of the Temple (2 K 23²⁶). He was a chief actor in the whole movement. There is no reason to doubt that his find was the genuine discovery of a lost law-book; this book was unmistakably the code of Deuteronomy (wh. see). 4. Father of the Gemariah of Jer 29³. 5. 6. Levites of the clan of Merari (1 Ch 6⁴⁶, 26¹¹). 7. A 'chief of the priests' returning from the Exile in B.C. 536 (Neh 12⁷, 41). 8. A companion of Ezra at the public reading of the Law (Neh 8⁴); he appears as Ezekias in 1 Es 9⁴. G. G. FINDLAY.

HILL, HILL-COUNTRY.—These terms in RV represent Heb. (gib'ah, har) and Greek names for either an isolated eminence, or a table-land, or a mountain-range, or a mountainous district. Gib'ah denotes properly 'the large rounded hills, mostly bare or nearly so, so conspicuous in parts of Palestine, especially in Judah.' Cf. 'Gibeah of Saul,' 'of Phinehas,' 'of the foreskins,' 'of Moreh,' 'of Hachilah,' 'of Ammah,' 'of Gareb,' and 'of Elohim.' har is to gib'ah as the genus is to the species, and includes not merely a single mound, but also a range or a district. It is usually applied to Zion. It is especially the description of the central mountainous tract of Palestine reaching from the plain of Jezreel on the N. to the Negeb or dry country in the S.; the Shephelah or lowlands of the S.W.; the midbar or moorland, and the 'arabah or steppes of the S.E. The best-known har- or hill-country in Palestine is the 'hill-country of Ephraim,' but besides this we hear of the 'hill-country of Judah' (e.g. in Jos 11²), the 'hill-country of Naphtali' (20⁷), the 'hill-country of Ammon' (Dt 2⁷), and of Gilead (3¹⁷). Among the eminences of Palestine as distinct from hill-districts are Zion, the hill of Samaria, the triple-peaked Hermon, Tabor, and Carmel.

HINGE.—See HOUSE, § 6.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF (called also 'valley of the son [Jer 7⁷] or children [2 K 23¹⁰] of Hinnom,' and 'the valley' [2 Ch 26⁹, Neh 2^{13, 15} 3¹⁴ and perhaps Jer 2²¹]).—It was close to the walls of Jerusalem 'by the entry of the gate Harsith' (Jer 19² RV), possibly the Dung-gate. Evidently the Valley-gate opened into it (Neh 2¹³ 3¹⁴). It formed part of the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15⁸ 18¹⁶). The place acquired an evil repute on account of the idolatrous practices carried on there (2 K 23¹⁰, 2 Ch 28³ 33⁶), and on this account Jeremiah (7³¹ 19⁹) announced that it was to receive the name 'valley of Slaughter.' Here perpetual fires are said to have been kept burning to consume the rubbish of the city. Such associations with the Valley led afterwards to Ge-hinnom (NT Gehenna) becoming the type of hell.

The situation of the Valley of Hinnom has been much disputed. Of the three valleys of Jerusalem—the Kidron on the E., the Tyropoeon in the centre, and the Wady er-Rababi on the W.—each has in turn been identified with it. In favour of the Kidron is the fact that the theological Gehinnom or Arab. Jahannum of Jewish, Christian, and early Moslem writers is located here; but this was probably a transference of name after the old geographical site was lost, for there are strong reasons (see below) against it. As the Tyropoeon was incorporated within the city walls before the days of Manasseh, it is practically impossible that it could have been the scene of the sacrifice of children, which must have been outside the city bounds (2 K 23¹⁰ etc.). The chief data are found in Jos 15⁸ 18¹⁶, where the boundary of Judah and Benjamin is described. If Bir Eyyub is En-rogel, as certainly is most probable, then the Wady er-Rababi, known traditionally as Hinnom, is correctly so designated. Then this Valley of Hinnom is a gai or gorge, but the Valley of Kidron is always described as a nachal ('wady'). It is, of course, possible that the Valley of Hinnom may have included part of the open land formed by the junction of the three valleys below Siloam; and Topheth may have lain there, as is suggested by some authorities, but there is no necessity to extend the name beyond the limits of the actual gorge. The Wady er-Rababi commences as a shallow open valley due W. of the Jaffa gate; near this gate it turns due South for about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile, and then gradually curves to the East. It is this lower part, with its bare rocky scarp, that presents the characters of a gai or gorge. Near where the valley joins the wide Kidron is the traditional site of Akeldama. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HIPPOPOTAMUS.—See BEHEMOTH.

HIRAH.—The Adullamite with whom Judah, according to the story of Gn 38 (J), appears to have entered into a kind of partnership in the matter of flocks. After Tamar had successfully carried out her stratagem, it was by the hand of his 'friend' Hiram that Judah sent the promised kid to the supposed qedeshah (Gn 38²⁰).

HIRAM.—1. King of Tyre, son and successor of Abibaal. When David was firmly established on his throne, Hiram, we are told, sent messengers to him, and, in order to show his goodwill, gave David materials for building his palace, sending at the same time workmen to assist in the building (2 S 5¹¹, 1 Ch 14¹). This first mention of Hiram is somewhat abrupt, and leads to the supposition that there must have been some earlier intercourse between him and David, the details of which have not come down to us. A real friendship, however, undoubtedly existed between the two (1 K 5¹), and this was extended to Solomon after the death of David. A regular alliance was made when Solomon came to the throne, Hiram supplying men and materials for the building of the house of the Lord, while Solomon, in return, sent corn and oil to Hiram. Another sign of friendliness was their joint enterprise in sending ships to Ophir to procure gold (1 K 9²⁶⁻²⁸ 10¹¹, 2 Ch 8^{17, 18} 9^{10, 21}). A curious episode is recounted in 1 K 9^{10, 14}, according to which Solomon gave Hiram 'twenty cities in the land of Galilee.' Hiram was dissatisfied with the gift, though he gave Solomon 'sixscore talents of gold.' In the parallel account (2 Ch 8¹⁻³) it is Hiram who gives cities (the number is not specified) to Solomon.

There is altogether considerable confusion in the Biblical references to Hiram, as a study of the passages in question shows. When these are compared with extra-Biblical information which we possess in the writings of early historians, discrepancies are emphasized. While, therefore, the friendly intercourse between Hiram and Solomon (as well as with David) is unquestionably historical, it is not always possible to say the same of the details.

2. The name of an artificer from Tyre 'filled with wisdom and understanding and cunning, to work all works in brass' (see 1 K 7¹³⁻⁴⁷); he is also spoken of as 'skilful to work in gold, and in silver, in brass, in iron, in stone, and in timber, in purple, in blue, and in fine linen, and in crimson . . . ' (2 Ch 2¹⁴). There is a discrepancy regarding his parentage: in 1 K 7¹⁴ he is said to have been the son of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali, and his father a man of Tyre; according to 2 Ch 2¹⁴ his mother belonged to the tribe of Dan, though here, too, his father was a Tyrian.

The form of the name is usually Hiram in the Books of Samuel and Kings, but the Chronicler adheres uniformly to the form Huram, while we find also Hirom in 1 K 5^{10, 18} 7⁴⁰.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HIRE, HIRELING.—The former is used in AV alongside of its synonym 'wages,' by which it has been supplanted in mod. English as in Gn 31⁸ RV (cf. 30^{18, 22}, with 29¹⁸ 30³⁸ etc.). A hireling is a person 'hired' to work for a stipulated wage, such as a field-labourer (Mal 3⁵), shepherd (Jn 10¹²), or mercenary soldier (Is 16¹⁴, cf. Jer 46¹¹). No imputation of unfaithfulness or dishonesty is necessarily conveyed by the term, although these ideas have now become associated with it owing to our Lord's application of the word to an unfaithful shepherd in Jn 10^{12, 13}.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HITTITES.—A people said in the J document (Ex 3^{1, 17}) to have been one of the pre-Israelitish occupants of Palestine. The E document says they lived in the mountains (Nu 13²⁹). They are often included by D and his followers among the early inhabitants of the land, while P tells us (Gn 23) that Abraham bought from a Hittite the cave of Machpelah at Hebron. They are probably the people known in Egyptian inscriptions as Khetu, in Assyrian annals as Khatti, and in Homer (Od. xi. 521) as Keteioi.

It is supposed that the carved figures found in many parts of Asia Minor, having a peculiar type of high hat and shoes which turn up at the toe, and containing hieroglyphs of a distinct type which are as yet undeciphered, are Hittite monuments. Assuming that this is correct, the principal habitat of the Hittites was Asia Minor, for these monuments are found from Karabel, a pass near Smyrna, to Erzerum, and from the so-called Niobe (originally a Hittite goddess), near Magnesia, to Jerabis, the ancient Carchemish, on the Euphrates. They have also been found at Zenjirli and Hamath in northern Syria (cf. Messerschmidt's 'Corp. Inscript. Hett.' in Mitteilungen der Vorderas. Gesell. vol. v.; and Sayce, PSBA vol. xxviii. 91-95). It appears from these monuments that at Boghazkui east of the Halys, at Marash, and at various points in ancient Galatia, Lycania, Isauria, and Cilicia the Hittites were especially strong. It is probable that their civilization was developed in Asia Minor, and that they afterwards pushed southward into northern Syria, invading a region as far eastward as the Euphrates.

This is confirmed by what we know of them from the inscriptions of other nations. Our earliest mention of them occurs in the annals of Thothmes III. of Egypt (about B.C. 1500), to whom they paid tribute (cf. Breasted's Ancient Records of Egypt, ii. 213).

In the reign of Amenophis III. (about B.C. 1400) they attempted unsuccessfully to invade the land of Mittani on the Euphrates, and successfully planted themselves on the Orontes valley in Syria (cf. KIB v. 33, and 255, 257). In the reign of Amenophis IV. they made much greater advances, as the el-Amarna letters show. In the next dynasty Seti I. fought a battle with the Hittites between the ranges of the Lebanon (Breasted, op. cit. iii. 71). In the reign of Rameses II. Kadesh on the Orontes was in their hands. Rameses fought a great battle with them there, and afterwards made a treaty of peace with them (Breasted, op. cit. iii. 125 ff., 165 ff.). Meren-ptah and Rameses III. had skirmishes with them, the latter as late as B.C. 1200. From the similarity of his name to the names of Hittite kings, Moore has conjectured (JAOS xix. 159, 160) that Sileira (Jg 5) was a Hittite. If so, in the time of Deborah (about B.C. 1150) a Hittite dynasty invaded northern Palestine.

About B.C. 1100 Tiglath-pileser I. of Assyria fought with Hittites (KIB i. 23). In David's reign individual Hittites such as Ahimelech and Uriah were in Israel (1 S 26, 2 S 11 etc.). Kings of the Hittites are said to have been contemporary with Solomon (1 K 10²⁰ 11), also a century later contemporary with Joram of Israel (2 K 7). In the 9th cent. the Assyrian kings Ashurnazir-pal (KIB i. 105) and Shalmaneser II. (ib. p. 139) fought with Hittites, as did Tiglath-pileser III. (ib. ii. 29), in the next century, while Sargon II. in 717 (ib. ii. 43; Is 37) destroyed the kingdom of Carchemish, the last of the Hittite kingdoms of which we have definite record. The researches of recent years, especially those of Jensen and Breasted, make it probable that the Cilicians were a Hittite people, and that Syennesis, king of Cilicia, mentioned in Xenophon's Anabasis as a vassal king of Persia about B.C. 400, was a Hittite. Possibly the people of Lycania, whose language Paul and Barnabas did not understand (Ac 14¹¹), spoke a dialect of Hittite.

The Hittites accordingly played an important part in history from B.C. 1500 to B.C. 700, and lingered on in many quarters much longer. It is probable that a Hittite kingdom in Sardis preceded the Lydian kingdom there (cf. Herod. i. 7). The Lydian Cybele and Artemis of Ephesus were probably originally Hittite divinities.

Jensen, who has made a little progress in deciphering the Hittite inscriptions, believes them to be an Aryan people, the ancestors of the Armenians (cf. his Hittiter und Armenier), but this is very doubtful.

Politically the Hittites were not, so far as we know, united. They seem to have formed small city-kingsdoms.

The religion of the Hittites seems to have had some features in common with Semitic religion (cf. Barton, Semitic Origins, pp. 311-316). GEORGE A. BARTON.

HIVITES.—One of the tribes of Palestine which the Israelites displaced (Ex 3⁸ 17 [J]). Our oldest source (J) says that they were the people who, fearing to meet the Israelites in battle, by a ruse made a covenant with them (Jos 9⁷). A Deuteronomic editor states that their villages were Gibeon, Cephira, Kiriath-jearim, and Beeroth (Jos 9¹⁷). Gibeon was six miles N.W. of Jerusalem, and Beeroth ten miles N. of it. Probably, therefore, they inhabited a region north of Jerusalem. Gn 34² (P) makes the Shechemites Hivites, but this is of doubtful authority. The main part of the chapter is silent on this point. In Jos 11³ and Jg 3³ they seem to be located near Hermon in the Lebanon, but 'Hivite' is probably here a corruption of 'Hittite' (cf. Moore, Judges, p. 79). Deuteronomic editors introduce Hivites often in their list of Canaanitish peoples, usually placing them before Jebusites. Perhaps this indicates that they lived near Jerusalem. 2 S 24⁷, though vague, is not inconsistent with this. Some have supposed Hivite to mean 'villager', but the etymology is most uncertain. Really nothing is known of their racial affinities. GEORGE A. BARTON.

HIZKI.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁷).

HIZKIAH (AV Hzekiah).—A son of Neariah, a descendant of David (1 Ch 3²⁴).

HOBAB.—In E (Ex 3¹ 4¹⁸ 18¹ 25¹) the father-in-law of Moses is uniformly named Jethro. But Nu 10²⁹ (J) speaks of 'Hobab the son of Reuel the Midianite Moses' rather-in-law' (hōthēn). It is uncertain how this should be punctuated, and whether Hobab or Reuel was Moses' father-in-law. The former view is found in Jg 4¹¹ (cf. 1¹⁸), the latter in Ex 2¹⁸. The RV in Jg 1¹⁸ 4¹¹ attempts to harmonize the two by rendering hōthēn 'brother-in-law.' But this harmonization is doubtful, for (1) though it is true that in Aram. and Arab. the cognate word can be used rather loosely to describe a wife's relations, there is no evidence that it is ever so used in Heb.; and it would be strange to find the father and the brother of the same man's wife described by the same term; (2) Ex 2¹⁸ appears to imply that the priest of Midian had no sons. It is probable that the name Reuel was added in v. 18 by one who misunderstood Nu 10²⁹. The suggestion that 'Hobab the son of' has accidentally dropped out before Reuel is very improbable. Thus Jethro (E) and Hobab (J) are the names of Moses' father-in-law, and Reuel is Hobab's father. A Mohammedan tradition identifies Sho'ab (perhaps a corruption of Hobab), a prophet sent to the Midianites, with Moses' father-in-law. On his nationality, and the events connected with him, see KENITES, MIDIAN, JETHRO.

A. H. McNEILE.

HOBAB.—The place to which, acc. to Gn 14¹⁴, Abraham pursued the defeated army of Chedorlaomer. It is described as 'on the left hand (i.e. 'to the north') of Damascus.' It is identified, with considerable probability, with the modern Hoba, 20 hours N. of Damascus.

HOBALAH.—See HABATAH.

HOD ('majesty').—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁷).

HODAVIAH.—1. A Manassite clan (1 Ch 5²⁴). 2. The name of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 9⁷). 3. A Levitical family name (Ezr 2⁴⁰); called in Neh 7⁴⁵ Hodevah. 4. A descendant of David (1 Ch 3³⁴).

HODESH ('new moon').—One of the wives of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8³).

HODEVAH.—See Hodaviah, No. 3.

HODIAH.—1. A man of Judah (1 Ch 4¹⁹). AV wrongly takes it as a woman's name. 2. A Levite (Neh 8⁹ 10¹⁰). 3. Another Levite (Neh 10¹³). 4. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹⁸).

HOGLAH ('partridge').—Daughter of Zelophehad, Nu 26²⁸ 27³⁶ 36¹¹, Jos 17² (P).

HOHAM, king of Hebron, formed an alliance with other four kings against Gibeon, but was defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon, and put to death along with his allies at Makkedah (Jos 10²⁶).

HOLINESS.—I. IN OT.—

The Heb. words connected with the Semitic root qdsh (those connected with the root chrm may be left out of the inquiry: cf. art. BAN), namely, qōdesh 'holiness', qādash 'holy', qiddash, etc. 'sanctify', the derived noun miqdāsh 'sanctuary', qādash qēdeshāh 'whore', 'harlot'—occur in about 830 passages in OT, about 350 of which are in the Pentateuch. The Aram. qaddish 'holy' is met with 13 times in the Book of Daniel. qādashand qēdeshāh have almost exclusively heathen associations, qaddish is used in a few passages of the gods, but otherwise the Biblical words from this root refer exclusively to Jehovah, and persons or things connected with Him. The primary meaning seems at present indiscoverable, some making it to be that of 'separation' or 'cutting off', others connecting with chādāsh 'new', and the Assy. quddushu 'pure', 'bright'; but neither brings conclusive evidence. In actual use the word is always a religious term, being, when applied to deity, almost equivalent to 'divine', and meaning, when used of persons or things, 'set apart from common use for divine use.'

1. Holiness of God.—For all the Ancient East, Phœnicians and Babylonians as well as Hebrews, a god was a holy being, and anything specially appropriated to one, for example an ear-ring or nose-ring regarded as an amulet, was also holy. The conception of holiness was consequently determined by the current conception of God. If the latter for any people at any time was low, the former was low also, and vice versa. In the heathen world of the Ancient East the Divine holiness had no necessary connexion with character. The ethical element was largely or altogether absent. So a holy man, a man specially intimate with a god, need not be a moral man, as in Palestine at the present day, where holy men are anything but saints in the Western sense of the term (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, p. 149 f.). In ancient Israel the holiness of Jehovah may in the first instance have been ceremonial rather than ethical, but this cannot be proved. In the so-called Law of Holiness (H, contained chiefly in Lv 17-26)—a document which, though compiled about the time of Ezekiel, probably contains very ancient elements—the ceremonial and the ethical are inextricably blended. The holiness which Jehovah requires, and which is evidently to be thought of as to some extent of the same nature as His own: 'Ye shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19²), includes not only honesty (19¹¹ 30), truthfulness (v. 11), respect for parents (v. 3, 20⁹), fair dealing with servants (19¹³), kindness to strangers (v. 34), the weak and helpless (vv. 14 32), and the poor (v. 9⁷), social purity (20¹⁵ 18²⁶), and love of neighbours (19¹⁸), but also abstinence from blood as an article of food (17¹⁰ 19²⁶), from mixtures of animals, seeds, and stuffs (19⁹), and from the fruit of newly planted trees for the first four years (v. 23¹⁰); and, for priests, compliance with special rules about mourning and marriage (21¹⁻¹⁶). In other words, this holiness was partly ceremonial, partly moral, without any apparent distinction between the two, and this double aspect of holiness is characteristic of P (in which H was incorporated) as a whole, stress being naturally laid by the priestly compiler or compilers on externals. In the prophets, on the other hand, the ethical element greatly preponderates. The vision of the Holy Jehovah in Isaiah, which wrung from the seer the cry 'Woe is me, for I am a man of unclean lips' (Is 6⁵), leaves the ceremonial aspect almost completely out of sight. The holiness of Jehovah there is His absolute separation from moral evil, His perfect moral purity. But there is another element clearly brought out in this vision—the majesty of the Divine holiness: 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory' (v. 3). This aspect also comes out very distinctly in the great psalm of the Divine holiness, perhaps from the early Greek period, where the holy Jehovah is declared to have 'a great and terrible name' (Ps 99⁵) and to be 'high above all peoples' (v. 2), and in one of the later portions of the Book of Isaiah, where He is described as 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy' (Is 57¹⁵). The holiness of God in OT is characterized by stainless purity and awful majesty.

2. Holy persons and things.—In ancient Israel all connected with God was holy, either permanently or during the time of connexion. He dwelt in a holy heaven (Ps 20⁶), sat on a holy throne (Ps 47⁸), and was surrounded by holy attendants (Ps 89⁷). His Spirit was holy (Ps 51¹¹, Is 63¹⁰). His name was holy (Lv 20⁴ etc.). His arm was holy (Ps 98¹), and His way was holy (Is 35⁸). His chosen people Israel was holy (Lv 19², Dt 7⁶ etc.), their land was holy (Zec 2¹³), the Temple was holy (Ps 11⁴ etc.), and the city of the Temple (Is 52¹, Neh 11¹). Every part of the Temple (or Tabernacle) was holy, and all its utensils and appurtenances (1 K 8⁴); the altars of incense and burnt-offering (Ex 30²¹), the flesh of a sacrifice (Hag 2¹³), the incense (Ex 30³⁸), the table (Ex 30²⁷), the shew-bread (1 S 21⁶), the candlestick (Ex 30²⁷), the ark (v. 38, 2 Ch 35³), and the anointing oil (Ex 30²⁵). Those attached more closely to the service of Jehovah—priests (Lv 21⁸, H), Levites (Nu 81⁷), and perhaps to some extent prophets (2 K 4⁹)—were holy (with ceremonial holiness) in a higher degree than others. The combination of merely external and ethical holiness as the requirement of Jehovah lasted until the advent of Christianity, the proportion of the elements varying with the varying conception of God.

II. IN NT.—

The word 'holiness' in EV stands for hosiōtēs (Lk 1⁷, Eph 4²²), hagios (2 Co 1¹² RV, AV having another reading; He 12¹⁰), hagiosynē (Ro 1⁴, 2 Co 7¹, 1 Th 3¹²), hagiasmos (in AV, Ro 6¹⁹ 2², 1 Th 4⁷, 1 Ti 2¹⁵, He 12¹⁰), but in the other 5 passages in which the word occurs we find 'sanctification'; RV has 'sanctification' throughout, and for part of hieroprepēs (Tit 2¹), 'as becometh holiness,' RV 'reverent in demeanour.' The idea of holiness, however, is conveyed mainly by the adjective hagios 'holy' (about 230 times) and the verb hagiazō (27 times, in 24 of which it is rendered in EV 'sanctify'), also by hosiōs (Ac 2²⁷ 13³⁴, 1 Ti 2⁸, Tit 1⁸, He 7²⁶, Rev 15² 16⁶, not in the text of AV) and hieros (1 Co 9¹³, 2 Ti 3¹⁵; RV has in both passages 'sacred'). Of these words by far the most important is the group which has hagios for its centre, and which is the real equivalent of qōdesh, qādash, etc., hieros referring rather to external holiness and hosiōs to reverence, piety. hagios, which is freely used in LXX, but is very rare in classical Greek and not frequent in common Greek, never occurring (outside of Christian texts) in the seven volumes of papyrus issued by the Egypt Exploration Society, is scarcely ever used in NT in the ceremonial sense (cf. 1 Co 7¹⁴, 2 P 1¹⁸) except in quotations from OT or references to Jewish ritual (He 9² 3² 10¹ etc.), and in current Jewish expressions, e.g. 'the holy city,' Mt 4⁵ etc. Otherwise it is purely ethical and spiritual.

Three uses demand special notice. 1. The term 'holy' is seldom applied directly to God (Lk 1⁹, Jn 17¹¹, 1 P 1¹⁴, Rev 4⁸), but it is very often used of the Spirit of God ('the Holy Spirit' 94 times, 56 of which are in the writings of Luke: cf. art. HOLY SPIRIT). 2. The epithet is used in 10 passages of Christ ('the Holy One of God,' Mk 1², Lk 4³⁴, Jn 6⁶⁹; also Lk 1³⁵, Ac 3¹⁴ 4²⁷ 30, He 7³, 1 Jn 2²⁰, Rev 3⁷). 3. It is very often used of Christians. They are called 'saints' or 'holy ones' (hagioti) 60 times, 39 in the Pauline Epistles. The expression is no doubt of OT origin, and means 'consecrated to God,' with the thought that this consecration involves effort after moral purity (cf. Lightfoot on Ph 1¹). In this use the ethical element is always in the foreground. So we find hagios associated with amōmos 'without blemish,' RV Eph 1⁴ 57, Col 1²; and with dikaos 'righteous,' RV Mk 6²⁰, Ac 3¹⁴. The three words hagiōlēz, hagiōsynē, and hagiasmos designate respectively the quality of holiness, the state of holiness, and the process or result. For the sphere and source of holiness, cf. SANCTIFICATION.

HOLOFERNES.—According to the Book of Judith, Holofernes was the general entrusted by Nebuchadnezzar, 'king of Nineveh,' with the task of wreaking vengeance on 'all the earth' (2¹⁻⁴). Before his vast army nation after nation submitted and acknowledged Nebuchadnezzar as a god. The Jews alone would not yield; and Holofernes accordingly blockaded their city of Bethulia. For the subsequent story and the death of Holofernes at the hands of Judith, see art. JUDITH.

Holofernes has been variously identified with Ashurbanipal, Cambyzes, Orophernes of Cappadocia (a friend of Demetrius Soter, the enemy of the Jews), Nicanor (the Syrian general conquered by Judas Maccabæus), Scaurus (Pompey's lieutenant in Syria), and Severus (Hadrian's general).

HOLON.—1. A city of Judah in the Hebron hills, given to the Levites (Jos 15²¹ 21¹⁵). In the parallel passage 1 Ch 6¹³ it is called Hilen. The ruin Beit Aūla, in the lower hills west of Hebron, would be a suitable site. 2. A city of Moab near Heshbon (Jer 48²¹). Its site has not been recovered.

HOLY OF HOLIES, HOLY PLACE.—See TABERNACLE, and TEMPLE.

HOLY ONE OF ISRAEL.—A title of God used with especial frequency by Isaiah to express His transcendence and majesty. The idea of God's holiness is, of course, much older than Isaiah, but to him, as to no one before, it was the central and most essential attribute of God, far more so than His power or majesty. We can trace this idea from the very moment of his call in the Temple. As he felt himself on that day standing in God's presence, his first thought was of his own uncleanness, and this wrung from him a cry of anguish (Is 6²; cf. St. Peter's cry in Lk 5⁸). When this passed away, he heard the angelic choir chanting the refrain, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts.' From henceforth he thought of God most often as a pure, unique, spiritual Being removed from all the imperfections of earth—an idea found also in some of the Psalms (e.g. 71² 78¹ 89¹⁵). It was in a special sense against the Assyrian invaders that God vindicated His claim to this title (2 K 19²²), by showing that the might of man was powerless against His own people when protected by Him. In this sense the holiness and the omnipotence of God are nearly allied, though never synonymous.

HOLY SPIRIT.—The Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit arises out of the experience of the Church, as it interprets, and is itself interpreted by, the promise of the Comforter given by Jesus to His disciples (Jn 14-16). This appeal to experience follows the method adopted by St. Peter in his Pentecostal sermon (Ac 2³³). The teaching may briefly be stated as follows: The Holy Spirit is God; a Person within the Godhead; the Third Person, the knowledge of whom depends on the revelation of the Father and the Son, from both of whom He proceeds. He was in the world, and spoke by the prophets before the Word became flesh, and was Himself the agent in that creative act. Through Him the atonement was consummated. He is the life-giving presence within the universal Church, the Divine agent in its sacramental and authoritative acts; communicating Himself as a presence and power to the individual Christian; mediating to him forgiveness and new birth; nourishing, increasing, and purifying his whole personality; knitting him into the fellowship of saints; and finally, through the resurrection of the body, bringing him to the fullness of eternal life. The purpose of this article is to justify this teaching from Scripture.

1. The promise of Christ.—It is unnecessary to discuss the historical character of the Last Discourses as presented in John, because the fact of the promise of the Spirit is sufficiently attested by St. Luke (Lk 24⁴⁹, Ac 1⁴ 5, 2³²), and its significance corroborated by the whole tenor of the NT. The specific promise of the Paraclete (Jn 14¹⁶ 17, 3¹⁵ 16⁷⁻¹⁸) must be read in view of the wider promise of the Abiding Presence, which is its background (14² 3, 18-23 15¹⁻¹¹). The first truth to be grasped by the Christian disciple is that to see Jesus is to see the Father (14⁹, cf. 12⁴⁵), because the Son abides in the Father (v. 10¹ 17²¹ 23). Next he must realize the true meaning of the comfort and peace he has found in Christ as the way through which he attains his own true end, which is to come to the Father and abide in Him (14²⁰ 17²¹; cf. He 7²⁵ 10¹² 20). So the promise takes, first, the form of a disclosure. If Jesus is not only to embody God but to be the channel through which the faithful have communion with Him, He must Himself depart to prepare abiding-places in the Father's house (14²), that He may lift men to the sphere of His own eternal life, and that where He is they too may be (v. 3, cf. 12²⁶). It is necessary, therefore, not only that the disciple should behold Jesus (16¹⁸ 17, 19) as the Apostles did with their eyes (1 Jn 1¹, Jn 19³⁵) and as later believers do through the Apostolic word (17²⁰, Lk 1³), but that he should abide in Him (Jn 15⁴). Thus the purpose of the Incarnation is fulfilled in the linking up of the chain—the Father in the Son; the Son in the Father; the believer in the Son; mankind in God.

The method by which Jesus is to consummate this reconciling work is declared in the promise of the Paraclete. (For the question whether the word Paraklētos is to be translated 'Comforter,' or 'Advocate,' see art. ADVOCATE.) Having promised another 'Comforter,' the Lord proceeds to identify Him with the Spirit (Jn 14¹⁷), which enables Him to give to the Person, of whom He speaks, the name of 'the Holy Spirit' (v. 26, the Greek having the definite article before both 'Spirit' and 'Holy'). Only once in His previous teaching is He reported to have employed this title (Mk 3²⁹ ||). Mk 12³¹ and 13¹¹ appear to supply other instances, but comparison should be made with the parallel passages in either case (Mt 22⁴, Mt 10²⁰, Lk 21¹⁵). And there is something abnormal in the warning concerning the unpardonable sin, being one of the hard sayings fully interpreted only in the light of subsequent events) cf. Mk 8³⁴, Jn 6³³). But 'Spirit' and 'Holy Spirit' occur as used by Christ in the Synoptics (Mt 12³¹, Lk 11¹³; Gr. no definite article) and in John (3³). Too much cannot be made of this argument, as we are at best dealing with a Greek tr. of the words actually used by our Lord. But it remains true that in these cases a new and unexpected development is given to old ideas, as when Nicodemus fails to understand the spiritual birth (Jn 3¹⁰), or disciples are scandalized by the spiritual food (6⁵⁰), yet both the terms used and the thoughts represented are familiar, and postulate a previous history of doctrine, the results of which 'a master in Israel' ought at least to have apprehended. The passage read by Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁸ 19, Is 61¹⁻²) forms a link between the Gospel and the OT in respect to the Spirit.

2. The Spirit in OT.—(1) General. The OT never uses the phrase 'the Holy Spirit.' In two passages the epithet 'holy' is applied to the Spirit, but in each it is still further qualified by a possessive pronoun (Ps 51¹³ 'thy,' Is 63¹⁰ 'his'). But the conception of the 'Spirit of God' is characteristic, being closely related to the Word (Schultz, OT Theol. II. 184). The distinction between them is that between the breath and the voice, the latter being the articulate expression of thought, the former the force by which the word is made living. The Spirit is the life of God, and, as such, is life-giving. The account of creation in Genesis puts us in possession of the root idea (12²). 'It was no blind force inherent in nature which produced this beautiful world, but a divine Thinker' (Cheyne, OP, p. 322). The Spirit is the life of God communicated by a 'word' (cf. Ps 33⁶ 51¹¹ 104³⁰ 139⁷). This creative principle, which animates the universe, finds a special sphere of activity in man (Gn 2⁷, Job 27³ 33⁴), who by its operation becomes not only a living soul, but a rational being created in the image of God and reproducing the Divine life (Gn 1²⁷). Thus the Spirit is the source of the higher qualities which manhood develops—administrative capacity in Joseph (Gn 41³⁸), military genius in Joshua (Nu 27¹⁸), judicial powers in the seventy elders (Nu 11¹⁷), the craftsman's art in Bezalel and Oholiab (Ex 31² 35³¹). So far there is nothing directly moral in its influence. But above all it is the Spirit that reproduces in man the moral character of God (Ps 51¹¹ 143¹⁰, Is 30¹, Neh 9²⁰), though this aspect is by no means so clearly presented as might have been expected. Wickedness grieves His Spirit (Is 63¹⁰), which strives with the rebellious (Gn 6³, Neh 9⁴⁰). This comprehensive dealing, affecting alike intellect, affections, and will, arises out of the central conception, stated in the Book of Wisdom, that God made man 'an image of his own proper being' (23³).

(2) The Chosen Race. The epithet 'holy' as applied in the OT to the Spirit, though it may include positive righteousness and purity, arises in the first instance out of the negative meaning primarily attaching to holiness in Scripture; namely, separation to Him whose being is not compassed by human infirmity and mortal limitations. The Spirit, therefore, in its more general bearing, is the indwelling influence which consecrates all things to the fulfilment of the universal purpose. But Israel believed that God had a particular purpose, which would be accomplished through His presence in the Chosen Nation. A special consecration rested upon Jacob, in view of which the Gentiles might be regarded as aliens, sinners, who were outside the purpose (Gal 2¹⁵, Eph 2¹² 4¹⁸). Thus the presence of God's good or holy Spirit is the peculiar endowment of the Hebrew people (Neh 9³⁰, Is 63¹¹), which becomes the organ of the Divine self-manifestation, the prophetic nation (Ps 105¹³, cf. Is 44¹ etc.). The term 'prophet' is also applied to those who were representative leaders—to Abraham (Gn 20⁷), Moses (Dt 18¹⁵), Miriam (Ex 15²⁰), Deborah (Jg 4⁴), and Samuel. The Spirit 'came upon' David not only as the psalmist (2 S 23³) but as the ideal king (1 S 16¹³). The instruments of God's 'preferential action'—Israel, and those who guided its destiny—became the channel of revelation, the 'mouth' (Ex 4¹⁶) through which the message was delivered. More directly still, God 'spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets' (Lk 1⁷⁰; cf. Is 51¹⁶, Jer 1⁹), who hear the word at His mouth (Ezk 3¹⁷, 1 S 3¹¹).

(3) Prophecy. This brings us to the yet more definite sphere of the Spirit's action in the OT. 'It appears to the earlier ages mainly as the spirit of prophecy' (Schultz). Among the later Jews also the Holy Spirit was equivalent to the spirit of prophecy (Cheyne). From Samuel onwards prophecy takes its place alongside the monarchy as an organized function of the national life. From the visions of seers (1 S 9², 2 S 24¹¹, 2 Ch 9³⁰) and the ecstatic utterance of the earlier nebi'im (1 S 10¹⁰⁻¹⁹ 19²⁴, 2 K 3¹⁵; cf. Nu 11²⁵) to the finished literature of Isaiah and Jeremiah, revelation is essentially a direct and living communication of the Spirit to the individual prophet (Dt 34⁹, Am 3⁸, Mic 3⁸). Though the Spirit is still an influence rather than a personality, yet as we rise to the higher plane of prophecy, where the essential thought is that of God working, speaking, manifesting Himself personally, we approach the NT revelation. 'The Lord God hath sent me, and his spirit' (Is 48¹⁶, cf. Mt 10³⁰).

(4) The Spirit and Messiah. The point of contact between the OT and NT is the expectation of a special outpouring of the Spirit in connexion with the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom (Ezk 39²⁹, Jl 2²⁸⁻²⁹, Zec 12¹⁰; cf. Is 35, Jer 31³¹⁻³²). This was to distribute itself over the whole nation, which was no longer to be by representation from among its members the prophetic medium of Jehovah's messages, but universally the organ of the Spirit. The diffusion of the gift to 'all flesh' corresponds with that extension of the Kingdom to include all nations in the people of God which is characteristic of later Hebrew prophecy (Is 56⁷ etc., Ps 87, Lk 24⁴⁷). But it is on Messiah Himself that the Spirit is to rest in its fulness (Is 11²⁻⁴). Its presence is His anointing (Is 61¹). This is the connexion in which the relation of the Spirit to the manifestation of righteousness is most clearly shown (Is 11⁵, Ps 45⁷). So when Jesus of Nazareth begins His work as the Anointed One of Hebrew expectation, there lights upon Him what to the outward eye appears as a dove (Mk 1¹⁰ ||), emblem of that brooding presence (cf. Gn 1²) which was to find its home in the Messiah (Jn 1² 'abiding'); in the power of which He was to 'fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3¹⁵); to be driven into the wilderness for His fight with temptation (4¹); to return to His ministry in Galilee (Lk 4¹⁴); to work as by the finger of God (Lk 11²⁰, cf. ||); and to accomplish His destiny in making the Atonement (He 9¹⁴).

Spirit = The life of God.

3. Theology of the Holy Spirit.—These two elements, namely, the promise of a Paraclete to the disciples, based on their experience of Himself, and the identification of that Paraclete with the Spirit of God, based on the older revelation, combine to produce that language in which Jesus expressed the Divine Personality of the Holy Spirit, and upon which the Christian theology of the subject is founded. When first the Holy Spirit is mentioned, Jesus says 'whom the Father will send in my name' (Jn 14²⁶). At the next stage of the revelation of the Comforter, it is 'whom I will send unto you from the Father' (15²⁶). Then it is the Spirit Himself coming (16⁷⁻¹³), guiding (v. 13), declaring truth (v. 13), and glorifying the Son (v. 14).

(1) He is from the Father. The revelation of Jesus Christ is primarily a showing of the Father (14⁹). The principle of Jehovah's life thus becomes in the NT the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Father (15²⁶). This relation is consistently preserved even when the Spirit is represented as Christ's own gift (16¹³). Just as the Son is spoken of as God only in relation to the Father, and as subordinate to, in the sense of deriving His being from, Him, so there is no independent existence or even revelation of the Spirit. The technical term 'proceeding,' as adopted in the creeds, is taken from 15²⁶, which, while it refers immediately to the coming of the Spirit into the world, is seen, when the proportions of Scripture are considered, to follow a natural order inherent in the Divine Being (cf. Rev 22¹). Already in His teaching the Lord had spoken of the 'Spirit of your Father' (Mt 10³⁰). And the special relation of the Spirit to the Father is prominent in St. Paul. By the Spirit God raised up Jesus and will quicken men's mortal bodies (Ro 8¹¹). In the Spirit the disciple is justified (1 Co 6¹¹) and enabled to realize his redeemed sonship and address God as Father (Ro 8¹⁴⁻¹⁶, Eph 2¹⁸). His relation to God (i.e. the Father) is further asserted in many places (e.g. 1 Co 2¹⁰⁻¹², 2 Co 1² 5⁵, Eph 4³⁰).

(2) This is, however, not inconsistent with, but rather results in, a dependence upon the Son (Jn 15²⁶ 16¹⁵, cf. 15¹⁹) which enables the Spirit to become the organ, whereby is applied to mankind the redemptive efficacy of the Incarnate Life (14¹⁷⁻¹⁸, 21, 23, 26 16¹³, 14). Jesus speaks of the Spirit as His own gift (15²⁶). As Christ came in the Father's name, so will the Spirit come in Christ's name (14²⁶, cf. 5⁴⁹). His office is to be the witness and interpreter of Christ (15²⁶ 16¹⁴). The testimony of the disciples is to reflect this witness (15²⁷). The dependence of the Spirit on the Son, both in His eternal being and in His incarnate life, is fully borne out by the language of the NT generally. He is the Spirit of God's Son (Gal 4⁶), of the Lord [Jesus] (2 Co 3¹⁷), of Jesus (Ac 16⁷ RV), of Jesus Christ (Ph 1¹⁹), of Christ (Ro 8⁹, 1 P 1¹¹). It is to disciples only that the promise is made (Jn 14¹⁷ 17²⁰⁻²¹), and the experience of Pentecost corresponds with it (Ac 2¹⁻⁴), the extension of the gift being offered to those only who by baptism are joined to the community (Ac 2³⁸).

(3) The operations of the Spirit thus bestowed are all personal in character. He teaches (Jn 14²⁶), witnesses (15²⁶), guides and foretells (16¹³), and glorifies the Son (v. 14). So in the Acts He forbids (16⁷), appoints (13³), decides (15²⁸). To Him the lie of Ananias is told (5³). And the testimony of the Epistles coincides (1 Co 2¹⁰ 3¹⁶ 6¹⁹, Ro 8 passim, etc.). The fellowship of the Holy Spirit is parallel with the grace of Christ and the love of God in 2 Co 13¹⁴. To the world His presence is not power, but condemnation. He is to convict the world (Jn 16⁸) by carrying on in the life and work of the Church the testimony of Jesus (Jn 15²⁶, 27, 1 Co 12³, 1 Jn 5⁷, Rev 19¹⁰), in whom the prince of this world is judged (Jn 12³¹ 14³⁰). The witness, the power, and the victory of Christ are transferred to the society of His disciples through the Spirit.

4. Work of the Spirit in the Church.—(1) While anticipated by His work in the world (Ps 139⁷, Wis 17) and foreshadowed by His special relations with Israel, the presence of the Spirit is yet so far a new experience for Christians that St. John, speaking of the age before Pentecost, can say that 'the Spirit was not yet [given]' (Jn 7³⁹ RV). As from the point of view of the Chosen Race, those without were 'sinners of the Gentiles' (Gal 2¹⁵), 'without God in the world' (Eph 2¹²), so the world outside Christ is a stranger to the Spirit. This is made clear by the facts of Pentecost. The experience of the descent, attested, to those who were the subjects of Divine favour, by the wind and fiery tongues (Ac 2²), was granted only to the Apostles and their companions in the upper chamber (2¹, cf. 1¹³⁻¹⁴). The phenomena which followed (2²) were interpreted by those outside, who had heard without understanding the rushing sound, either as a mysterious gift of power (v. 13) or as the effect of wine (v. 14).

Whether the tongues were foreign languages, as the narrative of Acts taken by itself would suggest (v. 4), must, in the light of 1 Co 14¹⁻¹⁹, where the gift is some form of ecstatic speech needing the correlative gift of interpretation, be regarded as at least doubtful; see also Ac 10⁴ 11¹⁸. But that it enabled those who were not Palestinian Jews (vv. 5-11) to realize 'the mighty works of God' (v. 11) is certain. The importance attached to it in the Apostolic Church was due, perhaps, to the peculiar novelty of the sign as understood to have been foretold by Christ Himself (Mk 16¹⁷), more certainly to the fact that it was a manifestation characteristic of the Christian community. See, further, TONGUES, GIFT OF.

Though, by the time that St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, prophecy was already attaining higher importance as a more useful and therefore greater gift

(1 Co 12²⁸⁻³¹ 14¹), the memory of the impression created at Pentecost, as of the arrival in the world of a new and unparalleled power, united to the spiritual exaltation felt by the possessor of the gift, was still living in the Church. Nor can the Pentecostal preaching of St. Peter, with its offer of the Holy Spirit to those that repented and were baptized (Ac 2³⁸), be regarded otherwise than as evidence, alike in the Apostles and in those who were 'added to them' (v. 47), that they were dealing with a new experience. That this was a transfer of the Spirit which dwelt in Christ from His baptism (Mk 1¹⁰), carrying with it the fullness of the Incarnate Life (Jn 1¹⁶, Eph 3¹⁴⁻¹⁹ 4¹³), was attested by the miracles wrought in His name (Ac 3⁶, 7 4¹⁰ etc.), the works which He had done and which His disciples were also to do (Jn 14¹²), bearing witness to a unity of power.

(2) The Incarnation. That the presence of the Holy Spirit was not only a new experience for themselves, but also, as dwelling in the Incarnate Son, a new factor in the world's history, was recognized by the primitive Christians in proportion as they apprehended the Apostolic conception of the Person of Christ. One of the earliest facts in Christian history that demands explanation is the separation from the Apostolic body of the Jewish party in the Church, which, after the fall of Jerusalem, hardened into the Ebionite sects. The difference lies in the perception by the former of that new element in the humanity of Jesus which is prominent in the Christology of the Pauline Epistles (Ro 1⁴ 5¹²⁻²¹, 1 Co 15²⁰⁻²³, 2 Co 8⁹, Gal 4⁴, Ph 2⁶⁻¹¹, Col 2⁹).

It is all but certain that this language depends upon the acceptance of the Virgin Birth, which the sects above mentioned, because they had no use for it, tended to deny. The Apostles were enabled through a knowledge of this mystery to recognize Jesus as the second Adam, the quickening spirit, the beginning of the new creation of God (Rev 3¹⁴, cf. 21⁶, 8). If the narrative of the Annunciation in Luke (1²⁶) be compared with the Prologue of John (1¹⁻¹⁸) and with the account of Creation in Gn 1, the full import of this statement becomes apparent. The Spirit overshadows Mary as He brooded upon the face of the waters. The manifestation of the Messiah was, therefore, no mere outpouring of the spirit of prophecy even in measure hitherto unequalled, but God visiting and redeeming His people through the incarnation of His image (He 1¹⁻³, Col 1¹⁵).

St. Paul's protest, therefore, against Judaic Christianity, which, in spite of temporary misgivings on the part of St. Peter and St. James (Gal 2¹¹⁻¹³), received the assent of the Apostolic witnesses, resulted from a true interpretation of his experience of that Holy Spirit into which he had been baptized (Ac 9¹⁷, 18). The Gentiles, apart from circumcision (Gal 5³, cf. Ac 15), were capable of the Holy Spirit as well as the Jews, by the enlargement of human nature through union with God in Christ, and by that alone (Gal 4⁶, 6¹⁶, 2 Co 3¹⁷, 18; cf. Ro. 8²⁹, 1 Co 15⁴⁹). Thus, though the Apostolic preaching was the witness to Jesus and the Resurrection, beginning from the baptism of John (Ac 1²¹, 22), the Apostolic record is necessarily carried back to the narratives of the Infancy. The ministry of reconciliation, though fulfilled in the power of the baptismal Spirit (1 P 4¹⁴), depended for its range on the capacity of the vessel already fashioned by the same Spirit (1²⁸) for His habitation—God was in Christ (2 Co 5¹⁹).

(3) Union with Christ. What, therefore, the Apostolic community claimed to possess was not merely the aptitude for inspiration, as when the Spirit spoke in old times by the mouth of the prophets, but union with the life and personality of their Master (Jn 17²¹), through the fellowship of a Spirit (2 Co 13¹⁴, Ph 2¹) which was His (Ph 1¹⁹). The Acts is the record of the Spirit's expanding activity in the organic and growing life of the Christian Church. The 'things concerning the kingdom' (1³), of which Christ spoke before His Ascension, are summed up in the witness to be given 'unto the uttermost part of the earth' (v. 2) and in the promise of power (v. 4). The events subsequently recorded are a series of discoveries as to the potentialities of this new life. The Epistles set before us, not systematically, but as occasion serves, the principles of the Spirit's action in this progressive experience, corporate and individual.

(4) Spiritual gifts. The NT teaching with regard to spiritual gifts (wh. see) springs out of the conception of the Church as the mystical body of Christ (Eph 1² 2¹¹⁻³⁰ 4¹⁰, 1 Co 12¹²). The Holy Spirit is the living principle distributed throughout the body (1 Co 12¹³, Eph 2¹⁹ 4⁴). The point of supreme importance to the Christian is to have the inward response of the Spirit to the Lordship of Christ (1 Co 12²). This life is universally manifested in love (ch. 13), to strive after which is ever the 'more excellent way' (12³¹). But, though bestowed on all Christians alike, it is distributed to each 'according to the measure of the gift of Christ' (Eph 4⁷). The principle of proportion is observed by Him who has 'tempered the body together' (1 Co 12²⁴). The same gifts or manifestations of the Spirit are not, therefore, to be expected in all believers or in all ages. They are given that the whole body may profit (12⁷). They are correlative to the part which each has to fulfil in the organic structure of the whole (12¹⁴⁻²⁰, Eph 4¹⁰). The desire for them, though not discouraged (1 Co 12³¹ 14¹), must be regulated by consideration of the needs of the Church (14¹²) and the opportunities of service (Ro 12⁴⁻⁶, cf. 1 P 5⁵). 'Each "gifted" individual becomes himself a gift' (Gore).

Nowhere do we find any attempt to make a complete enumeration of spiritual gifts. In Eph 4¹¹, where the completion of the structure of Christ's body is the main thought (v. 13), four classes of ministerial function are named. In Ro 12⁴⁻⁶, where a just estimate of the individual's capacity for service is prominent, the list is promiscuous, exceptional gifts like prophecy, ministerial functions like teaching, and ordinary graces like liberality, being mentioned indifferently. Local circumstances confine the lists of 1 Co 12⁸⁻¹⁰ 28 to the 'greater gifts' (v. 3), those granted for more conspicuous service, most of which are tokens of God's exceptional activity. The object of the Apostle in this catalogue is to show that tongues are by no means first in importance. 'Faith' in v. 9 is not to be confused with the primary virtue of 13⁴, but is interpreted by 13⁴ (cf. Mk 17²⁰).

(5) Inspiration. It is in this connexion that inspiration as applied to the Bible must be brought into relation with the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. No theory, as applying to the whole Canon, is in the nature of the case to be expected in the NT itself. But prophecy is one of the gifts of the Spirit (1 Co 12¹⁰ 28), and it is clear that the prophets were recognized as a distinct order in the Apostolic Church (Ac 11²⁷ 13¹ 21¹⁰; cf. 1 Ti 1¹⁴ 4¹⁴), though there was nothing professional in this ministry (Ac 19⁶ 21⁹). The type was undoubtedly that of the OT prophets (see above), and a distinct link with the ancient line is found in St. Peter's reference to the words of Joel as fulfilled at Pentecost (Ac 2¹⁶ 17, 18). Agabus prophesies by the Spirit (11²⁸). He adopts the method of signs (21¹¹) and the phrase 'Thus saith the Holy Spirit' (cf. OT 'Thus saith the Lord'). Here, then, we have a gift that was conceived as perpetuating the mouthpiece whereby the will of God was revealed to the fathers (H 1¹). The inspiration of the OT Scriptures as understood in the 1st cent. of the Christian era was undoubtedly regarded as an extension of the prophetic gift. They were the oracles of God (Ac 7³⁸, Ro 3², He 1¹²), and as such 'the sacred writings' (2 Ti 3¹⁶), profitable because inbreathed by God for spiritual ends (v. 16). The connexion with prophecy is explicitly drawn out in 2 P 1²⁰⁻²¹, the same Epistle showing the process by which the writings of Apostles were already beginning to take similar rank (3¹⁵⁻¹⁶, cf. Eph 3³). That the Bible is either verbally accurate or inerrant is no more a legitimate deduction from this principle than is ecclesiastical infallibility from that of the Abiding Presence in the Church. In either case the method of the Spirit's activity must be judged by experience. Nor, in face of the express declaration of St. Paul, that 'the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets' (1 Co 14²⁹), may we tolerate any theory which impairs the freedom of human personality.

(6) The laying on of hands in the ministration of the Spirit seems to have been adopted by a spontaneous impulse in the primitive community, and to have become immediately an established ordinance. The place accorded to the practice in He 6¹, as belonging to the alphabet of gospel knowledge, attests the importance attached to it. Like baptism, its roots are in the OT, where it is found as an act of dedication (Nu 8¹⁰ 10, 12 27¹⁸⁻²²; see Schultz, OT Theol. i. 391) or benediction (Gn 48¹⁴⁻¹⁵). Christ uses it in blessing the children (Mk 10¹⁶). The Apostles adopt it as the sign, joined with prayer, for the anointing of the Holy Spirit, by which they effected consecration to an office or function (Ac 6⁶; cf. 1 Ti 4¹⁴ 5²² (? see below), 2 Ti 1⁶), or conferred blessing on the baptized (Ac 8¹⁴⁻¹⁵ 19⁶ 5). The offer of money to Peter at Samaria (8¹⁸) shows that the rite might be, and in this case was, followed by exceptional manifestations, like those which appeared at Pentecost; and that the fallacy which awakened Simon's covetousness was the identification of the gift with these effects. Though associated with the bestowal of the Spirit, the laying on of hands has not yet been reduced to a technical rite in a crystallized ecclesiastical system. Ananias uses it in the recovery of Saul's sight (Ac 9¹² 17); the Antiochene Church, not probably in ordaining Barnabas and Saul, but in sending them forth to a particular mission (Ac 13³). In Mk 16¹⁸ and Ac 28⁸ it is a symbol of healing (cf. Mk 14⁵² 6⁵ 8²³, Rev 1⁷, also Ja 5¹⁴ 15); in 1 Ti 5²² not improbably of absolution (see Hort, Ecclesia, p. 214). According to 2 Ti 1⁶, it was used by St. Paul in conveying spiritual authority to his representative at Ephesus; or, if the reference be the same as in 1 Ti 4¹⁴, in the ordination of Timothy to a ministerial function. The symbolism is natural and expressive, and its employment by the Christian Church was immediately justified in experience (e.g. Ac. 19⁶). Its connexion with the bestowal of specific gifts, like healing, or of official authority, like that of the Seven (Ac 6⁶), is easily recognized.

A more difficult question to determine is its precise relation to baptism, where the purpose of the ministration is general. The Holy Spirit is offered by St. Peter to such as repent and are baptized (Ac 2³⁸, cf. 1 Co 12¹³); while of those whom Philip had baptized at Samaria (Ac 8¹²) it is expressly asserted that He had 'fallen upon none of them' (v. 16). It may have been that the experience of the Apostles, as empowered first by the risen Christ (Jn 20²²), and then by the Pentecostal descent (Ac 2¹), led them to distinguish stages in the reception of the Spirit, and that the apparent discrepancy would be removed by a fuller knowledge of the facts. But this uncertainty does not invalidate the positive evidence which connects the ministration of the Spirit with either ordinance. See also LAYING ON OF HANDS.

HOMAM.—See HEMAM.

HOMER.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HOMICIDE.—See CRIMES, § 7. REFUGE [CITIES OF].

HONEST, HONESTY.—In 2 Es 16¹⁹ 'honest' has the meaning of 'chaste.' Elsewhere it means either 'honourable' or 'becoming.' For the meaning 'honourable' compare Ru 1² Cov. 'There was a kinsman also . . . whose name was Booz, which was an honest man'; and, for 'becoming,' Is 52¹ Cov. 'Put on thine honest rayment, O Jerusalem, thou cite of the holy one.'

'Honesty' in 1 Ti 2⁷, its only occurrence, means 'seemliness' (RV 'gravity').

HONEY.—The appreciation of honey by the Hebrews from the earliest times, and its abundance in Canaan, are evident from the oft-recurring description of that country as a 'land flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 3⁸ 17 onwards). In the absence of any mention of bee-keeping in OT, it is almost certain that this proverbial expression has reference to the honey of the wild bee (see BEES). The latter had its nest in the clefts of rocks, hence the 'honey out of the rock' of Dt 32¹³, in hollow tree-trunks (1 S 14²⁶, but the Heb. text is here in disorder), and even, on occasion, in the skeleton of an animal (Jg 14⁶). In later times, as is evident from the Mishna, bee-keeping was widely practised by the Jews. The hives were of straw or wicker-work. Before removing the combs the bee-keepers stupefied the bees with the fumes of charcoal and cow-dung, burnt in front of the hives.

In Bible times honey was not only relished by itself (cf. Sir 11¹: 'the bee is little, but her fruit is the chief of sweet things'), and as an accompaniment to other food (Mt 3⁴, Mk 1⁴: 'locusts and wild honey,' Lk 24⁴², Av with fish), but was also largely used in the making of 'bakemeats' and all sorts of sweet cakes (Ex 16²¹), sugar being then, of course, unknown. Although it formed part of the first-fruits presented at the sanctuary, honey was excluded from the altar, owing to its liability to fermentation.

Honey for domestic use was kept in earthen jars (1 K 14¹⁷ EV 'cruse'), in which, doubtless, it was also put for transport (Gn 43¹¹) and export (Ezk 27¹⁷). Many scholars, however, would identify the 'honey' of the two passages last cited with the grape syrup (the Arab. dibs, equivalent of the Heb. debash, 'honey') of modern Syria, which is produced by the repeated boiling of grape juice (for details see art. 'Honey' in E H col. 2105). Indisputable evidence of the manufacture of dibs in early times, however, is still lacking.

In addition to the proverbial expression of fertility above quoted, honey, in virtue of its sweetness, is frequently employed in simile and metaphor in Heb. literature; see Ps 19¹⁰ 119¹⁰³, Pr 16²⁴ 24¹¹, Ca 4¹¹ 5¹, Sir 24²⁰ 49¹ etc. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HOODS.—Only Is 3²⁴ AV, for which RV has rightly 'turbans.' See DRESS, § 5.

HOOK.—1. vav, a hook or ring with a spike driven into wood (Ex 26²² etc.). 2. Is 19⁸, Job 41¹, Am 4², Mt 17²⁷. The hook used in fishing was of course attached to a line, but whether the latter was simply held in the hand or was attached to a rod cannot be decided.

HOOPOE (Lv 11¹⁸, Dt 14¹⁸ RV; AV 'lapwing').—The hoopoe (Upupa epops) is a common spring visitor in Palestine, where its striking plumage, its tall crest and odd movements, make it conspicuous. Various folklore tales exist in the Talmud and among the fellahtn regarding it. It was an 'unclean' bird (Lv 11¹⁹), possibly because of its habit of haunting dunghills, but it is eaten to-day by the fellahtn.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HOPE.—1. Hope and faith (the soul's forward and upward look towards God) are imperfectly differentiated in the OT, as with men who 'greeted the promises from afar' (He 11¹³⁻¹⁶); hope has there the greater vogue.

Amongst the several Heb. words thus rendered, (1) signifying restful hope (leaning on J', &c.), oftener appears as 'trust' and sometimes as 'confidence'—'hope' in Job 6²⁰, Ps 16¹, Pr 14²⁶, Ec 9¹, Jer 17⁷. (2) A subjective synonym (radically, the loins) is variously translated 'hope', 'confidence', and 'folly' (cf. AV and RV in Job 8¹⁴ 31²⁴; also Job 4⁸, Ps 49¹³ 78⁷ 85⁷, Pr 3²⁶, Ec 7³). (3) RV corrects the 'hope' (AV) of Jer 17⁷, J1 3¹⁸, into 'refuge'. (4) A synonym hardly distinguishable from (5) and (6), and rendered 'hope' or 'wait upon', occurs 8 times (Ps 104²⁷ 146⁵ etc.). The two most distinctive OT words for hope are frequently rendered 'wait (for or upon)'. Of these (5) bears a relatively passive significance (e.g. in Job 6¹¹ 14¹⁴, Ps 33¹⁸⁻²² 42⁵, La 3²⁶). (6) The term oftener recurring, denoting practical, even strenuous, anticipation (rendered 'expectation' in Ps 91⁵ 62¹), has a root-meaning not far removed from that of the Heb. verb for 'believe'; Gn 49¹⁸, Ru 1¹², Job 14⁷, Ps 25¹⁻², Ezk 37¹¹, Hos 2¹⁸ afford good examples.

It is to the OT rather than the NT that one must look for definite representations of the earthly hopes belonging to God's Kingdom, the social regeneration and national well-being that come in its train (see, e.g., Is 9¹, 11¹⁻⁹ 55. 60 f., Ps 72. 96-98, etc.); broadly interpreted, these promises are of permanent validity (see Mt 6¹⁰, 13³⁵, 1 Th 4³ etc.). Hope plays an increasing part in the later OT books; it advances in distinctness, grandeur, and spirituality with the course of revelation. The Holy One of Israel made Himself 'the God of hope' for mankind (Ro 15¹³; cf. Jer 14⁸ and 17¹³ with Is 42-51⁴² 60). When the national hopes foundered, OT faith anchored itself to two objects: (a) the Messianic Kingdom (see KINGDOM of God); and (b), esp. in the latest times, the resurrection of the dead (Is 25⁸ 26¹⁹, Dn 12²; probably Job 19²⁵, Ps 16⁹⁻¹¹ 17¹⁵)—the latter conceived as necessary to the former, since otherwise those who had suffered most for God's Kingdom would miss it (cf. He 11³⁵, 1 Th 4¹⁴). The OT heritage is developed in extravagant forms by Jewish Apocalyptic literature, which was the product of a powerful ferment in the Judaism of New Test. times. Philo Judæus, who represents philosophic Judaism at the farthest remove from popular Messianic enthusiasm, nevertheless makes hope (followed by repentance and righteousness) the leader in his triad of the elementary religious virtues (cf. 1 Co 13¹³), while faith leads the second and highest triad.

2. To both factors of 'the hope of Israel,' separately or together, St. Paul appealed in addressing his compatriots (Ac 13²⁶ 23²⁶, 26⁶⁸, 28²⁰). It was 'a lamp shining in a dark place' (2 P 1¹⁹); hope at the Christian era was flickering low in the Gentile world (see Eph 2¹², 1 Th 4¹³, 1 Co 15²²—amply confirmed by classical literature). 'By the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead' humanity was 'begotten again unto a living hope' (1 P 1³; cf. Ac 2²⁶⁻²⁸, 1 Co 15¹²⁻²⁸, Rev 1⁷⁻¹⁷): the Israelite hope was verified, and the Christian hope founded, by the return of Jesus from the grave. The Greek word for 'hope' (elpis, noun; elpizō, verb) primarily meant expectation of good or evil—commonly, in effect, the former; but in later Greek, at the time when hope made its presence so powerfully felt in the Christian sphere, elpis elsewhere came to be increasingly used with the sense of anxiety or fear, of which there is not a single example in the LXX or NT (Cremer); 'evil hopes' in the Gr. of Is 28¹¹ is ironical, similarly in Wis 13⁹. The RV rightly substitutes 'hope' for 'trust' in the 18 places where AV rendered elpizō by the latter; for the NT clearly differentiates 'faith' and 'hope,' referring the latter to the future good of Christ's Kingdom longingly expected, while the former is directed to God's past deeds of salvation and His present grace in Christ. 'Hope' is used by metonymy for the matter of hope, the thing hoped for, in Gal 5⁵, Col 1⁵, Tit 2¹³, He 6¹⁸. It is sometimes replaced by 'patience' (or 'endurance'), its expression in outward bearing (cf. 1 Th 1³ and 2 Th 1⁴); and (as in the OT) the verbs 'hope' and 'wait' or 'look for' or 'expect' are interchangeable (see Ro 8¹⁹⁻²⁵, 1 Co 1⁷, Gal 5⁵, He 10¹³). St. Paul uses a graphic and intense synonym for hope, lit. 'watching with outstretched head,' in Ro 8¹⁹, Ph 1²⁰.

elpis appears first with its full Christian meaning in the NT Epp.; for it dates from our Lord's resurrection and the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ro 15¹³). Its object is, in general, 'the glory of God' (Ro 5², 1 Th 2¹²), i.e. the glorious manifestation of His completed redemption and the 'coming' of His 'kingdom in power,' which is to be realized, particularly, in the acknowledged lordship of Jesus (1 Co 15²⁴⁻²⁸, Ph 2⁹, Rev 17¹⁴ etc.), bringing about the glorification of His saints, shared by material nature (Ro 8¹⁷, 2 Th 1¹⁰, 1 Co 15²⁸). This will begin with the resurrection of the dead (1 Th 4¹⁶, 1 Co 15¹²⁻²³, Jn 5²⁸) and the transformation of the earthly body (1 Co 15⁵⁰, 2 Co 5⁴, Ph 3²¹), ushering in for 'those who are Christ's' the state of 'incorruption' which constitutes their 'eternal life' enjoyed in the vision of God and the full communion of the Lord Jesus (Lk 20³⁵, 1 Co 15⁴⁸, Mt 5⁸, Jn 14¹⁷, 17²⁴, 1 Jn 3², Rev 7¹⁴⁻¹⁷ etc.). Its goal is in heaven; and all the proximate and earthly aims of Christianity, whether in the way of personal attainment or of social betterment, are steps in the progress towards the final 'deliverance from the bondage of corruption' and 'the revealing of the sons of God'—the great day of the Lord. Its ground lies in the 'promise(s) of God' (Tit 1², He 6¹³⁻¹⁴, 2 P 3¹², 1 Jn 2²⁴), esp. the definite promise of the triumphant return of Jesus ensuring the consummation of the Messianic Kingdom (Mt 24^{30f.}, Ac 1¹¹ 3¹³⁻²¹, 1 Co 15²⁴⁻²⁸, Rev 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸ etc.); and its guarantee is twofold, being given objectively in the resurrection and ascension of our Lord (Ac 17³¹, Ro 1⁴, Eph 1¹³⁻²², Col 1¹³, He 6²⁰, 1 P 1² etc.), and subjectively in 'the earnest of the Spirit within' Christian 'hearts' (2 Co 1^{20f.}, Ro 8^{13f.}, Eph 1^{13f.}). Its subjects are 'the men of faith' (Ro 5¹⁻⁵ 15¹³ etc.): it is 'the hope of our calling' (Eph 4¹, 1 Th 2¹², Rev 19⁹), 'the hope of the gospel' (Col 1²³)—that which the gospel conveys, and 'the hope of righteousness' (Gal 5⁵)—that which the righteousness of faith entertains; it belongs only to the Christianly pure, and is purifying in effect (1 Jn 3^{2f.}; cf. Ps 24³⁻⁴, Mt 5⁸, Rev 22^{14f.}). Finally, it is a collective hope, the heritage of 'the body of Christ,' dear to Christian brethren because of their affection for each other (1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁸, 2 Th 2¹, Eph 5²⁷, Rev 19^{9f.} 21¹⁻⁷ etc.); and is cherished esp. by ministers of Christ for those in their charge (2 Co 1⁷⁻¹⁰, 1 Th 2^{19f.}, Col 1²³ 3⁴, Ph 2¹⁶ etc.), as it animated the Chief Shepherd (Jn 10^{14f.} 12²⁶ 17¹ etc.). 'In Christ Jesus' hope is bound up as intimately with love as with faith; these are the triad of essential graces (1 Co 13¹³, 1 Th 1³, 2 Th 1^{3f.}, Eph 4¹⁻⁴, He 10^{22f.}).

The whole future of the Christian life, for man and society, is lodged with 'Christ Jesus our hope' (1 Ti 1¹, Col 1²⁷); NT expectation focussed itself on His Parousia—'the blessed hope' (Tit 2¹³). Maranatha ('our Lord cometh') was a watchword of the Pauline Churches (1 Co 16²²; cf. 17¹). 'The hope laid up for them' 'in the heavens' formed the treasure of the first believers (Col 1³ 4¹ etc.); to 'wait for' the risen Jesus, coming as God's son 'from heaven' (1 Th 1¹⁰), was half their religion. 'By this hope' were they 'saved,' being enabled in its strength to bear joyfully the ills of life and the universal contempt and persecution of the world around them, which stimulated instead of quenching their courage (Ro 5²⁻⁵ 8¹⁸⁻²⁵, 2 Co 4¹³ 5⁴, Ph 1^{10f.}, He 10³²⁻³⁴, Rev 7¹³⁻¹⁷). According to the fine figure of He 6¹⁹, hope was their 'anchor of the soul,' grappled to the throne of the living, glorified Jesus 'within the veil.' G. G. FINDLAY.

HOPHNI AND PHINEHAS.—The two sons of Eli; they were priests in the sanctuary at Shiloh, where, in spite of the presence of their father, they carried on their evil practices. In consequence of their deeds a curse is twice pronounced upon the house of Eli, first by a 'man of God' (1 S 2²⁷) who is not named, and again by the mouth of Samuel (ch. 3). The curse was accomplished when Hophni and Phinehas were slain at the battle of Aphek, and the ark of God was lost—an incident which was the cause of the death of Eli (ch. 4). The malpractices of these two consisted in their claiming and appropriating more than their due of the sacrifices (2¹³⁻¹⁷), and in their immoral actions in the Tabernacle (v. 2; cf. Am 2⁷ 4).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HOPHRA.—Jer 44³⁰; the Egyptian Wahebrê, Apries of Herodotus, fourth king of the 26th Dyn. (c. B.C. 588-569 and grandson of Necho. He, or possibly his predecessor Psammetichus II., is also referred to as Pharaoh in Jer 37⁷ 7¹¹, Ezk 29² etc. Little is certainly known of his reign. Hophra must have been defeated by Nebuchadnezzar in Syria in attempting to resist the progress of the Babylonian army, and he received the fugitives from Palestine after the destruction of Jerusalem in B.C. 586. There is no evidence that Nebuchadnezzar plundered Egypt, as was anticipated by Ezekiel, though he seems to have attacked Hophra's successor Amasis in B.C. 568 with some success, and may have overrun some part of Lower Egypt. The Syrian and other mercenary soldiers stationed at Elephantine revolted in the reign of Hophra, but were brought again to submission. Another mutiny of the Egyptian soldiery, recorded by Herodotus, resulted in Amasis being put upon the throne as champion of the natives. Hophra relied on the Greek mercenaries, and maintained himself, perhaps in a forced co-regency, in Lower Egypt until the third year of Amasis, when he was defeated and slain.

HOR.—1. A mountain 'in the edge of the land of Edom' (Nu 33³⁷), where Aaron died. Constant tradition, at least since Josephus, sees Mount Hor in Jebel Harân, 'the Mountain of Aaron,' above Petra. This is regarded by the Arabs as the mountain sacred to the great high priest, and his tomb is shown and revered under a small dome on its summit. Some modern writers, especially H. C. Trumbull, have doubted the tradition and endeavoured to fix other sites, such as Jebel Madâra, N.W. of 'Ain Kadis. Jebel Harân rises 4780 ft. above the sea-level. Its western side is an unscalable precipice; it is ascended from the pass leading into Petra. A very wide view over the Arabian desert, down to the Red Sea and up to the Ghôr, is commanded from the summit. 2. A mountain mentioned in Nu 34⁷, as in the northern boundary of the Promised Land. In all probability this is meant for Hermon.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

HORAM.—A king of Gezer defeated and slain by Joshua (Jos 10³³).

HOREB.—See SINAI.

HOREM.—A city of Naphtali in the mountains (Jos 19³⁸); prob. the modern Hārā west of Kedesh-naphtali.

HORESH.—The word hōresh means 'wooded height' in Is 17⁸, Ezk 31¹³, 2 Ch 27⁴, and this is probably its meaning in 1 S 23¹⁵ (cf. vv. 16, 18), although some would make Horeh a proper name, as in RVm.

HOR-HAGGIDGAD.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites (Nu 33²²). The name suggests the land of the Horites, or its neighbourhood.

HORITES.—The pre-Edomite inhabitants of Seir of Edom according to Gn 14⁶ (a late passage) and Dt 2²² 2²² (Dt). Apparently they commingled with the Edomite invaders, for Gn 36²⁰ 2²² (P) counts them among the descendants of Esau. The name is usually taken to mean 'cave-dwellers' and this is probably correct. There are many tombs in the rocks at Petra (cf. Robinson, BRI 2, li. 129, 134), and some of these, like some at Belt Jibrin and some recently discovered at Gezer (cf. PEFSI, 1902, pp. 345 ff., and 1903, pp. 9-12) may have been used as dwellings originally. Sayce (HCM 203 ff.) derives the name from a root meaning 'white' as contrasted with the 'red'-skinned Edomites, while Hommel (AHT 261 ff.) takes it as a form of Garu (or Kharu) of one of the Amarna tablets. Kharu was, however, in Egyptian a name for all the inhabitants of Syria (cf. W. M. Müller, Asien und Europa, 148 ff.), and can hardly be connected with Horites. Driver (Deut. p. 38) favours the explanation as equivalent to 'cave-dwellers' or 'troglodytes.'

GEORGE A. BARTON.

HORMAH ('devoted' or 'accursed') was a city, apparently not far from Kadesh, where the Israelites were overthrown, when, after the death of the ten spies, they insisted on going forward (Nu 14⁴, Dt 1⁴). At a later time it was taken and destroyed by Israel (Nu 21¹, Jos 12¹⁹), this feat being attributed in Jg 1¹⁷ to Judah and Simeon. There we learn that the former name was Zephath. Possibly the memory of the previous disaster here led to its being called 'Accursed.' It was one of 'the uttermost cities of Judah, towards the borders of Edom in the south,' and is named between Chesil and Ziklag (Jos 15²⁰), also between Bethul (or Bethuel) and Ziklag (Jos 19¹, 1 Ch 4⁴⁰), in the territory occupied by Simeon. It was one of the towns to which David sent a share of the booty taken from the Amalekites who had raided Ziklag in his absence (1 S 30²⁰). There is no need to assume with Guthe (Bibelwörterbuch, s.v.) that two cities are so named. Probably, as in so many other cases, the old name persisted, and may be represented by the modern es-Sebailā, 23 miles north of 'Ain Kadīs, and 26 miles south of Beersheba. The probability is increased if Ziklag is correctly identified with 'Aslūj, 14 miles north of es-Sebailā. On the other hand, Naqb es-Safā agrees better with the position of Arad; but it seems too far from Kadesh, being more than 40 miles to the north-east (Robinson, BRP ii. 181).

W. EWING.

HORN (Heb. qeren, Gr. keras).—Sometimes horns were wrought into vessels in which oil was stored (1 K 18⁹) or carried (1 S 16¹). Probably with some dainty ornamentation, they were used to hold eye-paint (Job 42¹¹, Keren-happuch). Of rams' horns a kind of trumpet was made (Jos 6⁴); see MUSIC, 4 (2) (c). 'Horns' in poetry symbolized strength (Dt 33¹⁷ etc.). 'Horn' in Ps 18²—2 S 22² stands for offensive weapons, as 'shield' for defensive (Perowne). To 'exalt one's horn,' or 'cause it to bud' (grow), is to strengthen and prosper him (1 S 2¹, Ezk 29¹⁸ etc.). For one to 'lift his horn' is to be arrogant (Ps 75⁴). To crush or weaken one is to 'break or cut off his horn' (Jer 48², La 2¹). In prophetic symbolism horns stand for kings and military powers (Dn 7⁸ 8² etc.). The altar horns (Ex 27²), to which fugitives seeking asylum clung (1 K 16⁹ etc.), were projections at the four corners, and apparently peculiarly sacred (Ex 30¹⁰ etc.); but their significance and use are now unknown.

W. EWING.

HORNED SNAKE.—See SERPENT.

HORNET (Ex 23²⁸, Dt 7²⁰, Jos 24¹²).—In all three references the hornet is mentioned as an instrument of the Lord to drive out the Canaanites. By most interpreters a literal interpretation is accepted, but a metaphorical use of the word is contended for by some. Sayce has suggested that the reference may be to the armies of Rameses III., as the standard-bearers wore two devices like flies. The most plentiful hornet in Palestine is the Vespa orientalis. Hornets attack only when interfered with.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HORONAIM (perh. 'the two hollows').—A city of Moab, whose site has not been recovered with certainty. It is mentioned in Is 15⁵, Jer 48², 6. 24, and also on the Moabite Stone (ll. 31, 32). It may have lain to the south of the Arnon, in the neighbourhood of the Wady ed-Dera'a.

HORONITE (Neh 2¹⁰, 19 13²⁸).—A title given to Sanballat (wh. see), the opponent of Nehemiah. The name probably denotes an inhabitant of Beth-horon (wh. see).

HORSE.—The Israelites must have been acquainted with horses in Egypt (Gn 47¹⁷), and it is evident, too, from the Tell el-Amarna correspondence that horses were familiar animals in Palestine at an early period; but it would appear that the children of Israel were slow in adopting them. Throughout the OT up to the Exile they appear only as war-horses; the ass, the mule, and the camel were the beasts for riding and burden-bearing. Even for warlike purposes horses were only slowly adopted, the mountainous regions held by the Israelites being unsuitable for chariot warfare. David commenced acquiring chariots (2 S 8⁴), and Solomon greatly added to their numbers, obtaining horses for them from Musri [not Mizraim, 'Egypt'] in N. Syria and Kue, in Cilicia (1 K 10²⁸, 2 Ch 1¹⁶ [amending the text]). Horses were obtained also from Egypt (Is 31¹, 4, Ezk 17¹⁰). Some of the references may be to hired horsemen. The kings of Israel were warned against multiplying horses (Dt 17¹⁶). Trust in horses is put in antithesis to trust in the Lord (Is 30¹⁵, Ps 20⁷ 33¹⁷). Before the reforms of Josiah, horses sacred to the sun were kept in the Temple (2 K 23¹¹; cf. 11¹⁶). The appearance of the war-horse seems to have made a deep impression (Job 39¹⁹⁻²⁵, Jer 47³, Nah 3³ etc.). After the Exile horses were much more common: the returning Jews brought 736 horses with them (Neh 7²⁴). Horses were fed on barley and tibn (chopped straw) in Solomon's time as in Palestine to-day (1 K 4²⁸). Although the breeding of horses has become so intimately associated with our ideas of the Arabs, it would seem that during the whole OT period horses were unknown, or at least scarce, in Arabia. The equipment of horses is mentioned in the Bible—the bit and bridle (Ps 32⁹, Pr 26³), bells of the horses (Zec 14²⁰), and 'precious clothes for chariots' (Ezk 27²⁰). In OT times they were apparently unshod (Is 5²⁸).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HORSE-GATE.—See JERUSALEM, p. 439^b.

HORSE-LEECH ('aluqah, cf. Arab. 'alageh).—The horse-leech (Hæmopsis sanguisuga) and the medicinal leech (Hirudo medicinalis) are very common in Palestine and are the cause of much trouble, even sickness and death, to man and beast. They abound in many springs, streams, and pools, and lodge themselves, while still small, in the mouths of those drinking. Thence they not infrequently find their way to the pharynx, and even larynx, where they live and grow for many months. They cause frequent hæmorrhages, and, if not removed, lead to progressive anaemia and death. Their voracious appetite for blood, possibly referred to in Pr 30¹⁵, is well illustrated by their habits as internal parasites. It is probable, however, that the reference here is not to the leech of common life, but to the mythological vampire, the ghul of the Arabs.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HOSAH ('refuge').—1. A Levitical doorkeeper of the Temple (1 Ch 16³⁸ 26¹⁰, 11. 16). 2. A city of Asher, apparently south of Tyre (Jos 19²⁹). The site is doubtful.

HOSANNA (—'O save!').—An acclamation used by the people on Palm Sunday in greeting Jesus on His last entry into Jerusalem, and afterwards by the children in the Temple (Mt 21⁹, 15). It occurs six times in the Gospels (all in the connexion above noted).

The expression, which has preserved its Hebrew form (like 'Amen' and 'Hallelujah'), was originally (in Hebrew) a cry addressed to God 'Save now!' used as an invocation of blessing. When the word passed over (transliterated into Greek) into the early Church it was misunderstood as a shout of homage or greeting—'Hail' or 'Glory to.'

The simplest form of the Palm Sunday greeting occurs in Mk 11⁹ and Jn 12¹³ 'Hosanna! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord,' which really was the cry of the people. The additions that occur in the other passages ('Hosanna to the son of David,' Mt 21⁹, 15, and 'Hosanna in the highest,' Mt 21⁹, Mk 11⁹) seem really to be later amplifications due to misunderstanding of the real meaning of 'Hosanna.' The Hosanna cry (cf. Ps 118²⁶) and the palm branches naturally suggest the Feast of Tabernacles, when the people used to raise the cry of 'Hosanna,' while marching in procession and waving branches of palm, myrtle, and willow. The great occasion for this was especially the 7th day of the Feast, when the Hosanna processions were most frequent. Hence this day was early designated 'Day of Hosha'na' [Hosanna], and the lulab branches then used also received the same name. It was the greatest of popular holidays, probably the lineal descendant of an old Canaanitish festival, and still retains its joyous character in the Jewish Festival calendar (Hosha'na Rabbā).

It is not necessary, however, to suppose, with Wünsche (Erläuterungen der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrash, p. 241), that a confusion has arisen in the Gospel accounts of Palm Sunday between Tabernacles and Passover. Such processions were not peculiar to Tabernacles. They might be extemporized for other occasions of a joyous character (cf. 1 Mac 13³¹, 2 Mac 10⁷), and this was the case in the scene described in the Gospels.

In its transliterated form the word 'Hosanna' passed over into early liturgical (esp. doxological) use (cf. e.g. Didache 10⁹ 'Hosanna to the God of David'), as an interjection of praise and joy, and was developed on these lines. The early misunderstanding of its real meaning was perpetuated. But the history of this development lies outside the range of purely Biblical archaeology.

HOSEA.—The name of the prophet Hosea, though distinguished by the English translators, is identical with that of the last king of Israel and with the original name of Joshua; in these cases it appears in the EV as Hoshea. Hosea, the son of Beeri, is the only prophet, among those whose writings have survived, who was himself a native of the Northern Kingdom. The main subject of the prophecy of Amos is the Northern Kingdom, but Amos himself was a native of the South; so also were Isaiah and Micah, and these two prophets, though they included the Northern Kingdom in their denunciations, devoted themselves mainly to Judah.

Hosea's prophetic career extended from shortly before the fall of the house of Jeroboam II. (c. B.C. 746) to shortly before the outbreak of the Syro-Ephraimitish war in B.C. 735—a period of rapidly advancing decay following on the success and prosperity of the reign of Jeroboam II. He began to prophesy within some 10 or 15 years of the prophetic activity of Amos at Bethel, and continued to do so till some years after Isaiah had made his voice heard and his influence felt in the Southern Kingdom. Influenced himself probably by Amos, he seems to have exercised some influence over Isaiah; but these conclusions must rest on a comparison of the writings of the three prophets. Our direct knowledge of Hosea is derived entirely from the book which bears his name; he is mentioned nowhere else in the OT.

If the account given in the 1st and 3rd chapters of Hosea were allegory, as many ancient and some modern interpreters have held, our knowledge of Hosea would be slight indeed. But since these chapters are clearly not allegorical, there are few prophets whose spiritual experience is better known to us. In favour of an allegorical interpretation the clearly symbolical character of the names of Hosea's children has been urged; but the names of Isaiah's children—Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz—are also symbolical (cf. Is 8¹⁸). Moreover, if the narrative were allegorical, there would be just as much reason for the names of Hosea's wife and her father as for the names of the children being symbolical; on the other hand, in real life it was within the power of the prophet to give symbolical names to the children, but not to his wife or her father. The names of Hosea's wife, Gomer, and her father, Diblaim, are not symbolical. Further, the reference to the weaning of Lo-ruhamah in 1⁸ is purposeless in allegory, but natural enough in real life, since it serves to fix the interval between the birth of the two children.

The command in 1² has seemed to some, and may well seem, if prophetic methods of expression are forgotten, impossible except in allegory. It is as well, therefore, to approach the important narrative of Hosea with a recollection of such a method of describing experience as is illustrated by Jer 18¹⁻⁴. This describes a perfectly familiar scene. The incident, translated out of prophetic language, is as follows. On an impulse Jeremiah one day went down to watch, as he must often have watched before, a potter at his work; but on this particular day the potter's work taught him a new lesson. Then he recognized (1) that the impulse that had led him that day was from Jahweh, and (2) that the new suggestion of the potter's wheel was a word from Jahweh. So again, Jer 32¹ describes what we should term a presentiment; after it was realized, it was recognized to have been a word from Jahweh (Jer 32⁸). Interpreted in the light of these illustrations of prophetic methods of speech, the narrative of Hosea 1 gives us an account of the experience of Hosea, as follows. Driven by true love in which, probably enough, Hosea at the time felt the approval, not to say the direct impulse of Jahweh, Hosea married Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim. After marriage she proved unfaithful, and Hosea heard that the woman whom he had been led by Jahweh to marry had had within her all along the tendency to unfaithfulness. She was not at the time of marriage an actual harlot, but, had Hosea only fully understood, he would have known when he married her, as these years afterwards he has come to know, that when Jahweh said, 'Go, marry Gomer,' He was really saying 'Go, marry a woman who will bestow her love on others.' His new, sad knowledge does not make him feel less but more that his marriage had been ordered of God. Not only through the love of youth, but even more through the conflict and the treachery and the ill-return which his love has received, Jahweh is speaking. Had Hosea spoken just like Jeremiah, he might have continued: 'Then I discovered that my wife had played the harlot, and that my children were not mine. Then I knew that this was the word of Jahweh, and Jahweh said unto me: Even as the bride of thy youth has played the harlot, even so has My bride, Israel, played the harlot: even as thy children are children of harlotry, even so are the children of Israel children of harlotry, sons of the Baals whom they worship.'

Apparently Hosea reached the conclusion that none of the children were his; he calls them without exception 'children of harlotry' (1²). But the name Jezreel (1⁴) certainly does not suggest that at the birth of his first-born he was already aware of his wife's unfaithfulness, the name of the second, Lo-ruhamah ('Not pitied,' 1⁸), does not prove it, and even that of the third child, Lo-ammi ('Not my kinsman,' 1⁹), may merely carry further the judgment on the nation expressed unquestionably in the first and probably in the second. In any case we may somewhat safely infer that Hosea became a prophet before he had learned his wife's unfaithfulness, and that in his earnest preaching he, like Amos, denounced inhumanity as offensive to God; for this is the purpose of the name Jezreel; the house of Jehu, established by means of bloodshed and inhumanity (1⁴), is about to be punished. 'Kindness not sacrifice' (6⁶) must have been the ideal of religion which from the first Hosea held up before his people.

It has generally been inferred that Hosea's wife subsequently left him (or that he put her away), but that at last in his love for her, which could not be quenched, he rescued her from the life of shame into which she had sunk (ch 3). And this perhaps remains most probable, though Marti has lately argued with much ability (1) that ch. 3 does not refer to Gomer, (2) that, unlike ch. 1, ch. 3 is allegorical, and (3) that ch. 3 formed no part of the original Book of Hosea. Be this as it may, it is clear that although the circumstances of Hosea's married life were not the cause of his becoming a prophet, they do explain certain peculiar characteristics of his message and personality: his insistence on the love of God for Israel, and on Israel's sin as consisting in the want of love and of loyalty towards God; and the greater emotional element that marks him as compared with Amos. At the same time, it is important not to exaggerate the difference between Amos and Hosea, or to lose sight of the fact that Hosea not less than Amos or Isaiah or Micah insisted on the worthlessness of religion or of devotion to Jahweh which was not ethical (Jezreel, 1⁴; 6⁶). In considering the greater sympathy of Hosea with the people whom he has to condemn, it must be remembered that he was of them, whereas Amos, a native of the South, was not. G. B. GRAY.

HOSEA, BOOK OF.—The Book of Hosea formed the first section of a collection of prophetic writings which was formed after the Exile, probably towards the close of the 3rd century B.C., and entitled 'The Twelve Prophets' (see MICAH [BOOK OF]). The greater part of the Book of Hosea clearly consists of the writings of Hosea, the son of Beeri, who prophesied in the 8th cent. B.C. (see preced. art.), but it also contains the annotations or additions of editors who lived between the 8th and the 3rd centuries. It is not always possible to determine with certainty these editorial portions of the book.

Though we have no positive evidence to this effect, there is no reason to doubt that Hosea himself committed to writing the prophetic poems by which he gave expression to his message and of which the greater part of the Book of Hosea consists (chs. 2, 4-14), and that he prefixed to these the prose narrative of his life (chs. 1, 3, see HOSEA) with which the book now opens. It is possible, of course, that Hosea first circulated in writing single poems or a collection of two or three; but the complete collection, though scarcely made later than 735, since the prophecies make no allusion to the Syro-Ephraimitish war which broke out in that year, cannot be much earlier than 735, since the prophecies make allusions to the circumstances of the period that followed the death, in about B.C. 746, of Jeroboam II. (anarchy, 73-78; cf. 2 K 15²⁴; factions favouring appeal to Egypt and Assyria respectively, 53¹ 71¹ 8⁹ 12¹), and probably in particular to the payment of tribute by Menahem to Tiglath-pileser [= Pul, 2 K 15¹⁹], which took place in B.C. 738 (53¹ 10⁶). Again, the opening narrative (ch. 1), though it describes Hosea's life and teaching before the death of Jeroboam II. (1¹, see HOSEA), was not written until some years later, for it also records the birth of Lo-ammi (1⁹), which was separated by hardly less and possibly more than 5 years from the date of Hosea's marriage.

In its earliest form, then, the Book of Hosea was published by the prophet about the year 736 in the Northern Kingdom. Now, in common with all literature of the Northern Kingdom, Hosea owes its preservation to the care of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. It is tolerably certain that the Jews who preserved the book adapted it for Jewish use; in other words, that the Book of Hosea as we have it is a Jewish edition of the writings of an Israelite prophet. The hand of a Jewish editor (and in this case a somewhat late one) is perhaps clearest in the title (1¹), for Hosea, a citizen of the Northern Kingdom and addressing himself to the North, would scarcely date his prophecy by kings of the Southern Kingdom of Judah, nor would a contemporary be likely to equate the days of Uzziah and his successors with the days of Jeroboam, since Uzziah himself outlived Jeroboam. With more or less reason, additions to or modifications of Hosea's work by Jewish editors have been suspected in 1¹⁰⁻²¹ 3² ('and David their king') 41²⁴ 5² (last clause) 6¹¹ 8⁴ 10¹¹ 11^{12b}. In several other cases (5¹⁰ 12 13 14 6¹ 12²) it is possible that the editor has pointed the original prophecies at his own people of the South by substituting 'Judah' where Hosea had written 'Israel'; thus, although at present Jacob-Judah are mentioned in 12², the terms 'Jacob' and 'Israel,' synonyms for the people of the Northern Kingdom, were certainly in the mind of the writer of 12², for in 12² he puns on these names: 'In the womb he Jacobed his brother, and in his manhood Israelled with God.'

Another whole group of passages has been suspected of consisting of additions to Hosea's prophecies. These are the passages of promise (11¹⁰⁻²¹ 24¹⁻²² 31⁴ [regarded as an allegory of restoration] 53¹ 6¹ 11¹⁰ 11 14). There is little doubt that such passages were added to ancient prophecies, but it is not yet by any means generally admitted that the early prophets made no promises of a brighter future beyond judgment.

Apart from the intentional modifications of the original words of Hosea by later editors, the text has suffered very seriously from accidents of transmission. To some extent the Greek version allows us to see an earlier Hebrew text than that perpetuated by the Jews from which the EV is made. The English reader will find the translation from a critically emended text by Dr. G. A. Smith (Book of the Twelve Prophets, vol. i.) of great assistance. The best English commentary is that by W. R. Harper in the International Critical Commentary. G. B. GRAY.

HOSEN.—The plural of 'hose' (cf. 'ox,' 'oxen'), only Dn 3²¹ AV, and now obsolete in the sense, here intended, of breeches or trousers. The article of dress denoted by the original is uncertain. According to an early tradition (LXX tiara), some form of headress is intended (cf. RVm 'turbans'), but modern opinion favours 'coats' or 'tunics' as in RV.

HOSHAIH ('Jah has saved').—1. A man who led half the princes of Judah in the procession at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 12²²). 2. The father of Jeaniah (Jer 42¹), or Azariah (43²).

HOSHAMA.—A descendant of David (1 Ch 3¹⁸).

HOSHEA.—1. See JOSHUA. 2. An Ephraimite (1 Ch 27²⁰). 3. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²²). 4. The last king of Israel. The chronological data of our text are not entirely accordant (2 K 15¹⁷), but we know that he came to the throne not far from B.C. 732. Taking into view the Assyrian annals along with the Biblical accounts, we gather that there were two parties in Samaria, one advocating submission to Assyria, the other hoping for independence. Pekah was placed on the throne by the latter; Hoshea was the candidate of the Assyrians, and was perhaps actively supported by them in his revolt against Pekah, whom he supplanted. This was when Tiglath-pileser punished Pekah and Rezin for interfering in the affairs of Judah (see AHAAZ). At the death of Tiglath-pileser, however, Hoshea was enticed by the Egyptian king or sub-king, and went over to the party which was ready for revolt. It is probable that he had convinced himself that the land could no longer pay the heavy tribute laid upon it. The new king of Assyria (Shalmaneser IV.) moved promptly, captured and imprisoned the king, and laid siege to the capital. It speaks well for the strength of Samaria and for the courage of its people that the place held out for more than two years; but the result can hardly have been doubtful from the first. The surrender was followed by the deportation of a considerable part of the people, and the planting of foreign colonies in the country (2 K 17⁶ 24). Sargon, who came to the throne just before the surrender, had no desire to experiment with more vassal kings, and set an Assyrian governor over the wasted province. Thus ended the kingdom of Israel. H. P. SMITH.

HOSPITALITY.—In the life of the East there are no more attractive features than those that centre in the practice of hospitality. The virtue of hospitality ranked high in the ancient Orient, and the laws regulating its observance hold undisputed sway in the desert still. The pleasing picture of the magnanimous sheik, bidding strangers welcome to his tent and to the best he owns (Gn 18), is often repeated to this hour in the Arabian wilderness. It was to Lot's credit and advantage that he had preserved this virtue amid the corruptions of Sodom (Gn 19²). To shirk an opportunity for its exercise was shameful (Jg 19¹⁴ 15). A man's worth was illustrated by his princely hospitality (Job 31¹⁴). Jesus sent forth the Twelve (Mt 10¹), and the Seventy (Lk 10¹), relying on the hospitality of the people. Its exercise secured His blessing; woe threatened such as refused it. The Samaritans' churlish denial of hospitality to Jesus excited the wrath of His disciples (Lk 9⁵⁵).

The guest had a right to expect certain attentions (Lk 7^{45f.}). The practice of hospitality distinguished those on the right from those on the left hand (Mt 25³⁵; cf. 10⁴⁰, Jn 13²⁰). It is commended by precept (Ro 12¹³, 20, 1 Ti 3² etc.), and also by example (He 13²).

Hospitality was highly esteemed amongst other ancient peoples. In Egypt its practice was thought to favour the soul in the future life. By kindness to strangers the Greeks secured the approval of Zeus Xenios, their protector. For the Romans hospitality was a sacred obligation.

In its simplest aspect, hospitality is the reception of the wayfarer as an honoured guest, providing shelter and food. In the ancient, as indeed for the most part in the modern, Orient, men journey only under necessity. Travel for purposes of pleasure and education is practically unknown. Save in cities, therefore, and in trading centres along the great highways, there was little call for places of public entertainment. Villages probably always contained what is called the medafah—properly madyafah—a chamber reserved for guests, whose entertainment is a charge upon the whole community. From personal experience the present writer knows how solicitous the humblest villagers are for the comfort and well-being of their guests. If the chief man in a village be well off, he greatly adds to his prestige by a liberal display of hospitality.

In the desert, every tent, however poor its owner, offers welcome to the traveller. In the master's absence the women receive the guests, and according to their means do the honours of the 'house of hair.' It is the master's pride to be known as a generous man; any lack of civility or of kindness to a guest meets severe reprobation. In the guest's presence he calls neither his tent, nor anything it contains, his own. During his sojourn the visitor is owner. The women bake bread; the master slays a 'sacrifice,' usually a lamb, kid, or sheep, which is forthwith dressed, cooked, and served with the bread. The proud son of the wilds has high ideas of his own dignity and honour; but he himself waits upon his guest, seeking to gratify with alacrity his every wish. If his visitors are of superior rank he stands by them (Gn 18³), and in any case sits down only if they invite him. The safety and comfort of the guests are the first consideration; many place them before even the honour of wife and daughter (Gn 19⁸, Jg 19²⁴; cf. Lane, Mod. Egypt, 297). If a guest arrives after sunset he is entitled only to shelter, as the host might then be unable to prepare a meal creditable to himself. If food is offered, it is of the host's goodwill (Lk 11³⁴). The guest, careful of the host's honour, will indicate that more than he requires has been provided by leaving a portion in the dish.

The open hand, as the token of a liberal heart, wins the respect and esteem of the Arabs. Leadership does not of necessity descend from father to son. Right to the position must be vindicated by wisdom, courage, dignity, and not least by generous hospitality. For the niggard in this regard there is nothing but contempt. It is a coveted distinction to be known as a 'coffee sheik,' one who without stint supplies his visitors with the fragrant beverage.

The Arabs are sometimes charged with want of gratitude; justly, as it seems from our point of view. But what seems ingratitude to us may be due simply to the influence of immemorial custom, in a land where the necessities of life are never sold, but held as common good, of which the traveller may of right claim a share. The 'right of a guest' may be taken, if not freely offered. The man who refuses covers himself with perpetual shame. The guest enjoys only his right; therefore no thanks mingle with his farewell.

The right, however, is limited. 'Whoever,' says the Prophet, 'believes in God and the day of resurrection must respect his guest; and the time of being kind to him is one day and one night; and the period of entertaining him is three days; and if after that he does it longer, he benefits him more; but it is not right for the guest to stay in the house of his host so long as to incommode him' (Lane, Arabian Society in the Middle Ages, 143). After three days, or, some say, three days and four hours, the host may ask if he proposes to honour him by a longer stay. The guest may wish to reach some point under protection of the tribe. If so, he is welcome to stay; only, the host may give him work to do. To remain while refusing to do this is highly dishonourable. But the guest may go to another tent at the expiry of every third day, thus renewing his 'right,' and sojourn with the tribe as long as is necessary.

Hospitality involves protection as well as maintenance. 'It is a principle alike in old and new Arabia that the guest is inviolable' (W. R. Smith, Kinship, 48). That this provision applies to enemies as well as to friends shows the magnanimity of the desert law. Every stranger met in the open is assumed to be an enemy; he will owe his safety either to his own prowess or to fear that his tribe will exact vengeance if he is injured. But the stranger who enters the tent is daif Ullah, the guest whom God has sent, to be well entreated for His sake. In an enemy's country one's perils are over when he reaches a tent, and touches even a tent peg. A father's murderer may find sure asylum even in the tent of his victim's son. When he has eaten of the host's bread, the two are at once bound as brothers for mutual help and protection. It is said that 'there is salt between them.' Not that literal salt is required. This is a term covering milk, and indeed food of any kind. A draught of water taken by stealth, or even against his will, from a man's dish, serves the purpose. When protection is secured from one, the whole tribe is bound by it (W. R. Smith, RS 76).

To understand this we must remember (1) that in Arabia all recognition of mutual rights and duties rests upon kinship. Those outside the kin may be dealt with according to each man's inclination and ability. (2) Kinship is not exclusively a matter of birth. It may be acquired. When men eat and drink together, they renew their blood from the one source, and to that extent are partakers in the same blood. The stranger eating with a clansman becomes 'kinsman' to all the members of the clan, as regards 'the fundamental rights and duties that turn on the sanctity of kindred blood' (Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heid. 119f.; W. R. Smith, RS 273 n.). This sanctity may be traced to the ancient belief that the clan god shared its life, and when an animal was slain for food took part in the common meal. The clan's friends were therefore the god's friends, whom to injure was to outrage the deity. That the slaughter of the victim was a religious act involving the whole kin is borne out (a) by the fact that when an animal is slain all have an undisputed right to come to the feast; (b) by the name dhabihah, 'sacrifice,' still applied to it. The present writer was once entertained in the camp of a rather wild and unkempt tribe. His attendants supped with the crowd. Fearing this might not be agreeable to a European, the chief's son, who presided in his father's absence, with innate Arab courtesy, asked him to sup with him in the sheik's tent. Bringing in a portion of the flesh, the youth repeatedly remarked, as if for the stranger's re-assurance, adh-dhabihah wahidah, 'the slaughtering—sacrifice—is one'; i.e. the tribesmen and he ate from the same victim.

The bond thus formed was temporary, holding good for 36 hours after parting. By frequent renewal, however, it might become permanent. 'There was a sworn alliance between the Lihyan and the Mostalich: they were wont to eat and drink together' (RS 270 f.). A man may declare himself the dakhil—from dakhala, 'to enter,' i.e. to claim protection—of a powerful man, and thus pass under shelter of his name even before his tent is reached. Whoever should injure him then would have to reckon with the man whose name he had invoked. The rights of sanctuary associated with temples, and until recently with certain churches, originated in an appeal to the hospitality of the local deity. The refugee's safety depended on the respect paid to the god. Joab would have been safe had he not outlawed himself in this regard (1 K 2³⁵). Jael's dastard deed could be approved only in the heat of patriotic fanaticism (Jg 4¹⁷ 5²⁴).

In OT times it can hardly be said that inns in the later sense existed. The ordinary traveller was provided for by the laws of hospitality. The mālon of Gn 42²⁷ etc. was probably nothing more than a place where caravans were accustomed to halt and pass the night. A building of some kind may be intended by the 'lodge of wayfaring men' in the wilderness (Jer 9¹). For gērūth (Jer 41¹⁷) we should probably read gīdōth, 'folds' (cf. Jos. Ant. x. ix. 5). Great changes were wrought by Greek and Roman influence, and there can be no doubt that in NT times, especially in the larger centres of population, inns were numerous and well appointed. The name pandocheion = Arab. funduq, shows that the inn was a foreign importation. Those on the highways would in some respects resemble the khāns of modern times, and the buildings that stood for centuries on the great lines of caravan traffic, before the sea became the highway of commerce. These were places of strength, as well as of entertainment for man and beast. Such was probably the inn of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10⁴), identified with Khān Hadrūr, on the road to Jericho. The inns would be frequented by men of all nationalities and of all characters. Rabbinical references show that their reputation was not high. It was natural that Christians should, for their own safety, avoid the inn, and practise hospitality among themselves (1 P 4⁹ etc.).

In Lk 2⁷ 'inn' (kataluma) probably means, as it does in Mk 14¹⁴ and Lk 22¹¹, the guest-chamber in a private house. Such guest-chambers were open freely to Jews visiting Jerusalem at the great feasts (Abolth R. Nathan, cap. 34). It is reasonable to suppose that they would be equally open on an occasion like the registration, requiring the presence of such numbers. If Joseph and Mary, arriving late, found the hoped-for guest-chamber already occupied, they might have no resort but the khān, where, in the animal's quarters, Jesus was born.

In modern Palestine hotels are found only at important places on the most popular routes of travel.

HOST.—See next art. and ARMY.

HOST OF HEAVEN.—The phrase 'host (or army) of heaven' occurs in OT in two apparently different senses—referring (1) to stars, (2) to angels.

1. The 'host of heaven' is mentioned as the object of idolatrous worship; it is frequently coupled with 'sun and moon,' the stars being obviously meant; where 'sun and moon' are not specifically mentioned, the phrase may be used as including them as well. Dt 4¹⁹ speaks of this worship as a special temptation to Israel; it has been appointed or allotted to all the peoples, i.e. the heathen, and is absolutely inconsistent with the worship of J^h; the penalty is stoning (17³). The references to it suggest that it became prominent in Israel in the 7th cent. B.C., when Manasseh introduced it into the Temple (2 K 21⁴); its abolition was part of Josiah's reform (23¹ 4. 12). The mention, in the last verse, of 'the altars which were on the roof of the upper chamber of Ahaz' suggests that the worship was, in fact, older than the reign of Manasseh, and had been practised by Ahaz; it was carried on upon the roofs of houses (Jer 19¹³, Zeph 1⁴), so that 2 K 23¹² may well refer to it. Is 17⁴ mentions 'sun-pillars' as characteristic of the idolatry of the reign of Ahaz (unless the words are a later addition), and there are possible traces of nature-worship in earlier periods in Am 5²⁶, and in the names Beth-shemesh, Jericho, which suggest sun- and moon-worship. 2 K 17¹⁶, which speaks of the worship of the host of heaven as prevalent in the Northern Kingdom, is a 'Deuteronomic' passage, which can hardly be pressed historically. Whilst, then, there are early traces of nature-worship, the systematized idolatry of 'the host of heaven' belongs to the period of special Assyrian and Babylonian influence; astrology and kindred beliefs were characteristic of the religions of these countries.

The phrase is used in other contexts of the stars as the armies of J^h, innumerable, ordered, and obedient (Gn 2¹, Ps 33⁶, Is 34⁴ 45¹², Jer 33²²). Is 40²⁶ ('bringeth out their host by number; he calleth them all by name') comes very near to a personification. In Dn 8¹⁰ we read of the assault of the 'little horn' on the 'host of heaven' and their 'prince.' This may be only a hyperbolic expression for blasphemous pride, but it strongly suggests the influence of the Babylonian 'dragon myth,' in which heaven itself was stormed; cf. Rev 12⁴ 13¹, where the Beast blasphemes God, His tabernacles, and them that dwell in heaven; i.e. the angelic host (so Bousset), at least in the idea underlying the conception. Hence in Dn 8¹⁰ we are probably right in seeing a reference to the stars regarded as animate warriors of J^h, their 'captain'; cf. the poetical passages Jg 5²⁰ (the stars in their courses fighting against Sisera) and Job 38⁷ (the morning stars, coupled with the 'sons of God,' singing for joy); in these passages it remains a question how far the personification is merely a poetic figure. It is at least possible that a more literally conceived idea lies behind them. In Is 24²¹ we read of the 'host of the height' ('high ones on high'), whom J^h shall punish in the Day of Judgment, together with the kings of the earth. The passage, the date of which is very doubtful, is strongly eschatological, and the phrase must refer to supramundane foes of J^h, whether stars or angels; again, a reference to the dragon myth is very possible.

2. Passages such as these lead to the consideration of others where 'host of heaven' = 'angels.' The chief is 1 K 22¹⁹ (Micaiah's vision); cf. Ps 103²¹, Lk 2¹³. Though this actual phrase is not often used, the attendant ministers of J^h are often spoken of as an organized army (Gn 32², Jos 5¹⁴, 2 K 6¹⁷, Job 25³). Cf. in this connexion the title 'Lord of hosts (Sabaoth),' which, though it may have been used originally of J^h as the leader of the armies of Israel, admittedly came to be used of Him as ruler of the celestial hosts (see LORD OF HOSTS). There are passages where the phrase 'host of heaven' is ambiguous, and may refer either to stars or to angels (Dn 4³², Neh 9⁶, Ps 148² [where it connects angels and sun, moon, and stars]).

3. It remains to consider the connexion between the two uses of the phrase. It has been supposed by some to be purely verbal, stars and angels being independently compared to an army; or it has been suggested that the stars were 'the visible image' of the host of angels. But a study of the passages quoted above will probably lead to the conclusion that the connexion is closer. The idolaters evidently regarded the stars as animate; prophets and poets seem to do so too. When this is done, it lies very near at hand to identify them with, or at least assimilate them to, the angels. In the ancient myths and folklore, the traces of which in the Bible are increasingly recognized, stars and angels play a large part, and the conception of the two is not kept distinct. Later thought tended to identify them (Enoch 18² 21¹ etc., Rev 9¹ 11; cf. Is 14¹², Lk 10¹⁸). Hence the one use of the phrase 'host of heaven' ran naturally into the other, and it seems impossible to draw a sharp line of distinction between the two. As we have seen, there are passages where it is ambiguous, or where it seems to imply the personification of the stars, i.e. their practical identification with angels. While there is no reason why the spiritual teachers of Israel should not have countenanced this belief at a certain stage and to a certain point, and should not have adopted in a modified form the eschatology in which it figured, it is of course clear that the conception was kept free from its grosser and superstitious features. Whatever it may have been in the popular mind, to them it is little more than a metaphor, and nothing either distantly resembling the fear or the worship of the stars receives any countenance in their teaching. It is, however, worth while insisting on the full force of their language as affording a key to the reconstruction of the popular beliefs which seem to lie behind it. It should be noted that Wis 13² protests against any idea that the heavenly bodies are animate, and it has been suggested that Ezekiel's avoidance of the phrase 'Lord of hosts' may be due to a fear of seeming to lend any countenance to star-worship.

HOTHAM.—1. An Asherite (1 Ch 7²). 2. Father of two of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴).

HOTHIR.—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25⁴).

HOUGH.—The hough (modern spelling 'hock') of a quadruped is the joint between the knee and the fetlock in the hind leg; in man the back of the knee joint, called the ham. To 'hough' is to cut the tendon of the hough, to hamstring. The subst. occurs in 2 Es 15²⁸ 'the camel's hough' (AVM 'pastern or litter'). The verb is found in Jos 11⁸, 2 S 8⁴, 1 Ch 18⁴ always of houghing horses. Tindale translates Gn 49⁶ 'In their selfe-will they houghed an ox,' which is retained in AVM, and inserted into the text of RV in place of 'they digged down a wall.'

HOUE.—See TIME.

HOUSE.—The history of human habitation in Palestine goes back to the undated spaces of the palæolithic or early stone age (see especially the important chapter on 'Prehistoric Archaeology' in Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 1907, pp. 373 ff.). The excavations and discoveries, of the last few years in particular, have introduced us to the pre-historic inhabitants whom the Semitic invaders, loosely termed Canaanites or Amorites, found in occupation of the country somewhere in the third millennium before our era (circa B.C. 2500). The men of this early race were still in the neolithic stage of civilization, their only implements being of polished flint, bone, and wood. They lived for the most part in the natural limestone caves in which Palestine abounds. In the historical period such underground caves (for descriptions and diagrams of some of the more celebrated, see Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 135-146; Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, 204-270) were used by the Hebrews as places of refuge in times of national danger (Jg 6², 1 S 13³) and religious persecution (2 Mac 6¹¹, He 11¹³). But it is not with these, or with the texts in which the patriarchs and their descendants lived before the conquest of Canaan, that this article has to deal, but with the houses of clay and stone which were built and occupied after that epoch.

1. Materials.—The most primitive of all the houses for which man has been indebted to his own inventiveness is that formed of a few leafy boughs from the primeval forest, represented in Hebrew history to this day by the booths of OT (see BOOTH). Of more permanent habitations, the earliest of which traces have been discovered are probably the mud huts, whose foundations were found by Mr. Macalister in the lowest stratum at Gezer, and which are regarded by him as the work of the cave-dwellers of the later stone age (PEFSI, 1904, 110). Clay in the form of bricks, either sun-dried or, less frequently, baked in a kiln (see BRICK), and stone (Lv 14⁴⁶, Is 9¹⁰ etc.), have been in all ages the building materials of the successive inhabitants of Palestine. Even in districts where stone was available the more tractable material was often preferred. Houses built of crude brick are the 'houses of clay,' the unsubstantial nature of which is emphasized in Job 4¹, and whose walls a thief or another could easily dig through (Ezk 12², Mt 6¹⁹).

The excavations have shown that there is no uniformity, even at a given epoch, in the size of bricks, which are both rectangular and square in shape. The largest, apparently, have been found at Taanach, roughly 21 inches by 15½, and 4½ inches in thickness. At Gezer a common size is a square brick 15 inches in the side and 7 inches thick (PEFSI, 1902, 319). In the Mishna the standard size is a square brick 9 inches each way (Eruvin, i. 3).

The stone used for house building varied from common field stones and larger, roughly shaped, quarry stones to the carefully dressed wrought stone (gashit, 1 K 5¹⁷ RV) or 'hewn-stone, according to measure, sawed with saws' (7²), such as was used by Solomon in his building operations. Similarly rubble, wrought stone, and brick are named in the Mishna as the building materials of the time (Baba bathra, i. 1). For mortar clay was the usual material, although the use of bitumen [wh. see] (Gn 11³ RVm, EV 'slime') was not unknown. Wood as a building material was employed mainly for roofing, and to a less extent for internal decoration (see below).

2. General plan of Hebrew houses.—The recent excavations at Gezer and elsewhere have shown that the simplest type of house in Palestine has scarcely altered in any respect for four thousand years. Indeed, its construction is so simple that the possibility of change is reduced to a minimum. In a Syrian village of to-day the typical abode of the fellah consists of a walled enclosure, within which is a small court closed at the farther end by a house of a single room. This is frequently divided into two parts, one level with the entrance, assigned at night to the domestic animals, cows, ass, etc.; the other, about 18 in. higher, occupied by the peasant and his family. A somewhat better class of house consists of two or three rooms, of which the largest is the family living and sleeping room, a second is assigned to the cattle, while a third serves as general store-room (AV closet).

The Canaanite houses, which the Hebrews inherited (Dt 6¹⁰) and copied, are now known to have been arranged on similar lines (see the diagram of a typical Canaanite house in Gezer, restored by Mr. Macalister in his Bible Sidelights from Gezer [1906], fig. 25). As in all Eastern domestic architecture, the rooms were built on one or more sides of an open court (2 S 17¹⁸, Jer 32² etc.). These rooms were of small dimensions, 12 to 15 feet square as a rule, with which may be compared the legal definition of 'large' and 'small' rooms in the late period of the Mishna. The former was held to measure 15 ft. by 12, with a height, following the model of the Temple (1 K 6²²), equal to half the sum of the length and breadth, namely, 13½ ft.; a 'small' room measured 12 ft. by 9, with a height of 10½ ft. (Baba bathra, vi. 4).

Should occasion arise, through the marriage of a son or otherwise, to enlarge the house, this was done by building one or more additional rooms on another side of the court. In the case of a 'man of wealth' (1 S 9⁴ RVm), the house would consist of two or even more courts, in which case the rooms about the 'inner court' (Est 4¹¹) were appropriated to the women of the family. The court, further, often contained a cistern to catch and retain the precious supply of water that fell in the rainy season (2 S 17¹⁸). For the question of an upper storey see § 4.

3. Foundation and dedication rites.—In building a house, the first step was to dig out the space required for the foundation (cf. Mt 7²⁴), after which came the ceremony of the laying of the foundation stone, the 'corner stone of sure foundation' of Is 28¹⁶ (see, further, CORNER-STONE). The 'day of the foundation' (2 Ch 8¹⁶), as we learn from the poetic figure of Job 38⁶, was, as it is at the present day, one of great rejoicing (cf. Ezr 3¹¹).

With the exception of a passage to be cited presently, the OT is silent regarding a foundation rite on which a lurid light has been cast by the latest excavations in Palestine. It is now certain that the Canaanites, and the Hebrews after them, were wont to consecrate the foundation of a new building by a human sacrifice. The precise details of the rite are still uncertain, but there is already ample evidence to show that, down even to 'the latter half of the Hebrew monarchy' (PEFSI, 1903, 224), it was a frequent practice to bury infants, whether alive or after previous sacrifice is still doubtful, in large jars 'generally under the ends of walls,—that is, at the corners of houses or chambers or just under the door jams' (ibid. 306). At Megiddo was found the skeleton of a girl of about fifteen years, who had clearly been built alive into the foundation of a fortress; at Taanach was found one of ten years of age; and skeletons of adults have also been discovered.

An interesting development of this rite of foundation sacrifice can be traced from the fifteenth century B.C. onwards. With the jar containing the body of the victim there were at first deposited other jars containing jugs, bowls, and a lamp, perhaps also food, as in ordinary burials. Gradually, it would seem, lamps and bowls came to be buried alone, as substitutes and symbols of the human victim, most frequently a lamp within a bowl, with another bowl as covering. Full details of this curious rite cannot be given here, but no other theory so plausible has yet been suggested to explain these 'lamp and bowl deposits' (see Macalister's reports in PEFSI, from 1903—esp. p. 306 ff. with illustrations—onwards, also his Bible Sideights, 165 ff.; Vincent, Canaan, 50 f., 192, 198 ff.). The only reference to foundation sacrifice in OT is the case of Hiel the Bethelite, who sacrificed his two sons—for that such is the true interpretation can now scarcely be doubted—his first-born at the re-founding of Jericho, and his youngest at the completion and dedication of the walls and gates (1 K 16¹⁴ RV).

Here by anticipation may be taken the rite of the formal dedication of a private house, which is attested by Dt 20⁶, although the references in Hebrew literature to the actual ceremony are confined to sacred and public buildings (Lv 8¹⁰ et., 1 K 8¹ et., Ezr 6¹⁸ et., Neh 3¹² et., 1 Mac 4²² et.). It is most probable that some of the human victims above alluded to may have been offered in connexion with the dedication or restoration of important buildings (cf. 1 K 16¹⁴ above).

On the whole subject it may be said, in conclusion, that, judging from the ideas and practice of the Bedouin when a new tent or 'house of hair' is set up, we ought to seek the explanation of the rite of foundation sacrifice—a practice which obtains among many races widely separated in space and time—in the desire to propitiate the spirit whose abode is supposed to be disturbed by the new foundation (cf. Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, 46 ff.), rather than in the wish to secure the spirit of the victim as the tutelary genius of the new building. This ancient custom still survives in the sacrifice of a sheep or other animal, which is indispensable to the safe occupation of a new house in Moslem lands, and even to the successful inauguration of a public work, such as a railway, or—as the other day in Damascus—of an electric lighting installation. In the words of an Arab sheik: 'Every house must have its death—man, woman, child, or animal' (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day).

4. Details of construction, walls and floor.—The walls of Canaanite and Hebrew houses were for the most part, as we have seen, of crude brick or stone. At Tell el-Hesi (Lachish), for example, we find at one period house walls of 'dark-brown clay with little straw'; at another, walls of 'reddish-yellow clay, full of straw' (Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, 44). At Gezer Mr. Macalister found a wall that was 'remarkable for being built in alternate courses of red and white bricks, the red course being four inches in height, the white five inches' (PEFSI, 1903, 216). As a rule, however, the Gezer house walls consisted of common field stones, among which dressed stones—even at corners and door posts—are of the rarest possible occurrence. The joints are wide and irregular, and filled with mud packed in the widest places with smaller stones' (ibid. 215). The explanation of this simple architecture is that in early times each man built his own house, expert builders (Ps 118²²) or masons (see ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 3) being employed only on royal residences, city walls, and other buildings of importance. Hence squared and dressed stones are mentioned in OT only in connexion with such works (1 K 5¹⁷ 7⁹) and the houses of the wealthy (Am 5¹¹, Is 9¹⁰). In the Gezer houses of the post-exilic period, however, 'the stones are well dressed and squared, often as well shaped as a modern brick'

(PEFSI, 1904, 124, with photograph, 125). Between these two extremes are found walls of rubble, and quarry stones of various sizes, roughly trimmed with a hammer. Mud was 'universally used as mortar.'

In ordinary cases the thickness of the outside walls varied from 18 to 24 inches; that of partition walls, on the other hand, did not exceed 9 to 12 inches (ib. 118). In NT times the thickness varied somewhat with the materials employed (see Baba bathra, i. 1). It is doubtful if the common view is correct, which finds in certain passages, especially Ps 118²² and its NT citations, a reference to a corner stone on the topmost course of masonry (see CORNER). In most cases the reference is to the foundation stone at the corner of two walls, as explained above.

The inside walls of stone houses received a 'plaster' (EV) of clay (Lv 14⁴⁶, AV 'dust,' RV 'mortar'), or, in the better houses, of lime or gypsum (Dn 5²). The 'untempered mortar' of Ezk 13¹¹ 22²⁸ was some sort of whitewash applied to the outside walls, as is attested for NT times (Mt 23²⁷, Ac 23³ 'thou whited wall'). In the houses of the wealthy, as in the Temple, it was customary to line the walls with cypress (2 Ch 3⁶, EV 'fir'), cedar, and other valuable woods (1 K 6¹⁵, 18 7⁷). The 'cicled houses' of EV (Jer 22¹⁴, Hag 1⁴ etc.) are houses panelled with wood in this way (CIELED). The acme of elegance was represented by cedar panels inlaid with ivory, such as earned for Ahab's pleasure kiosk the name of 'the ivory house' (1 K 22¹⁹) and incurred the denunciation of Amos (Am 3¹⁵). We also hear of the panelled 'ceilings' of the successive Temples (1 K 6¹⁵, 2 Mac 1¹⁶ RV).

The floors of the houses were in all periods made of hard beaten clay, the permanence of which to this day has proved to the excavators a precious indication of the successive occupations of the buried cities of Palestine. Public buildings have been found paved with slabs of stone. The better sort of private houses were no doubt, like the Temple (1 K 6¹⁵), floored with cypress and other woods.

The presence of vaults or cellars, in the larger houses at least, is shown by Lk 11¹² RV. The excavations also show that when a wholly or partly ruined town was rebuilt, the houses of the older stratum were frequently retained as underground store-rooms of the new houses on the higher level. The reference in 1 Ch 27³⁷, 29 to wine and oil 'cellars' (EV) is to 'stores' of these commodities, rather than to the places where the latter were kept.

5. The roof.—The ancient houses of Canaan, like their modern representatives, had flat roofs, supported by stout wooden beams laid from wall to wall. Across these were laid smaller rafters (Ca 1¹⁷), then brushwood, reeds, and the like, above which was a layer of earth several inches thick, while on the top of all came a thick plaster of clay or of clay and lime. It was such a roofing (AV tiling, RV tiles, Lk 5¹⁹) that the friends of the paralytic 'broke up' in order to lower him into the room below (Mk 2⁴). The wood for the roof-beams was furnished mostly by the common sycamore, cypress (Ca 1¹⁷) and cedar (1 K 6⁹) being reserved for the homes of the wealthy. Hence the point of Isaiah's contrast between the humble houses of crude brick, roofed with sycamore, and the stately edifices of hewn stone roofed with cedar (Is 9¹⁰).

It was, and is, difficult to keep such a roof watertight in the rainy season, as Pr 27¹⁸ shows. In several houses at Gezer a primitive drain of jars was found for carrying the water from the leaking roof (Ec 10¹⁸ RV) through the floor to the foundations beneath (PEFSI, 1904, 14, with illust.). In the Mishna there is mention of at least two kinds of spout or gutter (2 S 5⁸ AV, but the sense here is doubtful) for conveying the rain water from the roof to the cistern. Evidence has accumulated in recent years showing that even in the smallest houses it was usual to have the beams of the roof supported by a row of wooden posts, generally three in number, resting on stone bases, 'from 1 foot 6 inches to 2 feet in diameter' (PEFSI, 1904, 115, with photo.). The same method was adopted for the roofs of large public buildings (see Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 91 f., with plan), and Mr. Macalister has ingeniously explained Samson's feat at the temple of Dagon, by supposing that he slid two of the massive wooden pillars (Jg 16²⁹ f.) supporting the portico from their stone supports, thus causing its collapse (Bible Sidelights, 136 ff. with illust.).

The roof was required by law to be surrounded by a battlement, or rather a parapet, as a protection against accident (Dt 22⁵). Access to the roof was apparently obtained, as at the present day, by an outside stair leading from the court. Our EV finds winding stairs in the Temple (1 K 6⁹), and some sort of inner stair or ladder is required by the reference to the secret trap-door in 2 Mac 1¹⁶. The roof or housetop was put to many uses, domestic (Jos 2⁸) and other. It was used, in particular, for recreation (2 S 11³) and for sleeping (1 S 9²⁵ f.), also for prayer and meditation (Ac 10⁹), lamentation (Is 15¹, Jer 48³⁸), and even for idolatrous worship (Jer 19⁴, Zeph 1⁵). For these and other purposes a tent (2 S 16²²) or a booth (Neh 8¹⁶) might be provided, or a permanent roof-chamber might be erected. Such were the 'chamber with walls' (2 K 4¹⁰ RVm) erected for Elisha, the 'summer parlour' (Jg 3²⁰, lit. as RVm 'upper chamber of cooling') of Egion, and the 'loft' (RV 'chamber') of 1 K 17¹⁹.

Otherwise the houses of Palestine were, as a rule, of one storey. Exceptions were confined to the houses of the great, and to crowded cities like Jerusalem and Samaria. Ahaziah's upper chamber in the latter city (2 K 12) may well have been a room in the second storey of the royal palace, where was evidently the window from which Jezebel was thrown (9²²). The same may be said of the 'upper room' in which the Last Supper was held (Mk 14¹⁵); cf. Ac 1¹³). It was a Greek city, however, in which Eutychus fell from a window in the 'third story' (Ac 20⁹ RV).

6. The door and its parts.—The door consisted of four distinct parts: the door proper, the threshold, the lintel (Ex 12⁷ RV), and the two doorposts. The first of these was of wood, and was hung upon projecting pivots of wood, the hinges of Pr 26¹⁴, which turned in corresponding sockets in the threshold and lintel respectively. Like the Egyptians and Babylonians, the Hebrews probably cased the pivots and sockets of heavy doors with bronze; those of the Temple doors were sheathed in gold (1 K 7²⁰). In the Hauran, doors of a single slab of stone with stone pivots are still found in situ. Folding doors are mentioned only in connexion with the Temple (1 K 6³⁴).

The threshold (Jg 19⁷, 1 K 14¹⁷ etc.) or sill must have been invariably of stone. Among the Hebrews, as among so many other peoples of antiquity, a special sanctity attached to the threshold (see Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant, passim). The doorposts or jambs were square posts of wood (1 K 7⁴, Ezk 41²¹) or of stone. The command of Dt 6⁹ 11²⁰ gave rise to the practice, still observed in all Jewish houses, of enclosing a piece of parchment containing the words of Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ 11¹³⁻²¹ in a small case of metal or wood, which is nailed to the doorpost, hence its modern name mezuzah ('doorpost').

Doors were locked (Jg 3²⁴ f.) by an arrangement similar to that still in use in Syria (see the illust. in Hastings' DB ii. 836). This consists of a short upright piece of wood, fastened on the inside of the door, through which a square wooden bolt (Ca 5⁴, Neh 3³ RV, for AV lock) passes at right angles into a socket in the jamb of the door. When the bolt is shot by the hand, three to six small iron pins drop from the upright into holes in the bolt, which is hollow at this part. The latter cannot now be drawn back without the proper key. This is a flat piece of wood—straight or bent as the case may be—into the upper surface of which pins have been fixed corresponding exactly in number and position to the holes in the bolt. The person wishing to enter the house 'puts in his hand by the hole of the door' (Ca 5⁴), and inserts the key into the hollow part of the bolt in such a way that the pins of the key will displace those in the holes of the bolt, which is then easily withdrawn from the socket and the door is open.

In the larger houses it was customary to have a man (Mk 13³⁴) or a woman (2 S 4⁶ RVm, Jn 18¹⁷) to act as a doorkeeper or porter. In the palaces of royalty this was a military duty (1 K 14²⁷) and an office of distinction (Est 2²¹ 6²).

7. Lighting and heating.—The ancient Hebrew houses must have been very imperfectly lighted. Indeed, it is almost certain that, in the poorer houses at least, the only light available was admitted through the doorway (cf. Sir 42¹¹ [Heb. text], 'Let there be no casement where thy daughter dwells'). In any case, such windows as did exist were placed high up in the walls, at least six feet from the ground, according to the Mishna. We have no certain monumental evidence as to the size and construction of the windows of Hebrew houses (but see for a probable stone window-frame, 20 inches high, Bliss and Macalister, Excav. in Palest. 143 and pl. 73). They may, however, safely be assumed to have been much smaller than those to which we are accustomed, although the commonest variety, the challōn, was large enough to allow a man to pass out (Jos 21¹, 1 S 19¹²) or in (Jl 2⁹). Another variety ('arubbah') was evidently smaller, since it is used also to designate the holes of a dove-cot (Is 60⁸ EV 'windows'). These and other terms are rendered in our versions by 'window,' lattice, and casement (Pr 7⁸ AV and RV 'lattice'). None of these, of course, was filled with glass. Like the windows of Egyptian houses, they were doubtless closed with wood or lattice-work, which could be opened when necessary (2 K 13¹⁷). An obscure expression in 1 K 6⁴ is rendered by RV, 'windows of fixed lattice-work.' During the hours of darkness, light was supplied by the small oil lamp which was kept continually burning (see LAMP).

Most of the houses excavated show a depression of varying dimensions in the floor, either in the centre or in a corner, which, from the obvious traces of fire, was clearly the family hearth (Is 30¹⁴). Wood was the chief fuel (see COAL), supplemented by withered vegetation of all sorts (Mt 6³⁰), and probably, as at the present day, by dried cow and camel dung (Ezk 41⁸). The pungent smoke, which was trying to the eyes (Pr 10²⁶), escaped by the door or by the window, for the chimney of Hos 13³ is properly 'window' or 'casement' ('arubbah', see above). In the cold season the upper classes warmed their rooms by means of a brasier (Jer 36²¹ f. RV), or fire-pan (Zec 12⁸ RV).

8. Furniture of the house.—This in early times was of the simplest description. Even at the present day the feiahin sit and sleep mostly on mats and mattresses spread upon the floor. So the Hebrew will once have slept, wrapped in his simlah or cloak as 'his only covering' (Ex 22²⁷), while his household gear will have consisted mainly of the necessary utensils for the preparation of food, to which the following section is devoted. Under the monarchy, however, when a certain 'great woman' of Shunem proposed to furnish 'a little chamber over the wall' for Elisha, she named 'a bed and a table and a stool and a candlestick' (2 K 4¹⁰), and we know otherwise that while the poor man slept on a simple mat of straw or rushes in the single room that served as living and sleeping room, the well-to-do had not only beds but bedchambers (2 S 4⁷, 2 K 11², Jth 16¹ etc.). The former consisted of a framework of wood, on which were laid cushions (Am 3¹² RV), 'carpets' and 'striped cloths' (Pr 7¹⁶ RV). We hear also of the 'bed's head' (Gn 47²¹) or curved end, as figured by Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt i. 416, fig. 191 (where note the steps for 'going up' to the bed; cf. 1 K 1⁴). Bolsters have rightly disappeared from RV, which renders otherwise (see 1 S 19¹⁴ 26⁷ etc.); the pillow also from Gn 28¹¹, 18 and Mk 4²

(RV here, 'cushion'), and where it is retained, as 1 S 19¹³, the sense is doubtful. Reference may be made to the richly appointed bed of Holofernes, with its gorgeous mosquito curtain (Jth 10¹³ 13⁹).

The bed often served as a couch by day (Ezk 23⁴, Am 3¹² RV—see also MEALS, § 3), and it is sometimes uncertain which is the more suitable rendering. In Est 1⁸, for example, RV rightly substitutes 'couches' for 'beds' in the description of the magnificent divans of gold and silver in the palace of Ahasuerus (cf. 7⁹). The wealthy and luxurious contemporaries of Amos had their beds and couches inlaid with ivory (Am 6⁴), and furnished, according to RV, with 'silken cushions' (3¹² RV).

As regards the stool above referred to, and the seats of the Hebrews generally, it must suffice to state that the seats of the contemporary Egyptians (for illust. see Wilkinson, op. cit. 1. 408 f.) and Assyrians were of two main varieties, namely, stools and chairs. The former were constructed either with a square frame or after the shape of our camp-stools; the latter with a straight or rounded back only, or with a back and arms. The Hebrew word for Elisha's stool is always applied elsewhere to the seats of persons of distinction and the thrones of kings; it must therefore have been a chair rather than a stool, although the latter is its usual meaning in the Mishna (Krengel, Das Hausgerät in der Mishnah, 10 f.—a mine of information regarding the furniture, native and foreign, to be found in Jewish houses in later times). Footstools were also in use (2 Ch 9¹⁸ and oft., especially in metaphors).

The tables were chiefly of wood, and, like those of the Egyptians (Wilkinson, op. cit. 1. 417 f. with illust.), were 'round, square, or oblong,' as the Mishna attests. They were relatively much smaller and lower than ours (see, further, MEALS, § 4).

The fourth article in Elisha's room was a candlestick, really a lampstand, for which see LAMP. It would extend this article beyond due limits to discuss even a selection from the many other articles of furniture, apart from those reserved for the closing section, which are named in Biblical and post-Biblical literature, or which have been brought to light in surprising abundance by the recent excavations. Mention can be made only of articles of toilet, such as the 'molten mirror' of Job 37¹⁸ (AV looking-glass), the paint-pot (2 K 9³⁰), pins and needles, of which many specimens in bone, bronze, and silver have been found; of the distaff, spindle, and loom (see SPINNING AND WEAVING), for the manufacture of the family garments, and the chest for holding them; and finally, of the children's cradle (Krengel, op. cit. 26), and their toys of clay and bone.

9. Utensils connected with food.—Conspicuous among the 'earthen vessels' (2 S 17²⁸) of every household was the water-jar or pitcher (kud)—the barrel of 1 K 18²⁵, Amer. RV jar—in which water was fetched from the village well (Gn 24¹⁵, Mk 14¹³, and oft.). From this smaller jar, carried on head or shoulder, the water was emptied into the larger waterpots of Jn 2⁶. Large jars were also required for the household provisions of wheat and barley—one variety in NT times was large enough to hold a man. Others held the store of olives and other fruits. The cruse was a smaller jar with one or two handles, used for carrying water on a journey (1 S 28¹¹, 1 K 19⁹), also for holding oil (1 K 17¹²). (See, further, art. POTTERY, and the elaborate studies, with illustrations, of the thousands of 'potter's vessels' which the excavations have brought to light, in the great work of Bliss and Macalister entitled Excavations in Palestine, 1898–1900, pp. 71–141, with plates 20–55; also Vincent's Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 1907, pp. 296–360, with the illustrations there and throughout the book).

The bucket of Nu 24⁷, Is 40¹⁸ was a water-skin, probably adapted, as at the present day, for drawing water by having two pieces of wood inserted crosswise at the mouth. The main use of skins among the Hebrews, however, was to hold the wine and other fermented liquors. The misleading rendering bottles is retained in RV except where the context requires the true rendering 'skins' or 'wine-skins' (Jos 9⁴, 13, Mt 9¹⁷). For another use of skins see MILK. 'After the water-skins,' says Doughty, 'a pair of mill-stones is the most necessary husbandry in an Arabian household,' and so it was among the Hebrews, as may be seen in the article MILL.

No house was complete without a supply of baskets of various sizes and shapes for the bread (Ex 29²²) and the fruit (Dt 26²), and even in early times for the serving of meat (Jg 6¹⁹). Among the 'vessels of wood' of Lv 15¹² was the indispensable wooden bowl, which served as a kneading-trough (Ex 12²⁴), and various other bowls, such as the 'lordly dish' of the nomad Jael (Jg 5²²) and the bowl of Gideon (6³⁸), although the bowls were mostly of earthenware (see BOWL).

As regards the actual preparation of food, apart from the oven (for which see BREAD), our attention is drawn chiefly to the various members of the pot family, so to say. Four of these are named together in 1 S 2¹⁴, the kippūr, the dūd, the qallachath, and the pārūr, rendered respectively the pan, the kettle, the caldron, and the pot. Elsewhere these terms are rendered with small attempt at consistency; while a fifth, the most frequently named of all, the str, is the flesh-pot of Ex 16¹, the 'great pot' of 2 K 4³⁸, and the 'caldron' of Jer 1¹⁴. In what respect these differed it is impossible to say. The str was evidently of large size and made of bronze (1 K 7⁴⁹), while the pārūr was small and of earthenware, hence ben-Sira's question: 'What fellowship hath the [earthen] pot with the [bronze] caldron?' (Sir 134, Heb. text). The kippūr, again, was wide and shallow, rather than narrow and deep. Numerous illustrations of cooking-pots from OT times may be seen in the recent works above referred to. The only cooking utensils known to be of iron are the baking-pan (Lv 2⁵ RV), probably a shallow iron plate (see Ezk 4³), and the frying-pan (Lv 2⁷). A knife, originally of flint (Jos 5²) and later of bronze, was required for cutting up the meat to be cooked (Gn 22⁶, 10, Jg 19²⁹), and a fork for lifting it from the pot (1 S 2¹³ EV fleshhook [wh. see]).

In the collection of pottery figured in Bliss and Macalister's work one must seek the counterparts of the various dishes, mostly wide, deep bowls, in which we read of food being served, such as the 'dish' from which the sluggard is too lazy to withdraw his hand (Pr 19²⁴ RV), and the chargers of Nu 7¹⁵, though here they are of silver (see, further, MEALS, § 5). In the same work the student will find an almost endless variety of cups, some for drawing the 'cup of cold water' from the large water-jars, others for wine—flagons, jugs, and juglets. The material of all of these will have ascended from the coarsest earthenware to bronze (Lv 6³⁸), and from bronze to silver (Nu 7¹⁵, Jth 12¹) and gold (1 K 10²¹, Est 1⁷), according to the rank and wealth of their owners and the purposes for which they were designed.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HOZAI is given as a prop. name in RV of 2 Ch 33¹⁹, where AV and RVm give 'the seers.' AVm has Hosai. If we retain the MT, the tr. of RV seems the only defensible one, but perhaps the original reading was 'his seers.'

HUKKOK.—A place near Tabor on the west of Naphtali (Jos 19²⁴). It may be the present village Yākūk near the edge of the plateau to the N.W. of the Sea of Galilee.

HUKOK.—See HELKATH.

HUL.—The eponym of an Aramæan tribe (Gn 10²⁵) whose location is quite uncertain.

HULDAH ('weasel'; an old totem clan-name—so W. R. Smith).—The prophetess, wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, living in a part of Jerusalem called the Mishneh ('second quarter'), whose advice

Josiah sought, by a deputation of his chief ministers, on the alarming discovery of 'the book of the law' in the Temple, in 621 B.C. (2 K 22³⁻²⁰ = 2 Ch 34⁸⁻²⁸). Her response was threatening for the nation, in the strain of Jeremiah, while promising exemption to the pious king. Huldah ranks with Deborah and Hannah among the rare women-prophets of the OT.

G. G. FINDLAY.

HUMILITY.—Trench defines 'humility' as 'the esteeming of ourselves small, inasmuch as we are so; the thinking truly, and because truly, therefore lowly, of ourselves. Alford, Ellicott, Salmond, Vincent, and many others agree. It is an inadequate and faulty definition. A man may be small and may realize his smallness, and yet be far from being humble. His spirit may be full of envy instead of humility. He may be depressed in spirit because he sees his own meanness and general worthlessness, and yet he may be as rebellious against his lot or his constitutional proclivities as he is clearly cognizant of them. Low-mindedness is not lowly-mindedness. The exhortation of Ph 2³ does not mean that every man ought to think that everybody else is better than himself in moral character, or in outward conduct, or in natural or inherited powers. That would be impossible in some cases and untruthful in many others. It is not an exhortation to either an impossibility or an untruthfulness. A better definition of the Christian grace of humility is found in the union of highest self-respect with uttermost abandon of sacrifice in service. A man who knows his own superior worth and yet is willing to serve his inferiors in Christian love is a humble man. The classic example in the NT is Jn 13³⁻¹⁵. The Lord, knowing that the Father had given all things into His hands, and that He came forth from God and would go again unto God, knowing His incomparable superiority to every one in that company, was yet so meek and lowly in heart, so humble in spirit and ready for service, that He girded Himself with a towel and washed the disciples' feet. The consciousness of His own transcendent worth was in no respect inconsistent with His humility. Genuine humility leads the strong to serve the weak. It never underestimates its own worth, but in utter unselfishness it is ready to sacrifice its own claims at any moment for the general good. Genuine humility loses all its self-conceit but never loses its self-respect. It is consistent with the highest dignity of character and life. Hence we may rightly call the Incarnation the Humiliation of Christ. He stood at the head of the heavenly hierarchies. He was equal with God. There was no dignity in the universe like unto His. Yet He humbled Himself to become a man. He made Himself of no reputation. He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He was the servant of all. There was no humility in the universe like unto His. He never forgot His dignity. When Pilate asked Him if He were a king, He answered that He was. He stood in kingly majesty before the mob, in kingly serenity before the magistrates; He hung as King upon the cross. Yet He never forgot His humility. Being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. St. Paul exhorts, 'Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus' (Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹). God giveth grace to all who are thus humble (Ja 4⁶).

When Augustine was asked, 'What is the first article in the Christian religion?' he answered, 'Humility.' And they said, 'What is the second?' and he said, 'Humility.' And they said, 'What is the third?' and he said the third time, 'Humility.' Pascal said: 'Vanity has taken so firm a hold on the heart of man, that a porter, a bodman, a turn-spike, can talk greatly of himself, and is for having his admirers. Philosophers who write of the contempt of glory do yet desire the glory of writing well, and those who read their compositions would not lose the glory of having read them. We are so presumptuous as that we desire to be known to all the world; and even to those who are not to come into the world till we have left it. And at the same time we are so little and vain as that the esteem of five or six persons about us is enough to content and amuse us.' D. A. HAYES.

HUNTING is not conspicuous in the literature of the Hebrews that remains to us. We may probably infer that it did not bulk largely in their life. As an amusement, it seems to belong to a more advanced stage of civilization than they had reached. The typical hunter was found outside their borders (Gn 10⁹). Esau, skilful in the chase, is depicted as somewhat uncouth and simple (Gn 25²⁷ etc.). Not till the time of Herod do we hear of a king achieving excellence in this form of sport (Jos. BJ i. xxi. 13). Wild animals and birds were, however, appreciated as food (Lv 17¹³, 1 S 26²⁰ etc.); and in a country like Palestine, abounding in beasts and birds of prey, some proficiency in the huntsman's art was necessary in order to secure the safety of the community, and the protection of the flocks. Among these 'evil beasts' lions and bears were the most dangerous (Gn 37³⁴, 1 K 13³⁴, 2 K 2²⁴, Pr 28¹⁵ etc.). Deeds of prowess in the slaughter of such animals—by Samson in self-defence (Jg 14⁶), David the shepherd to rescue his charges (1 S 17³⁴), and Benaiah (2 S 23²⁰)—gained for these men abiding fame. H. P. Smith (Samuel, in loc.) would read of Benaiah: 'He used to go down and smite the lions in the pit on snowy days,' when he could track them easily. The difficulty is that snowy days would be rather few to permit of his making a reputation in this way.

Among the animals hunted for food were the gazelle, the hart, the roebuck, and the wild goat (Dt 12¹⁵, 2 S 14⁵ etc.). The first three are mentioned specially as furnishing the table of Solomon (1 K 4²²). The partridge was perhaps the bird chiefly hunted in ancient times, as it is at the present day (1 S 26²⁰). Neither beast nor bird might be eaten unless the blood had been 'poured out' (Lv 17¹³, Dt 12¹⁶ etc.)—a law still observed by the Moslems.

Little information is given in Scripture as to the methods followed by the huntsmen. The hunting dog is not mentioned; but it is familiar to Josephus (Ant. vi. viii. 9). The following implements were in use, viz.:—the bow and arrow (Gn 27³ etc.), the club (Job 41²⁹), nets (Job 19⁶, Ps 9⁶, Is 51²⁰ etc.), pits, in which there might be a net, dug and concealed to entrap the larger animals (Ps 9⁶, Ezk 19⁸ etc.), the sling (1 S 17⁴⁹), the snare of the fowler (Ps 64⁹, 91³, 124⁷). The tame partridge in a cage was used as a decoy (Sir 11²⁰). The modern Syrian is not greatly addicted to hunting. Occasional raids are made upon the bears on Mt. Hermon. To the scandal of Jew and Moslem, Christians sometimes hunt the wild boar in the Huleh marshes, and in the thickets beyond Jordan. See also NETS, SNARES, etc.

W. EWING.

HUPHAM.—See HUPPIM.

HUPPAH.—A priest of the 13th course (1 Ch 24¹³).

HUPPIM.—The head of a Benjamite family (Gn 46²¹ P, 1 Ch 7¹², 1 S, Nu 26³⁹ [Hupham]).

HUR.—The name is possibly of Egyptian origin. 1. With Aaron he held up Moses' hands, in order that by the continual uplifting of the sacred staff Israel might prevail over Amalek (Ex 17¹⁰, 12 E). With Aaron he was left in charge of the people when Moses ascended the mountain (24¹⁴ E). 2. A Judahite, the grandfather of Bezalel (Ex 31², 35³⁰, 38²² P). According to the Chronicler, he was descended from Perez, through Hezron and Caleb (1 Ch 2¹⁹⁻²¹, 4¹⁻⁴, 2 Ch 1⁴); and in Jos. Ant. iii. ii. 4, vi. 1, he is the husband of Miriam, and identical with 1. 3. One of the kings of Midian slain after the sin at Peor (Nu 31⁹); described as 'chiefs' of Midian, and 'princes' of Sihon (Jos 13²¹). 4. The father of one of the twelve officers who supplied Solomon and his court with food (1 K 4⁴ RV 'Ben-hur').

4. The father of Rephaiah, who was a ruler of half of Jerusalem, and who helped to repair the walls (Neh 3⁹). LXX omits the name Hur. A. H. M'NEILE.

HURAI.—See HIDDAI.

HURAM.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁶). 2. 3. See HIRAM, 1 and 2.

HURI.—A Gadite (1 Ch 51⁴).

HUSBAND.—See FAMILY.

HUSBANDMAN, HUSBANDRY.—In EV the former is, in most cases, synonymous with 'a tiller of the ground,' which RV has substituted for it in Zec 13⁴—in modern English, a farmer. The first farmer mentioned in OT, therefore, is not Noah the 'husbandman' (Gn 9²⁰), but Cain the 'tiller of the ground' (4²). In Jn 15¹, however, the former has the more limited sense of vinedresser: 'I am the true vine and my Father is the vinedresser' (AV and RV 'husbandman'). So, too, in the parable of the Vineyard (Mt 21³³⁻⁴⁶).

'Husbandry,' in the same way, is tillage, farming. Thus of king Uzziah it is said that 'he loved husbandry' (lit. 'the land' in the modern sense, 2 Ch 26¹⁰), that is, as the context shows, he loved and fostered agriculture, including viticulture. In 1 Co 3⁹ 'husbandry' is used by metonymy of the land tilled (cf. RVm): 'ye are God's field' (Weymouth, The NT in Modern Speech).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HUSHAH.—Son of Ezer, the son of Hur (see HUR, 2), and therefore of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 4⁹).

HUSHAI.—An Archite (2 S 15³⁷ 17¹⁴), i.e. a native of 'the border of the Archites' (Jos 16²) to the W. of Bethel. He is further described as 'the friend of David' (15³⁷), while at 2 S 16¹⁶ the two titles are united. At the rebellion of Absalom he was induced by David to act as if he favoured the cause of the king's son. By so doing he was enabled both to defeat the plans of Ahithophel and to keep David informed (by means of Ahimaaz and Jonathan, the sons of Zadok and Abiathar the priests) of the progress of events in Jerusalem (2 S 16¹⁶⁻¹⁷). He is probably to be identified with the father of Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4¹⁴).

HUSHAM.—A king of Edom (Gn 36³⁴ 35 = 1 Ch 14⁴⁶).

HUSHATHITE (prob. —an inhabitant of Hushah).—This description is applied to Sibbecai, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 21¹⁸ = 1 Ch 20⁴, 2 S 23²⁷ = 1 Ch 11²⁹ 27¹¹).

HUSHIM.—1. The eponym of a Danite family (Gn 46²³); called in Nu 26⁴² Shuham. In 1 Ch 7¹² Hushim seems to be a Benjamite, but it is possible that for 'sons of Aher' we should read 'sons of another,' i.e. Dan. 2. The wife of Shaharaim the Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁵ 11).

HUSKS (keratia, Lk 15¹⁶) are almost certainly the pods of the carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua), commonly called the locust tree. This common Palestine tree is distinguished by its beautiful dark glossy foliage. The long pods, which ripen from May to August according to the altitude, are even to-day used as food by the poor; a confection is made from them. But they are used chiefly for cattle. The name 'St. John's bread' is given to these pods, from a tradition that these, and not locusts, composed the food of St. John the Baptist, but see FOOD, 18.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HUZZAB.—A word occurring in Nah 2⁷. Gesenius derived it from a verb hāḏabbh, and read 'the palace is dissolved and made to flow down.' Many recent authorities regard it as from hāḏabbh, and tr. 'it is decreed.' But Wellhausen and others have considered it a proper name—referring to the Assyrian queen, or to the city of Nineveh personified.

W. M. NESBIT.

HYACINTH.—Rev 9¹ RV; AV 'jacinth.' See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

HYÆNA (zābud, Jer 12⁹ [but see art. SPECKLED BIRD]. Zeboim [1 S 13¹⁵] probably means '[Valley of] Hyænas').—The hyæna (Arab. daba) is a very common Palestine animal, concerning which the fellahtn have countless tales. It is both hated and dreaded; it consumes dead bodies, and will even dig up corpses in the cemeteries; the writer has known such rifling of graves to occur on the Mount of Olives. It is nocturnal in its habits; in the day-time it hides in solitary caves, to which the fellahtn often follow it and attack it by various curious devices. In the gathering dusk and at night the hungry hyæna frequently becomes very bold, and will follow with relentless persistence a solitary pedestrian, who, if he cannot reach safety, will surely be killed. In spite of its habits it is eaten at times by the Bedouin.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

HYDASPES.—A river mentioned in Jth 1⁴ as on the Medo-Babylonian frontier. The name is probably the result of a confusion with the well-known Hydaspes in India (now the Jalam). In view of the mythical character of the Book of Judith, speculation as to the identity of this river is likely to remain fruitless. However, there may be a suggestion in the fact that the Syr. version reads Ulai (wh. see).

W. M. NESBIT.

HYMENÆUS.—A heretical Christian associated with Alexander in 1 Ti 1¹⁶, and with Philetus in 2 Ti 2¹⁷, though some have considered that two different persons are meant. These false teachers 'made shipwreck concerning the faith'; their heresy consisted in denying the bodily resurrection, saying that the resurrection was already past—apparently an early form of Gnosticism which, starting with the idea of matter being evil, made the body an unessential part of our nature, to be discarded as soon as possible. In the former passage St. Paul says that he 'delivered' the offenders 'unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme'; he uses a similar phrase of the incestuous Corinthian (1 Co 5⁵), there also expressing the purpose of the punishment,—the salvation of the man's spirit. The phrase may mean simple excommunication with renunciation of all fellowship, or may include a miraculous infliction of disease, or even of death. Ramsay suggests that it is a Christian adaptation of a pagan idea, when a person wronged by another, but unable to retaliate, consigned the offender to the gods and left punishment to be inflicted by Divine power.

A. J. MACLEAN.

HYMN (in NT; for OT, see MUSIC, POETRY, PSALMS).—The Greek word signified specifically a poem in praise of a god or hero, but it is used, less exactly, also for a religious poem, even one of petition. The use of hymns in the early Christian Church was to be anticipated from the very nature of worship, and from the close connexion between the worship of the disciples and that of the Jews of that and earlier centuries. It is proved by the numerous incidental references in the NT (cf. Ac 16²⁶, 1 Co 14²⁶, Eph 5¹⁹, Ja 5¹³, and the passages cited below), and by the famous letter of Pliny to Trajan describing the customs of the Christians. We lack, however, any collection of hymns comparable to the Psalms of the OT. Doubtless the Psalms were largely used, as at the Passover feast when the Lord's Supper was instituted (Mt 26³⁰); but in addition new songs would be written to express the intense emotions of the disciples, and even their spontaneous utterances in the gatherings of early Christians would almost inevitably take a rhythmical form, modelled more or less closely upon the Psalms. In some localities, perhaps, Greek hymns served as the models. St. Paul insists (1 Co 14¹⁵, Col 3¹⁶) that the singing be with the spirit and the understanding, an intelligent expression of real religious feeling. These passages specify 'psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs.' While at first it seems as if three classes of composition are here distinguished, either as to source or character, it is probably not the case, especially as in Mt 26³⁰, Mk 14²⁶ the verb 'to hymn' is used of singing a psalm. Luke's Gospel contains several hymns, but does not mention their use by the disciples. They are the Magnificat (Lk 1⁴⁶⁻⁵⁵), the Benedictus (1⁶⁸⁻⁷⁹), the Gloria in Excelsis (2¹⁴), and the Nunc Dimittis (2²⁹⁻³²). Whether these were Jewish or Jewish-Christian in origin is disputed. The free introduction of hymns of praise in the Apocalypse, in description of the worship of the new Jerusalem, points to their use by the early Church. The poetical and liturgical character of some other NT passages is asserted with more or less reason by different scholars (e.g. Eph 5¹⁴, 1 Ti 1¹⁷ 3¹⁶ 6¹⁸, 2 Ti 4¹⁸). See Hastings' DCG, art. 'Hymn.'

OWEN H. GATES.

HYPOCRITE.—This word occurs in the NT only in the Synoptic Gospels; but 'hypocrisy' is used in the Epistles (Gal 2¹³, 1 Ti 4², 1 P 2²), and the verb 'to play the hypocrite' in Lk 20²⁰ (tr. 'feigned'). The hypocrisy of the Gospels is the 'appearing before men what one ought to be, but is not, before God.' At times it is a deliberately played part (e.g. Mt 6² 16 22¹⁸ etc.), at others it is a deception of which the actor himself is unconscious (e.g. Mk 7⁶, Lk 6⁹ 12⁶ etc.). Thus, according to Christ, all who play the part of religion, whether consciously or unconsciously, without being religious, are hypocrites; and so fall under His sternest denunciation (Mt 23). This meaning of the word has led some to give it the wider interpretation of 'godlessness' in some passages (e.g. Mt 24¹¹; cf. Lk 12⁶); but as there may always be seen in the word the idea of a religious cloak over the godlessness, the ordinary sense should stand.

In the AV of OT (e.g. Job 8¹³, Is 9¹⁷) 'hypocrite' is a mistranslation of the Heb. word chănēph. It passed into the AV from the Latin, which followed the Greek Versions. In RV it is rendered 'godless,' 'profane.'

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

HYRCANUS.—1. The son of Tobias, who had money deposited at Jerus., in the Temple treasury, at the time of the visit of Heliōdōrus (2 Mac 3¹¹). The name seems to be a local appellative. Its use among the Jews is perhaps to be explained from the fact that Artaxerxes Ochus transported a number of Jews to Hyrcania. 2. See MACCABEES, § 5.

HYSSOP is mentioned several times in the Bible. It was used for sprinkling blood (Ex 12²²), and in the ritual of the cleansing of lepers (Lv 14⁴, Nu 19⁹); it was an insignificant plant growing out of the wall (1 K 4³³); it could afford a branch strong enough to support a wet sponge (Jn 19²⁹). It is possible that all these references are not to a single species. Among many suggested plants the most probable is either a species of marjoram, e.g., Origanum maru, or the common caper-plant (Capparis spinosa), which may be seen growing out of crevices in walls all over Palestine. See CAPER-BERRY. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

I

IADINUS 1 Es 9⁴⁸—Jamin of Neh 8⁷.

IBHAR.—One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem (2 S 5¹⁵, 1 Ch 3⁶ 14³).

IBLEAM.—A town belonging to West Manasseh (Jos 17¹¹, Jg 17⁷). It is mentioned also in 2 K 9²⁷ in connexion with the death of king Ahaziah, who fled by the way of Beth-haggan and 'the ascent of Gur, which is by Ibleam.' The Biblical data seem to be well satisfied by the modern ruin Bel'ame, some 13 miles E. of N. of Samaria, more than half-way to Jezreel.

In 2 K 15¹⁰ (AV and RV) 'before the people' should certainly be emended to 'in Ibleam.' Gath-rimmon of Jos 21²⁵ is a scribal error for Ibleam. It is the same place that is called Bileam in 1 Ch 6⁷⁰.

IBNELAH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 9⁸).

IBNIAH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 9⁸).

IBRI.—A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 24²⁷).

ISSAM.—A descendant of Issachar (1 Ch 7³).

IBZAN.—One of the minor judges, following Jephthah (Jg 12⁹⁻¹⁰). He came from Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem in Zebulun (Jos 19¹¹), 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. He had 30 sons and 30 daughters—an evidence of his social importance—and arranged their marriages. He judged Israel 7 years, and was buried at Bethlehem. According to Jewish tradition, Ibzan was the same as Boaz.

IOHABOD.—Son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. The name means 'inglorious,' but probably should be 'Jahweh is glory,' from an original Jochēbed. If this guess be well founded, then the turn given to the story in 1 S 4²¹ is due to a desire to mould it on the story of the birth of Benjamin in Gn 35¹⁸. W. F. COBB.

IOCONIUM, now called Konia, is an ancient city of continuous importance from early times to the present day. Situated at the western edge of the vast central plain of Asia Minor, and well watered, it has always been a busy place. It is surrounded by beautiful orchards, which cover the meanness of its modern buildings. About the beginning of the Christian era it was on the border of the two ethnic districts, Lycaonia and Phrygia. It was in reality the easternmost city of Phrygia, and the inhabitants considered themselves Phrygians, but ancient writers commonly speak of it as a city of Lycaonia (wh. see), the fate of which it generally shared. In the 3rd cent. B.C. it was ruled by the Seleucids, and about A.C. 164, probably, it passed under the power of the Galatæ (Asiatic Celts). It was the property of the Pontic kings from about 130, was set free during the Mithridatic wars, and in A.C. 39 was given by Mark Antony to Polemon, king of Cilicia Tracheia. In B.C. 36 Antony gave it to Amyntas, who was at that time made king of Galatia (wh. see). On his death in A.C. 25 the whole of his kingdom became the Roman province of Galatia. Iconium could thus be spoken of as Lycaonian, Phrygian, or Galatic, according to the speaker's point of view. In the time of the Emperor Claudius, it, along with Derbe, received the honorary prefix Claudio-, becoming Claudioiconium (compare our Royal Burghs), but it was not till Hadrian's time (A.D. 117-138) that it became a Roman colony (wh. see). Its after history may be omitted. It was eighteen miles distant from Lystra, and a direct route passed between them.

The gospel was brought to Iconium by Paul and Barnabas, who visited it twice on the first missionary journey (Ac 13⁵¹ 14²¹). The presence of Jews there is confirmed by the evidence of inscriptions. According to the view now generally accepted by English-speaking scholars, it is comprehended in the 'Phrygo-Galatic region' of Ac 16⁶ and the 'Galatic region and Phrygia' of Ac 18². It was thus visited four times in all by St. Paul, who addressed it among other cities in his Epistle to the Galatians. During the absence of Paul it had been visited by Judaizers, who pretended that Paul was a mere messenger of the earlier Apostles, and contended that the Jewish ceremonial law was binding on the Christian converts. Paul's Epistle appears to have been successful, and the Galatians afterwards contributed to the collection for the poor Christians of Jerusalem. The alternative view is that Iconium is not really included in the Acts narrative after 16th, as the words quoted above from Ac 16^a and 18th refer to a different district to the far north of Iconium, and that the Epistle to the Galatians, being addressed to that northern district, had no connexion with Iconium. In any case, Iconium is one of the places included in the (province) Galatia which is addressed in First Peter (about A.D. 80 probably), and the large number of Christian inscriptions which have been found there reveal the existence of a vigorous Christian life in the third and following centuries. A. SOUTER.

IDALAH.—A town of Zebulun (Jos 19¹⁸).

IDBASH.—One of the sons of the father of Etam (1 Ch 4²).

IDDO.—1. Ezr 8¹⁷ (1 Es 8¹⁶. Loddeus) the chief at Casiphia, who provided Ezra with Levites and Nethinim. 2. 1 Ch 27²¹ son of Zechariah, captain of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead, perh. —No. 4. 3. Ezr 10⁴³ (1 Es 9⁴³ Edos) one of those who had taken 'strange' wives. 4. 1 K 4⁴ father of Abinadab, who was Solomon's commissariat officer in Mahanaim in Gilead (see No. 2). 5. 1 Ch 6³¹ a Gershonite Levite called Adaiah in v.⁴¹. 6. A seer and prophet cited by the Chronicler as an authority for the reigns of Solomon (2 Ch 9²⁹), Rehoboam (2 Ch 12²⁴), Abijah (2 Ch 13²²). 7. Zec 1¹ 7, Ezr 5¹ 6⁴ (1 Es 6¹ Addo) grandfather (father acc. to Ezr.) of the prophet Zechariah; possibly of the same family as No. 2. 8. Neh 12¹⁸ one of the priestly clans that went up with Zerubbabel.

IDOLATRY.—Hebrew religion is represented as beginning with Abraham, who forsook the idolatry, as well as the home, of his ancestors (Gn 12¹, Jos 24²); but it was specially through the influence of Moses that Jehovah was recognized as Israel's God. The whole subsequent history up to the Exile is marked by frequent lapses into idolatry. We should therefore consider (1) the causes of Hebrew idolatry, (2) its nature, (3) the opposition it evoked, and (4) the teaching of NT. The subject is not free from difficulty, but in the light of modern Biblical study, the main outlines are clear.

1. Causes of Hebrew idolatry.—(1) When, after the Exodus, the Israelites settled in Canaan among idolatrous peoples, they were far from having a pure monotheism (cf. Jg 11²⁴). Their faith was crude. (a) Thus the idea that their neighbours' gods had real existence, with rights of proprietorship in the invaded land, would expose them to risk of contamination. This would be the more likely because as yet they were not a united people. The tribes had at first to act independently, and in some cases were unable to dislodge the Canaanites (Jg 1). (b) Their environment was thus perilous, and the danger was intensified by intermarriage with idolaters. Particularly after the monarchy was established did this become a snare. Solomon and Ahab by their marriage alliances introduced and promoted idol cults. It is significant that post-exilic legislation had this danger in view, and secured that exclusiveness so characteristic of mature Judaism (Ezr 10¹). (c) The political relations with the great world-powers, Egypt and Assyria, would also tend to influence religious thought. This might account for the great heathen reaction under Manasseh.

(2) But, specially, certain ideas characteristic of Semitic religion generally had a strong influence. (a) Thus, on Israel's settling in Canaan, the existing shrines, whether natural (hills, trees, wells—each understood to have its own tutelary baal or lord) or artificial (altars, stone pillars, wooden poles), would be quite innocently used for the worship of J^h. (b) Idols, too, were used in domestic worship (Jg 17⁴; cf. Gn 31¹⁹, 1 S 19¹³). (c) A darker feature, inimical to Jehovahism, was the sanction of sexual impurity, cruelty and lust for blood (see below, § 2 (1)).

Here then was all the apparatus for either the inappropriate worship of the true God, or the appropriate worship of false gods. That was why, later on in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., when the earlier Jehovahism was changing into typical Judaism, all such apparatus was felt to be wrong, and was attacked with increasing violence by prophets and reformers, as their conception of God became more clear and spiritual.

2. Its nature.—(1) Common to all Canaanite religions, apparently, was the worship of Baal as representing the male principle in nature. Each nation, however, had its own provincial Baal with a specific name or title—Chemosh of Moab, Molech of Ammon, Dagon of Philistia, Hadad-Rimmon of Syria. Associated with Baalism was the worship of Ashtoreth (Astarte), representing the female principle in nature. Two features of these religions were prostitution [of both sexes] (cf. Nu 25¹, Dt 23¹⁷, 1 K 14²⁴, Hos 4¹³, Am 2⁷, Bar 6⁴²) and human sacrifice (cf. 2 K 17¹⁷, Jer 7³¹, and art. TOPHETH). Baalism was the chief Israelite idolatry, and sometimes, e.g. under Jezebel, it quite displaced Jehovahism as the established religion.

(2) The underlying principle of all such religion was nature-worship. This helps to explain the calf-worship, represented as first introduced by Aaron, and at a later period established by Jeroboam I. In Egypt—which also exercised a sinister influence on the Hebrews—religion was largely of this type; but living animals, and not merely images of them, were there venerated. Connected with this idolatry is tolemism, so widely traced even to-day. Some find a survival of early Semitic totemism in Ezk 8¹⁰.

(3) Another form of Hebrew nature-worship, astrolatry, was apparently of foreign extraction, and not earlier than the seventh cent. B.C. There is a striking allusion to this idolatry in Job 31²⁶⁻²⁸. There were sun-images (2 Ch 34⁴), horses and chariots dedicated to the sun (2 K 23¹¹); an eastward position was adopted in sun-worship (Ezk 8¹⁶). The expression 'queen of heaven' in Jer 7¹⁸ 44¹⁹ is obscure; but it probably points to this class of idolatry. In the heathen reaction under Manasseh the worship of the 'host of heaven' is prominent (2 K 17¹⁶). Gad and Meni (Is 65¹¹) were possibly star-gods. Related to such nature-worship perhaps was the mourning for Tammuz [Adonis] (Ezk 8¹⁴, Is 17¹⁰ RVm). Nature-worship of all kinds is by implication rebuked with amazing force and dignity in Gn 1, where the word God as Creator is written 'in big letters over the face of creation.' Stars and animals and all things, it is insisted, are created things, not creators, and not self-existent.

(4) There are no clear traces of ancestor-worship in OT, but some find them in the teraphim (household gods) and in the reverence for tombs (e.g. Machpelah); in Is 65⁴ the context suggests idolatry.

(5) A curious mixture of idolatry and Jehovahism existed in Samaria after the destruction of the Northern Kingdom. The foreign colonists brought with them the worship of various deities, and added that of J^h (2 K 17³⁴⁻⁴¹). These gods cannot be identified with certainty. By this mixed race and religion the Jews of the Return were seriously hindered, and there resulted the Samaritan schism which, in an attenuated form, still exists.

3. Opposition to idolatry.—While fully allowing for the facts alluded to in § 1, it is impossible to account—not for mere temporary lapses, but—for the marked persistence of idolatry among the Hebrews, unless we recognize the growth which characterizes their laws and polity from the simple beginning up to the finished product. Laws do but express the highest sense of the community—however deeply that sense may be quickened by Divine revelation—whether those laws are viewed from the ethical or from the utilitarian standpoint. If the legislation embodied in the Pentateuch had all along been an acknowledged, even though a neglected, code, such a complete neglect of it during long periods, taken with the total silence about its distinctive features in the sayings and writings of the most enlightened and devoted men, would present phenomena quite inexplicable. It is needful, therefore, to observe that the true development from original Mosaism, though perhaps never quite neglected by the leaders of the nation, does not appear distinctly in any legislation until the closing decades of the 7th cent. B.C. This development continued through and beyond the Exile. Until the Deuteronomic epoch began, the enactments of Mosaism in regard to idolatry were clearly of the slenderest proportions. There is good reason for thinking that the Second of the Ten Commandments is not in its earliest form; and it is probable that Ex 34¹⁰⁻²⁸ (from the document J, i. e. c. B.C. 850) contains an earlier Decalogue, embodying such traditional Mosaic legislation as actually permitted the use of simple images (distinct from molten cultus-idols, Ex 34¹⁷). Such development accounts for the phenomena presented by the history of idolatry in Israel. For example, Samuel sacrifices in one of those 'high places' (1 S 9¹².) which Hezekiah removed as idolatrous (2 K 18⁴). Elijah, the stern foe of Baalism, does not denounce the calf-worship attacked later on by Hosea. Even Isaiah can anticipate the erection in Egypt of a pillar (Is 19¹⁹) like those which Josiah in the next century destroyed (2 K 23¹⁴). As with reforming prophets, so with reforming kings. Jehu in Israel extirpates Baalism, but leaves the calf-worship alone (2 K 10^{26f.}). In Judah, where heathenism went to greater lengths, but where wholesome reaction was equally strong, Asa, an iconoclastic reformer, tolerates 'high places' (1 K 15¹²⁻¹⁴; cf. Jehoshaphat's attitude, 1 K 22⁴). It was the work of the 8th cent. prophets that prepared the way for the remarkable reformation under Josiah (2 K 22. 23). Josiah's reign was epoch-making in everything connected with Hebrew religious thought and practice. To this period must be assigned that Deuteronomic legislation which completed the earlier attempts at reformation. This legislation aims at the complete destruction of everything suggestive of idolatry. A code, otherwise humane, is on this point extremely severe: idolatry was punishable by death (Dt 17²⁻⁷; cf. 6¹⁶ 8⁹ 13⁶⁻¹⁰ etc.). Such a view of idolatry exhibits in its correct perspective the teaching of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the elaborate Levitical enactments, the exilic and post-exilic literature. Distinctive Judaism has succeeded to Jehovahism monotheism has replaced henotheism, racial and religious exclusiveness has supplanted the earlier eclecticism. The Exile marks practically the end of Hebrew idolatry. The lesson has been learned by heart.

A striking proof of the great change is given by the Maccabean war, caused by the attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to force idolatry on the very nation which in an earlier period had been only too prone to accept it. Relations with Rome in the 1st and 2nd centuries A.D. illustrate the same temper. Had not Caligula's death so soon followed his insane proposal to erect his statue in the Temple, the Jews would assuredly have offered the most determined resistance; a century later they did actively resist Rome when Hadrian desecrated the site of the ruined Temple.

4. Teaching of the NT.—As idolatry was thus non-existent in Judaism in the time of Christ, it is not surprising that He does not allude to it. St. Paul, however, came into direct conflict with it. The word itself (eidōlatreia) occurs first in his writings; we have his illuminating teaching on the subject in Ro 1¹⁸⁻²², Ac 17²⁻³, 1 Co 8 etc. But idolatry in Christian doctrine has a wider significance than the service of material idols. Anything that interferes between the soul and its God is idolatrous, and is to be shunned

(cf. Eph 5⁵, Ph 3¹⁰, 1 Jn 5²⁰, and the context of Gal 5²⁰ etc.). See also art. IMAGES.

IDUEL (1 Es 8⁴) = Ezr 8¹⁶ Ariel. The form is due to confusion of Heb. d and r.

IDUMÆA.—The Greek equivalent (in RV only in Mk 3⁷) of the name Edom, originally the territory east of the Jordan-Arabah valley and south of the land of Moab. This country was inhabited, when we first catch a glimpse of it, by a primitive race known as Horites, of whom little but the name is known. The apparent meaning of the name ('cave-dwellers') and comparison with the remains of what seems to have been an ancient race discovered in the excavations at Gezer, show that this race was at a low stage of civilization. They were partly destroyed, partly absorbed, by the Bedouin tribes who claimed descent through Esau from Abraham, and who were acknowledged by the Israelites as late as the date of the Deuteronomic codes as brethren (Dt 23⁷). They were governed by sheiks (EV 'dukes,' a lit. tr. of the Lat. dux), and by a non-hereditary monarchy whose records belonged to a period anterior to the time of Saul (Gn 36²¹⁻²⁹, 1 Ch 1²⁻⁵⁴). See EDOM.

After the fall of Babylon the pressure of the desert Arabs forced the Edomites across the Jordan-Arabah valley, and the people and name were extended westward. In 1 Mac 5⁴ we find Hebron included in Idumæa. Josephus, with whom Jerome agrees, makes Idumæa extend from Belt Jibrin to Petra; Jerome assigns the great caves at the former place to the troglodyte Horites. The Herod family was by origin Idumæan in this extended sense. In the 2nd cent. A.D. the geographer Ptolemy restricts Idumæa to the cis-Jordanic area, and includes the original trans-Jordanic Edom in Arabia.

IEDDIAS (1 Es 9²⁶).—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives, called Izziah in Ezr 10².

IEZER, IEZERITES (Nu 26³⁰).—Contracted from Abiezer, Abiezerites. See ABIEZER.

IGAL.—1. The spy representing the tribe of Issachar (Nu 13⁷). 2. One of David's heroes, the son of Nathan of Zobah (2 S 23²⁰). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11²⁶) the name is given as 'Joel, the brother of Nathan.' 3. Son of Shemaiah of the royal house of David (1 Ch 3²).

IGDALIAH.—A 'man of God,' father of Hanan, whose name is mentioned in connexion with Jeremiah's interview with the Rechabites (Jer 35⁴).

IGNORANCE.—It appears to be in accordance with natural justice that ignorance should be regarded as modifying moral responsibility, and this is fully recognized in the Scriptures. In the OT, indeed, the knowledge of God is often spoken of as equivalent to true religion (see KNOWLEDGE), and therefore ignorance is regarded as its opposite (1 S 2¹², Hos 4⁶). But the Levitical law recognizes sins of ignorance as needing some expiation, but with a minor degree of guilt (Lv 4, Nu 15²²⁻²⁹). So 'ignorances' are spoken of in 1 Es 8⁹ (RV 'errors'). To 3¹, Sir 22¹, as partly involuntary (cf. He 5² 9⁷). The whole of the OT, however, is the history of a process of gradual moral and spiritual enlightenment, so that actions which are regarded as pardonable, or even praiseworthy, at one period, become inexcusable in a more advanced state of knowledge. In the NT the difference between the 'times of ignorance' and the light of Christianity is recognized in Ac 17³⁰ (cf. 1 Ti 1², 1 P 1¹⁴), and ignorance is spoken of as modifying responsibility in Ac 3¹⁷, 1 Co 2⁸, Lk 23³⁴. This last passage, especially, suggests that sin is pardonable because it contains an element of ignorance, while Mk 3²⁹ appears to contemplate the possibility of an absolutely wilful choice of evil with full knowledge of what it is, which will be unpardonable (cf. 1 Jn 5¹⁹). Immoral and guilty ignorance is also spoken of in Ro 1¹⁸, Eph 4¹⁸. For the question whether Christ in

His human nature could be ignorant, see KENOSIS, KNOWLEDGE. J. H. MAUDE.

IIM.—A city of Judah (Jos 15²⁹); site unknown. See IYIM, 2.

IJON.—A town in the north part of the mountains of Naphtali, noticed in 1 K 15²⁰ (= 2 Ch 16⁴) as taken by Benhadad. It was also captured and depopulated by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15²⁹). The name survives in Merj 'Aydn, a plateau N.W. of Dan. The most important site in this plateau is Tell Dibbin, which may be the site of Ijon.

IKKESH.—The father of Ira, one of David's heroes (2 S 23²⁶, 1 Ch 11²⁸ 27⁹).

ILAI.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11²⁹). In the parallel list (2 S 23²⁶) the name appears as Zalmon, which is probably the more correct text.

ILIADUN (1 Es 5⁵⁸).—Perhaps to be identified with Honadad of Ezr 3⁹.

ILLYRICUM.—The only Scripture mention is Ro 15¹⁹, where St. Paul points to the fact that he had fully preached the good news of the Messiah from Jerusalem and round about as far as Illyricum. Neither geographical term is included in the sense of the Greek, which is that he had done so from the outer edge of Jerusalem, so to speak, round about (through various countries) as far as the border of Illyricum. These provinces in order are Syria, Cilicia, Galatia, Asia, and Macedonia, and a journey through them in succession describes a segment of a rough circle. The provinces Macedonia and Illyricum are continuous, and the nearest city in Macedonia in which we know St. Paul to have preached is Berea (Ac 17^{10f}). Illyricum is a Latin word, and denotes the Roman province which extended along the Adriatic from Italy and Pannonia on the north to the province Macedonia on the south. A province Illyria had been formed in B.C. 167, and during the succeeding two centuries all accessions of territory in that quarter were incorporated in that province. In A.D. 10 Augustus separated Pannonia from Illyricum, and gave the latter a settled constitution. The government of this important province was difficult, and was entrusted to an ex-consul with the style legatus Augusti pro pretore. The northern half was called Liburnia and the southern Dalmatia (wh. see). The latter term gradually came to indicate the whole province of Illyricum. A. SOUTER.

IMAGE.—In theological usage the term 'image' occurs in two connexions: (1) as defining the nature of man ('God created man in his own image,' Gn 1²⁷); and (2) as describing the relation of Christ as Son to the Father ('who is the image of the invisible God,' Col 1¹⁵). These senses, again, are not without connexion; for, as man is re-created in the image of God—lost, or at least defaced, through sin (Col 3¹⁰; cf. Eph 4²⁴)—so, as renewed, he bears the image of Christ (2 Co 3¹⁸). These Scriptural senses of the term 'image' claim further elucidation.

1. As regards man, the fundamental text is that already quoted, Gn 1²⁶ 27. Here, in the story of Creation, man is represented as called into being, not, like the other creatures, by a simple fiat, but as the result of a solemn and deliberate act of counsel of the Creator: 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. . . . And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.' Distinctions, referred to below, have been sought, since Patristic times, between 'image' and 'likeness,' but it is now generally conceded that no difference of meaning is intended. The two words 'image' (tsdem) and 'likeness' (demuth) combine, without distinction of sense, to emphasize the idea of resemblance to God. This is shown by the fact that in v. 27 the word 'image' alone is employed to express the total idea, and in 5 the word 'likeness.' Man was made like God, and so bears

His image. The expression recurs in Gn 9⁶, and again repeatedly in the NT (1 Co 11⁷, Col 3¹⁰; cf. Ja 3⁹ 'likeness'). The usage in Genesis is indeed peculiar to the so-called 'Priestly' writer; but the idea underlies the view of man in the Jahwistic sections as well, for only as made in God's image is man capable of knowledge of God, fellowship with Him, covenant relation to Him, and character conformable to God's own. To 'be as God' was the serpent's allurement to Eve (Gn 3⁵). Ps 8 echoes the story of man's creation in Gn 1.

In what did this Divine image, or likeness to God, consist? Not in bodily form, for God is Spirit; nor yet simply, as the Socinians would have it, in dominion over the creatures; but in those features of man's rational and moral constitution in which the peculiar dignity of man, as distinguished from the animal world below him, is recognized. Man, as a spiritual nature, is self-conscious, personal, rational, free, capable of rising to the apprehension of general truths and laws, of setting ends of conduct before him, of apprehending right and wrong, good and evil, of framing ideas of God, infinity, eternity, immortality, and of shaping his life in the light of such conceptions. In this he shows himself akin to God; is able to know, love, serve, and obey God. The germ of sonship lies in the idea of the image. To this must be added, in the light of such passages as Eph 4²⁴ and Col 3¹⁰, the idea of actual moral conformity—of actual knowledge, righteousness, and holiness—as pertaining to the perfection of the image. Sin has not destroyed the essential elements of God's image in man, but it has shattered the image in a moral respect; and grace, as the above passages teach, renews it in Christ.

If this explanation is correct, the older attempts at a distinction between 'image' and 'likeness,' e.g. that 'image' referred to the body, 'likeness' to the intellectual nature; or 'image' to the intellectual, 'likeness' to the moral, faculties; or, as in Roman Catholic theology, 'image' to the natural attributes of intelligence and freedom, 'likeness' to a superadded endowment of supernatural righteousness—must, as already hinted, be pronounced untenable.

2. The idea of Christ, the Son, as 'the image (eikōn) of the invisible God' (Col 1¹⁵; cf. 2 Co 4⁴) connects itself with the doctrine of the Trinity, and finds expression in various forms in the NT, notably in He 1³—'who being the effulgence of his glory and the very image of his substance.' Jesus Himself could declare of Himself that he who had seen Him had seen the Father (Jn 14⁹). But the passages quoted refer to a supra-temporal and essential relation between the Son and the Father. God, in His eternal being, reflects Himself, and beholds His own infinite perfection and glory mirrored, in the Son (cf. Jn 1¹⁷). It is this eternal Word, or perfect self-revelation of God, that has become incarnate in Jesus Christ (Jn 1¹⁴). The consequence is obvious. Bearing Christ's image, we bear God's. Being renewed in God's image, we are conformed to the image of His Son (Ro 8²⁹). JAMES ORR.

IMAGES.—1. The making of an image implies a definite conception and the application of art to religion. The earliest Semitic religion (like that of Greece, Rome, etc.) was accordingly imageless. The first images were the stone pillar and the wooden pole or asherah (a tree fetish possibly of phallic significance). Then came real idols, at first for domestic use (as probably the teraphim, portable household gods), and subsequently those of greater size for public worship.

2. About 15 words in OT are used specifically for images. The earliest point to the process of manufacture—graven, sculptured, molten images. The word properly meaning image, i.e. 'likeness,' is not earlier than the end of 7th cent. B.C. From that time onwards metaphor is frequent: images are 'vanity,' 'lies,' and objects inspiring disgust or horror [cf. the name

Beelzebub, which some interpret as 'lord of dung'. Sometimes such terms would replace those used without offence in earlier days; thus, in a proper name compounded with baal (lord), the objectionable word would be replaced by bosheth ('shame'), in obedience to Ex 23¹³ etc.

3. Images represented animals (e.g. the golden calves and the serpent Nehushtan) and human forms (cf. Ezk 16¹⁷; Is 44¹³, Ps 115⁴⁻⁵, Wis 14¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 20). The ephod appears to have been some sort of image, but was perhaps originally the robe worn by the image.

4. The materials used in idol manufacture were clay (Wis 15¹³, Bel 7), wood (Is 44¹³, Wis 13¹³), silver and gold (Hos 8⁴, Dn 3¹). They might be painted (Wis 13¹⁴ 15¹), dressed up (Jer 10⁹, Ezk 16¹⁸), crowned and armed (Bar 6⁸⁻¹⁴). They were kept in shrines (Jg 17², Wis 13¹⁴ etc.), and secured from tumbling down (Is 41⁷, Jer 10⁹). Refreshments (Is 65¹¹, Jer 7¹⁸) and kisses (Hos 13¹, 1 K 19¹⁸) were offered to them, as well as sacrifice and incense. They figured in processions (cf. ancient sculptures, and Is 46⁷, Jer 10⁹). See also art. IDOLATRY.

H. F. B. COMPSTON.

IMAGINATION.—In the AV imagine always means 'contrive' and imagination 'contrivance.' In the case of imagination a bad intention is always present (except Is 26¹ AVm), as in Ro 1²¹ 'they . . . became vain in their imaginations' (RV 'reasonings'); 2 Co 10⁵ 'casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself' (RVm 'reasonings'). The Greek words have in these passages the same evil intent as the AV word, so that the RV renderings are not so good. Coverdale translates Is 55⁷ 'Let the ungodly man forsake his ways, and the unrighteous his ymaginations, and turne awayne unto the LORDE.'

IMALCUE (1 Mac 11²⁰).—An Arab prince to whom Alexander Balas entrusted his youthful son Antiochus. After the death of Alexander, in B.C. 145, Imalcue reluctantly gave up the boy to Tryphon, who placed him on the throne of Syria as Antiochus vi. in opposition to Demetrius ii.

IMLA (2 Ch 18⁷ 8) or IMLAH (1 K 22⁸ 9).—The father of Micaiah, a prophet of J^h in the days of Ahab.

IMMANUEL.—The name occurs in Is 7¹⁴ 8⁸, Mt 1²³, and is a Heb. word meaning 'God is with us'; the spelling Emmanuel comes from the LXX (see Mt 1²³ AV, RVm). Its interpretation involves a discussion of Is 7, esp. vv. 10-17.

1. Grammatical difficulties.—The RV should be consulted throughout. The exact implication of the word 'virgin' or 'maiden' (RVm) is doubtful (see art. VIRGIN); it is sufficient here to say that it 'is not the word which would be naturally used for virgin, if that was the point which it was desired to emphasize' (Kirkpatrick, Doctrine of the Prophets, p. 187). The definite article may either indicate that the prophet has some particular mother in mind, or be generic, referring to the class. In v. 15 the renderings of RV and RVm are both admissible, but the former is more probable; in v. 16 RV should be followed, AV being quite misleading. In 8⁸ there may be no reference to Immanuel at all; a very slight alteration of the vowel points would give the reading ' . . . of the land; for God is with us'; the refrain occurs in v. 10.

2. Historical situation.—In B.C. 735 the kings of Syria and Ephraim formed an alliance against Judah, with the object of setting Tabeel, a nominee of their own, on the throne of David, and forcing the Southern Kingdom to join in a confederacy against Assyria. Ahaz had only lately come to the throne, and the kingdom was weak and demoralized (2 K 16¹). The purpose of Isaiah was to calm the terror of the people (Is 7³), and to restore faith in Jehovah (v. 9). But the policy of Ahaz was to take the first step of invoking the aid of Assyria itself. Hence, when the prophet offered him a sign from God, he refused to accept it, for fear of committing himself to the prophet's policy of faith and independence. He cloaked his refusal in words of apparent piety. A sign is, however, given—the birth of a child, who shall eat butter and honey (i.e. poor pastoral fare; cf. v. 22) till (?) he comes to years of discretion. Before that time, i.e. before he is four or five years old, Syria and Ephraim shall be ruined (v. 16). But Ahaz and his own kingdom shall become the prey of Assyria (v. 17); the rest of the chapter consists of pictures of desolation. The interpretation of the sign is by no means clear. Who is the child and what does his name imply? Is the sign a promise or a threat? It should be noticed, as probably an essential element in the problem, that it is the house or dynasty of David which is being attacked, and which is referred to throughout the chapter (vv. 2, 13, 17).

3. Who is the child? (see Driver, Isaiah, p. 40 ff.).

(a) The traditional interpretation sees in the passage a direct prophecy of the Virgin-birth of Christ, and nothing else. In what sense, then, was it a sign to Ahaz? The view runs counter to the modern conception of prophecy, which rightly demands that its primary interpretation shall be brought into relation to the ideas and circumstances of its age. The rest of the chapter does not refer to Christ, but to the troubles of the reign of Ahaz; is it legitimate to tear half a dozen words from their context, and apply them arbitrarily to an event happening generations after? (b) It is suggested that the maiden is the wife of Ahaz and that her son is Hezekiah, the king of whom Isaiah rightly had such high hopes; or (c) that she is the 'prophetess,' the wife of Isaiah himself. In both cases we ask why the language is so needlessly ambiguous. The chronological difficulty would seem to be fatal to (b), Hezekiah being almost certainly several years old in 735; and (c) makes the sign merely a duplication of that given in 8⁸. It becomes a mere note of time ('before the child grows up, certain things shall have happened'); it leaves unexplained the solemn way in which the birth is announced, the choice of the name, and its repetition in 8⁸ (if the usual reading be retained). It also separates this passage from 9¹⁻⁷ 11¹⁻³, which almost certainly stand in connexion with it. Similar objections may be urged against the view (d), which sees in the maiden any Jewish mother of marriageable age, who in spite of all appearances to the contrary may call her child, then about to be born, by a name indicating the Divine favour, in token of the coming deliverance. The point of the sign is then the mother's faith and the period of time within which the deliverance shall be accomplished. (e) A more allegorical version of this interpretation explains the maiden as Zion personified, and her 'son' as the coming generation. But the invariable word for Zion and countries in such personifications is bethulah, not almah (see art. VIRGIN). (f) There remains the view which sees in the passage a reference to a Messiah in the wider use of the term, as understood by Isaiah and his contemporaries. There probably already existed in Judah the expectation of an ideal king and deliverer, connected with the house of David (2 S 7¹²⁻¹⁶). Now at the moment when that house is attacked and its representative proves himself unworthy, Isaiah announces in oracular language the immediate coming of that king. The reference in 8⁸, and the passages in chs. 9, 11, will then fall into their place side by side with this. They show that the prophet's thoughts were at this period dwelling much on the fate and the work of the 'wondrous child,' who will, in fact, be a scion of the house of David (9⁷ 11¹). Strong support is given to this view by Mic 5³ ('until the time when she that beareth hath brought forth'); whether the passage belong to Micah himself, a contemporary of Isaiah, or be of later date, it is clearly a reference to Is 7, and is of great importance as an indication of the ideas current at the time. With regard to the beliefs of the time, evidence has been lately brought forward (esp. by Jeremias and Greßmann) showing that outside Israel (particularly in Egypt and Babylonia) there existed traditions and expectations of a semi-divine saviour-king, to be born of a divine, perhaps a virgin, mother, and to be wonderfully reared. That is to say, there was an already existing tradition to which the prophet could appeal, and which is presupposed by his words; note esp. 'the virgin.' How much the tradition included, we cannot say; e.g. did it include the name 'Immanuel'? The 'butter and honey' seems to be a pre-existing feature, representing originally the Divine nourishment on which the child is reared; so, according to the Greek legend, the infant Zeus is fed on milk and honey in the cave on Ida. But in the prophecy, as it stands, it seems to be used of the hard fare which alone is left to the inhabitants of an invaded land. We must indeed distinguish throughout between the conceptions of the primitive myth, and the sense in which the prophet applies these conceptions. The value of the supposition that he was working on the lines of popular beliefs ready to his hand, is that it explains how his hearers would be prepared to understand his oracular language, and suggests that much that is obscure to us may have been clear to them. It confirms the view that the prophecy was intended to be Messianic, i.e. to predict the birth of a mysterious saviour.

4. Was the sign favourable or not? The text, as it stands, leaves it very obscure whether Isaiah gave Ahaz a promise or a threat. The fact that the king had hardened his heart may have turned the sign which should have been of good omen into something different. The name of the child and v.¹⁶ speak of deliverance; vv.^{15, 17} and the rest of the chapter, of judgment. It is perfectly true that Isaiah's view of the future was that Ephraim and Syria should be destroyed, that Judah should also suffer from Assyrian invasion, but that salvation should come through the faithful remnant. The difficulty is to extract this sense from the passage. The simplest method is to follow the critics who omit v.¹⁶, or at least the words 'whose two kings thou abhorrest'; 'the land' will then refer naturally to Judah; if referring, as it is usually understood, to Syria and Ephraim, the singular is very strange. The prophecy is then a consistent announcement of judgment. Immanuel shall be born, but owing to the unbelief of Ahaz, his future is mortgaged and he is born only to a ruined kingdom (cf. 8⁴); it is not stated in this passage whether the hope implied in his name will ever be realized. Others would omit v.¹⁷, and even v.¹⁵, making the sign a promise of the failure of the coalition. Whatever view be adopted, the inconsistencies of the text make it at least possible that it has suffered from interpolation, and that we have not got the prophecy in its original form. The real problem is not to account for the name 'Immanuel,' or for the promise of a saviour-king, but to understand what part he plays in the rest of the chapter. Connected with this is the further difficulty of explaining why the figure of the Messianic king disappears almost entirely from Isaiah's later prophecies.

5. Its application to the Virgin-birth.—The full discussion of the quotation in Mt 1²³ is part of the larger subjects of Messianic prophecy, the Virgin-birth, and the Incarnation. The following points may be noticed here. (a) Though the LXX (which has parthenos 'virgin') and the Alexandrian Jews apparently interpreted the passage in a Messianic sense and of a virgin-birth, there is no evidence to show that this interpretation was sufficiently prominent and definite to explain the rise of the belief in the miraculous conception. The text was applied to illustrate the fact or the belief in the fact; the fact was not imagined to meet the requirements of the text. The formula used in the quotation suggests that it belongs to a series of OT passages drawn up in the primitive Church to illustrate the life of Christ (see Allen, St. Matthew, p. ixii.). (b) The text would not now be used as a proof of the Incarnation. 'Immanuel' does not in itself imply that the child was regarded as God, but only that he was to be the pledge of the Divine presence, and endowed in a special sense with the spirit of Jehovah (cf. Is 11²). The Incarnation 'fulfils' such a prophecy, because Christ is the true realization of the vague and half-understood longings of the world, both heathen and Jewish.

C. W. EMMET.

IMMER.—1. Eponym of a priestly family (1 Ch 9¹² 24¹⁴, Ezr 2³⁷ 10²⁹, Neh 3³⁰ 7⁴⁰ 11¹³). 2. A priest contemporary with Jeremiah (Jer 20¹). 3. The name of a place (?) (Ezr 2⁵⁹ = Neh 7⁶¹). The text is uncertain (cf. 1 Es 5³⁰).

IMMORTALITY.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

IMNA.—An Asherite chief (1 Ch 7³⁰).

IMNAH.—1. The eldest son of Asher (Nu 26⁴⁴, 1 Ch 7³⁰). 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹⁴).

IMNITES.—Patronymic from Imnah (No. 1), Nu 26⁴⁴.

IMPORTUNITY.—The Greek word so translated in Lk 11⁸ is literally 'shamelessness.' It is translated 'impudence' in Sir 25²². These are its only occurrences in the Bible. It is probable, however, that it had lost some of its original force, and that 'importunity' is a fair rendering. The Eng. word signified originally 'difficulty of access' (in-portus), hence persistence. It is now practically obsolete, and 'persistence' might have been introduced into the RV.

IMPOTENT.—This word, now obsolescent in common speech, means literally 'without strength.' It is used as the tr. of Gr. words which mean 'without power' (Bar 6²⁸, Ac 14⁹) or 'without strength' (Jn 5⁷, Ac 4⁹). 'When religion is at the stake,' says Fuller (Holy State, ii. 19, p. 124), 'there must be no lookers on (except impotent people, who also help by their prayers), and every one is bound to lay his shoulders to the work.'

IMPRISONMENT.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 9.

IMRAH.—An Asherite chief (1 Ch 7³⁰).

IMRI.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 9⁴). 2. Father of Zaccur, who helped to build the wall (Neh 3³).

INCANTATIONS.—See MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY.

INCARNATION.—It is a distinguishing feature of Christianity that it consists in faith in a person, Jesus Christ, and in faith or self-committal of such a character that faith in Him is understood to be faith in God. The fact on which the whole of the Christian religion depends is therefore the fact that Jesus Christ is both God and man. Assuming provisionally this fact to be true, or at least credible, this article will briefly examine the witness borne to it in the books of the OT and NT.

1. The Incarnation foreshadowed in the OT.—Early religions have attempted to explain two things—the existence and order of the universe, and the principles of conduct or morality. The Hebrews attained at an early period to a belief in God as the creator and sustainer of the universe, but their interest in metaphysics did not go beyond this. It is in their moral idea of God that we shall find anticipations of the Incarnation. (a) The OT conception of man. Man is made in the image of God (Gn 1²⁶ 9⁶). Whatever may be the exact meaning of this expression, it appears to imply that man has a free and rational personality, and is destined for union with God. (b) God reveals Himself to man. A belief in the self-manifestation of God, through visions, dreams, the ministry of angels, the spirit of prophecy, and in the possibility of personal converse between God and man, is apparent upon every page of the OT. The 'theophanies' further suggest the possibility of the appearance of God in a human form. It is also remarkable that, although the sense of the holiness and transcendence of God grew with time, the Jews in the later periods did not shrink from strongly anthropomorphic expressions. (c) Intimations of relationships in the Deity. Without unduly pressing such particular points as the plural form of Elohim (God), or the triple repetition of the Divine name (Is 6³, Nu 6²³), it may at least be said that the idea of God in Jewish monotheism is not a bare unit, and 'can only be apprehended as that which involves diversity as well as unity.' Moreover, the doctrine of the Divine Wisdom as set forth in the Books of Proverbs and Wisdom (Pr 8²², Wis 7²²⁻²⁵ 8¹ etc.) personifies Wisdom almost to the point of ascribing to it separate existence. The doctrine was carried further by Philo, with assistance from Greek thought, and prepared the way for St. John's conception of the Logos, the Word of God. (d) The Messianic hope. This was at its root an anticipation of the union of Divine and human attributes in a single personality (see MESSIAH). It developed along several distinct lines of thought and expectation, and it will be noted that these are not combined in the OT; but Christianity claims to supply the explanation and fulfilment of them all.

2. The fact of the Incarnation in the NT.—(a) The humanity of Christ. It is beyond dispute that Christ is represented in the NT as a man. He was born, indeed, under miraculous conditions, but of a human mother. He grew up with gradually developing powers (Lk 2⁵²). The people among whom He lived for thirty years do not appear to have recognized anything extraordinary in Him (Mt 13⁵⁵). During the period of His life about which detailed information has been recorded, we read of ordinary physical and moral characteristics. He suffered weariness (Mk 4³⁸, Jn 4⁶), hunger (Mt 4²), thirst (Jn 19²⁸); he died and was buried. He felt even strong emotions: wonder (Mk 6⁶, Lk 7⁹), compassion (Mk 8², Lk 7¹³), joy (Lk 10²¹), anger (Mk 8¹² 10¹⁴); He was deeply moved (Jn 11³⁴, Mk 14³³). He acquired information in the ordinary way (Mk 6³⁸ 9²¹, Jn 11⁵⁴). He was tempted (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Lk 22²⁸). And it may be further asserted with the utmost confidence, that neither in the Gospels nor in any other part of the NT is there the smallest support for a Docetic explanation of these facts (that is, for the theory that He only seemed to undergo the experiences narrated). (b) The Divinity of Christ. Side by side with this picture of perfect humanity there is an ever-present belief through all the NT writings that Christ was more than a man. From the evidential point of view the most important and unquestionable testimony to the early belief of His disciples is contained in St. Paul's Epistles, especially those to the Romans, Galatians, and Corinthians, which are among the earliest books of the NT, and of the most undisputed genuineness. In these Epistles we find Jesus Christ 'co-ordinated with God in the necessarily Divine functions, in a manner impossible to the mind of a Jewish monotheist like St. Paul, unless the co-ordinated person is really believed to belong to the truly Divine being.' In the Gospels we have an account of how this belief arose. The Synoptic Gospels supply a simple narrative of fact in which we can mark the growing belief of the disciples; and the Fourth Gospel definitely marks stages of faith on the part of Christ's adherents, and of hatred on the part of His enemies. The following points may be specially noted in the Gospels:—

(1) Extraordinary characteristics are constantly ascribed to Christ, not in themselves necessarily Divine, but certainly such as to distinguish Christ in a marked degree from other men. There is a personal influence of a very remarkable kind. This is naturally not described or dwelt upon, but every page of the Gospels testifies to its existence. The earliest record of Christ's life is pre-eminently miraculous. In spite of economy and restraint of power, mighty works are represented as having been the natural, sometimes the almost involuntary, accompaniments of His ministrations. Two special miracles, the Resurrection and the Virgin-birth, are noticed separately below. He spoke with authority (Mk 7²⁹). He claimed to fulfil the Law—a law recognized as Divine—to be Lord of the Sabbath, and to give a new law to His disciples. In all His teaching there is an implicit claim to infallibility. In spite of His being subject to temptation, the possibility of moral failure is never entertained. There is nothing that marks Christ off from other men more than this. In all other good men the sense of sin becomes more acute with increasing holiness. In Christ it did not exist. The title of 'Son of Man' which He habitually used may have more meanings than one. But comparing the different connexions in which it is used, we can hardly escape the conclusion that Christ identifies Himself with the consummation and perfection of humanity.

(2) He claimed to be the Messiah, summing up and uniting the different lines of expectation alluded to above. As has been pointed out, the Messianic hope included features both human and Divine; and although this was not recognized beforehand, it appears to us, looking back, that these expectations could not have been adequately satisfied except by the Incarnation.

(3) Of some of the things mentioned above it might be a sufficient explanation to say, that Christ was a man endowed with exceptional powers and graces by God, and approved by mighty wonders and signs. But even in the Synoptic Gospels, which are for the most part pure narrative, there is more than this. In the claim to forgive sins (Mt 9²⁻⁶), to judge the world (Mk 14⁶², 43), to reveal the will of the Father (Mt 11²⁷), in His commission to the Church (Mt 28¹⁸⁻²⁰, Mk 16¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Lk 24⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸), and above all, perhaps, in the claim of personal adhesion which He ever made on His disciples, He assumes a relationship to God which would not be possible to one who was not conscious of being more than man.

(4) In the discourses in the Fourth Gospel, Christ plainly asserts His own pre-existence and His own essential relation to the Father. If these discourses represent even the substance of a side of Christ's teaching (a point which must be assumed and not argued here), He explicitly bore witness to His eternal relation to the Father.

(5) What crowned the faith of the disciples was the fact of the Resurrection. Their absolute belief in the reality of this fact swept away all doubts and misgivings. At first, no doubt, they were so much absorbed in the fact itself that they did not at once reason out all that it meant to their beliefs; and in teaching they had to adapt their message to the capacities of their hearers; but there can be no question about the place which the belief in the Resurrection took in determining their creed (see JESUS CHRIST, p. 458^a).

(6) One miracle recorded in the Gospels, the Virgin-birth, naturally did not form part of the first cycle of Apostolic teaching. The Apostles bore witness to their own experience and to the growth of their own faith, and they knew Jesus Christ first as a man. Apart from the evidence for the fact, it has seemed to most Christians in all ages that the idea of a new creative act is naturally associated with the occurrence of the Incarnation.

3. Purpose and results of the Incarnation.—(a) Consummation of the universe and of humanity.—St. Paul (Eph 1⁹) speaks of the purpose of God 'to sum up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens and the things upon the earth' (cf. He 2¹⁰). This is a view which is not often explicitly dwelt upon in the Scriptures, but the idea appears to pervade the NT, and it is conspicuous in Eph., Col., and Hebrews. Christ is represented as fulfilling the purpose of humanity and therefore of the universe, as being its first and final cause, 'for whom are all things, and through whom are all things.' It is hardly necessary to point out that the modern teaching of evolution, if not anticipated by Christianity, at least adapts itself singularly well to the expression of this aspect of it.

(b) Supreme revelation of God.—Christians have always believed that even the material universe was destined ultimately to reveal God, and St. Paul appeals to the processes of nature as being an indication not only of the creative power, but also of the benevolence of God (Ac 14¹⁷, cf. Ro 1²⁰). The OT is the history of a progressive revelation which is always looking forward to more perfect illumination, and the whole history of man is, according to the NT, the history of gradual enlightenment culminating in the Incarnation (He 1², Jn 14⁷, Col 1⁴).

(c) Restoration of man.—It has been a common subject of speculation in the Church whether the Incarnation would have taken place if man had not sinned, and it must be recognized that to such a question no decisive answer can be given. As a fact the Incarnation was conditioned by the existence of man's sin, and the restoration of man is constantly put forward as its purpose. Three special aspects of this work of restoration may be noticed. (1) Christ offers an example of perfect and sinless humanity: He is the unique example of man as God intended him to be. The ideal of the human race becomes actual in Him. His life was one of perfect obedience to the will of God (Mt 17⁵, Lk 3², Jn 8²⁹). (2) He removed the barriers which sin had placed between man and his Creator. This work is invariably associated in the NT with His death and resurrection. It is described as an offering, a sacrifice, of Himself (He 9²⁶), which takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1²⁹). Many metaphors are used in the NT to describe the effect of His death and resurrection, such as redemption, which conveys the idea of a deliverance at a great cost from slavery; propitiation, or an act or process by which sin is neutralized; salvation, or bringing into a condition of health or safety; reconciliation with God, and remission of sin (see ATONEMENT). (3) These two parts of Christ's work for man were accomplished by His earthly life, death, and resurrection. But they do not comprise all that the Incarnation has done for the restoration of man. The completion of His work Christ left to His Church, the society which He founded, and in which He promised that He would dwell through the Holy Spirit. The Church, St. Paul says, is His body, living by His life and the instrument of His work. Thus the Kingdom of God which Christ brought to the earth, and which He constantly speaks of both as being already come and as still to come, is visibly represented in His Church, which is 'the Kingdom of heaven in so far as it has already come, and prepares for the Kingdom as it is to come in glory.'

4. Relation of the NT doctrine to that of the Councils.

—It has been seen above that the disciples knew our Lord first as a man, and that they advanced by degrees to a belief in His Divinity. Men educated in Jewish habits of thought would not readily apprehend in all its bearings the Christian idea of a Person who could be both God and man. It is therefore not surprising that there should be in the NT a diversity of treatment with regard to the question of the Person of Christ, and that it should be possible to recognize what may be called different levels of Christological belief. Before our Lord's death the disciples had recognized Him as the Messiah, though with still very inadequate ideas as to the nature of the Messianic Kingdom which He was to set up. The Resurrection transformed this faith, and it naturally became the central point of their early teaching. The conception of Christ prominent in the earliest Apostolic age, and emphasized in the first part of the Acts and in the Epistles of 1 Peter, James, and Jude, regards Him primarily as the Messiah, the glory of whose Person and mission has been proved by the Resurrection, who has been exalted to God's right hand, and who will be judge of quick and dead. St. Paul in his earlier Epistles regards Christ's Person more from the point of view of personal religion, as One who has bridged over the gulf which sin has caused between God and man, and in whom man's desire for reconciliation with God finds satisfaction. St. Paul's later Epistles, as well as the Ep. to the Hebrews and St. John's Gospel, deal with the cosmological and mystical aspects of the Incarnation, and contain the most definite statements of the Divinity of Christ.

It has been further maintained that the definitions of the doctrine made by the great Councils and embodied in the Creeds show an advance upon the doctrine contained in the NT. This was not, however, the view of those who drew up the definitions, for they invariably appealed to the NT writings as conclusive, and believed themselves to be only formulating beliefs which had always been held by the Church. The language of the definitions was undoubtedly to some extent new, but it has never been shown that the substance of the doctrine expressed by them in any respect goes beyond what has been represented above as the teaching of the NT. If the NT writers really believed, as has been maintained above, that Christ was a Person who was perfectly human and who was also Divine, there is nothing in the dogmatic decrees of the 4th and 5th centuries which asserts more than this. What these definitions do is to negative explanations which are inconsistent with these fundamental beliefs. It is not surprising that men found it difficult to grasp the perfect Divinity as well as the perfect humanity of Christ, and that attempts should have been made to explain away one side or other of the doctrine of the Incarnation. The attempt which met with the widest success, and most threatened the doctrine of the Church, was that of Arius, who taught that the Son of God was a created being, a sort of demi-god. This teaching found ready support and sympathy among men who had not shaken off pagan habits of thought, and in opposing it the Church was contending for a true Theism, which cannot endure the multiplication of objects of worship, no less than for Christianity. But although a word was used in the definition finally accepted, the celebrated homousion—'of one substance with the Father'—which was not used by any NT writer, it was used unwillingly, and only because other attempts to assert beyond the possibility of cavil the true Divinity of Christ had failed. Again, when the Divinity of Christ was fully accepted, the difficulty of believing the same Person to be both God and man led to attempts to explain away the perfect humanity. Apollinaris taught that the Word of God took the place of the human mind or spirit in Christ, as at a later period the Monothelites held that He had no human will; Nestorius practically denied an Incarnation, by holding that the Son of God and Jesus Christ were two separate persons, though united in a singular degree; Eutyches taught that the manhood in Christ was merged in the Godhead so as to lose its proper and distinct nature. These explanations contradicted in various ways the plain teaching of the Gospels that Christ was a truly human Person, and they were all decisively negated by the Church in language which no doubt shows a distinct advance in theological thought, but without adding anything to the substance of the Apostolic doctrine. J. H. MAUDE.

INCENSE.—(1) lebāndh, which should always be tr. 'frankincense' (wh. see). It was burnt with the meat-offering (Lv 21², 23¹³, 24⁶ etc.), and offered with the shewbread (Lv 24⁷⁻⁹). (2) qetōreth, lit. 'smoke,' and so used in 1¹³, Ps 66¹⁸ 141²; used for a definite substance, Lv 10¹, Ezk 8¹¹ etc. (3) thumiana (Gr.), Lk 1¹⁰, Rev 5⁸ 8¹³. The holy incense (Ex 30³⁴) was made of stacte, onycha, galbanum, and frankincense, but the incense of later times, which was offered daily (Jth 9¹, Lk 1⁸⁻¹⁰), was more complicated. According to Josephus, it had thirteen constituents (BJ v. v. 5). Incense was originally burned in censers, but these were laterly used only to carry coals from the great altar to the altar of incense. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

INCENSE, ALTAR OF.—See TABERNACLE, § 6 (c) and TEMPLE, § 4.

INCEST.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

INDIA (Heb. Hōddā) is named as the E. boundary of the empire of Ahasuerus (Est 1⁸). The Heb. is contracted from Hondu, the name of the river Indus. It indicated the country through which that river flows: not the great peninsula of Hindustan. So also in 1 Mac 8⁴, Ad. Est 13¹ 14¹, 1 Es 3¹. Possibly the drivers of the elephants (1 Mac 6²⁷) were true Indians. If India proper is not named, there is little doubt that from ancient times Israel had relations with the country, by means of the caravan trade through Arabia. Many of the articles of commerce in the account given of this trade are of Indian origin: e.g. 'ivory and ebony,' 'cassia and calamus,' 'broidered work,' and 'rich apparel' (Ezk 27^{16, 19, 24}). W. EWING.

INDITE.—This Eng. verb is now somewhat old-fashioned. When it is used, it means to write. But formerly, and as found in AV, it meant to inspire or dictate to the writer. Thus St. Paul indited and Tertius wrote (Ro 16²⁶). The word occurs in the Preface to the AV and in Ps 45¹ 'My heart is inditing a good matter.' In the Douai version (though this word is not used) there is a note: 'I have received by divine inspiration in my hart and cogitation a most high Myserie.'

INFIDEL.—This word has more force now than formerly. In AV it signifies no more than 'unbeliever.' It occurs in 2 Co 6¹⁴, 1 Ti 5⁸ (RV 'unbeliever' in both). So 'infidelity' in 2 Es 7⁴ is simply 'unbelief' (Lat. incredulitas).

INGATHERING.—See TABERNACLES [FEAST OF].

INHERITANCE.—It is a remarkable fact that the Hebrew language fails to discriminate between the inheritance of property and its possession or acquisition in any other manner. The two words most constantly used in this connexion denote the idea of settled possession, but are quite indeterminate as to the manner in which that possession has been acquired. As might easily be inferred, from the historical circumstances of Israel's evolution, the words became largely restricted to the holding of land, obviously the most important of all kinds of property among a pastoral or agricultural people.

1. INHERITANCE IN LAW AND CUSTOM.—1. Property.—While land was the most important part of an inheritance, the rules for succession show that it was regarded as belonging properly to the family or clan, and to the individual heir only as representing family or tribal rights. Cattle, household goods, and slaves would be more personal possessions, which a man could divide among his sons (Dt 21¹⁶). Originally wives, too, as part of the property of the deceased, would fall to the possession of the heir-in-chief (cf. 2 S 16²⁰⁻²², 1 K 2¹²).

2. Heirs.—(a) The firstborn son, as the new head of the family, responsible for providing for the rest, inherited the land and had also his claim to a double portion of other kinds of wealth (Dt 21¹⁷). To be the son of a concubine or inferior wife was not a bar to heirship (Gn 21¹⁰, 1 Ch 5¹); though a jealous wife might prevail on her husband to deprive such a son of the right of succession (Gn 21¹⁰). That a father had power to transfer the birthright from the firstborn to another is implied in the cases of Ishmael and Isaac (Gn 21¹⁰), Esau and Jacob (27³⁷), Reuben and Joseph (1 Ch 5¹), Adonijah and Solomon (1 K 1¹⁶⁻¹⁷). But this was contrary to social usage, and is prohibited in Dt 21¹⁶⁻¹⁷. Moreover, the exceptions to the rule are presented as examples of a Divine election rather than a human preference (Isaac, Gn 21¹²; Jacob, Mal 2¹, Ro 9¹²; Joseph, Gn 49²⁴; Solomon, 1 Ch 22^{9, 10}), and can hardly be adduced as survivals of the ancient custom of 'Junior Right.' (b) At first a daughter could not succeed (the inheritance of the daughters of Job [Job 42¹⁴] is noted as exceptional)—an arrangement that has been referred either to the influence of ancestor-worship, in which a male heir was necessary as priest of the family cult, or to the connexion between inheritance and the duty of blood revenge. For unmarried daughters, however, husbands would almost invariably be found. In the case of the daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 27¹⁻¹¹) we see the introduction of a change; but it is to be noted that this very case is associated with the provision (Nu 36¹⁻¹²) that heiresses should marry only within their father's tribe, so that the inheritance might not be alienated from it. (c) For the widow no immediate place was found in the succession. So far from being eligible as an heir, she was strictly a part of the property belonging to the inheritance. According to the levirate law, however, when a man died leaving no son, his brother or other next-of-kin (go'el) must marry the widow, and her firstborn son by this marriage became the heir of her previous husband (Dt 25⁵). (d) For the order of succession the rule is laid down in Nu 27⁸⁻¹¹ that if a man die without male issue the right of inheritance shall fall successively to his daughter, his brothers, his father's brothers, his next kinsman thereafter. The provision for the daughter was an innovation, as the context shows, but the rest of the rule is in harmony with the ancient laws of kinship.

ii. NATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS INHERITANCE.—1. The possession of the land of Canaan was commonly regarded as the inheritance of the whole people. In this particular case the inheritance was won only as the result of conflict and effort; moreover, theoretically at any rate, it involved the annihilation of the previous inhabitants. Consequently the inheritance of Canaan was not entirely devoid of the idea of succession. But the extermination of the Canaanites was never effected; and although the conquest was achieved only by the most strenuous effort, yet the Israelites were so strongly impressed with a vivid sense of Jehovah's intervention on their behalf, that to subsequent generations it seemed as if they had entered into the labours of others, not in any sense whatever by their own power, but solely by Jehovah's grace. The inheritance of Canaan signified the secure possession of the land, as the gift of God to His people. 'The dominant Biblical sense of inheritance is the enjoyment by a rightful title of that which is not the fruit of personal exertion' (Westcott, Heb. 168).

2. It is not surprising that the idea of inheritance soon acquired religious associations. The Hebrew mind invested all social and political institutions with a religious significance. As Israel became increasingly conscious of its mission in, and began dimly to apprehend its mission to, the world, the peaceful and secure possession of Canaan seemed an indispensable condition of that self-development which was itself the necessary prelude to a more universal mission. The threatening attitude of the great world powers in the eighth and subsequent centuries B.C. brought the question prominently to the front. Over and over again it seemed as if Jerusalem must succumb to the hordes of barbarian invaders, and as if the last remnant of Canaan must be irretrievably lost; but the prophets persistently declared that the land should not be lost; they realized the impossibility of Israel's ever realizing her true vocation, unless, at any rate for some centuries, she preserved her national independence; and the latter would, of course, be wholly unthinkable without territorial security. The career of Israel, as a nation, the influence, even the existence, of its religion, would be endangered by the dispossession of Canaan; moreover, it was recognized that as long as the people remained true to Jehovah, He on His part would remain true to them, and would not suffer them to be dispossessed, but would make them dwell securely in their own land, in order that they might establish on their side those conditions of righteousness and justice which represented the national obligations, if Jehovah's covenant with them was to be maintained.

3. The possession of the land, the inheritance of Canaan, symbolized the people's living in covenant with their God, and all those spiritual blessings which flowed from such a covenant. And inasmuch as the validity of the covenant implied the continuance of Divine favour, the inheritance of the Holy Land was viewed as the outward and visible sign of God's presence and power among His own. We knew how the remorseless logic of history seemed to point to an opposite conclusion. The Exile spelt disinheritance; and disinheritance meant a great deal more than the loss of a little strip of territory; it meant the forfeiture of spiritual blessings as a consequence of national sin. The more ardent spirits of the nation refused, however, to believe that these high privileges were permanently abrogated; they were only temporarily withdrawn; and they looked forward to a new covenant whose spiritual efficacy should be guaranteed by national restoration. In the reconstituted theocracy, the Messiah figured as the mediator both of temporal and of spiritual blessings. The idea of a restored inheritance suggested at once the glorious anticipations of the Messianic age, when the people, not by works which they had done, but by Jehovah's grace, should recover that which they had lost; and renew the covenant that had been broken.

4. In this sense 'the inheritance' became almost equivalent to the Messianic salvation; and participation in this salvation is not a future privilege, but a present possession. In the OT the secure inheritance of the Holy Land was the outward symbol of these spiritual blessings; under the New Dispensation they are assured by membership in the Christian body.

5. As every Jew regarded himself as an inheritor of the land of Canaan, so also is each Christian an inheritor of the Kingdom of heaven. He is not the heir, in the sense of enjoying an honorary distinction, or of anticipating future privileges; but as one who is already in a position of assured privilege, conferred upon him with absolute validity. As Lightfoot remarks, 'Our Father never dies; the inheritance never passes away from Him; yet nevertheless we succeed to the full possession of it' (Galatians 1:15).

6. Three particular usages remain to be noticed. (a) The Jews never lost the conviction that Jehovah was the supreme overlord of the land, and of the people that dwelt in it. Accordingly Canaan is the Holy Land, and Jehovah's own inheritance; and Messiah when incarnate 'came to His own country, and His own people received Him not.' (b) The Jews also recognized that the possession of Canaan had value only in so far as it assured them of the free exercise of their religion, and all other spiritual blessings. This they strove to express by boldly declaring that Jehovah was Himself the inheritance of His people. (c) The Messiah, through whom the disinheritance should be brought to a close, and the covenant should be renewed, was naturally regarded as the supreme 'inheritor' or 'heir' of all the promises and privileges implied in the covenant. As, moreover, the Messiah's unique relation to the Father became more clearly defined, the idea of His inheritance, connoting His unique primogeniture and universal supremacy, became enlarged and expanded. It was, moreover, through the humanity which He restored that the Son proved and realized His heirship of all things; and thus His actual position is the potential exaltation of redeemed mankind.

INQUIRY.—See SIN.

INJURIOUS.—In the language of the AV 'Injurious' is more than hurtful; it is also insulting. It 'adds insult to injury.' It occurs Sir 8:1, 1 Ti 1:12; and the Gr. word used in these places is in Ro 1:30 translated 'despightful' (RV 'insolent').

INK is mentioned once in OT (Jer 36:18). Ex 32:33 and Nu 5:2 are adduced as evidence that the old Hebrew ink (derived from lamp-black [?]) could be washed off. From the bright colours that still survive in some papyri, it is evident that the ink used by the Egyptians must have been of a superior kind. The NT term for 'ink,' occurring three times (2 Co 3:3, 2 Jn 1:3, 3 Jn 1:3), is melan (lit. 'black'). See, further, under WRITING.

INKHORN.—In one of Ezekiel's visions (Ezk 9:2, 3, 4) a man appears with a scribe's inkhorn by his side (lit.

'upon his loins'). The 'inkhorn' consisted of a case for the reed pens, with a cup or bulb for holding the ink, near the upper end of the case. It was carried in the girdle (hence the above expression).

INN.—See HOSPITALITY.

INNER MAN.—The implied contrast involved in this expression may be regarded as exclusively Pauline. The antithesis between the adorning of the visible body, and 'the incorruptible (ornament) of a meek and quiet spirit,' 'the hidden man of the heart' (1 P 3:4) is an example of the Paulinism which pervades this encyclical letter (see Moffatt, Historical NT 2, p. 250). The contrast, so vividly portrayed in Ro 7:22, is essentially ethical in its character. It is between the law which passion blindly follows, and that to which 'the mind' or the informed conscience yields a delighted because a reasoned obedience (cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans, in loc.). Different from this is the contrast in 2 Co 4:16, where 'our outward man,' decaying and dying, stands over against 'our inward man,' which is in a constant state of renewal. Here we have the antithesis of the 'temporal' and the 'eternal' elements in man's complex personality (v. 18). This phrase is found in an absolute sense in Eph 3:16, where it denotes the entire basis of man's higher life, on which God's Spirit works, and in which Christ dwells. The intellectual and moral apprehension of the fruits of the Incarnation depend, first and last, upon whether 'the inward man' has its roots struck deep in that Divine love which is the first cause of man's redemption (v. 17; cf. Jn 3:16).

INSPIRATION.—The subject comprises the doctrine of inspiration in the Bible, and the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible, together with what forms the transition from the one to the other, the account given of the prophetic consciousness, and the teaching of the NT about the OT.

1. The agent of inspiration is the Holy Spirit (see p. 360) or Spirit of God, who is active in Creation (Gn 1:2, Ps 104:29), is imparted to man that the dust may become living soul (Gn 2:7), is the source of exceptional powers of body (Jg 6:34, 14:6, 19) or skill (Ex 35:31); but is pre-eminently manifest in prophecy (wh. see). The NT doctrine of the presence and power of the Spirit of God in the renewed life of the believer is anticipated in the OT, inasmuch as to the Spirit's operations are attributed wisdom (Job 32:8, 1 K 3:28, Dt 34:9), courage (Jg 13:25, 14:9), penitence, moral strength, and purity (Neh 9:20, Ps 51:10, Is 63:10, Ezk 36:27, Zec 12:10). The promise of the Spirit by Christ to His disciples was fulfilled when He Himself after the Resurrection breathed on them, and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost' (Jn 20:22), and after His Ascension the Spirit descended on the Church with the outward signs of the wind and fire (Ac 2:3). The Christian life as such is an inspired life, but the operation of the Spirit is represented in the NT in two forms; there are the extraordinary gifts (charisms)—speaking with tongues, interpreting tongues, prophecy, miracles (1 Co 12),—all of which St. Paul subordinates to faith, hope, love (ch. 13); and there are the fruits of the Spirit in moral character and religious disposition (Gal 5:22, 23). Intermediate may be regarded the gifts for special functions in the Church, as teaching, governing, exhorting (Ro 12:7, 8). The prophetic inspiration is continued (Ro 12:9); but superior is the Apostolic (1 Co 12:28) (see APOSTLES).

2. The doctrine of the inspiration of the NT attaches itself to the promise of Christ to His disciples that the Holy Spirit whom the Father would send in His name should teach them all things, and bring to their remembrance all things that He had said to them (Jn 14:26); and that, when the Spirit of truth had come, He should guide them into all the truth, and should declare to them the things that were to come (16:13). These promises cover the contents of Gospels, Epistles, and the Apocalypse. The inspiration of Christ's own words is affirmed in His claim to be alone in knowing and revealing the Father (Mt 11²⁷), and His repeated declaration of His dependence in His doctrine on the Father.

3. Christ recognizes the inspiration of the OT (Mt 22⁴⁰), and the authority of the prophets (Lk 24²⁰). The word 'inspire' is used only in Wis 15¹¹ 'Because he was ignorant of him that moulded him, and of him that inspired into him an active soul, and breathed into him a vital spirit.' The word 'inspiration' is used in this general sense in Job 32⁸ AV 'But there is a spirit in man; and the inspiration (RV 'breath') of the Almighty giveth them understanding.' In special reference to the OT we find in 2 Ti 3¹⁶ (RV) 'every scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching,' etc. While the term is not used, the fact is recognized in 2 P 1²¹ 'For no prophecy ever came by the will of man; but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost.' It must be added, however, that both these passages are in writings the Apostolic authorship of which is questioned by many scholars. But the NT view of the authority of the OT is fully attested in the use made of the OT as trustworthy history, true doctrine, and sure prophecy; and yet the inaccuracy of many of the quotations, as well as the use of the Greek translation, shows that the writers, whether they held a theory of verbal inspiration or not, were not bound by it.

4. Although the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible does not properly fall within the scope of a Bible Dictionary, a brief summary of views held in the Christian Church may be added: (a) The Theory of verbal inspiration affirms that each human author was but the mouthpiece of God, and that in every word, therefore, God speaks. But the actual features of the Bible, as studied by reverent and believing scholarship, contradict the theory. (b) The theory of degrees of inspiration recognizes suggestion, direction, elevation, and superintendency of the human by the Divine Spirit; but it is questionable whether we can so formally define the process. (c) The dynamical theory recognizes the exercise of human faculties in the author, but maintains their illumination, stimulation, and purification by the Spirit of God, in order that in doctrine and ethics the Divine mind and will may be correctly and sufficiently expressed; but this divorces literature from life. (d) We may call the view now generally held personal inspiration: by the Spirit of God men are in various degrees enlightened, filled with zeal and devotion, cleansed and strengthened morally, brought into more immediate and intimate communion with God; and this new life, expressed in their writings, is the channel of God's revelation of Himself to men. In place of stress on the words and the ideas of Scripture, emphasis is now laid on the moral character and religious disposition of the agents of revelation. ALFRED E. GARVIE.

INSTANT.—'Instant' and 'instantly' are now used only of time. In AV they have their earlier meaning of 'urgent,' 'urgently,' as in Lk 23³² 'they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified'; Lk 7⁴ 'they besought him instantly' (RV 'earnestly'). Cf. Erasmus, Paraphrase, i. 31, 'whoso knocketh at the doore instantly, to him it shal be opened.'

INSTRUMENT.—For musical instruments see MUSIC. The word is also frequently used in AV (though only twice in NT, both times in Ro 6¹³) for any utensil, implement, or weapon, and in To 7¹⁴, 1 Mac 13¹³ for a legal document or deed.

INTERCESSION.—See PRAYER.

INTEREST.—See USURY.

INTERMEDIATE STATE.—See ESCHATOLOGY, 3 (d), and PARADISE, 3.

INTERPRETATION.—This word and its cognates are found throughout the Bible with a wide variety in their use. 1. In the earlier stages of the history of mankind dreams were looked upon as manifestations of Divine intervention in human affairs, and it was regarded as of the first importance that their mysterious revelations should be explained for those to whom they were vouchsafed. From the story of Joseph we learn that a special class at the court of the Pharaohs discharged the function of interpreters of dreams (cf. 'magicians' [RVm 'sacred scribes'] and 'wise men,' Gn 41⁸). A similar body of wise or learned men is mentioned in the Book of Daniel, for the same object at the court of Babylon (Dn 2²², 4⁶). The idea that dreams were a means of communication between the Deity and men was also current amongst the Hebrews from a very early date. In the NT we find that dreams occupy the place of direct visions or revelations from God, and no difficulty seems to have been experienced by the recipients as to their precise meaning (Mt 13²⁰, 21¹, 13, 19, 22).

2. Turning again to the history of Joseph, we find there an incidental remark which leads us to believe that there was an official interpreter, or a body of interpreters, whose work it was to translate foreign languages into the language of the court (cf. 'the interpreter,' Gn 42²³). The qualification to act as interpreter seems to have been required of those who acted as ambassadors at foreign courts (cf. 2 Ch 32³¹). That prominent politicians and statesmen had this means of international communication at their disposal is seen in the translation by the Persian nobles of their letter from their own language into Aramaic (Ezr 4⁷). As the Hebrew tongue ceased to be that of the common people, interpreters were required at the sacred services to translate or explain the Law and the Prophets after the reading of the original (see W. R. Smith, OTJ 73, 36, 64n, 154). In the NT, examples are frequent of the interpretation in Greek of a Hebrew or Aramaic phrase (Mt 13²², 27⁴, Mk 5⁴¹, 15²², 24, Jn 1³⁸, 41¹, Ac 4³⁶, 9³⁶, 13³); and in this connexion it is interesting to recall the extract from the writings of Papias preserved by Eusebius, in which Mark is called 'the interpreter of Peter' (see HE iii. 39)—a tradition accepted by Jerome and Athanasius. The most natural explanation is that which makes St. Mark's Gospel the outcome in Greek of St. Peter's teaching in his native tongue.

3. The function of the prophets is described as that of interpreters or ambassadors explaining to Israel Jehovah's messages in terms suited to their capacity (Is 43²⁷, cf. Elihu's reference to the intercessory or ambassadorial work of angels in interpreting to man what God requires of him in the way of conduct, as well as explaining the mystery of His dealings with men [Job 33²²]).

4. Frequent references made by St. Paul to a peculiar phase in the life of the early Corinthian Church—speaking with tongues. Whatever may be the precise meaning attaching to this feature of Christian activity, and it is plain that in individual cases the practice gave the Apostle considerable cause for anxiety, one of the special spiritual 'gifts' to believers was the power of interpreting these strange utterances. The speaker himself might possess the gift of interpretation and use it for the benefit of the congregation (see 1 Co 14¹³, 13), or, on the other hand, he might not. In the latter event his duty was to keep silence, unless an interpreter were at hand to make his message intelligible to the other assembled worshippers (cf. 1 Co 14²⁸, 12³⁰, 30).

5. A somewhat ambiguous use of the word 'interpretation' occurs in 2 P 1²⁰, where the writer refers to the expounding of ancient prophecies; 'no prophecy of scripture is of private (RVm 'special') interpretation.' Two explanations of this passage are current: (1) the 'interpretation' is that of the prophet himself, who, because of his peculiar relation to the Spirit of God, uttered words the full meaning of which he did not comprehend; or (2) the word has a reference to the exegesis of the passage in question by individual readers. The present writer is of opinion that neither explanation does full justice to the author's idea. If the word translated 'private' be confined solely in its meaning to the own which it qualifies, we may understand by the phrase that no single event or result can be looked on as a complete fulfilment of the prophet's message. It has a wider range or scope than the happening of any special occurrence, though that occurrence may be regarded as a fulfilment of the prophet's announcement. J. R. WILLIS.

INTREAT.—Besides the mod. sense of 'beseech,' intreat (spelled also 'entreat') means 'deal with,' 'handle,' mod. 'treat,' always with an adverb 'well,' 'ill,' 'shamefully,' etc. Coverdale translates Is 40¹¹ 'He shal gather the lambes together with his arme, and carie them in his bosome, and shal kindly intreate those that beare yonge.'

It is even more important to notice that when the meaning seems to be as now, viz. 'beseech,' the word is often in reality much stronger, 'prevail on by entreaty.' Thus Gn 25²¹ 'And Isaac intreated the Lord for his wife, . . . and the Lord was intreated of him,' i.e. yielded to the entreaty, as the Heb. means. Cf. Grafton, Chron. ii. 768, 'Howbeit she could in no wise be intreated with her good will to deliver him.'

In Jer 15¹¹ and its margin the two meanings of the word and the two spellings are used as alternative renderings, 'I will cause the enemy to entreat thee well,' marg. 'I will intreat the enemy for thee' (RV 'I will cause the enemy to make supplication unto thee').

INWARDS, INWARD PARTS.—1. The former of these expressions is frequently found in EV (Ex. and Lv.), meaning the entrails or bowels of the animals to be sacrificed according to the Levitical institutions (Ex 29¹³ 22, Lv 3⁹ 10 48 11 73 8¹⁶ 21 etc.). The same idea is found in Gn 41¹³, where EV has 'had eaten them up,' and LXX renders 'came into their belly' (see AvM which gives the alternative 'had come to the inward parts of them'; cf. also 1 K 17²¹ AvM). For the most part, however, the expression 'inward parts' is used in a metaphorical sense, to denote the contrast between the inward reality and the outward clothing of human character. Situated within the 'inward parts' is the capacity for wisdom (Job 38³⁶, see nevertheless EVm), truth (Ps 51⁶), ethical knowledge, and moral renovation (Jer 31³³, where 'inward parts' is almost synonymous with 'heart,' cf. Pr. 20³⁰). Here, too, lie hidden the springs of active wickedness (Ps 5⁹), and deceitful language (Ps 62⁴ AvM). The power of deceiving as to character and motives comes from man's inherent ability to secrete, within the profound depths of the innermost parts, his daily thoughts (Pr 18⁸; cf. Ps 64⁹). At the same time, these hidden designs are as an open book, beneath the bright light of a lamp, to the Lord (Pr 20²⁷; cf., for a similar thought, Ps 26⁷ 79, Jer 11²⁰, Rev 2²² etc.).

2. In the NT the expression is used only to denote the power of the hypocrites to deceive their fellow-men (Lk 11³⁶; cf. Mt 7¹⁵ 23³⁵). The curious phrase 'give for alms those things which are within' (Lk 11⁴¹) may be taken as an incidental reference by Jesus to the necessity and the possibility of man's innermost life being renewed and restored to a right relationship with God and men (cf. Is. 58¹⁰). At least it is permissible to take the word rendered 'the things which are within' as equivalent to 'the inward man,' or 'the inward parts' (see Plummer, ICC, in loc.; cf. Mk 7¹⁸, Lk 16⁹). It is not enough to give alms mechanically; the gift must be accompanied by the spontaneous bestowal of the giver's self, as it were, to the receiver. J. R. WILLIS.

IOB.—See JASHUB, No. 1.

IPHDEIAH.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8²⁶).

IPHTAH.—A town in the Shephelah of Judah, Jos 15⁴²; site unknown.

IPHTAH-EL.—A ravine N.W. of Hannathon, on the north border of Zebulun (Jos 19⁴⁴ 47). It is identified by some with the Jotapata (mod. Jefda) of Josephus.

IR (1 Ch 7¹²).—A Benjamite (called in v. 7 Iri).

IRA.—1. The Jairite who was kohen or priest to David (2 S 20²⁶). His name is omitted from the original (?) passage in 2 S 8¹⁸, and from the passage in 1 Ch 18¹⁷. 'The Jairite' denotes that he was of the Gileadite clan of the Jairites. The name probably means 'the watchful.' 2. The Ithrite, one of David's heroes (2 S 23²⁸, where perhaps Ithrite should be Jairite). 3. The son of Ikesh the Tekoite (2 S 23²⁸), another of David's heroes. W. F. COBB.

IRAD.—Son of Enoch and grandson of Cain (Gn 4¹⁸).

IRAM.—A 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36⁴² = 1 Ch 1⁴⁴).

IR-HA-HERES.—In Is 19¹⁸ the name to be given in the ideal future to one of the 'five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts'; AV and RV 'one shall be called, The city of destruction.' The usually accepted explanation of the passage is that the name 'city of heres, or destruction,'—or, more exactly, 'of tearing down' (the verb hāras being used of pulling or tearing down cities, altars, wal's, etc., Jg 6²⁵, Is 14¹⁷, Ezk 13¹⁴).—Is chosen for the sake of a punning allusion to cheres, in Heb. a rare word for 'sun' (Job 9⁷), the 'city of cheres,' or 'the sun,' being a designation which might have been given in Heb. to On, the Heliopolis of the Greeks, a city a few miles N.E. of the modern Cairo, in ancient times the chief centre of the sun-worship in Egypt, and full of obelisks dedicated to the sun-god Ra ('Cleopatra's needle,' now on the Thames Embankment, was originally one of these obelisks, erected by Thothmes III. in front of the temple of the sun-god at On); and the meaning of the passage being that the place which has hitherto been a 'city of the sun' will in the future be called the 'city of destroying,' i.e. a city devoted to destroying the temples and emblems of the sun (cf. Jer 43¹³). [The LXX have polis hasedek, i.e. 'city of righteousness,' a reading which is open to the suspicion of being an alteration based on 12⁵.]

To some scholars, however, this explanation appears artificial; and the question is further complicated by historical considerations. The high priest Onias III., after his deposition by Antiochus Epiphanes in a.c. 175 (2 Mac 4⁷⁻⁹), despairing of better times in Judah, sought refuge in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor; and conceived the idea of building there a temple dedicated to J^r, in which the ancient rites of his people might be carried on without molestation, and which might form a religious centre for the Jews settled in Egypt. Ptolemy granted him a site at Leontopolis, in the 'nome,' or district, of Heliopolis; and there Onias erected his temple (Jos. BJ. i. 1. 1, Ant. xiii. iii. 1-3, and elsewhere; Ewald, Hist. v. 355 f.),—not improbably at Tell el-Yahudiyyeh, about 10 m. N. of Heliopolis, near which there are remains of a Jewish necropolis (Naville, The Mound of the Jew and the City of Onias, pp. 18-20). In support of his plan, Onias had pointed to Is 19¹⁸ and its context as a prediction that a temple to J^r was to be built in Egypt (Jos. Ant. xiii. iii. 1 end). These facts have indeed no bearing on Is 19¹⁸, supposing the passage to be really Isaiah's; but many modern scholars are of opinion that Is 19^{18(12-22)}} are not Isaiah's, and even those who do not go so far as this would be ready to grant that 19¹⁸ (from 'one shall be called') might be a later addition to the original text of Isaiah.

The following are the chief views taken by those who hold that this clause (with or without its context) is not Isaiah's. (1) Duham and Marti render boldly 'shall be called Lion-city (or Leontopolis),' explaining heres from the Arab. haria, properly the bruiser, crusher, a poetical name for a lion. But that a very special and fig. application of an Arab. root, not occurring in Heb. even in its usual Arabic sense, should be found in Heb. is not probable. (2) Dillmann, while accepting the prophecy as a whole as Isaiah's, threw out the suggestion that v. 12⁵ was added after the temple of Onias was built, cheres, 'sun' (so Symm., Vulg., and some Heb. MSS), being the original reading, which was altered afterwards by the Jews of Palestine into heres, 'destruction,' in order to obtain a condemnation of the Egyptian temple, and by the Jews of Egypt into tsedek, 'righteousness' (LXX), in order to make the prophecy more distinctly favourable to it. (3) Cheyne (Introd. to Is. pp. 102-110) and Skinner, understanding v. 18 ('there shall be five cities,' etc.), not (as is done upon the ordinary view) of the conversion of Egypt, cities to the worship of J^h, but of Jewish colonies in Egypt, maintaining their national language and religion, suppose vv. 16-22 to have been written in the latter years of the first Ptolemy (Lagi), c. B.C. 290, when there were undoubtedly many Jewish settlements in Egypt: the original reading, these scholars suppose with Dillmann, was 'city of the sun,' the meaning being that one of these colonies, preserving loyally the faith of their fathers, should flourish even in Heliopolis, the city of the sun-god; the reading was altered afterwards, when the Jews of Palestine began to show hostility towards the Egyptian temple, by the Jews of Egypt into 'city of righteousness' (LXX), and then further, by the Jews of Palestine, as a counter-blow, into 'city of destruction' (Heb. text).

It may be doubted whether there are sufficient reasons for departing from the ordinary explanation of the passage. S. R. DRIVER.

IRI.—See IR.

IRIJAH.—A captain who arrested Jeremiah on the charge of intending to desert to the Chaldeans (Jer 37¹³⁻¹⁴).

IR-NAHASH.—A city of Judah (1 Ch 4¹²). The site is uncertain.

IRON.—1. A city of Naphtali, in the mountains, Jos 19³⁸. It is probably the modern Yārūn. 2. See MINING AND METALS.

IRPEEL.—A city of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁷); possibly the ruin Rafat, N. of el-Jib (Gibeon).

IRRIGATION.—Owing to the lack of a sufficient rainfall, Babylonia and Egypt have to be supplied with water from their respective rivers. This is conveyed over the country by canals. The water is conducted along these canals by various mechanical devices, and at a cost of great labour. In Palestine the need for artificial irrigation is not so great, as is indicated by the contrast with Egypt in Dt 11¹⁰. As a rule the winter rainfall is sufficient for the ordinary cereal crops, and no special irrigation is necessary. The case is different, however, in vegetable and fruit-gardens, which would be destroyed by the long summer droughts. They are always established near natural supplies of water, which is made to flow from the source (either directly, or raised, when necessary, by a sakiyeh or endless chain of buckets worked by a horse, ox, or donkey) into little channels ramifying through the garden. When the channels are, as often, simply dug in the earth, they can be stopped or diverted with the foot, as in the passage quoted. Artificial water-pools for gardens are referred to in Ec 2⁶. A storage-pool is an almost universal feature in such gardens. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

IR-SHEMESH.—See BETH-SHEMESH, No. 1.

IRU.—The eldest son of Caleb (1 Ch 4¹⁸). The correct name is probably Ir, the -u being simply the conjunction 'and' coupling it with the following name Elah.

ISAAC.—Son of Abraham and Sarah. The meaning of the name is 'he laugheth,' and several reasons for bestowing it are suggested (Gn 17¹⁷ 18¹³ 21⁶). The narrative as it occurs in Scripture was derived from three principal sources. J supplied Gn 18¹⁰⁻¹⁵ 21¹⁻⁷ 24 25¹⁻¹¹ 26 and the bulk of 27; to E may be attributed 22¹⁻¹⁴ with 27¹¹⁻¹⁷. 20-22; while P was responsible for 25¹⁹⁻²⁶ 27¹⁸⁻²⁹ 35²⁷⁻²⁹. Apparent discrepancies in the story, such as that Isaac, on his deathbed (27¹⁻⁴), blessed Jacob, and yet did not die until many years afterwards (35²⁷), are evidently due to original differences of tradition, which later editors were not careful to remove. Viewed as coming from independent witnesses, they present no serious difficulty, and do not destroy the verisimilitude of the story. In outline the narrative describes Isaac as circumcised when eight days old (21⁴), and as spending his early youth with his father at Beersheba. Thence he was taken to 'the land of Moriah,' to be offered up as a burnt-offering at the bidding of God; and if Abraham's unquestioning faith is the primary lesson taught (22¹² 26⁶, He 11¹⁷⁻¹⁹), Isaac's child-like confidence in his father is yet conspicuous, with the associated sense of security. His mother died when he was thirty-six years of age; and Abraham sent a servant to fetch a wife for Isaac from amongst his kindred in Mesopotamia, according to Gn 24, where the religious spirit is as noticeable as the idyllic tone. For many years the couple were childless; but at length Isaac's prayers were heard, and Rebekah gave birth to the twins, Esau and Jacob. Famine and drought made it necessary for Isaac to shift his encampment to Gerar (26¹), where a story similar to that of Abraham's repudiation of Sarah is told of him (ch. 20; cf. 12¹⁰⁻²⁰). The tradition was evidently a popular one, and may have found currency in several versions, though there is no actual impossibility in the imitation by the son of the father's device. Isaac's prosperity aroused the envy of the Philistine herdsmen (26³⁰⁻³¹) amongst whom he dwelt, and eventually he withdrew again to Beersheba (26³²). He appears next as a decrepit and dying man (27¹⁻⁴), whose blessing, intended for Esau (25²⁸ 27⁴), was diverted by Rebekah upon Jacob. When the old man discovered the mistake, he was agitated at the deception practised upon him, but was unable to do more than predict for Esau a wild and independent career. To protect Jacob from his brother's resentment Isaac sent him away to obtain a wife from his mother's kindred in Paddan-aram (28²), and repeated the benediction. The next record belongs to a period twenty-one years later, unless the paragraph (35²⁷⁻²⁹) relates to a visit Jacob made to his home in the interval. It states that Isaac died at Hebron at the age of 180. He was buried by his sons in the cave of Machpelah (49³).

Isaac is a less striking personality than his father. Deficient in the heroic qualities, he suffered in disposition from an excess of mildness and the love of quiet. His passion for 'savory meat' (25²⁸ 27⁴) was probably a tribal failing. He was rather shifty and timid in his relations with Abimelech (26¹⁻²), too easily imposed upon, and not a good ruler of his household,—a gracious and kindly but not a strong man. In 26⁶ he is subordinated to Abraham, and blessed for his sake; but the two are more frequently classed together (Ex 24³⁻⁴, Mt 8¹¹ 22², Ac 3¹³ et al.), and in Am 7⁹. 16 'Isaac' is used as a synonym for Israel. If therefore the glory of Isaac was partly derived from the memory of his greater father, the impression made upon posterity by his almost instinctive trust in God (Gn 22⁷⁻⁸) and by the prevailing strength of his devotion (25²¹) was deep and abiding. Jacob considered piety and reverent awe as specially characteristic of his father (31¹²⁻¹³), where 'the Fear of Isaac' means the God tremblingly adored by him). The submission of Isaac plays a part, although a less important one than the faith of Abraham, in the NT references (He 11¹⁷, Ja 2²¹). R. W. MOSS.

ISAIAH.—Of the four prophets of the 8th cent. B.C., some of whose prophecies are preserved in the OT, Isaiah appeared third in the order of time—some twenty years after Amos preached at Bethel, and a few years after Hosea had begun, but before he had ceased, to prophesy. Isaiah's prophetic career apparently began before, but closed after, that of Micah. Hosea was a native of the Northern Kingdom, and addressed himself mainly, if not exclusively, to his own people. Amos was a native of Judah, but prophesied in and to Israel; and thus Isaiah is the earliest of these four prophets who addressed himself primarily to Judah, and even he in his earlier years, like his fellow-countryman Amos, prophesied also against Israel (see Is 9⁷⁻¹⁰ 58⁶⁻¹⁰ 17¹⁻¹¹).

Our knowledge of the life and teaching of Isaiah rests on the book that bears his name, which, however, is not a book compiled by him, but one containing, together with other matter, such of his prophecies as have been preserved, and narratives relating to him; see, in detail, next article.

Isaiah received the call to be a prophet 'in the year that king Uzziah (or Azariah) died' (Is 6¹). The year is not quite certain. If Azariah king of Judah and the Azriah king of Jaudi mentioned in Tiglath-pileser's annals of the year 738 be identical, Isaiah's call cannot be placed earlier than 738. But if the identification be not admitted, and it is by no means certain, his call may with more probability be placed a few years earlier. His activity extended at least down to the invasion of Sennacherib in 701, and some years later, if the theory be correct that chs. 36-39 refer to two invasions of Sennacherib, of which that in 701 was the first. In any case Isaiah's public career covered at the least close on forty years, whence we may infer that, like Jeremiah (Jer 1⁹), he became a prophet in early life. Unlike his contemporary Micah, his life, so far as we can trace it, was spent in Jerusalem. Not improbably he was a man of rank, at least he had easy access to the king (Is 7¹⁶), and was on terms of intimacy with persons of high position (8³). His father's name, Amoz, has in Hebrew no resemblance to that of the prophet Amos. Isaiah was married, and his wife is termed the prophetess (8³). Like Hosea, he gave to his children, Shear-jashub (7²) and Maher-shalal-hash-baz (8³), names which briefly stated characteristic elements in his teaching; his own name, though of a normal and frequent Hebrew type, also happened to have a significance ('help of Jahweh' or 'Jahweh helps') of which he could have made use; that he actually did so we may perhaps infer from 8¹⁸, if we do not rather interpret that statement, so far as Isaiah himself is concerned, of such symbolic conduct as that which he pursued when he went 'half-clad and bare-foot' (ch. 20).

It is impossible either to construct a complete biography of the prophet or to trace with any elaboration developments in his thought and teaching. His prophecies have obviously not come down to us in chronological order, and many are without any clear indication of the date when they were delivered; any attempt to date accurately much of the material must therefore be exceedingly uncertain, and the numerous attempts that have been made naturally differ widely in their results. But there are four periods at which we can clearly trace the prophet and his thought or teaching: these are the time of his call, about B.C. 740 (ch. 6); of the Syro-Ephraimitish War (B.C. 735-734: 7¹-8¹⁸); of the siege of Ashdod in B.C. 711 (ch. 20); and of the invasion of Sennacherib in B.C. 701 (chs. 36-39). The last-mentioned narratives are, however, of a later age than that of Isaiah, and require to be carefully used.

At the time of his call Isaiah became conscious that he was to be a teacher whose primary task was to warn his people of judgment to come, of judgment which was to issue in the extermination of his nation (6¹⁰⁻¹²—the last clause is absent from the LXX, and probably not original). This judgment of Jahweh on His people was to be executed by means of Assyria, which, since the accession of Tiglath-pileser in 745, had entered on a course of conquest, and, as early as 740, had achieved marked success in Northern Syria. The causes of this coming judgment, Isaiah, like Amos before him, and not improbably in part owing to the influence on him of the teaching of Amos, found in the prevalent social and moral disorder (see e.g. 2⁴-4¹ 5¹⁻²⁴ for the kind of offences which he denounced), in the ingratitude (e.g. 1³ 5¹⁻⁷) of the people to Jahweh, and in their failure to trust Him or to understand that what He required was not sacrifice, which was offered by the people in wearisome abundance, but justice and humanity (cf. e.g. 1²⁻²¹). In this teaching, as in his lofty conception of God, Isaiah did not fundamentally advance beyond the already lofty moral and religious standpoint of Amos and Hosea, though there are naturally enough differences in the details of the presentation. But, so far as we can see, he exercised a more direct, immediate, and decisive influence, owing to the fact that over a long period of years he was able to apply this teaching to the changing political conditions, insisting, for example, at the several political crises mentioned above, that the duty of Jahweh's people was to trust in Jahweh, and not in political alliances, whether with Assyria, Egypt, or Ethiopia (cf. e.g. 7¹⁻⁹ 20, and [in B.C. 701] 30¹⁻⁶ 31¹⁻⁹); and to the fact that from the first he set about the creation of a society of disciples who were to perpetuate his teaching (cf. 8¹⁸).

Although judgment to come was the fundamental note of Isaiah's teaching, there was another note that marked it from the outset: Israel-Judah was to perish, but a remnant was to survive. This at least seems to be the significance of the name of Shear-jashub, who must have been born very shortly after the call, since in 735 he was old enough to accompany his father on his visit to Ahaz (7³). Beyond the judgment, moreover, he looked forward to a new Jerusalem, righteous and faithful (1²⁶). How much further was Isaiah's doctrine of the future developed? Was he the creator of those ideas more particularly summed up in the term 'Messianic,' which exercised so powerful an influence in the later periods of Judaism, and which are doubtless among those most intimately connected with the prophet in the minds of the majority of students of the Bible? In particular, was the vision (9¹⁻⁶) of the Prince of Peace with world-wide dominion his? Or, to take another detail, did he hold that Zion itself was invincible, even though hostile hosts should approach it? These are questions that have been raised and have not yet received a decisive answer. On the one hand, it is exceedingly probable that in the several collections of the ancient prophecies later passages of promise have in some instances been added to earlier prophecies of judgment; that later prophecy in general is fuller than the earlier of promises; and that several of the Messianic passages, in particular, in the Book of Isaiah, stand isolated and disconnected from passages which bear unmistakably the impress of Isaiah or his age. On the other hand, Isaiah's belief in a remnant, which seems secured (apart from individual and perhaps doubtful passages) by the name of his son, forms a certain and perhaps a sufficient basis for the more elaborate details of the future. Further, from the very fact that they deal with the future, the passages in question, even if they were by Isaiah, might naturally bear less unmistakable evidence of their age than those which deal with the social and political conditions of his own time. And again, had Isaiah prophesied exclusively of judgment and destruction, we might have expected to find his name coupled with Micah's in Jer 26¹⁸.

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF.—See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, No. 6.

ISAIAH, BOOK OF.—The Book of Isaiah is one of the four great collections of Hebrew prophecies. Like the book of 'The Twelve Prophets'—another of these great collections (see MICAH [BOOK OF])—it was formed by incorporating with one another smaller and earlier collections, and contains prophecies of many prophets living at different periods; with the exception of Isaiah's, the prophecies contained in the collection are anonymous, the term 'Deutero-Isaiah,' applied to the author of chs. 40-66 (or 40-55), being of course nothing more than a modern symbol for one of these anonymous writers.

1. Composition and literary history of the present book.—The Book of Isaiah, substantially as we now have it, probably dates, like the 'Book of the Twelve Prophets,' from towards the end of the 3rd cent. B.C. But the external evidence is scanty and some of it ambiguous; and the internal evidence of certain sections is differently interpreted; if, as the interpretation of Duhm and Marti would require us to infer, ch. 33 and ch. 34 f. were not written till towards the middle of the 2nd cent., and chs. 24–27 not until after B.C. 128, it is obvious that the collection which contains these sections did not attain its present form and size till some (possibly considerable) time later than B.C. 128.

The most important piece of external evidence is contained in Sir 48²²⁻²⁴. In this passage the author, writing about B.C. 180, refers to Isaiah as one of the godly men of Israel, worthy of praise, and, as afterwards (49⁶⁻⁸) in the case of Ezekiel and of Jeremiah, he cites, or alludes to, certain sections which now stand in the book that bears the prophet's name. Thus he says: v. 22 'For Hezekiah did that which was pleasing to the Lord, and was strong in the ways of David his father, which Isaiah the prophet commanded, who was great and faithful in his vision'; v. 23 'In his days the sun went backward; and he added life to the king'; v. 24 'By a spirit of might he saw the end, and comforted the mourners in Sion'; v. 25 'For ever he declared the things that should be, and hidden things before they came.' Possibly the last clause of v. 22 refers to the title 'The vision of Isaiah' (Is 1¹); certainly v. 23 refers to the narrative of Is 38 (= 2 K 20), and v. 24¹ shows familiarity with the recurrent arguments from prophecy in Is 44–48 (see e.g. 41²¹⁻²⁴ 43² 46⁹ 48⁴⁵), while v. 25¹ is somewhat clearly reminiscent of the actual phraseology of 40¹ 61².³ Though it would be possible to invent somewhat different explanations of these facts, much the most probable inference is that, by the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., some (if not all) of the prophecies in chs. 1–35 had already been brought into a book, and to these had been appended, not necessarily or even probably at the same time, (a) chs. 36–39, (b) chs. 40–66 (or the most part thereof), and that the whole book at this time was attributed to Isaiah. Actual citations from the Book of Isaiah by name, which would help to prove the extent of the book at given periods, are not numerous before the 1st cent. A.D., when we find several in the NT: 1⁹ is cited in Ro 9²⁰; 6⁹ in Mt 13¹⁴, Jn 12⁴⁰, Ac 28²⁵; 9¹ in Mt 41⁴⁵; 10²¹ in Ro 9²⁷; 11¹⁰ in Ro 15¹²; 29¹³ in Mk 7¹; 40²⁻⁴ in (Mk 13) Mt 3²; 42¹⁻⁴ in Mt 12¹⁷⁻²¹; 53¹ 4. 7¹ in Ro 10¹⁶, Mt 8¹⁷, Ac 8³⁰ 22¹; 61¹ in Lk 4¹⁷⁻¹⁹; 65¹ in Ro 10²⁶. There are also some twenty-five unnamed citations in NT (Swete, Introd. to OT in Greek, 385 f.), some of which, like the unnamed citations from the Greek text of Is 31⁰ and 44²⁰ in Wis 21² 15¹⁰ (about B.C. 50), are taken in conjunction with the named citations, not without significance. Still, rigorous proof that the Book of Isaiah contained all that it now contains much before the final close of the Canon (see CANON OF OT), is wanting. The general considerations which, taken in conjunction with the proof afforded by Sir 48¹⁷⁻²⁵ that (most or all of) chs. 40–66 ranked as Isaiah's as early as B.C. 180, make it wisest, falling strong evidence to the contrary, to reckon with the probability that by about that time the book was substantially of the same extent as at present, are (a) the history of the formation of the Canon (see CANON OF OT), and (b) the probability, created by the allusions in the prologue (about B.C. 132) to Sirach to translations of prophecies, that our present Greek version dates from before 132. This version appears to proceed from a single age or hand, and yet it is, apart from brief glosses, of the same extent as the present Hebrew text of the book.

If we may adopt the most natural inference from 2 Ch 36²²—Ezr 1¹, external evidence would go far to prove that chs. 40–66 were not included in the Book of Isaiah much before the close of the 3rd cent. B.C. For the Chronicler here attributes the prophecy of Cyrus, which forms so conspicuous a feature of Is 40–48 (see 41¹ 43²⁴⁻⁴⁵, and esp. compare 2 Ch 36²² with Is 43²³), not to Isaiah but to Jeremiah, which he would scarcely have done if in his time (not earlier than B.C. 300) these anonymous chapters were already incorporated in a book entitled Isaiah. If we reject this inference, we are thrown back entirely on the evidence of the Book of Isaiah itself for the determination of the earliest date at which it can have been compiled.

Turning then to the internal evidence, we note first the structure of the book: (a) chs. 1–35—prophecies, some of which are attributed to Isaiah (1¹ 2¹ etc.), interspersed with narratives by or about Isaiah (chs. 6, 7, 8, 20); (b) chs. 36–39—historical narratives of the life and times of Isaiah, identical in the main with 2 K 18–20; (c) chs. 40–66—anonymous prophecies. Comparison with the Book of Jeremiah, which concludes with a chapter (52) about the times of Jeremiah derived from 2 K 24¹⁸, suggests that our present book has resulted from the union of a prophetic volume, consisting (in the main) of prophecies by or attributed to Isaiah, with an historical appendix and a book of anonymous prophecies. This union, as we have seen above, took place before B.C. 180; if any parts of chs. 1–39 are later than this, their presence in the book is due to subsequent interpolation.

If it were possible to write a full history of the literary process which culminated in the Book of Isaiah as we now have it, it would be necessary to trace in detail first the growth of chs. 1–39, then that of chs. 40–66, and lastly the causes which led to the union of the two. But this is not possible; in particular, we do not know whether chs. 40–66 were added to chs. 1–39 owing to the triumph of an Isaianic theory over the Jeremianic theory or tradition of the origin of these chapters (2 Ch 36²²; see above), or whether, as some have supposed, they were added to make the Book of Isaiah more nearly equal in size to the other prophetic collections—Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and the Twelve—with the result that as early as B.C. 180 these chapters came to be attributed to Isaiah; or whether something else, which we cannot conjecture, was the real cause of this union. But, apart from internal evidence pointing to the different periods in which different sections originated, certain indications of the complexity of the literary process do exist, particularly in the case of chs. 1–39; these we may consider. (1) The matter is not arranged chronologically; the call (cf. Ezk 1, Jer 1) of Isaiah, which naturally preceded any of his prophecies, is recorded not in ch. 1, but in ch. 6. Similarly, in the Koran the record of Mohammed's call does not occur till Sura 96; in this case the reason is that the editors of the Koran followed the rather mechanical principle of arranging the suras according to their size. The cause of the order in the case of the Book of Isaiah may in part be found in the fact that (2) the occurrence of several titles and indications of different principles of editorial arrangement points to the fact that chs. 1–35 (39) is a collection of material, some of which had previously acquired a fixed arrangement; in other words, chs. 1–35 is a book formed not entirely, or perhaps even mainly, by the collection and free re-arrangement of prophetic pieces, but rather by the incorporation whole of earlier and smaller books. Following these clues, we may first divide these chapters thus: (1) ch. 1 with title (v. 1), probably intended to cover the larger collection; (2) chs. 2–12 with title 2¹; (3) chs. 13–23 with title 13¹ naming Isaiah, and corresponding sub-titles not mentioning Isaiah, in 15¹ 17¹ 19¹ 21¹ 22¹ 23¹ (cf. elsewhere 30¹); (4) chs. 24–27, distinguished from the preceding sections by the absence of titles, and from the following by the absence of the opening interjection; (5) chs. 28–31 (33)—a group of woes; see 28¹ 29¹ (RV 'Ho' represents the same Hebrew word that is translated 'Woe' in 28¹ etc.); 30¹ 31¹ 33¹; (6) chs. 34, 35, which, like chs. 24–27, are without title. Some even of these sections seem to have arisen from the union of still smaller and earlier booklets. Thus it is reasonable to suppose that ch. 6 once formed the commencement of a booklet; again, chs. 2–4 are prophecies of judgment enclosed between Messianic prophecies 22-7 and 42-6; ch. 5 contains a brief group of 'Woes' (vv. 8, 11, 18, 20, 21, 22).

It is impossible to enter into details here as to the dates when these several booklets first appeared, or as to the various processes of union or re-arrangement or interpolation or other modifications. Merely to state theories which have been put forward, without adducing proof or offering criticism, would require more space than is available. And from the nature of the case it would be impossible to offer any complete theory that would not be in many respects uncertain. It is more important to appreciate the general fact, which is clear, that the Book of Isaiah is the result of a long and complex literary history, than to be ready to subscribe to any particular theory of this history. But two points may be briefly touched on. (1) Much of the literary process just referred to lies after the Exile. As will be shown below, chs. 40-55 were not written till the last years of the Exile; chs. 56-66 are certainly of no earlier, and probably of later, origin. The union of chs. 1-39 and 40-66 cannot therefore fall before the close of the Exile, and, as shown above, it need not, so far as the external evidence is concerned, fall much before B.C. 180. But even 1-39 was not a volume of pre-exilic origin; for the appendix 36-39 is derived from Kings, which was not completed till, at the earliest, B.C. 561 (cf. 2 K 25²⁷), or even in what may be regarded as its first edition (cf. Driver, LOT, 189) before about B.C. 600. On this ground alone, then, the completion of chs. 1-39, by the inclusion of the appendix 36-39, cannot be placed earlier than the Exile, and should probably be placed later. It must indeed be placed later, unless we regard all the sections in chs. 1-35 which are of post-exilic origin (see below) as interpolations rather than as what, in many cases at least, they probably are, original parts of the booklets incorporated in chs. 1-39. Thus chs. 2-12 and 13-23 (apart from subsequent interpolations or amplifications) as they lay before the editor who united them, probably owed their form to post-exilic editors. (2) The earliest stage of this long literary process falls in the lifetime of Isaiah (c. B.C. 740-701). But even in its earliest stage the literary process was not uniform. In chs. 6 and 8¹⁻⁵ we have what there is no reason to question are pieces of Isaiah's autobiography; Isaiah here speaks of himself in the first person. Chs. 7 and 20 may have the same origin, the fact that Isaiah is here referred to in the third person being perhaps in that case due to an editor; or these chapters may be drawn from early biographies of the prophet by a disciple. Thus chs. 1, 2-12, 13-23 and 28-33 consist in large part of prophetic poems or sayings of Isaiah; many of them were (presumably) written as well as spoken by Isaiah himself, others we not improbably owe to the memory of his disciples. There is no reason for believing that the present arrangement of this matter, even within the several booklets, goes back to Isaiah himself; the division into chapters and verses is of course of very much later origin, and in several cases does violence to the original connexion, either by uniting, as in ch. 5, originally quite distinct pieces, or dividing, as in the case of 9⁸⁻¹⁰, what formed an undivided whole. Justice can be done to the prophetic literature only when the brevity of the several pieces is recognized, instead of being obscured by treating several distinct pieces as a single discourse. Unfortunately, we have not for the teaching of Isaiah, as for that of Jesus, a triple tradition. But the analogy of the diverse treatment of the same sayings in the different Gospels may well warn us that sayings which lie side by side (as e.g. in 5⁸⁻²⁹) in the Book of Isaiah were not necessarily spoken in immediate succession.

But how far, if not in the order in which he spoke or wrote them, have the words of Isaiah reached us substantially as he spoke them. The question is not altogether easy to answer, particularly in one respect. Isaiah was pre-eminently a prophet of judgment; but intermingled with his warnings are many passages of promise: see e.g. 2²⁻⁴ and 42⁶, enclosing 27-41, ⁹ concluding the warnings of ch. 8, and the constant interchange of warning and promise in chs. 28-31. Are these passages of promise Isaiah's, or the work of some later writers with which later editors sought to comfort as well as to exhort their readers? These questions in general, and in detail with reference to each particular passage, are still far from settled. The general question of Messianic prophecy in Isaiah is briefly referred to in preceding art.; for details see Cheyne's Introd. to the Book of Isaiah, or commentaries such as those of Duhm and Marti, or, on a smaller scale and in English, of Whitehouse. Here this alone can be said: the period over which and down to which the history of the growth of the Book of Isaiah extends, and the complexity of that growth, would easily allow of these passages being incorporated as suggested by the theory; and we have the presumption created, for example, by the absence of the last clause of ch. 6 from the Greek text, that short consolatory annotations were still being made as late as the 2nd cent. B.C. Once the significance of the complexity of the Book of Isaiah is grasped, this at least should become clear, that the question, Is such and such a passage authentic? meaning, Was it written by Isaiah? proceeds from a wrong point of view. The proper question is this: To what period does such and such a passage in this collection of prophecies, made certainly after the Exile and probably not much before the close of the 3rd cent. B.C., belong?

The presence of explanatory annotations is now generally recognized. For example, in 7²⁰ Isaiah speaks figuratively of Jahweh using a razor; an editor added a note, which has intruded into the text, that by 'razor' we are to understand the king of Assyria. As to the number of such annotations scholars differ.

2. Summary.—The following summary of the Book of Isaiah and of the periods at which its several parts appear, or have been supposed, to have been written, must be used in the light of the foregoing account of the origin of the book. In the clearer cases the evidence of date is briefly indicated; in others one or two theories are mentioned. But for the evidence, such as it is, the reader must turn to larger works; it would require more space than the scope of the article allows, even to summarize it here. Again, in the majority of cases no attempt is made to indicate the smaller annotations of which an example is given in the preceding paragraph. For a synthesis (in part) of those sections of the book which consist of Isaiah's prophecies, see ISAIAH; and in connexion with chs. 40-55, consult art. SERVANT OF THE LORD.

1¹. Title.—Probably prefixed by an editor who brought together a considerable collection of Isaiah's prophecies. 'The days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah' describe the entire period of Isaiah's activity.

12-31. Till comparatively recently this was generally regarded as a single discourse, constituting, as Ewald terms it, the 'great arraignment.' But there was no agreement as to the period of Isaiah's lifetime to which it belonged,—some scholars referring it to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitish War (cf. ch. 7), almost at the beginning, others to the time of Sennacherib's invasion at the close, of Isaiah's career. If, as is really probable, this is not a single discourse, these differences are in part accounted for. The chapter falls into these sections—(a) vv. 1-17, which may perhaps itself consist of two distinct pieces, vv. 1-9 and vv. 10-17; (b) vv. 18-20, perhaps consisting of distinct sayings, namely, v. 18 and vv. 19-20; (c) vv. 21-28; (d) vv. 27-31, which again, as some think, are two fragments—v. 27¹⁻² and vv. 27-31. Of these sections (a) and (c) are distinct prophetic poems of Isaiah complete in themselves, (a) dating probably from 701, since the terms of vv. 17, 27 are better accounted for by the Assyrian invasion of that year than by that of the Syro-Ephraimitish army in 735; (c) perhaps from about 705. The short sayings of (b) and the fragment (d) are more difficult to date; (d) has been regarded by some as a denunciation of the Northern Kingdom, and therefore delivered before B.C. 722; by others as a post-exilic passage of promise (v. 27¹).

2¹. Title of a collection of Isaianic prophecies.

2²⁻⁴¹. The main body of this section, consisting of a poem announcing the near advent of the 'day of Jahweh' against 'everything proud and lifted up' (25²⁻²¹), another (31¹⁻¹⁵) describing the imminent social disintegration of Judah, and tracing its cause to the moral condition of the nation, and a third denouncing the light and luxurious ladies of Jerusalem (31¹⁻¹⁵), the catalogue in prose of 31¹⁻¹⁵ being perhaps an interpolation), appears to preserve the earlier teaching of Isaiah. It has been thought that in 26²⁻¹³ Isaiah writes with the experience of the great earthquake (Zec 14¹⁻⁴) of Uzziah's time fresh in mind, and that 31² contains an allusion to Ahaz (died ? 728) as the reigning king. The section, like the Book of Amos (Am 9¹⁻¹⁵), was provided by an editor (cf. 4¹ and 31¹), as many think, rather than by Isaiah himself, with a consolatory conclusion. The opening poem (25²⁻⁴), if not, as some still consider, Isaiah's, was incorporated by an editor. It is also included in the Book of the Twelve (Mic 4¹⁻⁴; see MICAH).

Ch. 5. Of independent origin are vv. 1-7. 8-24. 25-30. Vv. 1-7. The parabolic song of the vineyard pointing to the coming rejection by Jahweh of unworthy and ungrateful Judah. The song is Isaiah's, but whether composed early or late in his career is disputed. Vv. 8-24: six, perhaps originally seven, 'Woes'—some of them fragments. These cannot easily be dated, nor are they necessarily all of the same date; they may owe their present arrangement to an editor rather than to Isaiah. Vv. 25-30: the refrain of v. 25 connects this with 9⁸⁻¹⁰, of which poem it probably formed the last strophe.

Ch. 6. Isaiah's own record of his call in the year of Uzziah's death (v. c. 740±), written perhaps some years later. 7¹⁻¹⁵. Narratives (in part, and originally perhaps wholly, autobiographical) relating to prophecies delivered during the Syro-Ephraimitish War in b.c. 734. In detail: 7¹⁻¹⁵, Isaiah's interview with Ahaz; the sign of Immanuel (7¹⁴); v. 15, perhaps interpolated; 7¹⁷⁻²⁵, somewhat fragmentary, and probably not the immediate continuation of 7¹⁻¹⁵; 8¹⁻⁴, two signs indicating that Syria and Ephraim will perish before Assyria; vv. 5-8, Judah, not having trusted in Jahweh, will also suffer, and (vv. 9-10) so will the nations that oppose Judah; vv. 11-15, Jahweh the only real and true object of fear; vv. 16-18, the conclusion—his disciples are to persevere and witness to what he has said.

9⁸⁻¹⁰ with 5²⁵ (26¹⁻³⁰). A carefully constructed poem of five strophes of nearly (and perhaps in its original form of exactly) equal length, marked off from one another by the refrain in 9². 17. 21. 10⁴ (5²⁵). It belongs to Isaiah's early period (about b.c. 735), and deals with the collapse of the Northern Kingdom, Ephraim, before the Assyrians, who, without being named, are vigorously described in 5²⁵⁻³⁰.

10⁶⁻²⁷. Assyria will be punished for its pride and misunderstanding of the purpose for which Jahweh used it. Date much disputed; probably only in part the work of Isaiah.

10²⁸⁻³². A dramatic idyll portraying an (imaginary) Assyrian descent on Jerusalem. The period in Isaiah's lifetime to which it could best be referred is 701.

10³³⁻³⁴. Appended to the preceding poem, and pointing out that Assyria will perish just outside the city on which it has descended.

Ch. 11. Messianic prophecies: (a) vv. 1-9, description of the new prince of the house of Jesse (David), and of the ideal conditions that will exist under his reign; (b) v. 9; (c) vv. 11-16, the restoration of Jewish exiles. The last section clearly seems to be post-exilic; for it presupposes the exile on an extensive scale not only of Israelites, which might be explained by the events of b.c. 722, but also of Jews, which can be satisfactorily explained only by the captivity of 597 and 586. The first section must also date from after 586, if the figure of the felled tree in v. 1 implies that the Davidic monarchy has ceased.

Ch. 12. A psalm of thanksgiving. If most of the psalms in the Psalter (see PSALMS) are later in origin than the age of Isaiah, this psalm probably is so likewise.

13-23. The 'Book of Oracles' (AV 'Burdens'). The 'intitled sections, 14²⁸⁻³² (14²⁸⁻³²) 17¹²⁻¹⁴ 18. 20, which deal with Judah, as contrasted with most of the Oracles, which are against the foreign nations, perhaps formed no part of the original book.

13¹⁻¹⁴. The fall of Babylon (13¹⁹ 14³⁻²²). The section contains two poems (13²⁻²² and 14¹⁵⁻²²) in the same rhythm as is used in the elegies of the Book of Lamentations; between the poems, and at the close of the second, are short prose passages (14¹⁻¹⁴ 22¹⁻⁴). The section throughout presupposes conditions resembling those presupposed in chs. 40-55, and is, as certainly as that section, to be referred not to Isaiah, but to a writer living after 586, when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans (cf. 13¹⁹), whose king was king of Babylon (cf. 14¹). To the Assyrians, who play so conspicuous a part in Isaiah's prophecies, there is naturally no allusion; for with the fall of Nineveh about b.c. 606 the Assyrians ceased to count, and Babylon, which in Isaiah's time was subject to Assyria, here figures as possessed of world-wide dominion. Again, the point of the prophecy in 14¹⁻¹⁵ is to be observed: it is restoration from exile; the Exile itself is, for this writer, an existing fact, which of course it was not for Isaiah. From the allusion to the Medes (13¹⁷) only, and not to the Persians or to Cyrus, it has commonly been inferred that this section is somewhat earlier than 40-55, and was written about b.c. 549.

14²⁴⁻²⁷. A short prophecy, perhaps of the year 701, predicting the overthrow of the Assyrian invaders of Judah—14²⁸⁻³². Philistia warned: according to the title, delivered in the year that Ahaz died (? b.c. 728). Neither this date nor even the Isaianic authorship of the passage is universally admitted.

Chs. 15. 16. The fate of Moab. The prophecy is provided with an epilogue, 16¹⁹, written at a later date (and not claiming to be by the author of the prophecy), explaining that what was predicted long ago will be fulfilled within three years. In style the prophecy is very generally admitted to be singularly unlike that of the better attested prophecies of Isaiah; it is therefore either attributed to an anonymous prophet who was earlier than Isaiah, and, as some think, lived in the reign of Jeroboam II., the epilogue in this case being regarded as Isaiah's (though it contains nothing very characteristic of Isaiah), or the prophecy as well as the epilogue is assigned to a writer later than Isaiah. Much of the material of 15¹⁻¹⁶ appears to be worked up from older material, and some of it is in turn used again in Jer 48⁵. 29-38.

17¹⁻¹¹. The impending fall of Damascus, Syria, and Ephraim (cf. 7-8²); a prophecy of Isaiah's before the fall of Damascus in b.c. 732.

17¹²⁻¹⁴. The roar of hostile nations (presumably in the Assyrian army) advancing, which are to be suddenly dispersed. Date uncertain.

Ch. 18. A difficult prophetic poem containing much that is exceedingly obscure; it is commonly understood to embody Isaiah's disapproval of accepting proffered Ethiopian assistance; if this be correct, it may be assigned to some time between 704-701.

19¹⁻¹⁸. Jahweh's judgment on Egypt, which will take the form of civil discord (v. 2), foreign dominion (v. 4), and social distress. Vv. 16-22, the conversion of Egypt, which, together with Assyria, will worship Jahweh. Date of both sections much disputed; assigned by some to Isaiah and to the time of the defeat of the Egyptians by Sargon (? v. 2) at Raphia in 720. Many question the Isaianic authorship, especially of vv. 16-22, and some see in v. 18 an allusion to the temple of Onias in Heliopolis, built about b.c. 170 (Josephus, BJ, VII. x. 2-4). See IR-HA-HERES.

Ch. 20. A narrative and prophecy showing how Isaiah insisted that it was folly to trust in the Mizrites and Cushites (Arabians, according to some, but as commonly interpreted, Egyptians and Ethiopians). The date in v. 1 corresponds to b.c. 711.

21¹⁻¹⁰. A vision of the fall of Babylon (v. 2) before Elamites (i.e. Persians) and Medes (v. 2). Like 40-55, this prophecy was written between 549, when Cyrus of Persia conquered Media, and 538, when Babylon fell before him.

21¹¹ and 21¹⁷⁻¹⁸. Brief and obscure oracles on (a) Edom; (b) some nomad tribes of Arabia.

22¹⁻¹⁴. Isaiah declares to Jerusalem, once (or, as others interpret it, now) given up to tumultuous revels (v. 2), that it has committed unpardonable sin (v. 14). Assigned by some to b.c. 711, when Sargon's troops were at Ashdod (cf. 20); by others to the time of revelry that followed Sennacherib's retreat in 701.

22¹⁵⁻²⁵. Singular among Isaiah's prophecies in that it is addressed to an individual, namely Shebna, the governor of the palace, who is threatened with disgrace, which in 701 had befallen him in so far that he then occupies the lower office of secretary (36¹ 37¹).

23¹-14. An elegiac poem, closing (v. 14) as it begins (v. 1), on the approaching fall of Phœnicia: the occasion, according to some, being the siege of Tyre (vv. 5-8) by Shalmaneser, between b.c. 727 and 723: according to others, the destruction of Sidon (vv. 2, 4, 12), in b.c. 348. After its fall Tyre will rise again and serve Jahweh (vv. 15-18); cf. 19.

Chs. 24-27. An apocalyptic vision, in which we see universal catastrophe (24¹-2), which extends to the supernatural rulers or patron angels of the nations (24²; cf. 27¹), followed by the reign of Jahweh, who to His coronation feast invites all nations; death is abolished and sorrow banished (25¹-3). The Jews, hidden during the time of judgment (26¹-27¹), return from their dispersion one and all to Jerusalem (27¹²). Interspersed are songs or hymns (25¹-5, 9-12, 26¹-19, 27²-8). Difficult of interpretation as apocalypses are wont to be, and in parts obscured by very serious textual corruption, it is yet clear that this is a post-exilic work (cf. e.g. 27¹²); and the occurrence of striking ideas, such as those of resurrection (26¹⁹), immortality (25⁵), and patron angels, which occur elsewhere in the OT only in its latest parts, suggests a relatively late point even in this period.

Chs. 28-33. A group of prophecies brought together probably by an editor on account of the similar opening of the sections with 'Woe' (see above). In this section there is a constant and remarkable alternation between menace and denunciation of Judah, and consolation of her, which at times takes the form of menace to her foes. Looked at from this standpoint, this booklet falls into the following sections, of which the references to the sections of promise are here given in brackets, 28¹-4 (28⁵ 6), 28⁷-22 (28²³-29), 29¹-8 (29⁹), and possibly parts of 29¹-7, according to interpretation, 29¹⁶ (29¹⁷-24), 30¹-17 (30¹⁸-33), 31¹-4 (31⁵-9), 32¹-8 (32⁹-14, 32¹⁵-20) (33). In some cases it will be seen that the promise follows abruptly on the threat, and considerably lessens the force of the latter. The menaces and denunciations seem clearly to be the work of Isaiah, though some question his authorship of 32¹-4 (a parallel to 3¹⁶-4¹); but of late several scholars have attributed the entire group of promises to later writers, and a larger number do not consider ch. 33 to be the work of Isaiah. In any case, the section has merely an editorial unity, and is not all of one period; 28¹-4 would appear to have been composed before the fall of Samaria in 722; the majority of the remaining menaces, particularly those which denounce the resort to Egypt for help, may best be referred to the period immediately before Sennacherib's invasion in b.c. 701.

Chs. 34, 35. The future of Edom, on whom vengeance is to be taken (34¹) for its treatment of Zion (? in 586), and the future of the Jews contrasted. Not earlier than the Exile, which is presupposed (35⁹), and probably depended on, and therefore later than, chs. 40-55.

Chs. 36-39. Cf. art. KINGS [BOOKS]. It is now generally agreed that the editor of the Book of Isaiah derived this section from 2 Kings. The only section of these chapters not found in Kings is 38⁹-20, which the editor apparently derived from a collection of liturgical poems (cf. 38²⁰). The ascription of this psalm to Hezekiah (38⁹) is much questioned.

Chs. 40-66. Once, perhaps, attributed to Jeremiah, but from the beginning of the 2nd cent. b.c. (see above) to the close of the 18th cent. a.d., these chapters were regarded as the work of Isaiah. Since the close of the 18th cent. the evidence of their later origin, which is remarkably clear, has been increasingly, till it is now generally, admitted. But till within the last 15 years the chapters were commonly regarded as a unity; now it is by many admitted that chs. 40-55 and 56-66 belong to different periods, the former to the end of the Exile, the latter (in the main) to the age of Ezra, while some carry disintegration considerably further. It is impossible to enter further into details here.

(a) Chs. 40-55. These chapters presuppose that the writer and those whom he addresses lived during the period of the Babylonian Exile; they predict as imminent the close of the Exile, and return of the Jews. In detail observe that Zion lies waste and needs rebuilding (44²⁶ 49¹⁴-21 51³ 17-22 52¹-12 54), whereas Babylon is exalted, but is shortly to be brought low (47, 48¹). Cyrus himself, mentioned by name in 44²⁸ 45¹, and quite clearly referred to in 41²⁶, is not the subject of prediction; he is already well known to the prophet and his audience (or readers); his future career is predicted. By observing what part of Cyrus' career was already over, and what still future to the prophet as he wrote, his book can be dated somewhat precisely. Cyrus appeared shortly before 550 in Persia to the E. of Babylon; in 549 he conquered Media to the N. of Babylon, and in 538 he captured Babylon.

Is 41²⁸ refers to Cyrus as ruling both to the N. and E.; the prophet then writes after the conquest of Media; but he predicts the fall of Babylon, and therefore writes before that event. Between 549 and 538, and probably nearer the latter date, the prophecy was written.

Speaking generally, chs. 40-55 are dominated by one ruling purpose, namely, to rouse the exiles out of their despondency, and to fire them with enthusiasm for what the writer regards as their future destiny, the instruction of the world in Jahweh's ways and will,—in a word, in true religion. For this purpose he emphasizes and illustrates the omnipotence and omniscience of Jahweh, and the futility of the gods of the nations. Again, the passages dealing with the 'Servant of the Lord' (wh. see) are but one form in which he develops his main theme; for the Servant is Israel. The only sins of the people on which his purpose allows him to lay stress are those of despondency and unbelief; he is aware, indeed, that there have been other sins in the past, but as to these his message is that they are pardoned (40²). These chapters, then, though the progress of thought in them may be less in a straight line than circular, are closely knit together. But when we turn to—

(b) Chs. 56-66, the contrast is great: this may be seen by a brief summary. Thus (1) 56¹-8 describes the terms on which the eunuch and the foreigner may be admitted to the Jewish community, and enforces the observance of the Sabbath; (2) 56⁹-57²¹ describes and denounces an existing state of society in which the watchmen of the people are neglectful, from which the righteous perish, and in which the people generally resort to various illegitimate rites; (3) denunciation of people sedulous in fasting, but given to inhumanity and (cf. 56¹-8) profanation of the Sabbath; (4) 59, a denunciation similar to the preceding, followed (vv. 10-21) by a theophany in which Jahweh appears as a man of war (cf. 63¹-5); (5) chs. 60-62, the future glory of Zion; (6) 63¹-6, Jahweh's day of vengeance against Edom (cf. ch. 34); (7) 63⁷-64, a liturgical confession; (8) the contrasted characters and destinies of the apostates and the loyal; the idolatrous cults (cf. 56⁹-57²¹) of the former.

The difference of outlook, subject, and treatment between chs. 40-55 and chs. 56-66 is obvious, and must not be disregarded. In itself such difference need not necessarily imply difference of authorship, though it certainly suggests that we have to do with different works, even if of the same author, written with a different purpose and under different conditions. And there are other facts which confirm this suggestion. Thus a number of passages on the most obvious and natural, if not the only possible, interpretation imply the existence of the Temple and the presence of the speaker and his audience in Jerusalem, and consequently that the Exile is over (or not yet begun); see 56⁷ (cf. 44²⁸) 60⁷ [in chs. 60-62 the walls of Jerusalem require rebuilding (60⁹, cf. 61⁴), as they still did in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 1-3), but the Temple is apparently already there] 66⁷ 61³. In 57²-7 it is implied that the persons addressed are living in a country of torrent valleys and lofty hills such as Judah was and Babylon was not. The general social condition implied is more easily and naturally explained of the Jews in Palestine than in Babylon; for example, the tribunals are administered, though unjustly, by Jews (59²-3, 10), and there are 'watchmen' (prophets) and 'shepherds' (rulers).

The presence of such passages as 57²-7 was very naturally and rightly used by those who defended the unity of the Book of Isaiah as proof that the passages in question were not written in the Exile; but, of course, such passages could not annul the even clearer evidence of the exile origin of chs. 40-55. For a time other scholars saw in those parts of chs. 56-66 which imply residence in Palestine proof of the embodiment in chs. 40-66 of pre-exilic literature. But a clearer view of the history of the Book of Isaiah shows that a theory that such passages are post-exilic is equally legitimate. Whether pre-exilic or post-exilic must be determined by other considerations. The present tendency is to regard the whole of chs. 56-66 as post-exilic, and most of it, if not the whole, as belonging to the age of Ezra and Nehemiah, to which such characteristics as the stress laid on the observance of the Sabbath and the interest in the question of the admission of strangers to the community very naturally point. If this view is correct, we have, for example in 56¹ 60-62, the work of broader-minded and less exclusive contemporaries of Ezra and Nehemiah.

It is exceedingly unfortunate that the RV does not distinguish the poetical, which are by far the larger, parts of the Book of Isaiah from the prose. But this defect is made good in Cheyne's translation (Polychrome Bible), which must on every ground be recommended as one of the most valuable aids to the study of the book of which the English student can avail himself. Of commentaries in English, Skinner's (on the AV) and Whitehouse's (on the RV) are convenient and good. The larger commentary by Cheyne has been to some considerable extent antiquated, particularly by his own edition of the book in the Polychrome Bible, and his invaluable Introduction to the Book of Isaiah. In these works, and in, e.g., Driver's Isaiah, his Life and Times, and his LOT, and G. A. Smith's 'Isaiah' (Expositor's Bible), the student will find sufficient guidance to the extensive literature which has gathered round the Book of Isaiah.

ISCAH.—A daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah, Gn 11³⁰ (J).

ISCARIOT.—See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

ISDAEL (1 Es 5³¹) = Ezr 2⁵⁶ and Neh 7⁵⁸ Giddel.

ISHBAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4¹⁷).

ISHBAK.—A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 25² = 1 Ch 1³²). The tribe of which he is the eponym is somewhat uncertain.

ISHBI-BENOB.—One of the four Philistines of the giant stock who were slain by the mighty men of David (2 S 21¹⁶⁻¹⁷).

ISHBOSHETH.—1. The fourth son of Saul; on the death of his father and three brothers on Mt. Gilboa, he contested the throne of Israel with David for seven years. Driven by David over the Jordan, he took up his headquarters at Mahanaim, where, after having been deserted by Abner, he was murdered by two of his captains. His name is given in 1 Ch 8³³ and 9³⁹ as Esh-baal. The same variation meets us in the name of Jonathan's son—Mephibosheth or Meribbaal—and in the case of Jerubbaal or Jerubbesheth; similarly, we have Beeliada and Eliada. In 1 S 14⁴⁹ Ishbaal has become Ishvi, which in its turn is a corruption for Ishiah, or 'man of Jahweh'. The change of Ish-baal, 'man of Baal,' into Ishbosheth, 'man of the shameful thing,' is ordinarily accounted for on the supposition 'that the later religion wished to avoid the now odious term Baal.' The theory, however, is met by the difficulty that it is in the Chronicler that the form compounded with Baal occurs. Hence it has been suggested that Bosheth is the fossilized name of a Babylonian deity Bast, for which theory, however, little support is forthcoming. 2. Ishbosheth or Ishbaal is probably the true reading for Jashobeam in 1 Ch 11¹⁴ etc., which is corrupted to Josheb-basshebeth in 2 S 23⁸.

ISHHOD.—A Manassite (1 Ch 7¹⁸).

ISHI.—1. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2³¹). 2. A Judahite chief (1 Ch 4²⁰). 3. A chief of East Manasseh (1 Ch 5²⁴). 4. One of the captains of the 500 men of the tribe of Simeon who smote the Amalekites at Mt. Seir (1 Ch 4⁴²).

ISHI ('my husband').—The name which Hosea (2¹⁶) recommends Israel to apply to J^r instead of Baal ('my lord').

ISHMA.—One of the sons of Etam (1 Ch 4²).

ISHMAEL.—1. The son of Abraham by Hagar. His name, which means 'May God hear,' was decided upon before his birth (Gn 16¹¹). As in the case of the history of his mother, three documentary sources are used by the narrator. J supplied Gn 16¹¹⁻¹⁴, E 21¹⁸⁻²¹, whilst P adds such links as 16¹⁵, 17¹⁸⁻²⁷, 25⁷⁻¹⁰, 12-17. For the story of his life up to his settlement in the wilderness of Paran, the northern part of the Sinaitic peninsula, see HAGAR. At the age of thirteen he was circumcised on the same day as his father (Gn 17²⁴). In Paran he married an Egyptian wife, and became famous as an archer (21^{20f.}). No other incident is recorded, except that he was associated with his step-brother in the birth of their father (25⁹), and himself died at the age 37 (25¹⁷).

Ishmael had been resolved into a conjectural personification of the founder of a group of tribes; but the narrative is too vivid in its portrayal of incident and character, and too true in its psychological treatment, to support that view. That there is some idealization in the particulars is possible. Tribal rivalry may have undesignedly coloured the presentment of Sarah's jealousy. The little discrepancies between the documents point to a variety of human standpoints, and are as explicable upon the implication of historicity as upon the theory of personification. The note of all the recorded passions and promptings is naturalness; and the obvious intention of the narrative, with the impression produced upon an uncommitted reader, is that of an attempt at actual biography rather than at the construction of an artificial explanation of certain relationships of race.

In regard to the so-called Ishmaelites, the case is not so clear. Ishmael is represented as the father of twelve sons (Gn 25¹²⁻¹⁵, 1 Ch 1²⁹⁻³¹), and the phrase 'twelve princes according to their nations' (cf. Gn 17²⁰) almost suggests an attempt on the part of the writer at an exhibition of his view of racial origins. A further complication arises from the confusion of Ishmaelites and Midianites (37^{28f.}, Jg 8²⁴, 26), though the two are distinguished in the genealogies of Gn 25¹⁴⁻¹⁵. Branches of the descendants of the two step-brothers may have combined through similarity of habit and location, and been known sometimes by the one name, and sometimes by the other; but there was clearly no permanent fusion of the two families. Nor is it possible to say whether at any time a religious confederation of twelve tribes was formed under the name of Ishmael, or if the name was adopted, because of its prominence, for the protection of some weaker tribes. The scheme may have even less basis in history, and be but part of an ethnic theory by which the Hebrew genealogists sought to explain the relationships of their neighbours to one another, and to the Hebrews themselves. A dozen tribes, scattered over the Sinaitic peninsula and the districts east of the Jordan, because of some similarity in civilization or language, or in some cases possibly under the influence of correct tradition, are grouped as kinsmen, being sons of Abraham, but of inferior status, as being descended from the son of a handmaid. That the differences from the pure Hebrew were thought to be strongly Egyptian in their character or source, is indicated by the statement that Ishmael's mother and his wife were both Egyptians. The Ishmaelites soon disappear from Scripture. There are a few individuals described as of that nationality (1 Ch 2¹⁷ 27³⁰); but in later times the word could be used metaphorically of any hostile people (Ps 83⁶).

2. A son of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Jonathan (1 Ch 8³⁸ 9⁴⁴). 3. Ancestor of the Zebadiah who was one of Jehoshaphat's judicial officers (2 Ch 19¹¹). 4. A military officer associated with Jeholada in the revolution in favour of Joash (2 Ch 23¹). 5. A member of the royal house of David who took the principal part in the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 41¹⁻²). The story is told in Jer 40^{7-41¹⁴}, with a summary in 2 K 25²³⁻²⁶. It is probable that Ishmael resented Nebuchadnezzar's appointment of Gedaliah as governor of Judaea (Jer 40⁹) instead of some member of the ruling family, and considered him as unpatriotic in consenting to represent an alien power. Further instigation was supplied by Baalis, king of Ammon (Jer 40¹⁴), who was seeking either revenge or an opportunity to extend his dominions. Gedaliah and his retinue were killed after an entertainment given to Ishmael, who gained possession of Mizpah, the seat of government. Shortly afterwards he set out with his captives to join Baalis, but was overtaken by a body of Gedaliah's soldiers at the pool of Gibeon (Jer 41¹²), and defeated. He made good his escape (41¹⁴) with the majority of his associates; but of his subsequent life nothing is known. The conspiracy may have been prompted by motives that were in part well considered, if on the whole mistaken; but it is significant that Jeremiah supported Gedaliah (40⁶), in memory of whose murder an annual fast was observed for some years in the month Tishri (Zec 7^{8, 9, 10}). 6. One of the priests persuaded by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10²; cf. Ismael, 1 Es 9²²). R. W. Moss.

ISHMAIAH.—1. The 'ruler' of the tribe of Zebulun (1 Ch 27¹⁸). 2. One of David's 'thirty' (1 Ch 12⁴).

ISHMERAI.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8¹⁸).

ISHPAH.—The eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8¹⁶).

ISHPAN.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8²²).

ISH-SECHEL.—In Ezr 8¹⁸ it is said: 'And by the good hand of our God upon us they brought us a man of understanding, of the sons of Mahli,' where RV gives for 'man of understanding' the marginal proper name 'Ish-sechel.' That a proper name is required is certain, but whether Ish-sechel is that name is not so certain. Issachar has been suggested. W. F. Cobb.

ISHVAH.—Second son of Asher (Gn 46¹⁷, 1 Ch 7³⁰).

ISHVI.—1. Third son of Asher (Gn 46¹⁷, Nu 26⁴⁴ P, 1 Ch 7³⁰); patronymic Ishvites (Nu 26⁴⁴). 2. Second son of Saul by Abinoam (1 S 14⁴⁹).

ISLAND, ISLE.—The Heb. word 't means primarily 'coastlands,' but sometimes lands in general, and in one passage (Is 42¹⁵) 'dry land' as opposed to water. In Is 20⁶ Palestine is called 'this isle' (AV, but RV 'coastland'). The islands of the Gentiles or heathen (Gn 10⁴, Zeph 2¹¹) are apparently the coasts of the W. Mediterranean; the 'isles of the sea' (Est 10⁴, Ezk 26¹⁸ etc.) are also the Mediterranean coasts; 'the isles' (Ps 72¹⁰ etc., Is 42¹⁰ etc.) means the West generally as contrasted with the East. Tyre is mentioned as an isle in Is 23¹, and here perhaps the term may be taken literally, as Tyre was actually at that time an island. The isle of Kittim (Jer 2¹⁰, Ezk 27⁴) is probably Cyprus, and the isle of Caphtor (Jer 47⁴ mg.), Crete. In the NT five islands are mentioned: Cyprus (Ac 4³⁶ 11^{14, 15}, 13⁴ 15² 21^{3, 12} 27⁴), Crete (27^{7, 12, 13, 21}), Claudia (v. 16), Melita (28¹), and Patmos (Rev 1⁹). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ISMACHIAH.—A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹³). Cf. SEMACHIAH.

ISMAEL (1 Es 9²²) = Ezr 10²² Ishmael.

ISMAERUS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Ezr 10²⁴ Amram.

ISRAEL.—1. HISTORY.—1. Sources.—The sources of Jewish political and religious history are the OT, the so-called Apocryphal writings, the works of Josephus, the Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions, allusions in Greek and Roman historians, and the Mishna and Talmud.

Modern criticism has demonstrated that many of these sources were composed by weaving together previously existing documents. Before using any of these sources except the inscriptions, therefore, it is necessary to state the results of critical investigation and to estimate its effect upon the historical trustworthiness of the narratives. Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua (the Hexateuch) are the product of one long literary process. Four different documents, each the work of a school of writers, have been laid under tribute to compose it. These documents are quoted so literally that they can still be separated with practical certainty one from another. The documents are the Jahwistic (J), composed in Judah by J¹ before B. C. 800, perhaps in the reign of Jehoshaphat, though fragments of older poems are quoted, and supplemented a little later by J²; the Elohist (E) composed in the Northern Kingdom by E¹ about B. C. 750 and expanded somewhat later by E²; the Deuteronomic code (D), composed by D¹ about B. C. 650, to which D² prefixed a second preface about ninety years later; the Code of Holiness, compiled by H¹ about B. C. 500 or a little earlier, the priestly 'Book of Origins' written by P¹ about B. C. 450, and various supplementary priestly notes added by various writers at later times. It should be noted that D² added various notes throughout the Hexateuch.

The dates here assigned to these documents are those given by the Graf-Wellhausen school, to which the majority of scholars in all countries now belong. The Ewald-Dillmann school, represented by Strack and Kittel, still hold that P is older than D. For details see HEXATEUCH.

Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings were also compiled by one literary process. The compiler was a follower of D, who wrote probably about 600. The work received a supplement by a kindred writer about 560. The sources from which the editor drew were, for Judges, Samuel, and the first two chapters of Kings,—the J and E documents. In Jg 5 a poem composed about B. C. 1100 is utilized. The editor interpolated his own comments and at times his own editorial framework, but the sources may still be distinguished from these and from each other. A few additions have been made by a still 'after hand,' but these are readily separated. In 1 K 3-11 a chronicle of the reign of Solomon and an old Temple record have been drawn upon, but they are interwoven with glosses and 'after' legendary material. In the synchronous history (1 K 12-2 K 17) the principal sources are the 'Book of the Chronicle of the Kings of Israel' and the 'Book of the Chronicle of the Kings of Judah,' though various other writings have been drawn upon for the narratives of Elijah and Elisha. The concluding portion (2 K 18-25) is dependent also upon the Judean Chronicle. In all parts of Kings the Deuteronomic editor allows himself large liberties. For details see artt. on the Books of JUDGES, SAMUEL, and KINGS.

Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah are the result of a late literary movement, and came into existence about B. C. 300. They were composed under the influence of the Levitical law. The history was re-told in Chronicles, in order to furnish the faithful with an expurgated edition of the history of Israel. The chief sources of the Chronicler were the earlier canonical books which are now found in our Bibles. Where he differs from these he is of doubtful authority. See CHRONICLES. A memoir of Ezra and one of Nehemiah were laid under contribution in the books which respectively bear these names. Apart from these quotations, the Chronicler composed freely as his point of view guided his imagination. See EZRA and NEHEMIAH 'Books of'.

Of the remaining historical books 1 Maccabees is a first-rate historical authority having been composed by an author contemporary with the events described. The other apocryphal works contain much legendary material.

Josephus is for the earlier history dependent almost exclusively upon the OT. Here his narrative has no independent value. For the events in which he was an actor he is a writer of the first importance. In the non-Israelitish sources Israel is mentioned only incidentally, but the information thus given is of primary importance. The Mishna and Talmud are compilations of traditions containing in some cases an historical kernel but valuable for the light they throw upon Jewish life in the early Christian centuries.

2. Historical value of the earlier books.—If the oldest source in the Pentateuch dates from the 9th cent., the question as to the value of the narratives concerning the patriarchal period is forced upon us. Can the accounts of that time be relied upon as history? The answer of most scholars of the present day is that in part they can, though in a different way from that which was formerly in vogue. Winckler, it is true, would dissolve these narratives into solar and astral myths, but the majority of scholars, while making allowance for legendary and mythical elements, are confident that important outlines of tribal history are revealed in the early books of the Bible.

The tenth chapter of Genesis contains a genealogical table in which nations are personified as men. Thus the sons of Ham were Cush (Nubia), Mizraim (Egypt), Put (East Africa?), and Canaan. The sons of Shem were Elam, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Lud (a land of unknown situation, not Lydia), and Aram (the Aramæans). If countries and peoples are here personified as men, the same may be the case elsewhere and in Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Esau, and the twelve sons of Jacob, we may be dealing not with individuals but with tribes. The marriages of individuals may represent the alliances or union of tribes. Viewed in this way, these narratives disclose to us the formation of the Israelitish nation.

The traditions may, however, be classified in two ways: (1) as to origin, and (2) as to content. (For the classification as to origin see Paton, AJT viii. [1904], 658 ff.)

1. (a) Some traditions, such as those concerning kinship with non-Palestinian tribes, the deliverance from Egypt, and concerning Moses, were brought into Palestine from the desert. (b) Others, such as the traditions of Abraham's connexion with various shrines, and the stories of Jacob and his sons, were developed in the land of Canaan. (c) Still others were learned from the Canaanites. Thus we learn from an inscription of Thothmes III. about B.C. 1500 that Jacob-el was a place-name in Palestine. (See W. M. Müller, Asien und Europa, 162.) Israel, as will appear later, was a name of a part of the tribes before they entered Canaan. In Genesis, Jacob and Israel are identified, probably because Israel had settled in the Jacob country. The latter name must have been learned from the Canaanites. Similarly, in the inscription of Thothmes Joseph-el is a place-name. Genesis (48²⁹) tells how Joseph was divided into two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh. Probably the latter are Israelitish, and are so called because they settled in the Joseph country. Lot or Luten (Egyp. Ruten) is an old name of Palestine or of a part of it. In Genesis, Moab and Ammon are said to be the children of Lot, probably because they settled in the country of Luten. In most cases where a tradition has blended two elements, one of these was learned from the Canaanites. (d) Finally, a fourth set of traditions were derived from Babylonia. This is clearly the case with the Creation and Deluge narratives, parallels to which have been found in Babylonian and Assyrian literature. (See KTB vi.)

2. Classified according to their content, we have: (a) narratives which embody the history and movements of tribes. (b) Narratives which reflect the traditions of the various shrines of Israel. The stories of Abraham at Bethel, Shechem, Hebron, and Beersheba come under this head. (c) Legendary and mythical survivals. Many of these have an aetiological purpose; they explain the origin of some custom or the cause of some physical phenomenon. Thus Gn 18, 19—the destruction of Sodom and the other cities of the plain—is a story which grew up to account for the Dead Sea, which, we now know, was produced by very different causes. Similarly Gn 22 is a story designed to account for the fact that the Israelites sacrificed a lamb instead of the firstborn. (d) Other narratives are devoted to cosmogony and primeval history. This classification is worked out in detail in Peters' Early Hebrew Story. It is clear that in writing a history of the origin of Israel we must regard the patriarchal narratives as relating largely to tribes rather than individuals, and must use them with discrimination.

3. Historical meaning of the patriarchal narratives.—Parts of the account of Abraham are local traditions of shrines, but the story of Abraham's migration is the narrative of the westward movement of a tribe or group of tribes from which the Hebrews were descended. Isaac is a shadowy figure confined mostly to the south, and possibly represents a south Palestinian clan, which was afterwards absorbed by the Israelites. Jacob-Israel (Jacob, as shown above, is of Canaanitish origin; Israel was the name of the confederated clans) represents the nation Israel itself. Israel is called an Aramæan (Dt 26⁹), and the account of the marriage of Jacob (Gn 29–31) shows that Israel was kindred to the Aramæans. We can now trace in the cuneiform literature the appearance and westward migration of the Aramæans, and we know that they begin to be mentioned in the Euphrates valley about B.C. 1300, and were moving westward for a little more than a century (see Paton, Syria and Palestine, 103 ff.). The Israelites were a part of this Aramæan migration.

The sons of Jacob are divided into four groups. Six—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun—are said to be the sons of Leah. Leah probably means 'wild cow' (Delitzsch, Prolegomena, 80; W. R. Smith, *Kinship*¹, 254). This apparently means that these tribes were of near kin, and possessed as a common totem the 'wild cow' or 'bovine antelope.' The tribes of Manasseh, Ephraim, and Benjamin traced their descent from Rachel. Rachel means 'ewe,' and these tribes, though kindred to the other six, possessed a different totem. Judah was, in the period before the conquest, a far smaller tribe than afterwards, for, as will appear later, many Palestinian clans were absorbed into Judah. Benjamin is said to have been the youngest son of Jacob, born in Palestine a long time after the others. The name Benjamin means 'sons of the south,' or 'southerners': the Benjamites are probably the 'southerners' of the tribe of Ephraim, and were gradually separated from that tribe after the conquest of Canaan. Four sons of Jacob—Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher—are said to be the sons of concubines. This less honourable birth probably means that they joined the confederacy later than the other tribes. Since the tribe of Asher can be traced in the el-Amarna tablets in the region of their subsequent habitat (cf. Barton, Semitic Origins, 248 ff.), this tribe probably joined the confederacy after the conquest of Palestine. Perhaps the same is true of the other three.

4. The beginnings of Israel.—The original Israel, then, probably consisted of the eight tribes—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, Manasseh, and Ephraim, though perhaps the Rachel tribes did not join the confederacy until they had escaped from Egypt (see § 6). These tribes, along with the other Abrahamides—the Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites—moved westward from the Euphrates along the eastern border of Palestine. The Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites gained a foothold in the territories afterwards occupied by them. The Israelites appear to have been compelled to move on to the less fertile steppe to the south, between Beersheba and Egypt, roaming at times as far as Sinai. Budde (Rel. of Isr. to the Exile, 6) regards the Khabiri, who in the el-Amarna tablets lay siege to Jerusalem, as Hebrews who made an incursion into Palestine, c. B.C. 1400. Though many scholars deny that they were Hebrews, perhaps they were.

5. The Egyptian bondage.—From the time of the first Egyptian dynasty (c. B.C. 3000), the Egyptians had been penetrating into the Sinaitic Peninsula on account of the mines in the Wadi Maghara (cf. Breasted, Hist. of Egypt, 48). In course of time Egypt dominated the whole region, and on this account it was called Musru, Egypt being Musru or Misraim (cf. Winckler, Hilbert Jour. ii, 571 ff., and *KAT*² 144 ff.). Because of this, Winckler holds (*KAT*² 212 ff.) that there is no historical foundation for the narrative of the Egyptian oppression of the Hebrews and their exodus from that country; all this, he contends, arose from a later misunderstanding of the name Musru. But, as Budde (Rel. of Isr. to the Exile, ch. i.) has pointed out, the firm and constant tradition of the Egyptian bondage, running as it does through all four of the Pentateuchal documents and forming the background of all Israel's religious and prophetic consciousness, must have some historical content. We know from the Egyptian monuments that at different times Bedn from Asia entered the country on account of its fertility. The famous Hyksos kings and their people found access to the land of the Nile in this way. Probability, accordingly, strengthens the tradition that Hebrews so entered Egypt. Ex¹¹ states that they were compelled to aid in building the cities of Pithom and Raamses. Excavations have shown that these cities were founded by Rameses II. (B.C. 1292–1225; cf. Hogarth, Authority and Archaeology, 55). It has been customary, therefore, to regard Rameses as the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Menephtah (Meren-ptah, 1225–1215) as the Pharaoh of the Exodus. This view has in recent years met with an unexpected difficulty. In 1896 a stele was discovered in Egypt on which an inscription of Menephtah, dated in his fifth year, mentions the Israelites as already in Palestine or the desert to the south of it, and as defeated there (cf. Breasted, Anc Records of Egypt, iii. 256 ff.). This inscription celebrates a campaign which Menephtah made into Palestine in his third year (cf. Breasted, op. cit. 272). On the surface, this inscription, which contains by far the oldest mention of Israel yet discovered in any literature, and the only mention in Egyptian, seems to favour Winckler's view. The subject cannot, however, be dismissed in so light a manner. The persistent historical tradition which colours all Hebrew religious thought must have, one would think, some historical foundation. The main thread of it must be true, but in details, such as the reference to Pithom and Raamses, the tradition may be mistaken. Traditions attach themselves to different men, why not to different cities? Perhaps, as several scholars have suggested, another solution is more probable, that not all of the Hebrews went to Egypt. Wildeboer (Jahvedienst en Volksreligie Israel, 15) and Budde (op. cit. 10) hold that it was the so-called Joseph tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh, that settled for a time in Egypt, and that Moses led forth. This receives some support from the fact that the E document, which originated among the Ephraimites, is the first one that remembers that the name Jahweh was, until the Exodus, unknown to them (cf. Ex 3⁴).

Probably we shall not go far astray, if we suppose that the Leah tribes were roaming the steppe to the south of Palestine where Menephtah defeated them, while the Rachel tribes, enticed into Egypt by the opportunity to obtain an easier livelihood, became entangled in trouble there, from which Moses emancipated them, perhaps in the reign of Menephtah himself.

6. The Exodus.—The J, E, and P documents agree in their main picture of the Exodus, although J differs from the other two in holding that the worship of Jahweh was known at an earlier time. Moses, they tell us, fled from Egypt and took refuge in Midian with Jethro, a Kenite priest (cf. Jg 1¹⁶). Here, according to E and P, at Horeb or Sinai, Jahweh's holy mount, Moses first learned to worship Jahweh, who, he believed, sent him to deliver from Egypt his oppressed brethren. After various plagues (J gives them as seven; E, five; and P, six) Moses led them out, and by Divine aid they escaped across the Red Sea. J makes this escape the result of Jahweh's control of natural means (Ex 14²). Moses then led them to Sinai, where, according to both J and E, they entered into a solemn covenant with Jahweh to serve Him as their God. According to E (Ex 18²⁷), it was Jethro, the Kenite or Midianite priest, who initiated them into the rite and mediated the covenant. After this the Rachel tribes probably allied themselves more closely to the Leah tribes, and, through the aid of Moses, gradually led them to adopt the worship of Jahweh. Religion was at this period purely an affair of ritual and material success, and since clans had escaped from Egypt through the name of Jahweh, others would more readily adopt His worship also. Perhaps it was during this period that the Rachel tribes first became a real part of the Israelite confederation.

7. The Wilderness wandering.—For some time the habitat of Israel, as thus constituted, was the region between Sinai on the south and Kadesh,—a spring some fifty miles south of Beersheba,—on the north. At Kadesh the fountain was sacred, and at Sinai there was a sacred mountain. Moses became during this period the sheik of the united tribes. Because of his pre-eminence in the knowledge of Jahweh he acquired this paramount influence in all their counsels. In the traditions this period is called the Wandering in the Wilderness, and it is said to have continued forty years. The expression 'forty years' is, however, used by D and his followers in a vague way for an indefinite period of time. In this case it is probably rather over than under the actual amount.

The region in which Israel now roamed was anything but fertile, and the people naturally turned their eyes to more promising pasture lands. This they did with the more confidence, because Jahweh, their new God had just delivered a portion of them from Egypt in an extraordinary manner. Naturally they desired the most fertile land in the region, Palestine. Finding themselves for some reason unable to move directly upon it from the south (Nu 13. 14), perhaps because the hostile Amalekites interposed, they made a circuit to the eastward. According to the traditions, their detour extended around the territories of Edom and Moab, so that they came upon the territory north of the Arnon, where an Amorite kingdom had previously been established, over which, in the city of Heshbon, Sihon ruled. See AMORITES.

8. The trans-Jordanic conquest.—The account of the conquest of the kingdom of Sihon is given by E with a few additions from J in Nu 21. No details are given, but it appears that in the battles Israel was victorious. We learn from the P document in Nu 32 that the conquered cities of this region were divided between the tribes of Reuben and Gad. Perhaps it was at this time that the tribe of Gad came into the confederacy. At least they appear in real history here for the first time. The genealogies represent Gad as the son of a slave-girl. This, as already noted, probably means that the tribe joined the nation at a comparatively late period. Probably the Gadites came in from the desert at this period, and in union with the Reubenites won this territory, which extended from the Arnon to a point a little north of Heshbon. It is usually supposed that the territory of Reuben lay to the south of that of Gad, extending from the Arnon to Elealeh, north of Heshbon; but in reality each took certain cities in such a way that their territory interpenetrated (Nu 32⁴). Thus the Gadites had Dilion, Ataroah, and Aroer to the south, Jazer north of Heshbon, and Beth-nimrah and Beth-haran in the Jordan valley; while the Reubenites had Baal-meon, Nebo, Heshbon, and Elealeh, which lay between these. Probably the country to the north was not conquered until later. It is true that D claims that Og, the king of Bashan, was conquered at this time, but it is probable that the conquest of Bashan by a part of the tribe of Manasseh was a backward movement from the west after the conquest of Palestine was accomplished. During this period Moses died, and Joshua became the leader of the nation.

9. Crossing the Jordan.—The conquests of the tribe of Gad brought the Hebrews into the Jordan valley, but the swiftly flowing river with its banks of clay formed an insuperable obstacle to these primitive folk. The traditions tell of a miraculous stoppage of the waters. The Arabic historian Nuwairi tells of a land-slide of one of the clay hills that border the Jordan, which afforded an opportunity to the Arabs to complete a military bridge. The account of this was published with translation in the PEFSI, 1895, p. 253 ff. The J writer would see in such an event, as he did in the action of the winds upon the waters of the Red Sea, the hand of Jahweh. The accounts of it in which the priests and the ark figure are of later origin. These stories explained the origin of a circle of sacred stones called Gilgal, which lay on the west of the Jordan, by the supposition that the priests had taken these stones from the bed of the river at the time of the crossing.

10. The conquest of Canaan.—The first point of attack after crossing the Jordan was Jericho. In Jos 6 J's account and E's account of the taking of Jericho are woven together (cf. the Oxford Hexateuch, or SBOT, ad. loc.). According to the J account, the Israelites marched around the city once a day for six days. As they made no attack, the besieged were thrown off their guard, so that, when on the seventh day the Israelites made an attack at the end of their marching, they easily captured the town. As to the subsequent course of the conquest, the sources differ widely. The D and

P strata of the book of Joshua, which form the main portion of it, represent Joshua as gaining possession of the country in two great battles, and as dividing it up among the tribes by lot. The J account of the conquest, however, which has been preserved in Jg 1 and Jos 8-10. 13¹. 7². 13 15¹⁴⁻¹⁵. 43 16¹⁻². 10 17¹¹⁻¹³ 19¹, while it represents Joshua as the leader of the Rachel tribes and as winning a decisive victory near Gibeon, declares that the tribes went up to win their territory singly, and that in the end their conquest was only partial. This representation is much older than the other, and is much more in accord with the subsequent course of events and with historical probability.

According to J, there seem to have been at least three lines of attack: (1) that which Joshua led up the valley from Jericho to Ai and Bethel, from which the territories afterwards occupied by Ephraim and Benjamin were secured. (2) A movement on the part of the tribe of Judah followed by the Simeonites, south-westward from Jericho into the hill-country about Bethlehem and Hebron. (3) Lastly, there was the movement of the northern tribes into the hill-country which borders the great plain of Jezreel. J in Jos 11¹⁻⁹ tells us that in a great battle by the Waters of Merom (wh. see) Joshua won for the Israelites a victory over four petty kings of the north, which gave the Israelites their foothold there. In the course of these struggles a disaster befell the tribes of Simeon and Levi in an attempt to take Shechem, which practically annihilated Levi, and greatly weakened Simeon (cf. Gn 34). This disaster was thought to be a Divine punishment for reprehensible conduct (Gn 49⁷⁻⁹). J distinctly states (Jg 1) that the conquest was not complete, but that two lines of fortresses, remaining in the possession of the Canaanites, cut the Israelitish territory into three sections. One of these consisted of Dor, Megiddo, Taanach, Ibleam, and Beth-shean, and gave the Canaanites control of the great plain of Jezreel while, holding as they did Jerusalem, Aijalon, Har-heres (Beth-shemesh), and Gezer, they cut the tribe of Judah off from their northern kinsfolk. J further tells us distinctly that not all the Canaanites were driven out, but that the Canaanites and the Hebrews lived together. Later, he says, Israel made slaves of the Canaanites. This latter statement is perhaps true for those Canaanites who held out in these fortresses, but reasons will be given later for believing that by intermarriage a gradual fusion between Canaanites and Israelites took place.

Reasons have been adduced (§ 3) for believing that the tribe of Asher had been in the country from about B.C. 1400. (The conquest probably occurred about 1200.) Probably they allied themselves with the other tribes when the latter entered Canaan. At what time the tribes of Naphtali and Dan joined the Hebrew federation we have no means of knowing. J tells us (Jg 13³⁰) that the Danites struggled for a foothold in the Shephelah, where they obtained but an insecure footing. As they afterwards migrated from here (Jg 17. 18), and as a place in this region was called the 'Camp of Dan' (Jg 13² 18²), probably their hold was very insecure. We learn from Jg 15 that they possessed the town of Zorah, where Samson was afterwards born.

11. Period of the Judges.—During this period, which extended from about 1200 to about 1020 B.C., Israel became naturalized in the land, and amalgamated with the Canaanites. The chronology of the period as given in the Book of Judges is certainly too long. The Deuteronomist editor, who is responsible for this chronology, probably reckoned forty years as the equivalent of a generation, and 1 K 6¹ gives us the key to his scheme. He made the time from the Exodus to the founding of the Temple twelve generations (cf. Moore, 'Judges' in ICC, p. xxxviii.). The so-called 'Minor Judges'—Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (Jg 10¹⁻⁴ 12⁹⁻¹⁶)—were not included in the editor's chronology. The statements concerning them were added by a later hand. As three of their names appear elsewhere as clan names (cf. Gn 46¹³⁻¹⁴, Nu 26²³⁻²⁵, Dt 3¹⁴), and as another is a city (Jos 21³⁰), scholars are agreed that these were not real judges, but that they owe their existence to the mistake of a late writer. Similarly, Shamgar (Jg 3³¹) was not a real judge. His name appears where it does because some late writer mistakenly inferred that the reference to Shamgar (probably a Hittite chief) in Jg 5⁶ was an allusion to an earlier judge (cf. Moore, JAOS xix. 159 ff.). Some doubt attaches also to Othniel, who is elsewhere a younger brother of a Caleb,—the Calebites, a branch of the Edomite clan of the Kenaz (cf. Jg 1¹² with Gn 36¹¹⁻¹⁵, 42), which had settled in Southern Judah. This doubt is increased by the fact that the whole of the narrative of the invasion of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, is the work of the editor, R^p, and also by the fact that no king of Mesopotamia who could have made such an invasion is known to have existed at this time. Furthermore, had such a king invaded Israel, his power would have been felt in the north and not in Judah. If there is any historical kernel in this narrative, probably it was the Edomites who were the perpetrators of the invasion, and their name has become corrupted (cf. Paton, Syr. and Pal. 161). It is difficult, then, to see how Othniel should have been a deliverer, as he seems to have belonged to a kindred clan, but the whole matter may have been confused by oral transmission. Perhaps the narrative is a distorted reminiscence of the settlement in Southern Judah of the Edomitish clans of Caleb and Othniel.

The real judges were Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, Eli, and Samuel. Samson was a kind of giant-hero, but he always fought single-handed; he was no leader and organizer of men, and it is difficult to see how he can justly be called a judge. The age was a period of great tribal restlessness. Others were trying to do what the Israelites had done, and gain a foothold in Palestine. Wave after wave of attempted invasion broke over the land. Each coming from a different direction affected a different part of it, and in the part affected a patriot would arouse the Hebrews of the vicinity and expel the invader. The influence thus acquired, and the position which the wealth derived from the spoil of war gave him, made such a person the sheik of his district for the time being. Thus the judges were in reality great tribal chieftains. They owed their office to personal prowess. Because of their character their countrymen brought to them their causes to adjust, and they had no authority except public opinion whereby to enforce their decisions.

Deborah and Barak delivered Israel, not from invaders, but from a monarch whom up to that time the Hebrews had been unable to overcome. It is probable that this power was Hittite (cf. Moore, JAOS. xix. 158 ff.). This episode, which should probably be dated about 1150, marks the conclusion of the conquest of Northern Palestine.

There were four real invasions from outside during the period of the judges: that of the Moabites, which called Ehud into prominence; that of the Midianites, which gave Gideon his opportunity; that of the Ammonites, from whom Jephthah delivered Gilead; and that of the Philistines, against whom Samson, Eli, Samuel, and Saul struggled, but who were not overcome until the reign of David. The first of these invasions affected the territories of Reuben and Gad on the east, and of Benjamin on the west, of the Jordan. It probably occurred early in the period. The second invasion affected the country of Ephraim and Manasseh, and probably occurred about the middle of the period. Gideon's son Abimelech endeavoured to establish a petty kingdom in Shechem after Gideon had run his successful career, but the attempt at kingship was premature (cf. Jg 9). The Ammonite invasion affected only Gilead, while the Philistine invasion was later, more prolonged, and affected all of Central Palestine. These people came into Palestine from the outside (cf. Philistines), pushed the inhabitants of the Maritime Plain back upon the Israelites, made many attempts to conquer the hill-country, and by the end of the reign of Saul held the greater part of the Plain of Jezreel.

The struggles with these invaders gradually called into existence a national consciousness in Israel. It is clear from the song of Deborah that when that poem was written there was no sense of national unity. A dim sense of kinship held the tribes together, but this kinship brought to Deborah's standard only those who had some tribal interest in the struggle. The Reubenites did not respond to the appeal (Jg 5¹⁶), while the tribe of Judah is not mentioned at all.

At the end of the period, the kingship of Saul, who responded to a call to help Jabesh, a Gileadite city, against a second invasion of Ammonites, is the expression of a developing national consciousness.

At some time during this period a part of the Danites moved to the foot of Mount Hermon, to the city which was henceforth to be called Dan (Jg 17. 18). During these years the process of amalgamation between the Israelites and the tribes previously inhabiting the land went steadily forward. Perhaps it occurred in the tribe of Judah on a larger scale than elsewhere. At all events, we can trace it there more clearly. The stories of Judah's marriages in Gn 38 really represent the union of Shuaites and Tamarites with the tribe. The union of the Kenazites and Calebites with Judah has already been noted. The Kenites also united with them (Jg 1¹⁶), as did also the Jerahmeelites (cf. 1 S 30²⁷ with 1 Ch 2²⁹). What went on in Judah occurred to some extent in all the tribes, though probably Judah excelled in this. Perhaps it was a larger admixture of foreign blood that gave Judah its sense of aloofness from the rest of Israel. Certain it is, however, that the great increase in strength which Israel experienced between the time of Deborah and the time of David cannot be accounted for on the basis of natural increase. There were elements in the religion of the Israelites which, notwithstanding the absorption of culture from the Canaanites, enabled Israel to absorb in turn the Canaanites themselves. The religious and ethical aspects of the period will be considered in connexion with the religion.

12. Reign of Saul.—There are two accounts of how Saul became king. The older of these (1 S 9¹ 10¹⁶. 27b 11¹⁴) tells how Saul was led to Samuel in seeking some lost asses, how Samuel anointed him to be king, and how about a month after that the men of Jabesh-gilead, whom the Ammonites were besieging, sent out messengers earnestly imploring aid. Saul, by means of a gory symbolism consonant with the habits of his age, summoned the Israelites to follow him to war. They responded, and by means of the army thus raised he delivered the distressed city. As a result of this Saul was proclaimed king, apparently by acclamation. The later account (which consists of the parts of 1 S 8–12 not enumerated above) presents a picture which is so unnatural that it cannot be historical. Saul gained his kingdom, then, because of his success as a military leader. Probably at first his sovereignty was acknowledged only by the Rachel tribes and Gilead.

The Philistines, upon hearing that Israel had a king, naturally endeavoured to crush him. Soon after his accession, therefore, Saul was compelled to repel an invasion, by which the Philistines had penetrated to Michmash, within ten miles of his capital. Their camp was separated from Saul's by the deep gorge of Michmash. Owing to the daring and valour of Jonathan, a victory was gained for Israel which gave Saul for a time freedom from these enemies (cf. 1 S 13. 14). Saul occupied this respite in an expedition against Israel's old-time enemies the Amalekites. Our account of this (1 S 15) comes from the later (E) source, and gives us, by way of explaining Saul's later insanity, the statement that he did not destroy the accursed Amalekites with all their belongings, but presumed to take some booty from them.

Soon, however, Saul was compelled once more to take up arms against the Philistines, whom he fought with varying fortunes until they slew him in battle on Mount Gilboa. During the later years of Saul's life fits of insanity came upon him with increasing frequency. These were interpreted by his contemporaries to mean that Jahweh had abandoned him; thus his followers were gradually estranged from him. A large part of the space devoted to his reign by the sacred writers is occupied with the relations between Saul and the youthful David. These narratives are purely personal. The only light which they throw upon the political history of the period is that they make it clear that Saul's hold upon the tribe of Judah was not a very firm one.

How long the reign of Saul continued we have no means of knowing. The Books of Samuel contain no statement concerning it. Many scholars believe that the editor of Samuel purposely omitted it because he regarded David as the legitimate religious successor of Samuel, and viewed Saul consequently as a usurper. Saul must have ruled for some years—ten or fifteen, probably—and his kingdom included not only the territory from the Plain of Jezreel to Jerusalem, with a less firm hold upon Judah, but the trans-Jordanic Gileadites. The latter were so loyal to him that his son, when Judah seceded, abandoned his home in Gibeon, and made Mahanaim his capital. What attitude the tribes to the north of Jezreel took towards Saul we do not know.

13. Reign of David.—Before Saul's death David had attached the men of Judah so firmly to himself, and had exhibited such qualities of leadership, that, when Saul fell at Gilboa, David made himself king of Judah, his capital being Hebron. As Jonathan, the crown prince, had fallen in battle, Abner, Saul's faithful general, made Ish-baal (called in Samuel Ish-bosheth) king, removing his residence to Mahanaim. For seven and a half years civil war dragged itself along. Then Joab by treacherous murder removed Abner (2 S 3^{37a}), assassins disposed of the weak Ish-baal, and Israel and Judah were soon united again under one monarch, David. We are not to understand from 2 S 5 that the elders of Israel all came immediately in one body to make David king. Probably they came one by one at intervals of time. There were many tribal jealousies and ambitions deterring some of them from such a course, but the times demanded a united kingdom, and as there was no one but David who gave promise of establishing such a monarchy, they ultimately yielded to the logic of events.

David soon devoted himself to the consolidation of his territory. Just at the northern edge of the tribe of Judah, commanding the highway from north to south, stood the ancient fortress of Jerusalem. It had never been in the possession of the Israelites. The Jebusites, who had held it since Israel's entrance into Canaan, fondly believed that its position rendered it impregnable. This city David captured, and with the insight of genius made it his capital (2 S 5^{6b}). This choice was a wise one in every way. Had he continued to dwell in Hebron, both Benjamin—which had in the previous reign been the royal tribe—and Ephraim—which never easily yielded precedence to any other clan—would have regarded him as a Judæan rather than a national leader. Jerusalem was to the Israelites a new city. It not only had no associations with the tribal differences of the past, but, lying as it did on the borderland of two tribes, was neutral territory. Moreover, the natural facilities of its situation easily made it an almost impregnable fortress. David accordingly rebuilt the Jebusite stronghold and took up his residence in it, and from this time onward it became the city of David.

The Philistines, ever jealous of the rising power of Israel, soon attacked David in his new capital, but he gained such a victory over them (2 S 5^{17b}) that in the future he seems to have been able to seek them out city by city and subdue them at his leisure (2 S 8^{1b}). Having crushed the Philistines, David turned his attention to the trans-Jordanic lands. He attacked Moab, and after his victory treated the conquered with the greatest barbarity (8³). He was, however, the child of his age. All wars were cruel, and the Assyrians could teach even David lessons in cruelty. Edom was also conquered (8^{13, 14}). Ammon needlessly provoked a war with David, and after a long siege their capital Rabbah, on the distant border of the desert, succumbed (10. 11). The petty Aramaean State of Zobah was drawn into the war, and was compelled to pay tribute (8³⁷). Damascus, whose inhabitants, as kinsfolk of the people of Zobah, tried to aid the latter, was finally made a tributary State also (8³⁸), so that within a few years David built up a considerable empire. This territory he did not attempt to organize in a political way, but, according to the universal Oriental custom of his time, he ruled it through tributary native princes. Toi, king of Hamath, and Hiram, king of Tyre, sent embassies to welcome David into the brotherhood of kings. Thus Israel became united, and gained a recognized position among the nations.

This success was possible because at the moment Assyria and Egypt were both weak. In the former country the period of weakness which followed the reign of the great Tiglath-pileser I. was at its height, while in the latter land the 21st dynasty, with its dual line of rulers at Thebes and Tanis, rendered the country powerless through internal dissensions.

David upon his removal to Jerusalem organized his court upon a more extensive scale than Saul had ever done, and, according to Oriental custom, increased his harem. The early Semite was often predisposed to sexual weakness, and David exhibited the frequent bent of his race. His sin with Bathsheba, and subsequent treachery to her husband Uriah, need not be re-told. David's fondness for his son Absalom and his lax treatment of him produced more dire political consequences. Absalom led a rebellion which drove the king from Jerusalem and nearly cost him his throne. David on this occasion, like Ish-baal before him, took refuge at Mahanaim, the east Jordanic hinterland. Here David's conduct towards the rebellious son was such that, but for the fact that the relentless Joab disregarded the express commands of his royal master and put Absalom to death after his army had been defeated, it is doubtful whether Absalom would not have triumphed in the end. A smaller revolt grew out of this, but the reduction of Abel near Dan in the north finally restored David's authority throughout the land.

During the reign of David, though we do not know in what part of it, two misfortunes befell the country. The first of these was a famine for three successive years (2 S 21). The means taken to win back the favour of Jahweh, which it was supposed Israel had forfeited, so that He should give rain again, is an eloquent commentary on the barbarous nature of the age and the primitive character of its religious conceptions. The other event was a plague, which followed an attempt of David to take a census (ch. 24), and which the Israelites accordingly believed Jahweh had sent to punish the king for presumptuously introducing such an innovation.

The last days of David were rendered uneasy by the attempt of his son Adonijah to seize the crown (1 K 1). Having, however, fixed the succession upon Solomon, the son of Bathsheba, David is said to have left to him as an inheritance the duty of taking vengeance upon Joab and Shimei (1 K 2³⁷).

To the reign of David subsequent generations looked as the golden age of Israel. Never again did the boundaries of a united Israelitish empire extend so far. These boundaries, magnified a little by fond imagination, became the ideal limits of the Promised Land. David himself, idealized by later ages, became the prototype of the Messiah. The reign of David is said to have lasted forty years. It probably extended from about B.C. 1017 to 977.

14. Reign of Solomon.—Probably upon the accession of Solomon, certainly during his reign, two of the tributary States, Edom and Damascus, gained their independence (1 K 11¹⁴⁻²⁵). The remainder of the empire of David was held by Solomon until his death. Up to the time of Solomon the Israelites had been a simple rural people untouched by the splendour or the culture of the world outside. Simple shepherds and vine-dressers, they knew nothing of the splendours of Tyre or Babylon or Egypt, and had never possessed wealth enough to enjoy such splendours had they known them. David had risen from the people, and to his death remained a simple man of his race. Solomon, born in the purple, determined to bring his kingdom into line with the great powers of the world. He accordingly consummated a marriage with the daughter of Pharaoh, probably one of the Pharaohs of the Tanite branch of the 21st dynasty. This marriage brought him into touch with the old civilization of Egypt. In order to equip his capital with public buildings suitable to the estate of such an empire, Solomon hired Phœnician architects, and constructed a palace for himself, one for the daughter of Pharaoh, and a Temple of such magnificence as the rustic Israelites had never seen. Later generations have overlaid the accounts of these, especially of the Temple, with many glosses, increasing the impression of their grandeur (cf. TEMPLE), but there is no doubt that in the way of luxury they far surpassed anything previously known in Israel. The whole pile was approached through a hypostyle hall built on Egyptian models, called the 'house of the forest of Lebanon,' while into the Temple brazen work and brazen instruments were introduced, in flagrant violation of Israelitish traditions. Even a brazen altar of burnt-offering was substituted for the traditional altar of stone. Ornaments of palm trees and cherubim such as adorned the temple of Melkart at Tyre decorated not only the interior of the Temple, but the brazen instruments as well. These religious innovations were looked upon with disfavour by many of Solomon's contemporaries (cf. 1 K 12²⁸⁻³⁰), and the buildings, although the boast of a later age, were regarded with mingled feelings by those who were compelled to pay the taxes by which they were erected.

Not only in buildings but also in his whole establishment did Solomon depart from the simple ways of his father. He not only married the daughters of many of the petty Palestinian kings who were his tributaries, but filled his harem with numerous other beauties besides. Probably the statement that he had 700 wives and 300 concubines (1 K 11³) is the exaggeration of a later writer, but, allowing for this, his harem must have been very numerous. His method of living was of course in accord with the magnificent buildings which he had erected. To support this splendour the old system of taxation was inadequate, and a new method had to be devised. The whole country was divided into twelve districts, each of which was placed under the charge of a tax-gatherer, and compelled to furnish for the king's house the provision for one month in each year (1 K 4⁷⁻¹⁸). It is noteworthy that in this division economic conditions rather than tribal territories were followed. Not only were the tribes unequal in numbers, but the territory of certain sections was much more productive than that of others. Solomon's tax-collectors were placed in the most fertile sections of the land. Solomon is also said to have departed from the simple ways of his father by introducing horses and chariots for his use. The ass is the animal of the simple Palestinian. The ancient Hebrew always looked askance at a horse. It was an emblem of pride and luxury. In his eyes it was the instrument of war, not of peace. The introduction of this luxury further estranged many of Solomon's non-Judean subjects. His wealth was increased by his commerce with South Arabia. He established a fleet of trading vessels on the Red Sea, manned with Phœnician sailors (1 K 9^{26ff}).

Early in his reign Solomon obtained a reputation for wisdom. 'Wisdom' to the early Hebrew did not mean philosophy, but practical insight into human nature and skill in the management of people (cf. 1 K 3¹⁶⁻³²). It was this skill that enabled him to hold his kingdom intact in spite of his many innovations. It was this skill that in the later traditions made Solomon, for the Israelite, the typical wise man. Although we cannot longer ascribe to him either the Book of Proverbs or the Book of Ecclesiastes, his reputation for wisdom was no doubt deserved.

Solomon's reign is said to have continued forty years (1 K 11²). If this be so, B.C. 977-937 is probably the period covered. Towards the close of Solomon's reign the tribe of Ephraim, which in the time of the Judges could hardly bear to allow another tribe to take precedence of it, became restless. Its leader was Jeroboam, a young Ephraimite officer to whom Solomon had entrusted the administration of the affairs of the Joseph tribes (1 K 11²⁶). His plans for rebelling involved the fortification of his native city Zeredah, which called Solomon's attention to his plot, and he fled accordingly to Egypt, where he found refuge. In the latter country the 21st dynasty, with which Solomon had intermarried, had passed away, and the Libyan Shishak (Sheshonk), the founder of the 22nd dynasty had ascended the throne in B.C. 945. He ruled a united Egypt, and entertained ambitions to renew Egypt's Asiatic empire. Shishak accordingly welcomed Jeroboam and offered him asylum, but was not prepared while Solomon lived to give him an army with which to attack his master.

15. Division of the kingdom.—Upon the death of Solomon, his son Rehoboam seems to have been proclaimed king in Judah without opposition, but as some doubt concerning the loyalty of the other tribes, of which Ephraim was leader, seems to have existed, Rehoboam went to Shechem to be anointed as king at their ancient shrine (1 K 12¹⁶). Jeroboam, having been informed in his Egyptian retreat of the progress of affairs, returned to Shechem and prompted the elders of the tribes assembled there to exact from Rehoboam a promise that in case they accepted him as monarch he would relieve them of the heavy taxation which his father had imposed upon them. After considering the matter three days, Rehoboam rejected the advice of the older and wiser counsellors, and gave such an answer as one bred to the doctrine of the Divine right of kings would naturally give. The substance of his reply was: 'My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins.' As the result of this answer all the tribes except Judah and a portion of Benjamin refused to acknowledge the descendant of David, and made Jeroboam their king. Judah remained faithful to the heir of her old hero, and, because Jerusalem was on the border of Benjamin, the Judeans kings were able to retain a strip of the land of that tribe varying from one to time in width from four to eight miles. All else was lost to the Davidic dynasty.

The chief forces which produced this disruption were economic, but they were not the only forces. Religious conservatism also did its share. Solomon had in many ways contravened the religious customs of his nation. His brazen altar and brazen utensils for the Temple were not orthodox. Although he made no attempt to centralize the worship at his Temple (which was in reality his royal chapel), his disregard of sacred ritual had its effect, and Jeroboam made an appeal to religious conservatism when he said, 'Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.' Since we know the history only through the work of a propagandist of a later type of religion, the attitude of Jeroboam has long been misunderstood. He was not a religious innovator, but a religious conservative.

When the kingdom was divided, the tributary States of course gained their independence, and Israel's empire was at an end. The days of her political glory had been less than a century, and her empire passed away never to return. The nation, divided and its parts often warring with one another, could not easily become again a power of importance.

16. From Jeroboam to Ahab (937-875).—After the division of the kingdom, the southern portion, consisting chiefly of the tribe of Judah, was known as the kingdom of Judah, while the northern division was known as the kingdom of Israel. Judah remained loyal to the Davidic dynasty as long as she maintained her independence, but in Israel frequent changes of dynasty occurred. Only one family furnished more than four monarchs, some only two, while several failed to transmit the throne at all. The kings during the first period were:

ISRAEL.	JUDAH.
Jeroboam I. 937-915.	Rehoboam 937-920.
Nadab . . . 915-913.	Abijam . . . 920-917.
Baasha . . . 913-889.	Asa . . . 917-876.
Elah . . . 889-887.	Jehoshaphat 876- .
Zimri . . . days.
Omri . . . 887-875.

Few of the details of the reign of Jeroboam have come down to us. He fortified Shechem (1 K 12²⁸), but Tirzah (which Klostermann regards as the same as Zeredah) was also a residence (1 K 14¹⁷). Jeroboam extended his royal patronage to two sanctuaries Dan and Bethel, the one at the northern and the other at the southern extremity of his territory. Naturally there were hostile relations between him and Judah as long as Jeroboam lived. No details of this hostility have come down to us. If we had only the Biblical records before us, we should suppose that Jeroboam was aided in this war by Shishak of Egypt, for we are told how he invaded Judah (1 K 14²⁵) and compelled Rehoboam to pay a tribute which stripped the Temple of much of its golden treasure and ornamentation. It appears from the Egyptian inscriptions, however, that Shishak's campaign was directed against both the Hebrew kingdoms alike. His army marched northward to the latitude of the Sea of Galilee, captured the towns of Megiddo, Taanach, and Shunem in the plain of Jezreel, the town of Bethshean at the junction of Jezreel with the Jordan valley, and invaded the East-Jordanic country as far as Mahanaim. Many towns in Judah were captured also. (Cf. Breasted's Hist. of Egypt, 530.) How deep the enmity between Israel and Judah had become may be inferred from the fact that this attack of the Egyptian monarch did not drive them to peace.

Shishak's campaign seems to have been a mere plundering raid. It established no permanent Asiatic empire for Egypt. After this attack, Rehoboam, according to the Chronicler, strengthened the fortifications of his kingdom (2 Ch 11¹⁻¹¹). According to this passage, his territory extended to Maresah (Tell Sandehannah) and Gath (Tell es-Saji?) in the Shephelah, and southward as far as Hebron. No mention is made of any town north of Jerusalem or in the Jordan valley.

The hostile relations between the two kingdoms were perpetuated after the death of Rehoboam, during the short reign of Abijam. In the early part of the reign of Asa, while Nadab was on the throne of Israel, active hostilities ceased sufficiently to allow the king of Israel to besiege the Philistine city of Gibeon, a town in the northern part of the Maritime Plain opposite the middle portion of the Israelitish territory. The Israelitish monarch felt strong enough to endeavour to extend his dominions by compelling these ancient enemies of his race to submit once more. During the siege of this town, Baasha, an ambitious man of the tribe of Issachar, conspired against Nadab, accomplished his assassination, and had himself proclaimed king in his stead (1 K 15²⁷⁻²⁸). Thus the dynasty of Jeroboam came to an end in the second generation.

Baasha upon his accession determined to push more vigorously the war with Judah. Entering into an alliance with Benhadad I. of Damascus, he proceeded to fortify Ramah, five miles north of Jerusalem, as a base of operations against Judah. Asa in this crisis collected all the treasure that he could, sent it to Benhadad, and bought him off, persuading him to break his alliance with Israel and to enter into one with Judah. Benhadad thereupon attacked some of the towns in north-eastern Galilee, and Baasha was compelled to desist from his Judæan campaign and defend his own borders. Asa took this opportunity to fortify Geba, about eight miles north-east of Jerusalem, and Mizpeh, five miles to the north-west of it (1 K 15¹⁶⁻²²). The only other important event of Asa's reign known to us consisted of the erection by Asa's mother of an ashêrah made in a disgustingly realistic form, which so shocked the sense of the time that Asa was compelled to remove it (15¹⁹). Cf. for fuller discussion, below, II. § 1 (3).

During the reign of Elah an attempt was made once more to capture Gibbethon. The siege was being prosecuted by an able general named Omri, while the weak king was enjoying himself at Tirzah, which had been the royal residence since the days of Jeroboam. While the king was in a drunken brawl he was killed by Zimri, the commander of his chariots, who was then himself proclaimed king. Omri, however, upon hearing of this, hastened from Gibbethon to Tirzah, overthrew and slew Zimri, and himself became king. Thus once more did the dynasty change. Omri proved one of the ablest rulers the Northern Kingdom ever had. The Bible tells us little of him, but the information we derive from outside sources enables us to place him in proper perspective. His fame spread to Assyria, where, even after his dynasty had been overthrown, he was thought to be the ancestor of Israelitish kings (cf. KIB i. 151). Omri, perceiving the splendid military possibilities of the hill of Samaria, chose that for his capital, fortified it, and made it one of his residences, thus introducing to history a name destined in succeeding generations to play an important part. He appears to have made a peaceful alliance with Damascus, so that war between the two kingdoms ceased. He also formed an alliance with the king of Tyre, taking Jezebel, the daughter of the Tyrian king Ethbaal, as a wife for his son Ahab. We also learn from the Moabite Stone that Omri conquered Moab, compelling the Moabites to pay tribute. According to the Bible, this tribute was paid in wool (2 K 3⁴). Scanty as our information is, it furnishes evidence that both in military and in civil affairs Omri must be counted as the ablest ruler of the Northern Kingdom. Of the nature of the relations between Israel and Judah during his reign we have no hint. Probably, however, peace prevailed, since we find the next two kings of these kingdoms in alliance.

17. From Ahab to Jeroboam II. (875-781).—

The monarchs of this period were as follows:—

ISRAEL.	JUDAH.
Ahab . . . 875-853.	Jehoshaphat . . . 878-851.
Ahaziah . . . 853-851.	Jehoram . . . 851-843.
Joram . . . 851-842.	Ahaziah . . . 843-842.
Jehu . . . 842-814.	Athaliah . . . 842-836.
Jehoahaz . . . 814-797.	Joash . . . 836-796.
Jehoash . . . 797-781.	Amaziah . . . 796-782.
	Azariah . . .
	(Uzziah) 782- .

With the reign of Ahab we come upon a new period in Israel's history. Economic and religious forces which had been slowly developing for centuries now matured for action and made the period one of remarkable activity. Movements began which were destined in their far-off consummation to differentiate the religion of Israel from the other religions of the world.

The new queen Jezebel was a Tyrian princess. According to the custom of the time, she was permitted to raise shrines for her native deities, Melkart and Ashtart of Tyre. These gods were kindred to Jahweh and the Canaanite Baals in that all had sprung from the same antique Semitic conceptions of divinity; but they differed in that Tyre had become through commerce one of the wealthiest cities of the world, and its wealth had made its cult more ornate than the simpler cults of rural Canaan, and much more ornate than the Jahweh cult of the desert. The idleness which wealth creates, too, had tended to heighten in a disgusting way the sexual aspects of the Semitic cult as practised at Tyre.

These aspects were in primitive times comparatively innocent, and in the Jahweh cult were still so (cf. Barton, Semitic Origins, 300). Jezebel seems to have persuaded her husband also to disregard what the Israelites, in whom the spirit of individual and tribal feeling still survived, considered to be their rights. There was a royal residence in the city of Jezreel. Near this a certain Naboth owned a vineyard, which the royal pair desired. As he refused to part with it on any terms, the only way for them to obtain it was to have him put to death on the false charge of having cursed God and the king. This Jezebel did, and then Ahab seized his property. Hebrew polity made no provision for the forcible taking of property by the Government even if the equivalent in money were paid, and this high-handed procedure brought from the wilds of Gilead a champion of Jahweh and of popular rights against the king and the foreign gods—in the person of Elijah the Tishbite. It was not that Naboth had been put to death on false testimony, but that his property had been taken, that was in the eyes of Elijah the greater sin. This infringement of old Hebrew privilege he connected with the worship of the foreign deity, and in his long contest with Ahab and Jezebel he began that prophetic movement which centuries after for economic, religious, and, later, for ethical reasons produced Judaism.

On the political side we know that Ahab made an alliance with Jehoshaphat of Judah, which secured peace between the two kingdoms for a considerable time. Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (1 K 22⁴, 2 K 8¹⁸). Ahab rebuilt and fortified Jericho (1 K 16³⁴). The first part of his reign seems to have been prosperous, but about the middle of it the Moabites, according to the Moabite Stone, gained their independence. In b.c. 854 Ahab was one of a confederacy of twelve kings, who were headed by Benhadad II. of Damascus, and who fought Shalmaneser II. at Karkar on the Orontes (KIB i. 173 ff.). Although Shalmaneser claims a victory, it is clear that the allies practically defeated him. He may have taken some spoil as he claims, but he made no further progress into Palestine at that time. In the next year we find that Benhadad had invaded the trans-Jordanic territory and had seized Ramoth-gilead. Ahab, in endeavouring to regain it, had the assistance of the Judæan king, but was wounded in battle and lost his life. When Ahab died, therefore, the Moabites and Aramæans had divided his East-Jordanic lands between them. Of the brief reign of his son Ahaziah we know nothing.

Meantime, in Judah, Jehoshaphat had had a prosperous reign, although the Biblical writers tell us little of it. He had made Edom tributary to him (1 K 22⁴⁷), and had re-established a Hebrew fleet upon the Red Sea (22⁴⁸). Jehoram (or Joram), who succeeded to the throne of Israel in Jehoshaphat's last year, leaving the Aramæans in possession of Ramoth-gilead for a time, endeavoured, with the aid of Jehoshaphat and his tributary king of Edom, to re-subjugate Moab (2 K 3). They made the attack from the south, marching to it around the Dead Sea. The armies were accompanied by the prophet Elisha, who had succeeded to the work of Elijah, although he was not a man of Elijah's sturdy mould. After a march on which they nearly died of thirst, they overran Moab, besieged and nearly captured its capital. In his distress the king of Moab sacrificed his eldest son to Chemosh, the Moabite god. The sacrifice was performed on the city wall in sight of both armies, and produced such opposite effects on the superstitious minds of the besieged and the besiegers that the siege was raised and the conquest of Moab abandoned.

The chief event of the reign of Jehoram of Judah, Jehoshaphat's successor, was the loss of Edom, which regained its independence (2 K 8²⁰⁻²²). His son Ahaziah, the son of Athaliah, and a nephew of Jehoram, the reigning king of Israel, went to aid his uncle in the siege of Ramoth-gilead, which was still in possession of the king of Damascus. Joram was wounded in battle, and the two monarchs returned to the royal residence at Jezreel while the wound was healing. Meantime the prophetic circles, in which the traditions of the simple worship of Jahweh were cherished, determined to overthrow the hated house of Ahab. Elisha encouraged Jehu, a military officer employed in the siege of Ramoth-gilead, to return to Jezreel and slay the king. This he did, killing not only the king of Israel, but also the king of Judah, and exterminating Jezebel and all her offspring. This done, Jehu started for Samaria. On the way he was joined by Jonadab, son of Rechab, who had founded a kind of order of zealots for the preservation of the simpler forms of Jahweh worship. Accompanied by Jonadab, he went to Samaria, called a solemn feast in honour of Baal, and when the worshippers were assembled, massacred them all. Thus barbarous and unethical were the Jahweh-reformers of this period (cf. 2 K 9. 10). In the very year that Jehu thus gained the throne, Shalmaneser II. again marched into the West. This time apparently no powerful alliance was formed against him. Damascus and Israel were at war; resistance to the Assyrian seemed hopeless, and Jehu hastened to render submission and pay a tribute. In consequence of this Jehu is pictured on the black obelisk of Shalmaneser in the British Museum in the undignified attitude of kissing the Assyrian monarch's foot. Beyond this not too glorious revolution and this inglorious submission, the reign of Jehu, though long, accomplished nothing.

In Judah, when Ahaziah was put to death, Athaliah, the daughter of Jezebel, saw that her opportunity was slipping away. A queen-mother counted for something; she had held that position but for a year, and now it was gone. Athaliah inherited the spirit and the ruthlessness of Jezebel. Accordingly she seized the reins of government and put to death, as she thought, all the royal seed that could in any way dispute her sway. Thus it happened that a daughter of Jezebel sat on the throne of David. Here no doubt she exercised her preferences for the richer and more repulsive cult of Melkart, but in Judah there had developed as yet no strong opposition to such innovations. In this early period the religious interest is in the Northern Kingdom. What there was no prophet to do, priests, however, accomplished. One little prince, Joash, had been rescued when the slaughter of the princes occurred, and after he had been concealed six years, under the guidance of Jehoiada, the priest, he was proclaimed king, and Athaliah was assassinated (2 K 11). Joash enjoyed a long reign of forty years, during the early part of which he was under the guidance of the priests. During his reign money for the repair of the Temple was raised in a very natural way, but in a way not sanctioned by the later Levitical Code (cf. 2 K 12¹⁻¹⁶).

Meantime, in Israel, Jehu had passed away, and his son Jehoahaz had succeeded him. At the beginning of his reign Jehoahaz, like his predecessors, was unsuccessful in his efforts against Damascus, but Hazael, who now occupied the Aramaean throne, was a less able man than his predecessors, and Jehoahaz ultimately defeated him (2 K 13⁷⁻⁹). This was the beginning of an era of prosperity for Israel which was continued over into the next period.

Hazael, as he was losing strength in the East, sought to increase his prestige in the West. After a successful campaign in the Maritime Plain, he moved against Jerusalem. Joash was no warrior, and hastened to buy off the Aramaean with a heavy tribute (2 K 12¹⁷⁻¹⁸). Whether it was this that disaffected the subjects of Joash we do not know, but he was assassinated by a conspiracy (2 K 12²⁰), which placed his son Amaziah on the throne.

Meantime Jehoahaz of Israel had been succeeded by his son Jehoahaz, who followed up his father's victory over the Aramaeans, defeating them three separate times, and regaining all Israel's East-Jordanic territory (2 K 13²⁵). Amaziah, the Judean king, when once established in power, executed the assassins of his father, and then set out to build up his kingdom. Edom seemed the natural direction in which Judah could expand; he accordingly attacked, defeated, and occupied a part at least of that country. He then sent a challenge to Jehoash of Israel, which that king at first treated with contempt. The challenge, however, produced war, Israel seems to have been the invader after all, for the battle was fought at Beth-shemesh. Judah was defeated so completely that Jehoash went up and took Jerusalem without serious opposition, and broke down four hundred cubits of its wall, from the corner gate to the gate of Ephraim. Later, Amaziah, learning that a conspiracy had formed against him, fled to Lachish, which seems to have belonged to Judah. The conspirators pursued him thither, slew him, and made his young son Azariah, or Uzziah, king.

18. From Jeroboam II. to the fall of Samaria (781-722).

—The chronology of this period is as follows:—

ISRAEL	JUDAH
Jeroboam II. 781-740.	Azariah (Uzziah) 782-737.
Zechariah 6 months.	Jotham 737-735.
Shallum 740-737.	Ahaz 735-725.
Menahem 737-735.	Hezekiah 725-696.
Pekahiah 2 months.
Pekah 735-733.
Hoshea 733-722.

Towards the end of the period treated in the preceding paragraph, Israel's enemies on every side had grown weaker. An Assyrian king, Adadnirari III., had made an expedition into the West in 797, on which he claims to have received tribute not only from Tyre and Sidon, but also from the 'land of Omri' as the Assyrians still called the kingdom of Israel, but after this for more than half a century Assyria was too weak to disturb the Hebrews. The Aramaeans under Hazael had also lost their power to disturb the Israelites. Egypt under the 22nd dynasty became unable, after the one expedition of Shishak, to interfere in Asiatic affairs. Accordingly the kingdoms of Israel and Judah under the two able kings, Jeroboam and Uzziah, entered upon an era of unprecedented prosperity. Between them these monarchs restored the territory over which they ruled, almost to the limits of the Davidic boundaries. Jeroboam in his long reign extended the boundaries of Israel northward to Hamath and Damascus, perhaps including in his empire Damascus itself (2 K 14²⁸), while Uzziah, if the Chronicler is to be followed (2 Ch 26), extended his boundaries southward to the Red Sea, and reduced the Philistine cities once more to the position of tributaries. With outposts in all these directions, and the Red Sea open to commerce, a vigorous and profitable trade sprang up in this long era of peace. Freed from the necessity of continual warfare, the spirit of the nation gave itself with tremendous enthusiasm to the acquisition of material advantages. Neither earthquake nor tempest could dampen their ardour by misfortune. Wealth increased greatly, and palaces which to the simple Israelites seemed vast were reared on every hand. Every document of the time speaks of the erection of buildings or palaces. Wealth and leisure created a literary epoch, as a result of which, about 750, the E document was composed. Wealth, however, was not evenly distributed. The palaces were for a comparatively small minority. The poor, while they saw prosperity increasing around them, were daily becoming poorer. The economic conditions of the reign of Ahab, which had called forth the denunciations of Elijah, not only existed now in an exaggerated form, but were daily becoming worse. A moneyed class, distinct from the old shepherd and agricultural class, had been evolved. Capitalists then, as now, desired interest for their money. Lending it to the poor husbandman, they naturally felt justified in seizing his land if he was unable to repay. This social condition appeared to the conservative worshippers of Jahweh as in the highest degree obnoxious. Jahweh had never been the God of a commercial people. For one of His worshippers to exact usury from another was regarded as an offence against Him; to take from one of His faithful ones land given him by Jahweh in payment for debt, however just the debt, was in Jahweh's eyes unpardonable oppression of the poor.

These social conditions, thus viewed, called forth a new set of prophets,—men of a higher moral and spiritual order than any known before in Semitic history. Two of these, Amos and Hosea, belong altogether to this period, while Isaiah began his prophetic work when two-thirds of it had passed. Amos (wh. see), the earliest of them, came forward about 755 to denounce the social injustices of the Northern Kingdom and to pronounce Jahweh's doom on the whole circle of sinful nations which surrounded Israel. One-sided as his economic point of view was, his ethical standard was the loftiest and purest, and his conception of Jahweh as the God who ruled all nations carried men's thoughts into a clearer atmosphere. Amos simply denounced, but Hosea (wh. see), who came a little later, and put forward a view of Jahweh no less ethical, proclaimed Jahweh as a God of redeeming love. It is clear from the work of these prophets that the cults of Jahweh and Baal had in the lapse of time become mingled. Jahweh had long been conceived as a Baal. Hosea proclaims again the nomadic Jahweh, austere, simple, and moral, as compared with the deteriorated cults now practised by His followers.

It is clear, therefore, that the same forces were at work that appeared in the time of Ahab and Elijah, only now the foreign religious element was not so clearly foreign in the eyes of the people at large, and the economic conditions were more aggravated.

Amos and Hosea were country prophets, whose sympathies were naturally with the poorer classes of the people, but Isaiah, the city prophet, is no less strenuous than they in his denunciations of man's inhumanity to man. Towards the end of this long period of outward prosperity and social and religious ferment, a change occurred in Assyria. Pul, or Tiglath-pileser III., as he now called himself, seized the throne (B.C. 745), subsequently proving himself, both as a general and as a statesman, one of the world's great men. This monarch was, however, occupied until the year 742 in reducing the East to his sceptre. When he turned his attention to the West, the siege of Arpad occupied him for two years, so that before he interfered in Palestinian affairs Jeroboam II. had passed away.

The chronology of the Northern Kingdom after the death of Jeroboam II. is very confused. Many of the statements of the present Biblical text are manifestly incorrect. The statement of it given above is a conjectural reconstruction resting partly on the Assyrian evidence.

After Zechariah, the son of Jeroboam, had reigned but six months, a conspiracy removed him and placed Shallum on the throne. With Zechariah the house of Jehu disappeared.

Uzziah, who in his old age had become a leper, and had associated his son Jotham with him on the throne, appears to have taken a leading part in the organization of a coalition of nineteen States, including Carchemish, Hamath, and Damascus, to oppose the westward progress of Tiglath-pileser. Before the Assyrian monarch made his appearance again in the West, another revolution in Samaria had removed Shallum and placed Menahem on Israel's throne. The Assyrian, who apparently came in 737 (Esarhaddon mutilated the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser so that our data are incomplete), seems to have marched southward along the Maritime Plain as though to attack Uzziah himself. Upon his approach Menahem deserted the confederacy and hastened to pay his tribute to Assyria. Whether it was this defection or whether it was a battle that compelled Uzziah to pay tribute we do not know, but Tiglath-pileser records him among his tribute payers (KIB II. 20). Uzziah died in that year. The short, independent reign of Jotham seems to have been uneventful. Menahem died about 735; his son Pekahiah was soon removed by a revolution, and Pekah became king in Samaria (2 K 15²²⁻²⁷). In Judah, Jotham was succeeded in the same year by his youthful son Ahaz. Pekah and Rezin, who now sat on the throne of Damascus, desired to form a new confederacy to throw off Assyria's yoke. Into this they attempted to draw Ahaz, and when he declined to engage in the hopeless enterprise they threatened to make war jointly on Judah, depose Ahaz, and place a certain Tabeel on the throne of Judah. Upon the receipt of this news, consternation reigned in Jerusalem, but both king and people were reassured by the prophet Isaiah (Is 7). Isaiah's hopes were well founded, for in the next year (734) Tiglath-pileser returned to the West, took Damascus after a considerable siege (a town which his predecessors had at various times for more than a hundred years tried in vain to capture), made it an Assyrian colony, put Pekah the king of Israel to death (KIB II. 33), carried captive to Assyria the principal inhabitants of the territory north of the Plain of Jezreel (2 K 15²⁹⁻³¹), made Hoshea king of a reduced territory, and imposed upon him a heavy tribute. Ahaz, upon the approach of Tiglath-pileser, had renewed his allegiance; and after the capture of Damascus he went thither to do obeisance in person to the Assyrian monarch. Thus the whole of Israel passed irrevocably into Assyria's power. At Damascus, Ahaz saw an altar the form of which pleased him. He accordingly had a pattern of it brought to Jerusalem, and one like it constructed there. The brazen altar which Solomon had erected before the Temple was removed to one side and reserved for the king's own use. The new altar, established in its place, became the altar of ordinary priestly services.

One would suppose that the Northern Kingdom had now received such a chastisement that further revolt would not be thought of, and apparently it was not, so long as Tiglath-pileser lived. That monarch passed away, however, in 727; and soon afterwards Hoshea, encouraged by the king of a country to the south, withheld his tribute. The Biblical text calls this king 'So, king of Egypt' (2 K 17*), and it has been customary to identify him with Shabaka, the first king of the 25th dynasty. It now appears, however, that either he was a king of the Musri to the south of Palestine, or was some petty ruler of the Egyptian Delta, otherwise unknown, for Shabaka did not gain the throne of Egypt till B.C. 712 (cf. Breasted, Hist. of Egypt, 549 and 601). The folly of Hoshea's course was soon apparent. Shalmaneser IV., who had succeeded Tiglath-pileser, sent an army which overran all the territory left to Hoshea, cut off his supplies, and then shut him up in Samaria in a memorable siege. The military genius of Omri had selected the site wisely, but with the country in ruins it is a marvel that Samaria resisted for three years. While the siege dragged on its weary length, Shalmaneser died, and Sargon II. gained the Assyrian throne. Perhaps the generals who were prosecuting the siege did not know of the change till Samaria had fallen, but Sargon counts the reduction of Samaria as one of the achievements of his first year. When Samaria fell, Sargon deported 27,290 (cf. KIB II. 55) of the inhabitants of the region, including no doubt the more wealthy and influential citizens, princes, priests, etc., to cities which he had recently captured in the far East, and brought to Samaria people from Cuthah and Sippar in Babylonia, and from Hamath in Syria, to mingle with the mass of Hebrew population which he had left behind (2 K 17*). The Israelitish monarchy he abolished.

The foreigners who were introduced into Samaria at this time worshipped at first their own gods, but when lions attacked them, they petitioned to have a priest of Jahweh to teach them the worship of the God of the land. Sargon granted their request, and sent back a captive priest. In due time these foreigners intermarried with the Israelites who had been left, the cults of their gods were merged in the Jahweh cult, and they became the Samaritans. Those who seek for the 'ten lost tribes' should remember that they were never lost by captivity. Only the merest percentage of them were wrenched from their land. They were lost by becoming the substratum of later populations, and a handful still survives in the Samaritans (wh. see).

19. Hezekiah and Isaiah.—The fall of Samaria made doleful reverberations in Jerusalem. The date of the accession of Hezekiah is not quite certain, but it probably occurred before the fall of Samaria. Throughout his reign the prophet Isaiah was one of his chief advisers, and for the most part he ruled in accord with the prophetic ideals. About the time of his accession, and apparently before the fall of Samaria, another prophet, Micah, began to prophesy in the town of Moresheth (Maresha) in the Shephelah on the Philistine border. His burden was consonant with that of the three great literary prophets who had preceded him.

Judah escaped when Samaria fell, because she maintained that submissive attitude to Assyria which she had assumed when Uzziah paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser. This attitude secured her peace for some years to come, though it was not an easy attitude to maintain. On Judah's western border the petty kingdoms of Philistia were always plotting to throw off the Assyrian yoke, and endeavouring to secure the co-operation of Hezekiah. Such co-operation, however, Isaiah steadily opposed. In the year 711 Ashdod succeeded in heading a coalition which she hoped would gain her freedom, but Sargon sent an army which soon brought her to terms (Is 20¹). The course of political events went on smoothly therefore until after the death of Sargon in 705; then, as so often happened in Oriental countries, many subject lands endeavoured to gain their independence before the new monarch could consolidate his power. Hezekiah was tempted now, not by the Philistines only, but also by Merodach-baladan (Marduk-apal-iddin), a Babylonian king whom Sargon had early in his reign driven from Babylon and who now sought the opportunity to return (2 K 20¹²⁻¹³, Is 39¹⁻⁷). In this new coalition the Egyptians also, now under the stronger control of the 25th dynasty, had a part. Although Isaiah still consistently opposed the move, Hezekiah nevertheless yielded. In the city of Ekron there was one petty king faithful to Sennacherib. Him his subjects deposed, threw into fetters, and delivered to Hezekiah, who cast him into a dungeon (cf. KIB ii. 93). This was a direct act of rebellion, which Sennacherib was sure to avenge. Affairs in the East delayed the blow, but in 701 it finally fell. Sennacherib marched into the West, defeated the allies at Eltekeh, besieged and took Ekron, impaled many of the rebellious inhabitants, and invaded Judah. Forty-six of the smaller towns were captured, and Jerusalem itself was invested. Its inhabitants were of course panic-stricken, but Isaiah came forward, declaring Jerusalem to be the home of Jahweh, and, as such, inviolable in His eyes (Is 31¹). Hezekiah, meantime recognizing that his rebellion had been a grievous error, sent to Lachish, Sennacherib's headquarters, and offered to pay indemnity and tribute. Meantime Sennacherib had sent his main army on to inflict punishment upon Egypt, the strongest member of the alliance against him. On the border of Egypt his army was attacked with bubonic plague (such seeds to be the meaning of 2 K 19³⁵ combined with Herod. ii. 141), which rendered further operations impossible; he accordingly accepted Hezekiah's terms, raised the siege of Jerusalem, and withdrew to Assyria.

This event had a profound influence on Israel's religious history. In the time of David and Solomon, Jerusalem was a new town to the Israelites, and a town without religious associations. The real home of Jahweh was on Mount Sinai, but the land contained scores of shrines more dear to Him than Jerusalem, because He had longer dwelt in them. Solomon's innovations had tended to increase this feeling, and although the lapse of three hundred years had given Jerusalem an important place among the shrines, especially as the capital of the kingdom of Judah, nothing had occurred until now to make men think that it was the home of Jahweh par excellence. Now He had palpably abandoned the shrines of the Northern Kingdom, and by this victory, vindicating as it did the word of His prophet, He had shown that He had chosen Jerusalem as His permanent abode. Thus this event introduced Jerusalem to that place in the reverence and affection of the Hebrews which has made it the Holy City of three great religions.

According to 2 K 18¹ (R^D), Hezekiah attempted to abolish the country shrines and centralize the worship in Jerusalem. Some have doubted this statement, and others have thought that it is confirmed by an older document quoted in 2 K 18²². It seems in accord with historical probability that, prompted by Isaiah, Hezekiah should in his closing years have made such an effort. Hosea had seen, a generation before, that the worship of Jahweh could never be socially pure till separated from the elements which he believed had been introduced from the cult of Baal, and now that Isaiah had become convinced that Jerusalem had been Divinely proved to be Jahweh's special abode, it is certainly within the realm of probability that he prompted the king to do away with all other demoralizing shrines. If Jahweh could have only one temple and that under prophetic control, His cult would be forever differentiated from that of the Baals. What time could be more opportune for such a movement than the beginning of the 7th cent., when first the captivity of the Northern Kingdom, and then the reduction of the territory of Judah to narrow limits by Sennacherib, left at a minimum the number of shrines to be destroyed?

20. Manasseh and Amon.—From the time of Amon to the accession of Manasseh the prophetic vision had made steady progress, and the elevation of the religion of Jahweh and of the recognized standard of morals had gone steadily forward, but in the long reign of Manasseh (696-641) a strong reaction occurred. It is difficult to account for this reaction unless some attempt to destroy the village shrines had been made by Hezekiah, but if this be presupposed, all that occurred is natural. The superstitious prejudices of the village people had been outraged. They clamoured for liberty to worship at the village shrines consecrated by the usage of unknown antiquity, and the king, when Isaiah was gone, had no real motive for resisting them. Then, too, the period seems to have been a time of distress, Manasseh seems to have quietly remained in vassalage to Assyria, so that the armies of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, which four times marched along the coast and accomplished the reduction of Egypt during his reign, did not disturb Judah, though she may have been compelled to contribute to their support. Perhaps there was civil war in Jerusalem, for we are told that Manasseh shed much innocent blood (2 K 21¹⁶). At all events, whether on account of war, or famine, or unjust rule, his reign was a time of distress, and Judah sought escape from her trouble, not through prophetic reform, but by the revival of half-heathenish, outworn forms of worship. Jahweh was worshipped as Molek, or king, and to Him in this capacity child sacrifice, which had been prevalent among the Semites in early days, was revived. The Ammonites called their god Molek (Molech [wh. see]), and human sacrifice was still practised at times by Judah's heathen neighbours, especially by the Phœnicians. The prophets accordingly combated this form of worship as displeasing to Jahweh, and tried to persuade their countrymen that it was a foreign cult.

This turn of affairs drove those who cherished the ideals of Isaiah into retirement, where, being able to do nothing else for the cause they loved, one of them, about 650, drew up the legal code of Deuteronomy as the expression of the conditions which the prophetic experience had found to be necessary to the realization of their ideal.

The brief reign of Amon was but a continuation of the reign of his father.

21. Josiah and the Deuteronomic Reform.—Of the early part of the reign of Josiah, who ascended the throne as a boy of eight, we know little. Probably the customs which the previous reign had established were continued. In his thirteenth year, Jeremiah, a young priest from Anathoth, came forward as a prophet. In the next year the great Assyrian king Ashurbanipal died, and Assyria, whose power had been shattered by a great rebellion twenty years before, rapidly sank to her end. In Josiah's eighteenth year repairs on the Temple were undertaken at the king's command. During the progress of these, it was reported to him that in making the repairs they had found the copy of a code purporting to be the Law of Moses. When this was read to the king he was filled with consternation, since the current cult violated it in almost every particular. To test the genuineness of the Law it was submitted to an old prophetess, Huldah, who, since it agreed with her conceptions of the ideal religion of Jahweh, declared it to be the genuine Law of Moses (2 K 22). Upon this Josiah set himself to adjust the religious worship and institutions of his kingdom to this standard, and to a great reform, which swept away from Judah all shrines except the Temple in Jerusalem, all pillars as representatives of deity, and all ashtrahs, together with all immorality practised under the guise of religion (2 K 23). Modern criticism has clearly demonstrated that the Law which came into operation at this time was the Law of Deuteronomy.

This reform cost a long struggle. People who had all their lives regarded certain spots as places where Jahweh revealed Himself, and who knew that their ancestors for centuries had done the same, did not tamely yield to the new order. All the authority of the king and all the strength of the prophetic order were needed to carry it through, and the struggle continued for a generation. It was this reform, however, that began the creation of the Jew. But for it, he would not still be a distinct figure in the world.

This struggle for a better religion went on successfully for some years, when the little Judæan State was overtaken by a sad misfortune.

Assyria was tottering to its fall. Babylon, which had regained its independence upon the death of Ashurbanipal, in 625, was rapidly growing in power. Egypt, which under the 26th dynasty now possessed once more a line of native kings, had a monarch, Necho II., ambitious to re-establish for her an Asiatic empire. In 609 or 608 Necho marched an army into Asia and moved northward along the Maritime Plain. Josiah, probably because he determined to claim sovereignty over all the territory formerly occupied by Israel, marched northward with an army, fought Necho at the ancient battlefield of Megiddo, and met with defeat and death (2 K 23²⁹⁻³⁰). A greater calamity could scarcely have befallen the party of religious reform. Not only was their king fallen, but their hope of a prosperous Judæan kingdom, faithful to Jahweh's new Law, was rudely dashed to the ground.

22. Last Days of the Kingdom.—When the news of the defeat at Megiddo reached Jerusalem, the leaders of the people there placed Jehoahaz, a son of Josiah, on the throne. Necho meantime proceeded northward, taking possession of the country, and established his headquarters at Riblah in the territory of Hamath. Thither he summoned Jehoahaz, threw him into bonds, sent him to Egypt as a prisoner, and made his brother Eliakim king, imposing a heavy tribute upon the country (2 K 23³¹⁻³⁴). Eliakim upon his accession took the name of Jehoiakim (2 K 23³⁴). Judah thus became tributary to Egypt. Jehoiakim proved to be a man of quite different religious interests from his father, as the Book of Jeremiah makes clear.

Events in Western Asia were changing rapidly, and within a few years they gave Jehoiakim a new master. The new Babylonian power was pushing westward to secure as much of the Euphrates valley and of the West as possible. Assyria had fallen at the hands of Indo-European hordes in the year 606. Necho was ambitious to follow up his previous success and to check the growth of the Babylonian power. Accordingly in 604 he entered Asia again and marched to the Euphrates. Here he was met by Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian crown prince, and so crushingly defeated that he fled rapidly homeward, Nebuchadnezzar following closely upon his heels (Jer 46). Thus perished Necho's dreams of Asiatic empire, and thus Judah passed into vassalage to Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar, on the border of Egypt, ready to invade and conquer it, was informed of the death of his father in Babylon, and hastened home to secure his crown.

So important in the history of his people did Jeremiah consider this crisis, that at this time he first began to put the substance of his prophecies in writing, that they might have wider and more permanent influence (Jer 36). Nebuchadnezzar appears not to have been able to establish order in Western Asia all at once, so distracted was the country. He established his headquarters at Riblah, and for several years sent out bands of soldiers whither they were most needed. Jehoiakim, thinking to take advantage of the unsettled state, withheld his tribute, and some of these bands, composed of men of neighbouring tribes, were sent against him (2 K 24¹⁻²). Jehoiakim continued obstinate, however, and Nebuchadnezzar finally, in 598, sent a large army. Before it arrived Jehoiakim was no more, and his young son Jehoiachin was occupying his throne. Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, which after three months was compelled to capitulate, whereupon the Babylonian took ten thousand of the most prominent men, princes, warriors, priests, and craftsmen, and transported them to Babylonia. Another son of Josiah, who now took the name of Zedekiah, was placed upon the throne, subject of course to a heavy Babylonian tribute. Jehoiachin, a youth of twenty, was taken prisoner to Babylon, to languish in prison for many years.

It was now to be seen whether Judah would repeat the history of the Northern Kingdom or whether her king would have wisdom to remain faithful to Babylon. Jeremiah, as he had done for years, steadily proclaimed that Judah's sole safety lay in fidelity to Babylon; such was the will of Jahweh. There was in Jerusalem, however, a strong party who advocated an alliance with Egypt as a means of securing freedom from Babylon. The king himself was weak and unwise. Finally, in 588, when Hophra, filled with ambitions for an Asiatic empire, ascended the Egyptian throne, he made such promises of aid to Judah that the standard of revolt was raised. Jeremiah, one of the greatest religious teachers that ever lived, did not, like Isaiah a century before, proclaim Jerusalem inviolate. He had seen further into the heart of religion, and now declared that Jahweh would abandon Jerusalem, and establish an inner covenant of the heart with all who were faithful. His younger contemporary, Ezekiel, a young priest who had been carried to Babylonia in 598, and had in 593 become a prophet there, was also teaching a similarly high conception of religion, and, with Jeremiah, preparing the faith of the people to survive the approaching shock. In 587 the Babylonian army appeared and the siege of Jerusalem began. The tedious suffering of its weary months may be traced in the Book of Jeremiah.

Early in 586, Hophra marched an army into Palestine, and Nebuchadnezzar was obliged to raise the siege to send his full force against the Egyptian. Jerusalem was then wild with joy, thinking deliverance had come. Jeremiah and his party were laughed to scorn. But Hophra was soon defeated, the siege of Jerusalem renewed and pressed to completion. In August the city surrendered, its wall was broken down, its glorious Temple destroyed, another large body of captives transported to Babylonia, and Zedekiah after being blinded was taken there too (2 K 25). Thus Jerusalem suffered the fate of Samaria. Providentially, however, before Jerusalem fell, the work of the prophets had so taken root, and such reforms had been instituted, that the future of spiritual religion was assured. Those who had been deported were again the more prominent citizens. The poorer people and the peasantry were not disturbed. Gedaliah was made governor of Judaea, and, because Jerusalem was desolate, Mizpeh, five miles to the north-west, was made the capital. Gedaliah had been in office but two months when he was assassinated, and this event so terrified some friends of Jeremiah, who had been permitted with the prophet to remain in Palestine, that they took Jeremiah, contrary to his advice, and fled to Egypt (2 K 25²⁶ and Jer 41-43).

23. The Exile.—Counting women and children, perhaps fifty thousand Jews had been transported to Babylonia in the two deportations of Nebuchadnezzar. These, with the exception of a few political leaders, were settled in colonies, in which they were permitted to have houses of their own, visit one another freely, and engage in business (Jer 29⁹⁻¹¹). Ezekiel gives us the picture of one of these at Tel-abib (Ezk 3¹⁶ 8¹ 20¹⁶ 24¹⁸ etc.), by the river Chebar (a canal near Nippur; cf. Bab. Ex. of Univ. of Pa., Cun. Texts, ix. 28), in which the Palestinian organization of 'elders' was perpetuated. In such communities the Jews settled down in Babylonia. The poorer ones in Palestine kept up as best they could the old religion, in an ignorant and superstitious way (cf. Jer 41¹⁶), while the priests and the more intelligent of the religious devotees transported to Babylon cherished the laws of the past, and fondly framed ideals for a future which they were confident would come. Such an one was Ezekiel, who lived and wrote among the captives till about B.C. 570. After the destruction of the city he elaborated a new religious polity for the nation, hoping that it would form the basis of Israel's organization when the time for the re-construction of the State came. Some years later another writer (P) wrote the 'Holiness Code' gathering up the traditions of the past, and shaping them with a view to a future religious ideal. Meantime many of the practically minded Jews had engaged in business in Babylonia and were acquiring wealth.

Thus time passed on, Nebuchadnezzar died, and his weak successors were rapidly following one another, when in the East a new political figure appeared. Cyrus, a petty king of Anshan, a small district of Elam, had conquered Persia, then Media and the Indo-European hordes called in the inscriptions 'Manda,' and was pushing his arms westward to the subjugation of Croesus of Lydia. At this juncture one of the world's great poets and prophets appeared among the captives, and in most eloquent and poetic strain taught them that Cyrus was the instrument of Jahweh, the God of heaven, that he was conquering for Jahweh and for them, and that it was Jahweh's will that they should return to rebuild Jerusalem and the desolations of Judah. The name of this prophet is lost, but his work now forms chs. 40-45 of the Book of Isaiah. The hope of this poet in Cyrus was justified, for in 538 Cyrus captured Babylon, overturning the Chaldean empire, and reversed the policy of transportation which Assyrians and Babylonians alike had pursued from the time of Tiglath-pileser III. Cyrus himself tells in a cuneiform inscription (A/B III², 121^r) that he permitted captive peoples to return to their lands and rebuild their temples. This gave the Jews the opportunity for which the Second Isaiah (so-called) had hoped. The prophet's faith in his own people was not so well justified. It was years before any considerable number of the captives made use of their newly acquired liberty (see § 24). They were interested in their religion, but they had learned to practise it outside of Palestine without sacrificial ritual, and the opportunities in Babylonia for wealth and trade were too good to be abandoned for the sterile soil of the land of their fathers. Here, accordingly, they continued to live for fifteen hundred years. They frequently sent money contributions to their brethren in Jerusalem; and occasionally a few of them returned thither. After a time they chose Exiliarchs, or 'Princes of the Captivity.' Schools of Jewish learning developed here. In due time the Babylonian Talmud was compiled in these schools. These communities thus survived the vicissitudes of Persian, Macedonian, Parthian, Sassanian, and Arabian rule, continuing to have their Exiliarchs till the 11th cent. A.D., when the oppressions to which they were subjected led them gradually to migrate (cf. J.E. v. 288-291).

24. Reconstruction of the Jewish State.—We have been accustomed to suppose, on the authority of the Book of Ezra, that when Cyrus issued his permission to exiled peoples to return and rehabilitate their shrines and their States, a large number at once went back. Recent investigation has, however, discredited this view. Haggai and Zechariah twenty years later know of no such return, and probably it did not take place. Twenty years later we find Zerubbabel, a grandson of the unfortunate king Jehoiachin, present in Jerusalem as governor, and a high priest named Joshua in charge of the worship. The altar of Jahweh had been rebuilt on the old site, but Jerusalem and the Temple were still in ruins. The tolerance of the Persians is shown in allowing the Jews a governor of their own royal family. He, with a small retinue, had no doubt returned from Babylonia, but we have no evidence that others had come back.

The Jewish population which had been left behind in Palestine, equally with those in Babylonia, expected at some time the re-construction of the Jewish institutions. A prolonged famine led Haggai in the second year of Darius I. (B.C. 519) to persuade the people that Jahweh withheld rain because He was displeased that the Temple was not yet rebuilt. Another prophet, Zechariah, took up the same burden, and under their leadership and inspiration the Temple was rebuilt by B.C. 516 on the lines of the old wall. Contributions to aid this enterprise had been received from their brethren in Babylonia. The first six years of the reign of Darius were troublous times. The reign of the false Bardiya had made nations suspect that the government of Persia was weak, and it became necessary for Darius to reconquer his empire, as many of the subject nations took the opportunity to rebel. It is probable that Zerubbabel represents such a movement. Scholars now have no doubt that Zechariah regarded Zerubbabel as the Messiah, and expected him to be crowned and to reign jointly with the high priest Joshua. Such is the meaning which underlies the text of Zec 3 (cf. H. P. Smith, OT Hist. 357 ff.). How these expectations were thwarted we can only guess. We know with what a strong arm the great Darius put down revolutions elsewhere, and certain it is that Jewish hopes for independence were not at this time realized.

Our knowledge of the next eighty years, till the arrival of Nehemiah, is derived from Is 56-66, large parts of which appear to come from this period, and from the anonymous prophet called Malachi, who, perhaps, wrote shortly before Nehemiah's return. The tone of these writings is one of depression and anarchy, both in civil and in religious affairs. Zerubbabel had been succeeded by a foreign governor (Mal 1¹), who probably to persuade their countrymen that it was a foreign cult.

This turn of affairs drove those who cherished the ideals of Isaiah into retirement, where, being able to do nothing else for the cause they loved, one of them, about 650, drew up the legal code of Deuteronomy as the expression of the conditions which the prophetic experience had found to be necessary to the realization of their ideal.

22. Last Days of the Kingdom.—When the news of the defeat at Megiddo reached Jerusalem, the leaders of the people there placed Jehoahaz, a son of Josiah, on the throne. Necho meantime proceeded northward, taking possession of the country, and established his headquarters at Riblah in the territory of Hamath. Thither he summoned Jehoahaz, threw him into bonds, sent him to Egypt as a prisoner, and made his brother Eliakim king, imposing a heavy tribute upon the country (2 K 23³¹⁻³⁴). Eliakim upon his accession took the name of Jehoiakim (2 K 23³⁴). Judah thus became tributary to Egypt. Jehoiakim proved to be a man of quite different religious interests from his father, as the Book of Jeremiah makes clear.

Events in Western Asia were changing rapidly, and within a few years they gave Jehoiakim a new master. The new Babylonian power was pushing westward to secure as much of the Euphrates valley and of the West as possible. Assyria had fallen at the hands of Indo-European hordes in the year 606. Necho was ambitious to follow up his previous success and to check the growth of the Babylonian power. Accordingly in 604 he entered Asia again and marched to the Euphrates. Here he was met by Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian crown prince, and so crushingly defeated that he fled rapidly homeward, Nebuchadnezzar following closely upon his heels (Jer 46). Thus perished Necho's dreams of Asiatic empire, and thus Judah passed into vassalage to Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar, on the border of Egypt, ready to invade and conquer it, was informed of the death of his father in Babylon, and hastened home to secure his crown.

So important in the history of his people did Jeremiah consider this crisis, that at this time he first began to put the substance of his prophecies in writing, that they might have wider and more permanent influence (Jer 36). Nebuchadnezzar appears not to have been able to establish order in Western Asia all at once, so distracted was the country. He established his headquarters at Riblah, and for several years sent out bands of soldiers whither they were most needed. Jehoiakim, thinking to take advantage of the unsettled state, withheld his tribute, and some of these bands, composed of men of neighbouring tribes, were sent against him (2 K 24¹⁻²). Jehoiakim continued obstinate, however, and Nebuchadnezzar finally, in 598, sent a large army. Before it arrived Jehoiakim was no more, and his young son Jehoiachin was occupying his throne. Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, which after three months was compelled to capitulate, whereupon the Babylonian took ten thousand of the most prominent men, princes, warriors, priests, and craftsmen, and transported them to Babylonia. Another son of Josiah, who now took the name of Zedekiah, was placed upon the throne, subject of course to a heavy Babylonian tribute. Jehoiachin, a youth of twenty, was taken prisoner to Babylon, to languish in prison for many years.

It was now to be seen whether Judah would repeat the history of the Northern Kingdom or whether her king would have wisdom to remain faithful to Babylon. Jeremiah, as he had done for years, steadily proclaimed that Judah's sole safety lay in fidelity to Babylon: such was the will of Jahweh. There was in Jerusalem, however, a strong party who advocated an alliance with Egypt as a means of securing freedom from Babylon. The king himself was weak and unwise. Finally, in 588, when Hophra, filled with ambitions for an Asiatic empire, ascended the Egyptian throne, he made such promises of aid to Judah that the standard of revolt was raised. Jeremiah, one of the greatest religious teachers that ever lived, did not, like Isaiah a century before, proclaim Jerusalem inviolate. He had seen further into the heart of religion, and now declared that Jahweh would abandon Jerusalem, and establish an inner covenant of the heart with all who were faithful. His younger contemporary, Ezekiel, a young priest who had been carried to Babylonia in 598, and had in 593 become a prophet there, was also teaching a similarly high conception of religion, and, with Jeremiah, preparing the faith of the people to survive the approaching shock. In 587 the Babylonian army appeared and the siege of Jerusalem began. The tedious suffering of its weary months may be traced in the Book of Jeremiah.

Early in 586, Hophra marched an army into Palestine, and Nebuchadnezzar was obliged to raise the siege to send his full force against the Egyptian. Jerusalem was then wild with joy, thinking deliverance had come. Jeremiah and his party were laughed to scorn. But Hophra was soon defeated, the siege of Jerusalem renewed and pressed to completion. In August the city surrendered, its wall was broken down, its glorious Temple destroyed, another large body of captives transported to Babylonia, and Zedekiah after being blinded was taken there too (2 K 25). Thus Jerusalem suffered the fate of Samaria. Providentially, however, before Jerusalem fell, the work of the prophets had so taken root, and such reforms had been instituted, that the future of spiritual religion was assured. Those who had been deported were again the more prominent citizens. The poorer people and the peasantry were not disturbed. Gedaliah was made governor of Judaea, and, because Jerusalem was desolate, Mizpeh, five miles to the northwest, was made the capital. Gedaliah had been in office but two months when he was assassinated, and this event so terrified some friends of Jeremiah, who had been permitted with the prophet to remain in Palestine, that they took Jeremiah, contrary to his advice, and fled to Egypt (2 K 25^{20ff.} and Jer 41-43).

23. The Exile.—Counting women and children, perhaps fifty thousand Jews had been transported to Babylonia in the deportations of Nebuchadnezzar. These, with the exception of a few political leaders, were settled in colonies, in which they were permitted to have houses of their own, visit one another freely, and engage in business (Jer 29^{ff.}). Ezekiel gives us the picture of one of these at Tel-abib (Ezk 3¹⁶ 8¹ 20^{ff.} 24¹⁸ etc.), by the river Chebar (a canal near Nippur; cf. Bab. Ex. of Univ. of Pa., Cum. Texts, ix. 28), in which the Palestinian organization of 'elders' was perpetuated. In such communities the Jews settled down in Babylonia. The poorer ones in Palestine kept up as best they could the old religion, in an ignorant and superstitious way (cf. Jer 41^{ff.}), while the priests and the more intelligent of the religious devotees transported to Babylon cherished the laws of the past, and fondly framed ideals for a future which they were confident would come. Such an one was Ezekiel, who lived and wrote among the captives till about B.C. 570. After the destruction of the city he elaborated a new religious polity for the nation, hoping that it would form the basis of Israel's organization when the time for the re-construction of the State came. Some years later another writer (P) wrote the 'Holiness Code' gathering up the traditions of the past, and shaping them with a view to a future religious ideal. Meantime many of the practically minded Jews had engaged in business in Babylonia and were acquiring wealth.

Thus time passed on, Nebuchadnezzar died, and his weak successors were rapidly following one another, when in the East a new political figure appeared. Cyrus, a petty king of Anshan, a small district of Elam, had conquered Persia, then Media and the Indo-European hordes called in the inscriptions 'Manda,' and was pushing his arms westward to the subjugation of Crœsus of Lydia. At this juncture one of the world's great poets and prophets appeared among the captives, and in most eloquent and poetic strain taught them that Cyrus was the instrument of Jahweh, the God of heaven, that he was conquering for Jahweh and for them, and that it was Jahweh's will that they should return to rebuild Jerusalem and the desolations of Judah. The name of this prophet is lost, but his work now forms chs. 40-45 of the Book of Isaiah. The hope of this poet in Cyrus was justified, for in 538 Cyrus captured Babylon, overturning the Chaldean empire, and reversed the policy of transportation which Assyrians and Babylonians alike had pursued from the time of Tiglath-pileser III. Cyrus himself tells in a cuneiform inscription (ATB III², 121^r) that he permitted captive peoples to return to their lands and rebuild their temples. This gave the Jews the opportunity for which the Second Isaiah (so-called) had hoped. The prophet's faith in his own people was not so well justified. It was years before any considerable number of the captives made use of their newly acquired liberty (see § 24). They were interested in their religion, but they had learned to practise it outside of Palestine without sacrificial ritual, and the opportunities in Babylonia for wealth and trade were too good to be abandoned for the sterile soil of the land of their fathers. Here, accordingly, they continued to live for fifteen hundred years. They frequently sent money contributions to their brethren in Jerusalem; and occasionally a few of them returned thither. After a time they chose Exiliarchs, or 'Princes of the Captivity.' Schools of Jewish learning developed here. In due time the Babylonian Talmud was compiled in these schools. These communities thus survived the vicissitudes of Persian, Macedonian, Parthian, Sassanian, and Arabian rule, continuing to have their Exiliarchs till the 11th cent. A.D., when the oppressions to which they were subjected led them gradually to migrate (cf. JE v. 288-291).

24. Reconstruction of the Jewish State.—We have been accustomed to suppose, on the authority of the Book of Ezra, that when Cyrus issued his permission to exiled peoples to return and rehabilitate their shrines and their States, a large number at once went back. Recent investigation has, however, discredited this view. Haggai and Zechariah twenty years later know of no such return, and probably it did not take place. Twenty years later we find Zerubbabel, a grandson of the unfortunate king Jehoiachin, present in Jerusalem as governor, and a high priest named Joshua in charge of the worship. The altar of Jahweh had been rebuilt on the old site, but Jerusalem and the Temple were still in ruins. The tolerance of the Persians is shown in allowing the Jews a governor of their own royal family. He, with a small retinue, had no doubt returned from Babylonia, but we have no evidence that others had come back.

The Jewish population which had been left behind in Palestine, equally with those in Babylonia, expected at some time the re-construction of the Jewish institutions. A prolonged famine led Haggai in the second year of Darius I. (B.C. 519) to persuade the people that Jahweh withheld rain because He was displeased that the Temple was not yet rebuilt. Another prophet, Zechariah, took up the same burden, and under their leadership and inspiration the Temple was rebuilt by B.C. 516 on the lines of the old wall. Contributions to aid this enterprise had been received from their brethren in Babylonia. The first six years of the reign of Darius were troublous times. The reign of the false Bardiya had made nations suspect that the government of Persia was weak, and it became necessary for Darius to reconquer his empire, as many of the subject nations took the opportunity to rebel. It is probable that Zerubbabel represents such a movement. Scholars now have no doubt that Zechariah regarded Zerubbabel as the Messiah, and expected him to be crowned and to reign jointly with the high priest Joshua. Such is the meaning which underlies the text of Zec 3 (cf. H. P. Smith, OT Hist. 357 ff.). How these expectations were thwarted we can only guess. We know with what a strong arm the great Darius put down revolutions elsewhere, and certain it is that Jewish hopes for independence were not at this time realized.

Our knowledge of the next eighty years, till the arrival of Nehemiah, is derived from Is 56-66, large parts of which appear to come from this period, and from the anonymous prophet called Malachi, who, perhaps, wrote shortly before Nehemiah's return. The tone of these writings is one of depression and anarchy, both in civil and in religious affairs. Zerubbabel had been succeeded by a foreign governor (Mal 1⁸), who probably had little sympathy with Jewish ideals. The Nabataeans had pushed the Edomites out of their old territory, and the latter had occupied southern Judaea almost as far as Hebron. These migrations caused unrest and suffering in Judah. The Samaritans, who had apparently spread to the valley of Ajlalon, held many of the approaches to the city. The Jewish colony occupied but a small territory about Jerusalem, and in their distress some, as in the days of Manasseh, were seeking relief in the revival of long-discarded superstitious rites (Is 65¹¹). There were nevertheless some souls of noble faith whose utterances we still cherish among the treasures of our Scriptures. Thus passed the reigns of Darius and Xerxes. Somewhere, whether in Babylonia or Palestine we cannot tell, the priestly Grundchrift—the main body of the Priestly document—was compiled by P² during this period, about B.C. 450.

Such was the state of affairs when in B.C. 444, Nehemiah, the noble young Jewish cup-bearer of Artaxerxes I., arrived in Jerusalem with a commission from the king to rebuild the walls. The energy with which Nehemiah devoted himself to the erection of the walls, the opposition which he encountered from the surrounding tribes, especially from the Samaritans, who wished to share in the religious privileges of the Temple, but whom his narrow conceptions excluded, and the success which attended his labours, are forcibly depicted in Neh 1-7. Before the summer of 444 was over, Jerusalem had a wall as well as a Temple. Nehemiah remained for some years as governor, and then returned to Persia. He came back a second time to the governorship in B.C. 432, and continued in the office for a length of time which we cannot now trace. Perhaps it was until his death, but we do not know when this occurred. During Nehemiah's administration he persuaded the Jews to do away with all foreign marriages; with, it is stated, the aid of Ezra the scribe, he introduced the Pentateuch, so constructed that the Levitical law was its heart and core, and bound the people to observe its provisions (Neh 8, 9); and he completely separated the true Jews from the Samaritans (Neh 13^{28ff.}), thus thoroughly organizing the Jewish community in civil and religious affairs. Nehemiah completed what Ezekiel had begun. The whole Levitical ritual was at this time established. The menial offices of the Temple were assigned to Levites, to whom also was committed the singing. This organization a hundred years later was so thoroughly fixed that the Chronicler could attribute it to David. Probably it was at the time of Nehemiah that the first book of the Psalter (Pss 3-41) was compiled. When Nehemiah died, the Jewish State was not only reconstructed, but was transformed into the Jewish Church.

25. Late Persian and Early Greek Periods.—After the time of Nehemiah our sources fail us for a considerable period. Only one other glimpse of the Jewish colony do they afford us before the fall of the Persian empire, and this glimpse is a somewhat confused one. Josephus (Ant. xi. vii. 1) tells us that the Persian general Bagoas, whom he calls Bagoses, entered the Temple, and oppressed the Jews seven years, because the high priest John murdered his brother Joshua, a friend of Bagoas, for whom the latter had promised to obtain the high priesthood. Perhaps there was more underlying this than appears upon the surface. Many have supposed, at least, that the action of Bagoas was the result of an attempt on the part of the Jews to regain their independence.

Josephus (Ant. xi. viii. 3f.) also tells a tale of the fidelity of the high priest Jaddua to Darius III., while Alexander the Great was besieging Tyre. Alexander summoned the Jews to aid him, so the story runs, but on the ground of loyalty they refused. Alexander, after the surrender of Gaza, marched personally to Jerusalem to take vengeance upon it. At his approach the Jews, clad in white, marched out to Scopus. The high priest, wearing his glorious robes of office, led the assemblage, and Alexander seeing them forgot his wrath and saluted the high priest graciously.

This story is no doubt mere legend. Arrian, for example, declares that the rest of Palestine had submitted before the siege of Gaza. Jerusalem was to Alexander simply one Syrian town. It was out of his route, and probably was never visited by him. The one element of truth in the tale is that the high priest was the head of the Jewish community.

During the wars that followed the death of Alexander, Judaea must often have suffered. In the struggles between the generals, the armies of Antigonus and Demetrius were at various times in this region. In 312 a great battle was fought near Gaza, and the Jews must have had their share of the hardship and uncertainty which in the shock of empires during those years tried men's souls. Palestine finally fell however, to the lot of Ptolemy Lagi, who had secured Egypt, and for a century was subject to the Ptolemaic line. Seleucus regarded it as rightfully his, but on account of the help Ptolemy had given him when his fortunes were at a low ebb, he did nothing more than enter a verbal protest, though Sulpicius Severus says (Sacr. Hist. ii. 17) that he exacted 300 talents in tribute from him. The age was a period of migration, and the Jews felt the impulse along with others. During this century large settlements were made by them in Egypt, and probably elsewhere (see DISPERSION). In 220 Antiochus the Great gained Palestine for Syria, but in 219 it reverted to Egypt again. Finally, in B.C. 199, he permanently attached it to Syria, and its fortunes were never subject to the Ptolemys again.

The chief connexion with the suzerain power during this period was through the payment of taxes. At one period the Egyptian king became dissatisfied with the high priest's management of the finances and committed them to the care of one Joseph, son of Tobias, who with his sons led for a generation or two spectacular careers (cf. Ant. xii. iv.). At times tribute had to be paid both to Syria and to Egypt.

During this period the head of the Jewish community was the high priest, assisted by a Sanhedrin or council. The religious life of the community can only be inferred from the literature. An intense devotion to the Law was begotten in the minds of the Jewish people, as is shown by such psalms as the 119th. But the life of the community was a varied one. The 'Wisdom' literature was cultivated, and many a passionate psalm attests that a deep religious life superior to all formalism was springing up (cf. e.g. Ps 51).

26. The Maccabean Revolt.—For many years the Hellenic civilization, radiating from the many cities founded by the Macedonians, found no welcome among the little Jewish community in Jerusalem. Gradually, however, it penetrated even there, and under the Syrians certain high priests adopted Greek names, and, to court the favour of the Syrian kings, cultivated Hellenic practices. In Jerusalem, where there was a Syrian garrison, Greek culture became popular, gymnasia were established, and men went so far as to attempt to remove artificially the signs of circumcision. The country towns were more conservative, but possibly even here the movement would have made its way had not Antiochus IV. determined to force upon the Jews both Greek culture and religion. One curious feature of this period consists in the fact that a high priest, Onias III., deposed by Syrian intervention, went to Egypt and established at Leontopolis in the nome of Heliopolis a temple to Jahweh, which existed there for a hundred years.

In B.C. 168, Antiochus commanded altars to Zeus to be erected throughout the land, and especially in the Temple at Jerusalem. He also directed swine to be offered in sacrifice upon them. The fear of Syrian arms secured wide-spread obedience to this decree. In the little town of Modin, however, an old priest, Mattathias, struck down the officiating priest and raised the standard of revolt. The faithful soon rallied to his standard, and he made his son Judas captain over them. Unexpected victories speedily followed, and the successful Judas was surnamed Makkab, 'the hammer.' Mattathias died before the end of the first year, but the struggle was continued by his sons. At the end of three years the Syrians had been driven from the Temple, though they still held the fortress which overlooked it. Accordingly, in December 165, three years after the Temple had been defiled, a great feast was held for its dedication. Up to this time Judas had been aided by the Chasidim, or pious—a set of religious devotees whose ideal was ceremonial puritanism. This party would have been satisfied to rest in what had already been achieved, but Judas and his brethren aimed at political independence. Although it estranged the Chasidim, Judas, with varying fortunes, maintained the struggle till B.C. 161. Antiochus IV. died, the forces of the young Antiochus V. were defeated, a great victory was won over Nicanor, whom Demetrius I., the next king of Syria, sent to Judæa. This victory was long celebrated in a yearly festival. Judas himself fell before the end of the year 161 in a battle with the force which Demetrius sent to avenge the death of Nicanor.

The direction of the Jewish cause then fell to Jonathan, one of the brothers of Judas, who for nearly twenty years was the leader (161–143). At the beginning of this period the Maccabæan fortunes were at their lowest ebb. At first Jonathan thought of taking refuge with the Nabatæans, but here he was treacherously treated and his brother John was slain. He himself, with a considerable force, was caught near the Jordan by the Syrians, and escaped only by swimming the river to the western side. Here Jonathan maintained himself for some years as an outlaw in the wilderness of Judæa. After many unsuccessful efforts to capture him, the Syrians finally (B.C. 153) entered into a treaty with him whereby he was permitted to live at Michmash as a kind of licensed free-booter. Here, like David in his outlaw days, he ruled over such as came to him. A little later Alexander Balas appeared in the field as a contestant for the Syrian crown. This proved a great help to the Maccabæan cause, as both parties were willing to bid high for the support of Jonathan. Jonathan for a time adhered to the cause of Alexander, who killed Demetrius I. and secured the crown. But although Alexander had driven Demetrius I. from the field, he was left but a short time in undisputed possession of the Syrian throne. Demetrius II. appeared, and bid high for Jewish favour. He recognized Jonathan as high priest, and exempted the Jews from various taxes. This angered the adherents of Alexander, one of whom lured Jonathan to Ptolemais for a conference and treacherously put him to death. Another brother, Simon (143–135), then assumed the leadership. The star of Alexander Balas went down, and Demetrius II. made a treaty which once more recognized the independence of the Jews. This event created the wildest joy. Never since Uzziah had paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III. in B.C. 737, unless it was for a few years in the reign of Josiah, had the Jews been politically free. It seemed like a new birth of the nation, and it stimulated the national genius and devotion in all directions. Many psalms were written at this period, and the whole civil and religious polity of the nation were reorganized. Simon was made both political head of the nation and high priest, and it was ordained that these offices should continue in his house for ever, or until a faithful prophet should arise (1 Mac 14^{11f.}). Simon spent his energies in the following years in organizing his government and consolidating his territory. He was successful in taking possession of Gezer, where he built a large castle, recently excavated; also Joppa, which he made his port, and on the other side of the country, Jericho. At the latter place he was assassinated in B.C. 135 by his son-in-law, who hoped to seize the government.

27. The Hasmonæan Dynasty.—The chronology follows:—

John Hyrcanus I.	135–105
Aristobulus I.	105–104
Alexander Jannæus	104–79
Alexandra	79–69
John Hyrcanus II.	69–63
Aristobulus II.

During the early years of Hyrcanus I. the vigorous Antiochus VII. (Sidetes), who had gained the Syrian crown, pressed him so hard that the struggle for independence not only had to be renewed, but seemed for a time to waver in the balance. Weaker hands, however, soon came into possession of the Syrian sceptre; and Hyrcanus, his independence secure, set about consolidating the power of Judæa. He conquered the Edomites, who had centuries before been pushed up into southern Judah, and compelled them to accept Judaism. Later he conquered Samaria and lower Galilee, treating the latter country as he had treated Idumæa (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 2). During the reign of Hyrcanus the Pharisees and Sadducees began to emerge into well-defined and opposing parties. The former were developed out of the Chasidim of the earlier time. They desired separation and exclusion from foreigners in order that they might devote themselves to the keeping of the Law. The Sadducees, on the other hand, consisted largely of the old priestly families, whose wealth and position prevented them from either the narrowness or the devotion of the Pharisees. Hyrcanus threw in his lot with the latter.

Aristobulus I., upon his accession, assumed the title of king (Ant. XIII. xi. 1)—a step which still further estranged the Pharisees. He was a man of cruel and suspicious disposition, who imprisoned his brother and treated his subjects roughly. He conquered and Judaized in the one year of his reign 'upper Galilee,' by which it is supposed Ituræa is meant.

Upon his death his widow, Alexandra, released her brother-in-law, Alexander Jannæus, from prison and offered him her hand and the throne, both of which he accepted. In his long and chequered reign he not only put down rebellion on the part of his turbulent subjects, but conquered and Judaized the old Israelitish territory across the Jordan, so that under him the little Jewish community had spread, by conquest and forcible conversion, from the narrow limits of the days of Nehemiah to practically the limits of the territory of ancient Israel. Thus the foundations of the NT distribution of Palestinian Jews were laid by the Hasmonæans. During the whole of the reign of Alexander the opposition of the Pharisees to the dynasty and its policy was exceedingly bitter. As his end approached, Alexander committed the government to Alexandra, advising her to make her peace with the Pharisees (Ant. XIII. xv. 5). This she did, and for the next ten years the internal affairs of the kingdom were more pacific. Alexandra made her son, John Hyrcanus II., high priest. Upon her death she left the civil authority to Aristobulus II., the younger of her two sons (Ant. XIII. xvi. 1). This division of the two offices, which had been united from Simon to Alexandra, proved a fatal mistake. Each brother desired the office of the other, and a civil war followed. This dragged itself on for several years. Aristobulus was more popular with the soldiery, and in a short time had defeated Hyrcanus and assumed the high priesthood. The contemplative Hyrcanus would probably have been quietly relegated to private life had not an extraordinary man, Antipater, an Idumæan, appeared. He attached himself to Hyrcanus, and persuaded the latter to flee to Harethath III. (Aretas), king of the Nabatæans, who upon the promise that the cities which Alexander Jannæus had taken should be restored to him, furnished an army for the prosecution of the civil war. The advantage seems to have been with Hyrcanus, when in the year 65, Scaurus, the representative of the Roman general Pompey, appeared in Damascus, and both brothers appealed to him. The interference of Scaurus gave Aristobulus some advantage, but settled nothing, so that when, in 64-63, Pompey himself appeared, both brothers sent him rich gifts and appealed to him. Pompey postponed decision until he should reach Jerusalem. Meantime he set out upon an expedition against the Nabateans, taking both Aristobulus and Hyrcanus with him.

In the progress of this expedition Aristobulus deserted and fled, first to Alexandria and then to Jerusalem. Pompey, hearing of this, proceeded at once to Jerusalem. When he approached it, Aristobulus first promised to capitulate, and then, at the instigation of his soldiers, shut the gates against him. Pompey invested the city, which, after a terrible siege of three months, capitulated (Ant. xiv. iv. 1-4). With the fall of Jerusalem, in Oct. 63, the Jews for ever lost their independence, and the dream of empire which had been awakened by the success of Simon eighty years before was dispelled.

28. Roman Rule before Herod.—The history of the Jews for the next few years reflects the vicissitudes of the tangled politics of the city of Rome. From B.C. 63-48 Palestine was under the personal power of Pompey. That general had re-established Hyrcanus II. in power as high priest, but stripped him of most of the territory won since the days of Simon, and made him subject to his personal representative, Scaurus. In the years that followed, Hyrcanus came more and more under the influence of Antipater, his self-appointed adviser. Antipater was found to be a man of such ability that the Romans committed to him the finances of Judæa, and on more than one occasion entrusted delicate missions to him, but Hyrcanus was in name the ruler of the land. How the Pharisees felt during this period we learn from the poems called 'The Psalter of Solomon.' The loss of independence had led them to cherish with renewed fervour the hopes of a Messianic kingdom.

After the defeat and death of Pompey in 48, Antipater and Hyrcanus were able to render Julius Cæsar material aid at Alexandria, thus winning his favour. Antipater, who had of course been the chief instrument in this, was made a Roman citizen by Cæsar, and also procurator of Judæa. Many privileges of which Pompey had deprived them were restored to the Jews. The old powers of the Sanhedrin were revived; the religious customs of the Jews were guaranteed, not only in Judæa, but in Alexandria and elsewhere, and their taxes were remitted in the Sabbatical years (Ant. xiv. ix. 3-5). Antipater proceeded to build up the fortunes of his family, making his son Phasaelus governor of Jerusalem, and Herod governor of Galilee. Herod proved an able administrator, but narrowly escaped condemnation by the Sanhedrin for presuming to exercise the power of life and death without its consent.

In B.C. 44 Lucius Cassius went to Syria to raise funds for the conspirators. Antipater made no resistance, but sought to show how useful his family could be. He set his sons to raise the 700 talents imposed on the Jews, and Herod was so successful in raising the part assigned to him that he was made general of the forces, both land and maritime, of Coele-Syria.

The withdrawal of Cassius from Syria was followed by the murder of Antipater, after which Hyrcanus came under the power of Herod and Phasaelus. When Cassius and Brutus were defeated at Philippi (B.C. 42), Antony moved on to the eastward to secure Syria. Although many Jews complained bitterly of the sons of Antipater, he made them tetrarchs with full political power, leaving to Hyrcanus only the high priesthood.

While Antony was in Egypt, Antigonus, a son of Aristobulus II., gained the aid of the Parthians, who sent a force which captured Jerusalem (B.C. 40), and made Antigonus both king and high priest. In the progress of events which thus culminated Phasaelus had committed suicide. Hyrcanus was taken to Babylon and had his ears cut off, that he might never be high priest again. Herod in view of these events, made a most remarkable winter journey to Rome, where he besought Augustus and Antony to make Aristobulus, a grandson of Hyrcanus II., king. These Roman statesmen, however, preferred to commit the government to one whose ability had already been proved; they accordingly made Herod king and he returned to win his kingdom. Naturally Herod could do little until Antony, who was leading an expedition against the Parthians, could allow him troops with which to fight, but with aid so furnished he finally expelled Antigonus and became king of the Jews in fact as well as in name in B.C. 37.

29. Herod and his successors.—The reign of Herod (wh. see) was marked at first by a period of difficulty. His master, Antony, was the slave of the Egyptian Cleopatra, and Herod had not only the ordinary difficulty of a ruler of the Jews to contend with, but the caprices of Cleopatra as well. After the battle of Actium he won the favour of Augustus, who became the master of the whole Roman world, and a period of prosperity set in. Herod had a passion for building, and knew how to squeeze money out of his subjects for his purposes. He therefore built many cities, adorning them with the beauties of Greek architecture. He also built many temples. His rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem is, perhaps, the best known of these undertakings, but it is only one of many. The taxes necessary for his various enterprises fell heavily upon his subjects, and rendered them wretched and restless. His domestic life was tragic, though his own disposition was the cause of this. During his reign Hellenism made new inroads into Judæa, and Pharisaism became consolidated in the celebrated schools of Hillel and Shammai.

When Herod died (B.C. 4), Augustus divided his dominions among his sons, Archelaus receiving Judæa and Samaria; Antipas, Galilee and Peræa; and Philip, Ituræa and Trachonitis. Antipas held his territory till A.D. 39, and was the ruler of Galilee in the time of Christ, but Archelaus proved such a bad ruler that in A.D. 6 Augustus removed him, banishing him to Gaul (Jos. BJ II. vii. 3). Judæa was then placed under procurators as a part of the province of Syria. The fifth of these procurators was Pontius Pilate, under whom Christ was crucified.

Once more (A.D. 41-44) all the dominions of Herod were united under Herod Agrippa I., a grandson of Herod the Great. Agrippa was a friend of the Emperor Caligula, who gave him this position, but his rule was brief. Upon his death the country passed once more under direct Roman rule through procurators.

30. Last political struggles.—From the time that Pompey conquered Jerusalem many Jews had entertained hopes of national independence. Some thought that the tables might be turned, and Jerusalem might replace Rome as the mistress of the world. Gradually these feelings pervaded most of the population, and became more intense. Finally, in A.D. 66, they took shape in open rebellion. The Roman general Vespasian was sent to put down the revolution, and had reduced Galilee and the outlying cities of Judæa when he heard of the death of Nero, and withdrew to Egypt to await events. During 69 Vespasian was fighting for the empire, which he finally won; but the Jews, instead of strengthening themselves for the coming conflict, were consuming one another by civil war. Finally, in A.D. 70, Titus appeared before Jerusalem with a Roman army, and after one of the most terrible sieges in its history, which Josephus fully describes (BJ v. ii. ff.), it was once more devastated. The Temple was ruined, its sacred furniture taken to Rome, where the candlestick may still be seen carved on the Arch of Titus, the wall of the city broken down, and the whole site laid waste. The services of the Jewish Temple then ceased for ever.

The tenth Roman legion was left in charge of the spot, and camped here for many years. A small garrison of the Jews who had captured the fortress of Masada, on the shore of the Dead Sea, held out for three years longer, but was finally captured (Jos. BJ vii. viii.).

After this terrible calamity the Jews were politically quiet for many years. The Sanhedrin removed from Jerusalem to Jabneh (Jamnia), a town in the Philistine plain south of Joppa, where in later years its sessions became famous for the discussions of Rabbi Akiba and others concerning Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs and other interesting questions.

In A.D. 116, under the Emperor Trajan, Jews in Cyprus and the East-Mediterranean lands raised a revolt, but it accomplished nothing. Hadrian, a ruler of just and tolerant spirit, is said to have granted permission for the rebuilding of the Temple, when the slanders of the Samaritans led him to revoke it. Such an event tended to foster national resentment. In 132 a new Jewish leader, called Bar Cochba, or 'Son of the Star,' appeared and led a new and stubborn revolution. This precipitated a bloody war. After the defeat of the main force a body of troops fortified themselves at Bether (mod. Bitir), where they held out till 133. Hadrian was so exasperated that he determined to erase the name of Jerusalem from the map. A Roman colony, called Elia Capitolina, was accordingly founded on the site of Jerusalem, from which all Jews were banished, and a temple to Jupiter was erected on the site of the Temple of Jahweh.

This revolt was the last expression of Israel's national aspirations. In the centuries which have elapsed since, the Jew has been scattered in many countries. Often persecuted, he has in persecution cherished Messianic expectations. He has maintained his national identity without land or national government, content to stand as the representative of a religious idea once embodied in a glorious national life.

II. RELIGION. 1. The pre-Jahwistic religion of Israel.—The history of the religion of Israel is the history of the religion of Jahweh. The religion of Jahweh was, however, introduced at a definite time in Israel's history, and His religion as practised by the Hebrews contains many features which are identical with those of other Semitic religions. Several of these can be proved to have had their origin in very primitive conditions common to all the Semites, from which the Israelites had in a good degree emerged before the worship of Jahweh was introduced. It will aid to clearness of thought to note at the beginning what those features were which the Hebrews brought to the religion of Jahweh from their common Semitic inheritance.

(1) In this early religion totemism prevailed. In Comparative Religion the term 'totemism' denotes the idea that a natural object—usually an animal—is kindred in blood to the worshipper. Such animals are held in great veneration; often they are regarded as specially related to the god of the tribe, and are then worshipped as the representatives of the deity. Traces of such a conception among the ancestors of the Israelites are found in the fact that the name Leah means 'wild cow'; Rachel, 'ewe'; Simeon, a kind of 'wolf' or 'hyena'; Caleb, 'a dog.' Confirmation of this view is found in the food taboos of the Israelites. Certain animals were 'clean,' and others 'unclean.' The latter class was in early times indistinguishable from 'holy' animals (Smith, RS 425 ff.). For further proof of totemism, see Barton, Semitic Origins, 34 ff., and the references there given.

(2) Another conception common to the primitive Hamite and Semite was the idea that deity manifests itself especially in the processes of reproduction, and that therefore the organs of reproduction are especially sacred. That this was true of these people generally is abundantly proved (cf. Barton, ch. iii.). One direct evidence that it survived in Israel is the fact that when in early times one swore by Jahweh he put his hand under the thigh (Gn 24²), as one now puts it on the Bible.

(3) The 'pillar' (mazzēbah) was a sacred symbol in the worship of Jahweh down to the reform of Josiah (cf. Gn 28², Hos 3⁴, Dt 7⁸, 2 K 23¹⁴). This object was not peculiar to the Israelites, but is found in all Semitic countries. The 'pillar' was at first a representation of a phallus (cf. Barton, 102), and no doubt, as such, came to be the symbol of deity. The Egyptian obelisks are but more conventionally fashioned 'pillars.'

With the 'pillar' must be placed the ashērah. This object was among the Hebrews at times a wooden post, but usually consisted of more than one. There is some reason for supposing that the ashērah was not complete until there was carved in it a rude doorway, symbolic of the physical doorway of life, in which a figure of a goddess stood (cf. Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, p. 165 ff. Plates 17, 18, 29, 80, 83; also 1 K 15¹³). If this be true the pillar and the ashērah together represented at every sanctuary the male and female organs of reproduction (cf. Whatham, Amer. Jour. of Rel. Psychology, i. 25 ff.). Ashērahs stood by the altar of Jahweh down to the Deuteronomic reform (2 K 23⁶). These symbols, then, were survivals from the pre-Jahwistic religion of Israel, and their existence proves that the conception of deity of which they are the expression formed a part of that early religion also. Cf. artt. ASHERAH, PILLAR.

(4) Circumcision also is an institution which the Hebrews had inherited from their Semitic ancestry. It can no longer be regarded as a peculiarly Hebrew institution, for it was practised by both Hamites and Semites (Barton, 98–117), and is pictured on an Egyptian monument earlier than the 1st dynasty (Bull. de cor. hellénique, 1892, p. 307 ff., and pl. 1). Circumcision, like many other religious institutions, underwent different interpretations at different periods; but its origin is clearly connected with that naive conception of the close connexion of the reproductive organs with the Divine which characterized all the people of the Hamito-Semitic race (cf. Whatham, 'Origin of Circumcision,' l.c. i. 301 ff.). The practice of circumcision among the Israelites is another proof that their conception of deity was in early times closely connected with animal fertility.

(5) From the pre-Jahwistic period came also the idea that spirits or numina dwelt in certain natural objects, such as trees, stones, and springs. This conception belonged to the primitive Semites, by whom it was held in common with primitive peoples generally (cf. RS 132, 167–183, 185–195; Sem. Or. 82 ff., 87–97). Sacred trees existed in many parts of Palestine. There was Abraham's oak of Mamre near Hebron (Gn 13¹⁸ 18¹), at Shechem stood another (Jos 24⁶), at Ophrah another (Jg 6¹¹ 19), and at many other places they were found, and indeed they are still found in Palestine at the present day (cf. Curtiss, Prim. Sem. Rel. To-day, 91 ff.; Barton, A Year's Wanderings in Bible Lands, 162, 163, and Biblical World, xxiv. 170, 174).

Wells were also sacred. The fountain at Kadesh was called En-mishpat (Gn 14⁷), or the 'spring of judgment,' no doubt because oracular decisions were obtained there. The well of Lahai-roi (Gn 16¹⁴) had a story to account for its sacredness, as had also the wells at Beersheba (Gn 21²⁵), which were evidently sacred. En-rogel (modern Job's Well) was so sacred that Adonijah held a sacrifice by it (1 K 1²⁶), while Solomon was anointed at Gihon (modern Virgin's Fountain) for the same reason.

A sacred circle of stones called Gilgal existed on the west of the Jordan (Jos 4¹⁰). This sacred stone-circle like many which exist still on the east of the Jordan (cf. Barton, A Year's Wanderings, 143, and Biblical Work xxiv. 177), was no doubt of pre-historic origin. In the pre-Jahwistic religion, then, such numina were worshipped by the Hebrews.

(6) Another feature of this early religion was sacrifice. In later times sacrifice was regarded mainly as a gift of food to the deity (cf. Ps 50), and probably in early times this idea entered into it. The late W. R. Smith thought that the chief feature of primitive sacrifice was communion

i.e. that a commensal feast, in which the god and the worshipper partook of the same food, and their kinship was consequently renewed, was its chief feature (*RS*², vi.-xi.). Whether this was its sole feature or not, there can be no doubt that the sacrificial feast formed an important part of primitive sacrifice, and of sacrifice among the early Hebrews (cf. Ex 24¹¹). Curtiss believes that the originally significant element in sacrifice was the bursting forth of the blood,—that this rather than the feast constituted it a sacrifice (Prim. Sem. Rel. To-day, 216–228), while Whitham (l.c. ii. 38) holds that human sacrifice, at least, originated in impersonating the death of the earth-goddess's son, i.e. the death of vegetation. Whatever the meanings attached to it (and in the long developments of pre-historic time they may have been many), sacrifice both of human beings and of animals was practised by the primitive Semites, and was perpetuated by the Hebrews into the OT period. Traces of human sacrifice were found by Mr. Macalister during the excavation at Gezer (cf. PEFS, 1903, pp. 33 ff., 121, 306 ff.). The story of the sacrifice of Isaac (Gn 22) is in reality an attempt to justify the discontinuance of the sacrifice of the human firstborn, and to substitute a ram for it. It is really the story of Isaac's deliverance, not of his sacrifice. Its presence in the OT proves that in early times the Israelites, in common with other Semites, practised human sacrifice.

(7) Probably the 'ban' (chērem), by which even before a battle all the population of the enemies' country and their effects were devoted to destruction as a solemn obligation to Jahweh, is another survival from primitive times. Many examples of it are found in the OT (cf. Nu 21², Jos 6¹⁷, 1 S 15³⁴). It seems to have been the custom of the Moabites, for Mesha says (Moabite Stone, l. 11 f.): 'I killed all the people of the city—a pleasing spectacle to Chemosh.' So barbarous a custom was no doubt primitive.

(8) Another custom perpetuated by the Israelites from pre-Jahwistic times was the law of blood revenge, by which it became a religious duty, when one was injured, to inflict a like injury, and if the blood of one's kinsman was shed, to shed the blood of those who had committed the deed. This idea not only meets us frequently in the OT (Gn 4^{14f.}, 22¹, Ex 21 22¹), but is also found often in the Code of Hammurabi, B.C. 2100 (§§ 127, 195–197, 200, 202, 210, 219, 229, 230, 231), and among the Arabs to-day (cf. e.g. Zwemer, Arabia, 155, 265). It is clearly one of the religious points of view which have come out of the primitive Semitic past.

(9) The Passover, or spring leaping festival, so called, perhaps, because the young were then gambolling about, is another institution which, as is now generally recognized, the Israelites brought with them from their remote Semitic past (cf. *RS*² 406 ff., 464; Sem. Or. 108 ff.; Kautzsch, in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 621 ff.; Schmidt, Prophet of Nazareth, 62). It is one of the survivals of the early Semitic worship of deity as the giver of animal life, and, like the 'pillar' and asherah, is an evidence of the sacred nature of reproduction among the ancestors of the Hebrews. It underwent in later times a different interpretation at their hands (cf. Ex 12), but it is certain that that explanation does not account for its origin.

(10) It is probable that an autumn festival, which in primitive Semitic times was connected with the date harvest, and in the OT period was known as the Feast of Tabernacles, was brought by the Israelites into Jahweh-worship from their primitive life. This is not so universally recognized as in the case of the Passover, but has been practically proved by Barton (Sem. Or. 111–115). In connexion with this festival probably in primitive times the wailing for Tammuz occurred, and all those ceremonies which celebrated the death and resurrection of vegetation. This wailing was in the late Hebrew ritual interpreted as mourning for sin on the Day of Atonement (cf. *RS*² 411; Sem. Or. 289 ff.). Similarly after the settlement in Canaan it was regarded as the feast of the grape harvest instead of the date harvest.

(11) We can hardly say that the Hebrews were believers in polytheism before the covenant with Jahweh, but certainly they were not monotheists. Probably each tribe had its god. One of these, the god of the tribe Gad, has survived in the OT with a specialized function (cf. Is 65¹). These tribal deities received the special homage of their respective clans, but no doubt when men wandered into the region of other local numina they propitiated these also. Such a condition, where tribes worship one deity but recognize the reality of other deities, is called by some scholars 'henotheism.'

2. The covenant with Jahweh.—The historical circumstances under which Jahweh became the God of Israel have been sketched above (I § 6).

(1) Those circumstances certainly suggest that Jahweh was the god of the Kenites before He was the God of Israel.

This view, first suggested by Ghillany also independently by Tiele, more fully urged by Stade, fully worked out by Budde, is now accepted by Guthe, Wildeboer, H. P. Smith, Barton, and W. R. Harper. The reasons for it are: (a) Of the three documents which narrate the Exodus, E and P tell of the introduction of the name Jahweh as a new name. In early religion a new name usually means a new deity. E, on whom P is dependent in this part of the narrative, was an Ephraimite and preserved the traditions current among the Joseph tribes. (b) The account of the institution of the covenant (Ex 18^{12f.}) makes it clear that Jethro, the Kenite priest, offers the sacrifice. He really initiates the Hebrews into the worship of Jahweh. This is confirmed by the underlying thought of all the documents that it was in this Midianite or Kenite country (the Kenites were a branch of the Midianites) that Moses first learned of Jahweh. (c) For centuries after this Sinai was regarded as the home of Jahweh. From here He marched forth to give victory to His people (Jg 5^{4f.}, Dt 33², Hab 3¹, Ps 68⁴). Elijah also made a pilgrimage to Sinai to seek Jahweh in His home (1 K 19). (d) The Kenites during several succeeding centuries were the champions of the pure worship of Jahweh. Jael killed Sisera (Jg 5^{24f.}). The Rechabites, who from Jehu to Jeremiah (2 K 10¹⁵, Jer 35) championed Jahweh, were Kenites (1 Ch 2⁵⁴). (e) Some of the Kenites joined Israel in her migrations (Nu 10^{29f.}), mingling with Israel both in the north (Jg 5²⁴) and in the south (Jg 1¹⁶); some of them remained on the southern border of Judah, where they maintained a separate existence till the time of Saul (1 S 15⁵), and were finally, in the days of David, incorporated into the tribe of Judah (1 S 30^{26f.}, 29¹). (f) It is this absorption of the Kenites by Judah, which, if Jahweh were a Kenite deity, explains why the J document, written in Judah, regards the knowledge of the name Jahweh as immemorial (Gn 4²⁰). The perpetual separateness of Judah from the other tribes tended to perpetuate this in spite of contrary currents from other quarters. We are therefore justified in holding that Jahweh was the god of the Kenites, that some of the Hebrew tribes entangled in Egypt were ready to abandon their old gods for one that could deliver them, and thus He became their God. The objections to this view urged by Kautzsch (loc. cit. 626 ff.) really do not touch the nerve of the argument. The words 'God of thy fathers' on which he lays so much stress are written from a later point of view, and that point of view is quite as well justified by the Kenite hypothesis (for the Kenites were absorbed by Judah) as by the supposition that Jahweh was the god of one of the Israelitish clans.

(2) What conception the Hebrews of the time of Moses held of Jahweh we can in broad outline define. Evidently they conceived Him to be a god of war. The needs of the oppressed tribes demanded a warrior. The people are said to have sung, after their deliverance, 'Jahweh is a man of war.' A book of old poems was called 'The Book of the Wars of Jahweh' (Nu 21¹⁴), and 'Jahweh of hosts' (or armies) was afterwards one of His most constant names. There can be little doubt that this conception of Jahweh as a war-god had developed among the Kenites, and that it had large influence in drawing the Hebrews into His worship.

There is reason also to believe that, as Jahweh had long been worshipped around Mount Sinai, where severe thunder-storms occur (cf. Agnes Smith Lewis, Expo.

Times, June 1906, p. 394). He had come to be regarded as a god who manifested Himself especially in the phenomena of storms. He is usually represented as coming in a thunder-storm (Ps 18, Ezk 1, Hab 3, Is 19, Job 38), and the regular name for thunder was 'the voice of Jahweh' (Ps 29⁹, Job 37⁴). He is also said to have led His people in a cloud (Ex 13. 14), to have appeared on Mount Sinai and in the Temple in a cloud (Ex 19, 1 K 8¹⁰⁻¹¹); and in the middle books of the Pentateuch the cloud is used more than forty times as the symbol of Jahweh's presence. Probably, then, the Israelites received Him from the Kenites as a god of war who manifested Himself in the storm-cloud and uttered His terrible voice in thunder.

These conceptions, however, did not exhaust their thought of Him. The Israelites were Semites, and they thought of Him as a god of life. Had this not been so, circumcision would not have been His sign, the 'pillar' and asherah would not have been symbolic instruments in His worship, the firstborn would not have been offered to Him in sacrifice, and the genitals would not have been the part of the body specially sacred to Him. Barton has shown that Jahweh is an evolution out of that primitive Semitic conception which made plant and animal fertility especially reveal deity (op. cit. ch. vii.). These conceptions, too, the Hebrews in the time of Moses held of Jahweh.

(3) The name Jahweh, explained in Ex 3¹⁴ as 'I am that I am' or 'I will be that which I will be,' was long thought to justify the view that at the time of Moses the Israelites regarded Jahweh as the self-existent or uncreated One. It has now been generally recognized, however, that this is only a later Hebrew explanation of a name the original meaning of which had been forgotten.

In an attempt to recover the lost original, many and various theories have been put forward. For a resumé of these, see Barton (op. cit. 283, 284). Scholars are by no means agreed as to the meaning of the name. There are almost as many theories of its etymology as there are different scholars. Barton has correctly seen that the name probably had some reference to Jahweh as the God of life,—the God whose 'reward' is 'the fruit of the womb' (Ps 127³), but he failed, then, to see that the etymology should be sought not in Hebrew but in Arabic. The Kenites were an Arabian tribe, and Jahweh was no doubt an Arabian epithet. Probably it is connected with the root hawa, 'to love passionately' used in some forms especially of sexual desire. If this meaning were understood by Hebrews at the time of Moses, it was lost as soon as the Israelites began to speak a Canaanitish dialect.

(4) It is probable that the covenant between Jahweh and Israel involved at the time no more than that they would become His worshippers in return for deliverance, victory, and protection. In becoming His worshippers, however, it was necessary to have a knowledge of His ritual, i.e. how to worship Him. Our oldest document J gives a list of ten commands or 'words' (Ex 34), which its author regarded as the basis of the covenant. As this Decalogue of J stands, it would form a convenient summary of ritual law for a nomadic people to carry in the memory.

Some features of it cannot, however, be as old as Moses, for the feast of 'unleavened bread' is, as Wellhausen and others have demonstrated, an agricultural festival, which grew up after the settlement in Canaan. It was, however, merged with the Passover, and its name has probably been substituted for the Passover by some editor. The Feasts of Weeks and of Ingathering were also agricultural festivals, but, as pointed out in the preceding section, the latter goes back to a nomadic date festival. The observance of the Sabbath probably goes back, as Toy has shown (JBL xviii 190 ff.), to an old taboo. With very little alteration, therefore, the Decalogue of J suits all the wilderness conditions.

We may suppose that the summary of ritual which Moses taught the Israelites as the basis of the covenant with Jahweh was somewhat as follows:—

1. Thou shalt worship no other god.
2. Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.

3. The feast of the Passover thou shalt keep.
4. The firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb
5. None shall appear before me empty.
6. On the seventh day thou shalt rest.
7. Thou shalt observe the feast [of the date harvest].
8. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leavened bread, neither shall the sacrifice of the Passover be left until the morning.
9. The firstlings of thy flocks thou shalt bring unto Jahweh thy god.
10. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk.

These commands are in part conjectural, but as they are obtained from J by omitting the agricultural and later elements, they are probably approximately right.

(5) It will be noticed that the second command is not a prohibition of idols, but only of expensive idols. Kautzsch (loc. cit. 629) thinks that the number of references to the bodily presence of Jahweh (cf. e.g. Ex 33²²) may indicate that some idol of Him existed in Sinai. This is quite possible, since the Decalogue, as J understood it in the 9th cent., did not prohibit such images.

(6) Jahweh's symbol at this time was the sacred ark. As the Egyptians and Babylonians had similar structures for carrying their gods (cf. Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 289; 'Isaiah' in SBOT, 78), it is probable that the ark was a kind of movable sanctuary for a nomadic people. A late tradition (1 K 8⁹⁻¹⁰) says that it contained the Ten Commandments written on stone. The later versions of the Commandments differ so radically that it is not probable that an authoritative copy from such early date was preserved. Scholars suppose therefore that the ark contained an aerolite or some such symbol of Jahweh. Centuries afterwards, when it was carried into the camp of the Philistines, it was thought that Jahweh Himself had come into the camp (1 S 4).

In the J document the ark plays a small part, while in the E document it is much more prominent. J apparently thought much more of Sinai as the home of Jahweh. This probably came about from the fact that after the settlement the ark was in the possession of the Joseph tribes and became their shrine.

(7) According to the oldest sources, there seems to have been no priesthood at this time except that of Moses himself. J tells us that when the covenant was ratified, Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu and seventy elders of Israel went up into Jahweh's mountain, but only Moses was permitted to come before Him (Ex 24^{1-2, 9-11}), while E tells us of a 'tent of meeting' which Moses used to pitch at a distance from the camp, and to which he would go to consult Jahweh (Ex 33⁷⁻¹¹), and then return. In this tent Joshua, Moses' minister, abode all the time (Ex 33¹¹). It is clear that neither of these writers had any conception of the choice of the tribe of Levi for the priesthood. Indeed E makes no mention of the tribe of Levi anywhere. Moses was in his view apparently of one of the Joseph tribes, and how the term 'Levite' for priest originated he does not tell us. In Jg 17⁷ he tells us of a Levite who belonged to the tribe of Judah (cf. SBOT, ad loc.), so that here 'Levite' cannot have a tribal signification. J tells us of a tribe of Levi to which a calamity happened (Gn 34. 49⁶⁻⁷), and he tells us also (Ex 32²⁶⁻²⁸) of a number of men who in a crisis attached (lewied) themselves to Moses for the preservation of the religion of Jahweh, and were, perhaps, accordingly called 'Levites.' Many scholars think that the later priesthood was developed out of this band, and that its identification with the unfortunate clan of Levi is due to a later confusion of the names. In the present state of our knowledge, this is, perhaps, the most probable view. (For the great variety of opinion among scholars, cf. art. 'Levi' in JE vii. 21.) The priesthood is probably a development later than Moses.

3. The pre-Prophetic religion in Canaan.—(1) The conquest of Canaan strengthened the faith of the Israelitish tribes in Jahweh as the god of war. Their success strengthened the hold of Jahweh upon them. A Semitic people upon entering a new land always felt it necessary to propitiate the god of the land. As this was the case as late as the 8th cent. (2 K 17²⁴⁻²⁶), it would be all the more true at the beginning of the 12th. At first, therefore, they must have mingled the worship of the Baals with the worship of Jahweh. As we have seen, the conquest did not occur all at once; there must have been many conflicts, which kept the tribes in constant dependence upon Jahweh (cf. Jg 5²³). These conflicts continued to the time of Saul and David, and constituted a life and death struggle. When, under David, Israel emerged victorious, Jahweh was more than ever the god of armies. These vicissitudes tended to eliminate the worship of the tribal deities. Little by little Jahweh came to be regarded as the god of the land,—as a Baal,—and as such took possession in their thought of the principal Canaanitish shrines.

(2) Gradually the Canaanitish conceptions connected with these shrines were transferred to Jahweh. This fusion was easily possible because of the kinship of Jahweh and the Baals. Both had sprung from the same primitive conceptions. Both were regarded as gods of animal fertility. To both the same symbols of fertility were sacred. The main difference was that the Baals were the gods of clans which had longer resided in a fertile land (cf. Sem. Or. 297 ff.). By this fusion the somewhat meagre and simple ritual of Jahweh was enriched. By the time of Gideon the term Baal ('lord') was applied to Jahweh, as Jerub-baal, Gideon's real name, proves. Ish-baal and Meri-baal, sons of Saul, and Beeliada, a son of David, bear names which prove the same thing.

(3) During this period it was not thought wrong to make images of Jahweh. Gideon made an ephod-idol at Ophrah (Jg 8²⁷). Micah made an image to Jahweh (Jg 17²⁵), and it is probable that similar images existed elsewhere. Sometimes these were in the form of bullocks as were those which Jeroboam set up at Bethel and Dan. These latter symbolized Jahweh as the generator of life, and the god of pastoral wealth. Household numina called teraphim were also worshipped. Images of these were also made, sometimes large enough to be passed off for a man (1 S 19^{18ff.}).

(4) In the whole of this period it was thought that Jahweh existed in the form of a man. He might appear and talk with a person, indistinguishable from a human being, until the moment of His departure (cf. Gn 18²², Jg 6^{11ff.}, 13^{2ff.}). Sometimes, as in the last two passages cited, it was the angel of Jahweh that appeared, but at the period when these narratives were written, the conception of the difference between Jahweh and His angel was not fully developed. So the 'face' (presence) of Jahweh (Ex 33) is a reference to the 'person' of Jahweh. It indicates that He was conceived as having a bodily form. When the J document was written, the Prophetic period was already dawning. As we are indebted to that document for most of these anthropomorphic representations of Jahweh, we may be sure that this conception prevailed throughout the pre-Prophetic period.

(5) The only literature which has come to us from this pre-Prophetic time consists of a few poems—the Song of Deborah (Jg 5), David's Lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1), and a few fragments elsewhere (e.g. Nu 21 and Jos 10¹⁹). No one now thinks of attributing the Psalms in the form in which we have them to David, or the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes to Solomon. The literature of this period, then, is, so far as we know it, secular in character. The people were religious, but the religion existed as a help to secular life. It consisted largely of inherited customs, of half-superstitious beliefs, while the main interest of all was centred in physical prosperity. Certain practices were regarded as wrong,—as offences against Jahweh (e.g. the crime of Jg 19 and David's sin [2 S 11]), but the ethical content of the religion was of a very rudimentary character. Stealing (cf. Jg 18), deceit (Gn 27), and treachery (Jg 3^{15ff.}, 5²⁴, 27) were not only condoned but at times even glorified.

(6) Before the time of Solomon a traveller in Palestine would have found no elaborate temple or structure devoted to religion. Instead, in every village he would have found an open-air 'high place,' marked by 'pillars' and ashêrahs,—high places such as have recently been excavated at Gezer and Megiddo and found at Petra. In connexion with these there were often sacred caves and other accessories of primitive worship. In some, as at Gezer and Jerusalem, serpent-worship was practised, and brazen serpents as well as the living animal were kept (cf. PEFSI, 1903, p. 222; 2 K 18⁴). Probably at most of them, as at Gezer, some form of Ashtart, the mother-goddess, was also worshipped (cf. PEFSI, 1903, p. 228). As time went on, an occasional shrine had a building. The first of these which we can trace was at Shiloh (1 S 1-3); it had at least two rooms and doors. Solomon then erected the splendid Temple at Jerusalem on Phœnician models, departing, as has been pointed out (I, § 14), from older Hebrew practice in many ways. Perhaps Jeroboam erected temples at Bethel and at Dan (cf. 1 K 12²¹, Am 7¹³), but for the most part these shrines were of the simplest nature and without buildings. A wealthy citizen might in this period have a private temple in connexion with his residence (Jg 17).

(7) The priesthood in this period was not confined to any tribe. There seems to have been a feeling that it was better to have a levi for priest (whatever that may have meant; cf. Jg 17¹⁰), but Micah, an Ephraimite, made his son a priest (Jg 17⁹); Samuel, a member of one of the Joseph tribes, acted as priest (1 S 9^{22ff.}); and David made his sons priests (2 S 8¹⁸ RVm). According to J (cf. Jg 18³⁰), Jonathan, a grandson of Moses, started life as an impecunious resident of Bethlehem in Judah; in seeking his fortune he became a priest in the private shrine of Micah, the Ephraimite; then at the instigation of the Danites he robbed that shrine and fled with them to the north, becoming the founder of a line of priests in the temple of Dan. Even if his descent from Moses should not be credited, the story gives evidence of the kind of irregularity in the priesthood which was still conceivable when the J document was composed. So far as Jerusalem was concerned, David improved this chaotic condition by regulating the priesthood.

(8) The festivals at this period were of a simple, joyous character. They were held in the interest of the worshipper. A picture of one has been preserved in 1 S 1. 2. The priests killed the sacrifice, pouring out the blood no doubt to Jahweh, and then the flesh was cooked. While it was cooking, the priest obtained his portion by a kind of chance (cf. 1 S 2^{13ff.}), after which the victim was consumed by the worshippers in a joyous festival. This festival was the appropriate time to pray for children, and it is probable that considerable licence accompanied it (cf. Sem. Or. 287 ff.). The feast described occurred annually, but there were lesser feasts at the time of the new moons and on other occasions, which were probably observed in the same simple way (cf. 1 S 20^{25ff.}). In addition to the sacrifices at such feasts (cf. 1 S 9^{22ff.}), it is clear that on extraordinary occasions human sacrifice was in this period still practised. The story of Jephthah's daughter, whether historical in all its features or not, proves that such sacrifices were regarded as possible. It is probable that 1 K 16³⁴ is proof that children were still sacrificed when important structures were set up. The language of this passage has been greatly illuminated by the discoveries at Gezer (cf. above, § 1 (6)).

(9) A glimpse into the household worship of the time we obtain from the teraphim. These seem to have been household deities, similar to those found in Babylonia (Ezk 21²¹) and among the Arameans (Gn 31¹⁹). Of their use we know little. They seem to have been employed for divination (Zec 10⁹), and they were sometimes made in human form (1 S 19¹⁸). Throughout this period they were a recognized element in the worship (cf. Jg 18³⁰, Hos 3⁴). Whether these gods formed the centre of the home worship or not we cannot tell. They were evidently a crude survival from an earlier time, and with religious progress they disappeared.

In addition to the features of the religion of the pre-Prophetic period which have been enumerated, it must be remembered that the fundamental institutions of the pre-Jahwistic religion of Israel, enumerated in § 1, continued through this period also.

(10) Another religious phenomenon of the pre-Prophetic period consisted in the development of a class of seers or prophets, who are to be carefully distinguished from the great moral and literary prophets of the next period. The prophets of this period were closely akin to the seers and fortune-tellers who are common the world over. They had their parallel in other Semitic countries, e.g. Phoenicia and Assyria. In the time of Saul there was a class of ecstatic prophets in Israel who used music to aid their prophetic excitement, who uttered themselves when possessed by an uncontrollable frenzy, and who went about in bands (cf. 1 S 10¹⁰⁻¹² 192²¹).

These prophets have their analogue in a youth at Gebal in Phoenicia, of whom the Egyptian Wenamon makes report about n.c. 1100. This youth was seized by the spirit of the gods and thrown into a frenzy, and then uttered prophecies which moved a king (cf. AJSJL xxi. 105). This type of prophecy was therefore in this period widely spread over the country even beyond the bounds of Israel. The 'sons of the prophets' referred to so often in the OT were simply guilds of these men organized for mutual help. Music helped to bring on the frenzy, and it was more contagious when a number were together.

Samuel was not sharply distinguished from the 'sons of the prophets,' although he was evidently a man of a higher order, beloved by the people to possess superior gifts. He was called a 'seer' (1 S 9⁹), and was believed to be able to direct people in finding lost property, and not to be above taking a fee for it (1 S 9⁷). Somewhat parallel to such a seer is the one mentioned by Ashurbanipal (G. Smith, Ashurbanipal, 119 ff.).

These men were held in high esteem, and obtained their living by telling people what they wished to know. Their oracles were mostly about the future, but often no doubt they told a man whether this or that action was in accord with the will of Jahweh, or of the god whom they represented. Baal as well as Jahweh had his prophets (1 K 18¹⁹). Such men were necessary adjuncts of a court, for a king had often to engage in hazardous enterprises of State. We find accordingly that Ahab kept four hundred of them about him (1 K 22⁵). David and other kings had probably done the same. No doubt Nathan and Gad, whom later writers mention in connexion with David, were really men of this character, who are in the narratives pictured like the nobler prophets of later time.

These prophets by profession possessed no higher ethical tendencies than the other men of their time. Their sustenance was dependent on the pleasure of their royal master, if they were connected with the court, and usually they gave such oracles as were desired. (For fuller account, see Batten, The Hebrew Prophet, 27-72.) The institution was held in high regard. When the ecstatic frenzy came upon a man and his higher nerve centres were by the excitement inhibited from action, he was, as such men usually are among savage and primitive people (cf. Davenport, Primitive Traits in Religious Revivals, ch. i. vi.), thought to be under the possession of a supernatural spirit. He was accordingly listened to most carefully, and his utterances were supposed to reveal the Divine will. It is significant that the Hebrews used the same word for 'prophet' and for 'lunatic.' The institution was capable nevertheless of high possibilities. If those came forward exercising its gifts who were animated by high ethical purpose and possessed a great spiritual message, the regard in which this institution was held assured them of a hearing.

4. Religion in the Prophetic period.—The period which we call Prophetic extends from Elijah to the great prophet of the Exile, the so-called Second Isaiah. It was in this period that, thanks to the labours of the great school of prophetic reformers, the religion of Israel became ethical and spiritual. They gave it this content, and by the new interpretation which they put on the covenant with Jahweh which Moses and Jethro had mediated, forced it upon the nation. In this they were aided by the misfortunes and sufferings incident to the interference of Assyria and Babylon in Hebrew affairs. In one important respect the prophets in this noble succession changed the method of prophetic utterance. With one exception, they discarded the method of ecstatic utterance, and spoke as the result of prophetic vision. Just what they mean by 'vision' we may not say, but we may be sure that intelligence and imagination had their part in it. It led to the perception of a noble ideal, and gave the beholder a holy passion to realize it.

(1) Elijah. The prophetic work began with Elijah. The main points of his career (1 K 17-19) have already been touched upon above (1. § 17). His significance lies in the fact that in the name of Jahweh he championed the poor against the rich. That his conception of Jahweh was narrow,—that he regarded Him as a god of the nomadic type,—that he opposed a foreign cult, are all incidental. Any enthusiastic member of a prophetic guild might have done any one of these three things. The significance of the work of Elijah lies in the fact that it marks the dawn of ethical purity and social justice in Jahweh's religion. The method of Elijah, too, was an ethical method. He delivered his message, and relied upon its weight for the results.

(2) The Jahwist (J writer). In the same century, perhaps contemporary with Elijah, the first of the J writers was composing his matchless prose narratives in Judah. He was pervaded by the prophetic spirit in its incipient form. He traces the creation of man to Jahweh, and is interested in the descent of the nations from a primitive pair. He tells the stories of the patriarchs to illustrate the power of Jahweh, but the purely religious motive is not often present. He represents the patriarchs as on friendly terms with the Canaanites about them, which indicates that he is not conscious that the religion of Jahweh is hostile to other faiths. His conception of the basis of Jahweh's covenant with Israel is, as pointed out above (§ 2 (4)), ten commands of a purely ritual nature. The tone of his stories is sombre. Clothing and child-bearing came in consequence of sin. The first agriculturist was the first murderer. The inventors of metal instruments and of music were especially wicked men. The civilization of Babylonia attempted such astounding structures, that, as Jahweh looked down from heaven, He found He could prevent men from reaching heaven only by confounding their language. To the Jahwist civilization meant sin, pain, and trouble. He had no hopeful outlook. His type of faith was nomadic indeed. He represents the starting-point from which the prophetic movement went forward.

(3) Elisha hardly deserves to be reckoned in this great succession. He was the very head of professional prophecy. When absent from the band of associates he found it necessary to call a minstrel to work up his ecstasy before he could prophesy (2 K 3¹⁶). It was he too, who prompted Jehu, one of the bloodiest of usurpers and reformers, to undertake the purification of Israel from the taint of foreign religion; and when it was accomplished Israel was not one whit more ethical or spiritual than before. Elisha is usually counted as Elijah's successor, but he belongs to a different class. The nobler religion of Israel owes him nothing.

(4) Amos, the first prophet to commit his message to writing, came, like Elijah, with a magnificent message—a message indeed which is to that of Elijah like noon to dawn. Amos announces for the first time the faith of a practical monotheist. Such a faith had been implicit in the Jahwist, when he traced the existence of all mankind to Jahweh's act, but in Amos it is explicit. Jahweh brought not only the Israelites from Egypt, but the Philistines from Caphtor, and the Aramaeans from Kir (Am 9⁷), and He will likewise judge the Philistines, Damascus, Moab, Edom, and all nations (chs. 1, 2). Jahweh, too, Amos proclaims as an ethical God. Ethics, not ritual, was the basis of the covenant at Sinai (Am 5^{2-2b}). Justice is to roll down as waters and righteousness as a perennial stream before Jahweh will be satisfied. In this spirit Amos championed in the name of Jahweh the cause of the oppressed poor, and rebuked the social impurities connected with religion, pronouncing upon the unethical the doom of Jahweh.

(5) The Elohist. Perhaps contemporary with Amos was the first E writer. He was a man of true prophetic spirit. Like J, he recorded many of the traditions of ancient times, but he tells them with a more hopeful outlook. He has a high regard for a prophet, and represents Abraham — one (Gn 20⁷). He represents a higher conception of God than J. J's anthropomorphism has disappeared. God is never seen in human form in E's narratives, but reveals Himself in dreams. The ethical character of E's conception of religion appears, however, in his conception of the basis of the covenant which Moses made between Israel and Jahweh. The basis of this is a Decalogue in which the ritualistic is reduced to a minimum (Ex 20 without the additions of R¹⁰), and which contains the fundamental elements of morality, and a code of laws (Ex 20¹⁴-23¹⁹) embodying the principles of equity that were necessary for the life of a simple agricultural community. In giving expression to this conception, the Elohist placed himself in line with the great ethical prophets, and did much towards the differentiation of the religion of Israel from the nature cults about it. In his opening to the Decalogue (Ex 20¹) he shows that his monotheism was somewhat insecure, but his ethical conception of Jahweh's relation to Israel helped to put religion on a spiritual basis.

(6) Hosea's main contribution to religious theory was the thought that God is love—not the crass sexual love of the early Semite, but the self-sacrificing love of an affectionate father or a devoted husband, who would suffer to reclaim the fallen. Not less stern than Amos in his conception of ethical standards, Hosea is less occupied with proclaiming doom. He seeks by the love of Jahweh to allure Israel and win her back. Amos devoted himself mainly to checking the oppression of the poor, Hosea largely to the establishment of social purity. It became clear to him that this could not be accomplished so long as the primitive orgies of sexual freedom which were enacted in the name of religion in all the high places were permitted to continue. These he believed were no part of the real religion of Jahweh; they had come into it from the cult of Baal and Astarte. He accordingly denounced this impurity as the worship of another god,—as conjugal infidelity to Jahweh, and prohibited the application to Jahweh in the future of the appellation Baal, or 'lord' (Hos 2¹⁶). Thus, as in the time of Elijah the struggle for justice linked itself with opposition to a foreign cult, so now the struggle for justice and purity led to opposition to Baal. The cult was not so foreign as the prophets supposed. It was native, as we have seen, to Jahweh as well as to the clans of Canaan which were now a part of Israel, but the idea that it was foreign helped the prophets to fight it. The fight was taken up by Hosea's successors and pushed to success. The recovery of the high place at Gezer, with all its crass and revolting symbolism, helps us to understand the weight of deadening sensualism against which the prophets contended.

Hosea, like Amos was a monotheist. His conception of Jahweh was, however, not perfect. He thought of Him as caring especially for Israel. Though He ruled other nations, Hosea believed He controlled them mainly for the sake of Israel.

(7) Isaiah continued the work of Amos and Hosea. He proclaimed Jahweh as the All-powerful, who fills heaven and earth,—the Holy One, who proves His sanctity by His justice. For forty years, in many crises and under varying figures, Isaiah set forth this doctrine. Man is in Jahweh's hands as clay in the hands of the potter. The powerful Assyrian is but the rod by which Jahweh in His wrath is chastising Israel; when His will is accomplished, the rod will be broken and thrown away (Is 10³⁴). Isaiah's monotheism, though lofty, had the same defect as Hosea's. In upholding this conception of God, Isaiah denounced the social sins which had called out the opposition of Amos and Hosea. So great is Jahweh's desire for justice, that Isaiah believed that He would one day raise up a prince great in all the qualities of a princely conqueror, who should be a 'Wonderful-counsellor, a god of a warrior, a father of booty, but a prince of peace' (Is 9⁶). At another time he saw a vision of a kingdom of complete justice which an offshoot of the Davidic dynasty should found (Is 11). These visions show how, in Isaiah's conception, the Holy One would organize human society. In addition to his work in keeping alive these lofty ideas, Isaiah, as was pointed out above (I. § 19), gave practical direction to the development of Israel's religion. His doctrine of the inviolability of Jerusalem took effect in later times, and had much to do with the development of Judaism. He is probably responsible also for that attempt to suppress the high places which afterwards found legal expression in Deuteronomy. The significance of this will, however, be pointed out in considering that law. In Micah, a younger contemporary of Isaiah, the spirit and message of Amos reappear.

(8) The Deuteronomist, in the development of the Prophetic period, follows Isaiah. Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah had proclaimed an ethical monotheism. They had denounced ritual as without place in the religion of Jahweh. The message had been enforced by the awful calamity which had overtaken the Northern Kingdom; it had, in consequence of Isaiah's friendship with Hezekiah, moulded policies of State. Under Manasseh, however, it became painfully evident that it was to take more than moral means to eliminate impure ritual from the religion of Jahweh. No part of the world, not even the Hebrews, was ready for a religion without ritual. Isaiah, probably, had seen this in his old age. The Deuteronomist at all events saw it. Ritual should be retained, but it should be brought within manageable limits. The high places should be eliminated, the cult centralized in Jerusalem—the place which Isaiah's teaching and the signal defeat of Sennacherib had so clearly proved to be Jahweh's special dwelling-place. From this all sodomites and sacred harlots were to be excluded, as well as all symbols, such as the 'pillar' and ashêrah, which were specially significant of the odious social practices. To accomplish this, the code of the Elohist was rewritten in such a way that this conception of the sanctuary stood in the forefront, and other parts were made to conform to it. Into the whole code a more humanitarian tone towards the poor was introduced. It was thus made to express in legal form the burden of the best social teaching. Although the Deuteronomist did not advance the great ideas of spiritual religion to higher levels, he did by the compromise of this code help those ideas to influence practical life.

(9) Jeremiah, perhaps the greatest of the prophets, made great advances in the conception of spiritual religion. There was in all his work an undertone of passionate love,—a heart-throb,—like that of Hosea. The greatest significance of his teaching is not, however, his tenderness. He saw that Jahweh is independent of temple or place. An inviolable Jerusalem He did not need. What Jahweh desires is that man shall break up the fallow ground of his disposition, that he shall circumcise his heart (Jer 4¹⁰). Religion is a matter not of a temple, but of a soul. Jeremiah, too, was the first to declare that the idols of the heathen are mere vanities. Others had ignored them, he exhibits them in their true nothingness (10⁸ 14²). Another great truth which Jeremiah was the first to grasp was that the heathen as well as the Hebrew might come to Jahweh and be welcome (16¹⁹). Not only did Jeremiah proclaim universality and ideality in religion, but he shook himself free from the old Semitic conception of solidarity which had prevailed before him. No lofty morality could prevail until every one was responsible for his own acts and for those only; and this is the standard proclaimed by Jeremiah (31²⁹ 30). No prophet reached a loftier flight.

(10) Ezekiel occupies a peculiar position in the Prophetic development. He stands, on one side in the succession of prophets and, on the other, is the father of Judaism. As one of the prophetic succession, his chief work lay in the recognition and elaboration of the idea of individualism. No prophet is so impressed as he with the fact that God deals with each soul individually (Ezk 18). This thought leads Ezekiel to place a very great value upon the individual. The salvation of the individual becomes his special care. He even thinks of the Messiah as primarily a shepherd,—a pastor,—one whose chief care will be to accomplish the salvation of individuals. He addresses the rulers of Israel as shepherds. Cornill who calls attention to this phase of his work (Prophecy of Israel, 115 ff.) calls him the father of pastoral theology. Ezekiel was, however, more truly the successor of the Deuteronomist than of Jeremiah. Like the former, he endeavoured to adapt prophetic conceptions to Israelitish institutions. Isaiah's conception of Jerusalem as the home of Jahweh he fully shared, and in the closing chapters of his book he utters his ideal for the rehabilitation of Hebrew institutions about Jerusalem as a centre. Some of these conceptions were unpractical, but others took deep root, and made Ezekiel the father of Judaism.

(11) The Second Isaiah was the last of Israel's really great prophets. His conception of Jahweh as the creator of the universe, as the ruler of the world and the maker of history, is clearer than that of any of his predecessors. The great Cyrus, who was conquering so successfully as the Second Isaiah wrote, was only Jahweh's creature. Cyrus might think otherwise, but Jahweh and His prophet knew the truth. Even Hosea never expressed the tenderness of Jahweh towards His people with greater beauty than did this prophet. His conception of Jahweh, too, is more symmetrical than that of the 8th century prophets. If in him, as in them, Jahweh seems to care chiefly for Israel, it is so only in appearance. He has shown in his great poem on the Suffering Servant (Is 52¹-53²) that in his view Israel was made the chosen people not through favouritism, or to puff up her self-esteem, but because Jahweh had for her a great mission. That mission was nothing less than to bring the nations of the world to Jahweh. The path of this service was the path of suffering, but it was to accomplish the salvation of the world. Jahweh, then, loved the world. He had chosen Israel and given her her tragic experience that she through this might become a missionary to the nations and bring them all to Jahweh. It does not detract from the prophet's great conception, that the mission which he conceived for his people was never fulfilled till the coming of the ideal Israelite, Jesus Christ.

This prophetic conception of God and religion, which thus developed from Elijah to the Second Isaiah, is unique in the world's history. Only once has this teaching been surpassed. Jesus of Nazareth, who perfected this conception of God and made it capable of being universally received, alone has gone beyond it. It was the teaching of these prophets that redeemed the religion of Israel from the level of other Semitic religions. It is this that has made the religion of Jahweh the inspiration of the world as the religion of the one true God. This prophetic teaching is quite unaccounted for by its environment. Nothing like it has been produced without its aid in any portion of the Semitic world, or among any other people. It is in the prophetic teaching and the influences which flowed from it that we find proof of the truth of the words: 'Men speak from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit' (2 P 1²).

5. From the Exile to the Maccabees.—(1) It is clear from the sketch given above (I § 24), that in the rehabilitation of the Jewish communities in Palestine the whole sentiment of the organizers centred in the ritual. If there were prophets, such as Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, they uttered their prophetic visions to persuade the people to make sacrifices to restore and maintain the sacred ceremonies. It thus happened that the whole movement in the early days after the Exile was pervaded more by the priestly than by the prophetic spirit. The Priestly document with its supplements (for the analysis of Carpenter and Harford-Battersby's Hexateuch) was the heart of the whole movement. The religious life of the Judæan community did not become consistent until it was organized upon this basis, and after this organization it went forward confidently. The author of the Priestly document (P²) was the successor of Ezekiel, as Ezekiel had been the successor of the Deuteronomist. As Ezekiel took more interest in the organization of the ritual than did D, so P²'s interest greatly exceeded Ezekiel's. The prophetic movement had given P² his pure monotheism. From it he had received a faith in an All-powerful, Holy Creator and Ruler of the universe. The nearness and warmth of God, as the prophets had conceived Him, escaped P², but with such elements of the prophetic conception as he could grasp he set himself to the organization of the ritual.

The ritual which had come down to him from his priestly ancestry he had received as the will of God. We can see that it had its birth in Semitic heathenism, but he could not. In reality this ritual bound him to earth by the strands of many a half-superstitious custom, but in his thought it had all come from heaven. If this were so, the problem to his mind was to find the connexion of all this with the will of the God of the universe. To express the vital connexion which he thought he found, he re-wrote the history of the creation of the world and of the fortunes of the chosen people down to the settlement in Canaan, in such a way as to make it appear that circumcision had been enjoined on Abraham at the very beginning of revelation (Gn 17), and that the basis of the covenant at Sinai was neither the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 20¹-23¹⁹), nor the code of Deuteronomy, but the whole Levitical ritual. This ritual, as he conceived it, had been profoundly influenced by Ezekiel. The menial work of the sanctuary was no longer to be performed, as in pre-exilic days, by foreign slaves. The descendants of those priests who had officiated in shrines other than Jerusalem were to be assigned to these services (cf. Ezk 44¹⁻¹⁰). Thus an order of Levites as a menial class was created. If this ritual was the basis of the covenant at Sinai, it could not have been ignored in the Wilderness Wandering. There must have been a movable sanctuary. Solomon's Temple was the model shrine to Ezekiel and the priests, but Solomon's Temple must (so suppose P² and his successors) have been patterned upon a previous nomadic shrine; hence the account of the Tabernacle was placed in their history. Among the newly created class of Levites there were many who had descended from men who had officiated as priests at Hebron, Gezer, Kadesh, Ashtaroth, and many other ancient shrines. P² and his followers accounted for this fact by supposing that Joshua had given the tribe of Levi cities in all parts of the land (Jos 21; cf. Barton, 'Levitical Cities of Israel in the Light of the Excavation at Gezer,' Biblical World, xxiv, 167 ff.).

This conception was accepted as the real account of the history only when the Priestly document had been skilfully combined with the older writings in our Pentateuch in such a way that these priestly institutions seemed to be the heart of the whole and to overshadow all else. Then apparently all opposition vanished, and priestly enthusiasm and prophetic fervour were joined by popular co-operation in establishing this ritual as the one right method of serving the Living God. This enthusiasm was in part the result of a distorted reading of history, but all uncritical readers so distort the history to the present hour. By the time of Nehemiah this view of the history was fully accepted, and by the time of the Chronicler, a century later, it had distorted the history of the Israelites in Canaan, to correspond with the priestly picture, as appears to this day in the Books of Chronicles.

This priestly triumph was in a way a retrogression from prophetic ideals. Some of the prophets, as Jeremiah, had taught a religion free and spiritual, capable of becoming universal. The priestly conception, however noble its monotheism, was so harnessed to outworn ritual that it could appeal only in a limited degree to men of other races. Nevertheless this ritual had its place. In the centuries which followed, when the soul of the Hebrew was tried almost beyond endurance, and no cheering voice of prophet was heard, it was due to this objective ritual, as something for which to live, and strive, and fight, that he survived to do his work in the world. With the adoption of the Priestly Code Judaism was born.

(2) The effects of the priestly ritual were not, however, so deadening as one might suppose. Various causes prevented it from stifling the deeper religious life. The teachings of the prophets were cherished, and many of them had taught that religion is a matter of the heart and not a ceremonial. During the long exile the devout Jew had learned how to live a really religious life without the help of Temple ritual. Many of the faithful were in Babylonia, and were still compelled to do without the Temple sacrifices and prayers. Then the Law itself did not contain sacrifices for many sins. The old customs adapted in Lv 4-6 and 16 provided sacrifices for only very few of the sins of life. The sincere heart was compelled still to live its life with God in large measure independently of the ritual. The Pentateuch also contains many noble and inspiring precepts on moral and spiritual matters. There were those, too, who paid little attention to the ceremonies of the Temple, although most supported it as a matter of duty. All these causes combined to prevent the Law from at once stereotyping the religious life. This period became accordingly the creative period in Judaism.

The first of these important creations was the Psalter, the hymn-book of the Second Temple. This greatest of the world's collections of sacred song was a gradual growth. Book I. (Pss 3-41) came into existence probably in the time of Nehemiah. The other collections were gradually made at different times, the whole not being completed till the Maccabean age (cf. art. PSALMS). In compiling it some earlier hymns were probably utilized, but they were so re-edited that critics cannot clearly date them. Into this collection there went every variety of religious expression. The breathings of anger against enemies mingle with tender aspirations after communion with God. One psalm, the 50th, treats sacrifice sarcastically, while many express a devotion to the Law which is extremely touching. One (Ps 51) expresses the most advanced and psychologically correct conception of the nature of sin and forgiveness that is found anywhere in the OT. A Judaism capable of producing such a book was noble indeed. To live up to the highest expressions of this the first-fruits of creative Judaism is to be a pure Christian.

(3) There was, however, in this period a class of sages who lived apart from the life of the Temple, untouched by the ceremonies of the priest or the aspirations of the prophet. They treated religious problems from that practical common-sense point of view which the Hebrews called 'wisdom.' The books produced by this class had a profound religious influence. The attitude of these men left them free for the greatest play of individuality. Their books are, therefore, written from various standpoints, and present widely divergent points of view.

The oldest of these, the Book of Job, discusses, in some of the noblest poetry ever written, the problem of suffering, or the mystery of life. The author treats his theme with absolute freedom of thought, untrammelled by the priestly conceptions of the Law. In his conclusion, however, he is profoundly religious. He demonstrates at once the function and the limits of reason in the religious life,—its function to keep theology in touch with reality, and its inability to fathom life's mystery. Job does not find satisfaction till he receives the vision of God, and becomes willing, through appreciation of the Divine Personality, to trust even though his problems are unsolved (cf. Peake, Problem of Suffering in OT, 100 ff.).

The Book of Proverbs contains the sayings of sages of the practical, everyday sort. Their view of life is expeditious. Wisdom is good because it pays, and the fear (worship) of Jahweh is the beginning of wisdom. Sometimes, as in ch. 8, they rise to noble poetry in the praise of wisdom, but for the most part they pursue the humdrum pathway of everyday expediency. Their point of view is the opposite of that of the impassioned Psalmists, but is not inconsistent with formal faithfulness in the observance of the Law.

Ecclesiastes is the work of a man who has almost lost faith, and who has quite lost that enthusiasm for life which the perception of a noble meaning in it gives. He is not altogether able to throw off completely his childhood's beliefs, but they have ceased to be for him a solution of life's mystery, and he has scant patience with those who, in like case with himself, continue to volubly profess their devotion because it is the orthodox thing to do. He insists upon bringing all things to the test of reality.

Sirach is a collection of aphorisms which continues the work of the Book of Proverbs.

(4) The religious life thus far described was that which flourished in Palestine. During this period, however, the Jews had been scattering over the world (cf. DISPERSION). These scattered communities had no idea of being anything but Jews. They had their synagogues in which the Law was read, and, like the Captivity in Babylonia, they maintained as much of their religious life as they could away from the Temple. As often as possible they went to Jerusalem at the time of some great feast, and took part in its sacrificial worship. Contact with the heathen world, however, broadened the vision of these Jews. They saw that many Gentiles were noble men. Probably too here and there one of the nobler Gentiles was attracted by the lofty religion of the Jew.

At all events there sprang up among the Diaspora a desire to win the heathen world to Judaism. The translation of the Bible into Greek, which was begun in the 3rd cent., was demanded not only for the use of the Greek-speaking Jews, but as an instrument in the hands of those who would fulfil the missionary conception of the Second Isaiah and win the world to Jahweh. Towards the end of this period a missionary literature began to be written. One portion of this, the Sibylline Oracles, the oldest part of which dates perhaps from the Maccabean age, represented the Sibyl, who was so popular in the Græco-Roman world, as recounting in Greek hexameters the history of the chosen people. The Book of Jonah dates from this period, and is a part of this literature, though probably written in Palestine. Its author satirizes the nation as a whole for her unwillingness, after all her chastisements, either to go on the mission to which Jahweh would send her, or to rejoice that He showed mercy to any but herself.

6. The reign of legalism.—With the beginning of the Hasmonæan dynasty (John Hyrcanus I.), the creative period of Judaism was over, and the leaders, gathering up the heritage of the past, were crystallizing it into permanent form. This did not come about all at once, and its beginnings go back into the preceding period. The writers of the Priestly Law were the real intellectual ancestors of those Chasidim, or enthusiasts for the Law, out of whom the Maccabees sprang. Until after the Maccabæan struggle, however, the religious life was too varied, and the genius of the nation too creative, for the priestly conceptions to master everybody. The struggle of the Maccabees for the life of the Jewish religion greatly strengthened the Chasidim, who early in the Hasmonæan rule developed into the Pharisees. More numerous than the Sadducees, and possessing among the country people a much greater reputation for piety, they soon became the dominant party in Palestine. Some, as the Essenes (wh. see), might split off from them, but they were too insignificant to shatter the Pharisees' influence. The aim of the Pharisees was to apply the Law to all the details of daily life. Some of its provisions were indefinite. It called on the Hebrew not to work on the Sabbath, but some work was necessary, if man would live. They endeavoured to define, therefore, what was and what was not work within the meaning of the Pentateuch. Similarly they dealt with other laws. These definitions were not for some centuries committed to writing. Thus there grew up an Oral Law side by side with the Written Law, and in due time the Pharisees regarded this as of Divine authority also. Thus their energies fastened the grip of external observance upon the religious life. The epoch was not creative. They dared not create anything. Everything was given out either as an interpretation of the Law, or as the interpretation of some predecessor. There was development and growth, of course, but this was accomplished, not by creating the new, but by interpreting the old. In the Rabbinic schools, which were developed in the reign of Herod, this system fully unfolded itself, and became the archetype of orthodox Judaism to the present day.

In the Rabbinic schools the method of teaching was by repetition. The sayings or interpretations of famous Rabbis were stated by the master and repeated again and again till they were remembered. Not originally but memory was the praiseworthy quality in a student. Thus when, centuries later, the Oral Law was committed to writing, it was called Mishna, or 'Repetition.'

In the synagogue (wh. see), where the people worshipped on the Sabbath, and where the children were taught, the inner religious life was fostered, but synagogues gradually became centres for the propagation of Pharisaism.

Beginning with the Maccabæan struggles, a new class of literature, the Apocalyptic, was called into existence. Prophecy was completely dead. No one had the creative genius to unfold in his own name the Divine purposes. For some centuries those who had a message for the contemporaries in persecution presented it as a vision which some ancient worthy, Enoch, Daniel, Baruch, or Ezra, had seen. The apocalyptists were only in a secondary sense creative. They moulded the utterances of the prophets and traditional material borrowed from Babylonia, so as to make them express the hopes which they would teach. No fewer than seven of these works were attributed to Enoch, and six to Baruch; one was ascribed to Moses, one to Isaiah, while each of the twelve sons of Jacob had his 'Testament,' and Solomon a 'Psalter.'

In this literature the national consciousness of Judaism, in conflict first with Syria and then with Rome, finds expression. The hopes for the long-delayed kingdom of which the prophets had spoken are portrayed. As one sees that kingdom fade (or brighten) from the earthly empire of the early apocalypses to the heavenly kingdom of some of the later ones, one follows the eschatological conceptions which were at this time being born in Judaism. The apocalyptic hopes were quite consistent with the Law; they pointed forward to that time when the faithful should have ability to serve God completely, and to the reward for all that they had suffered here.

The great idea of God expressed by the Priestly document pervaded and still pervades Judaism. The Divine unity and majesty were and are its watchwords. These as well as its Pharisaic ritual have been embodied in Talmud and Midrash, and transmitted to modern times. Judaism during the Christian centuries has had its history, its development, and its heresies. It has produced independent thinkers like Maimonides and Spinoza. In modern life the Reformed Jew is casting off the forms of Pharisaism, but through the lapse of all the centuries Judaism, as shaped by the Pharisees and held by their successors, has been the orthodox religion of that race which traces its lineage to Israel.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

ISRAELITE (Jn 1¹⁷).—This is the only instance of the use of the word 'Israelite' in the Gospels. It has the particular significance, suggested by the story of Jacob in Gn 32²⁸ 35¹⁰, of one belonging to the Jewish race, with special reference to the privileges conferred by God on His people: 'whose is the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the temple service, and the promises' (Ro 9⁴). Its use (as distinct from 'Jew' and 'Hebrew') became closely associated with belief in the Messianic hope (cf. Jn 1⁴⁶), and the expression 'Israelite indeed,' addressed to Nathanael, breathes that sense of tragedy so apparent in the Fourth Gospel, inasmuch as those who were specially 'His own' received Him not. We may compare the attitude of 'the Jews,' in ch. 6, who blindly claimed race privileges, and yet were enemies of Christ, and who cherished the very prejudice that Nathanael overcame (cf. Jn 1⁴⁶ with 6⁴², where the objection in both cases is to the commonplace origin of Jesus), when he readily responded to Philip's invitation, 'Come and see.' It is in this sense that Nathanael is 'without guile.' He does not allow his devout sense of privilege to destroy openness of heart towards the claim of Jesus of Nazareth. His action shows that he is sincere, frank, and without sinister aim (cf. 2 Co 12¹⁶, 1 Th 2²). To Jesus, therefore, he is an object of surprise.

R. H. STRACHAN.

ISSACHAR.—The fifth son of Leah, born after Gad and Asher, the sons of Zilpah, and the ninth of Jacob's sons (Gn 30¹⁸ [E], cf. 35^{22b} [P]). The name (In Heb. Yiss-askar) is peculiar in form, and of uncertain signification; but it is quite probable that it has arisen from a corruption of 'ish-sakhar as Wellhausen (Sam. 95) suggests, and further, that the latter element is the name of a deity. Ball (SBOT, ad loc.) suggests the Egyptian Memphite god Sokar. The name would then correspond to the name 'ish-Gad by which the Moabites knew the Gadites, and E, however, both connect it with the root sakhar,

'to hire': J, because Leah 'hired' Jacob from Rachei with Reuben's mandrakes; E, because she gave Zilpah to Jacob. The difference shows that the traditions are of little value as linguistic guides. Gn 49¹⁴, 18 also appears to play upon the root sakhar in its description of Issachar as 'a servant under task work.' This would harmonize with the interpretation 'hired man' or 'labourer.' It has, however, little to commend it.

P's census at Sinai gives the tribe 54,400 (Nu 1²⁹), and at Moab 64,300 (26²); cf. 1 Ch 7⁵. For the clans see Gn 46¹³ and 1 Ch 7¹⁵.

The original seat of the tribe appears to have been S. of Naphtali and S.E. of Zebulun, 'probably in the hills between the two valleys which descend from the Gress. Plain to the Jordan (Wady el-Bireh and Nahr Galud)' (Moore, Judges, 151). On the N.W. it touched upon Mt. Tabor, on the S. upon Mt. Gilboa. Eastward it reached to the Jordan. P's lot (Jos 19¹⁷⁻²⁰) assigns it to the tribe sixteen cities and their villages, scattered throughout the eastern end of the rich Plain of Esdraelon, and the Valley of Jezreel. The tribe participated in the war against Sisera (Jg 5¹³), and Deborah perhaps belonged to it. The 'with' before Deborah might be read 'people of'; but the verse is evidently corrupt. Baasha, the son of Ahijah, who succeeded Nadab, was 'of the house of Issachar'; and, possibly, also Omri, who gave his name to the Northern Kingdom. The references in the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49) would indicate that during the early monarchy Issachar lost both its martial valour and its independence. On the other hand, in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33¹⁸, 19) great commercial prosperity is indicated, and the maintenance of a sanctuary to which 'the peoples' flock to the sacrificial worship. Tola the judge, the grandson of Dodo, was a man of Issachar (Jg 10¹). This name Dodo, occurring on the Mesha stele as that of a divinity, has led to the suggestion that he may have been worshipped in early times by the tribe. According to the Talmud, the Sanhedrin drew from Issachar its most intellectually prominent members. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JAMES A. CRAIG.

ISSHIAH.—1. One of the heads of the tribe of Issachar (1 Ch 7⁵). 2. A Korahite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁶). 3. The son of Uzziel (1 Ch 23²⁰ 24²³), 4. A Levite (1 Ch 24²¹).

ISSHIAH.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10¹⁰); called in 1 Es 9²² Aseas.

ISSUE.—See MEDICINE, p. 600^a.

ISTALCURUS (1 Es 8¹⁰).—'Uthi the son of Istalcurus' here stands for 'Uthai and Zabbud' in Ezr 8¹⁴.

ITALIAN BAND.—See BAND.

ITALY.—This word varied in sense from time to time. It first signified only the Southern (the Greek) part of the peninsula; later it included all the country south of the Lombard plain; and finally, before the time of Christ, it had come to bear the meaning which it has now. Its central position in the Mediterranean, the conformation of its coast, and the capabilities of its soil under proper cultivation, fitted it to be the home and centre of a governing race. In the 1st cent. A.D. there was constant communication between the capital Rome and every part of the Empire, by well-recognized routes. Among the routes to the E., which mainly concern the NT student, was that from Rome along the W. coast of Italy to Campania, where it crossed the country and eventually reached Brundisium. From the harbour there the traveller either sailed across the Adriatic to Dyrrhachium, and went by the Egnatian road to Thessalonica and beyond, or sailed across to the Gulf of Corinth, transhipped from Lechaëum to Cenchræ (wh. see), and from there sailed to Ephesus or Antioch or Alexandria, as he desired.

The best account of a home journey is in Ac 27. The Jews poured into Italy, especially to Rome, and had been familiar to the Italians long before Christianity came.

A. SOUTER.

ITOH.—See MEDICINE, p. 599^b.

ITTHAI.—See ITTAL, 2.

ITHAMAR.—The fourth and youngest son of Aaron and Elisheba (Ex 6²³ etc.); consecrated priest (Ex 28¹²); forbidden to mourn for Nadab and Abihu (Lv 10⁶), or to leave the Tent of Meeting (v. 7); afterwards entrusted by Moses with priestly duties (Lv 10¹²) and rebuked by him for neglect (v. 12¹⁰); set over the Gershonites and the Merarites in connexion with the service of the Tent of Meeting (Nu 4¹⁻³⁸ 7¹¹; cf. also Ex 38²¹); ancestor of Eli (cf. 1 K 2²⁷ with 1 Ch 24³; Jos. Ant. viii. i. 3). The family in David's time was only half the size of Eleazar's (1 Ch 24⁴). It was represented among the returned exiles (Ezr 8²).

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

ITHIEL.—1. A Benjamite (Neh 11⁷). 2. One of two persons to whom Agur addressed his oracular sayings, the other being Ucal (Pr 30⁴). Neither LXX nor Vulg. recognizes proper names here, and most modern commentators point differently and tr. 'I have wearied myself, O God, I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed.' So RVm.

ITHLAH.—A town of Dan, near Aijalon (Jos 19⁴⁵). The site is unknown.

ITHEMAH.—A Moabite, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11¹⁶).

ITHAN.—A city in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15²³); site uncertain.

ITHERA.—The father of Amasa, and husband of Abigail, David's sister. He is described as an Israelite in 2 S 17², but the better reading is 'Jether the Ishmaelite' (1 Ch 2¹⁷).

ITHRAN.—1. Eponym of a Horite clan (Gn 36²⁸, 1 Ch 1⁴). 2. An Asherite chief (1 Ch 7²⁷), probably identical with Jether of the following verse.

ITHTHEAM.—The sixth son of David, born to him at Hebron (2 S 3³, 1 Ch 3³).

ITHRITE, THE.—A gentilic adjective applied to the descendants of a family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2²³), amongst whom were two of David's guard (2 S 23²⁸, 1 Ch 11⁴⁰ Ira and Gareb). Possibly, however, the text of 2 S 23 and 1 Ch 11 should be pointed 'the Jattirite,' i.e. an inhabitant of Jattir (mentioned in 1 S 30²⁷ as one of David's haunts) in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15¹⁸ 21¹⁴). See JATTIR.

ITS.—It is well known that this word occurs but once in AV, Lv 25⁴, and that even there it is due to subsequent printers, the word in 1611 being 'it'—'that which groweth or it owne accord.' The use of 'it' for 'its' is well seen in Shaks. King John, II. i. 166,

'Go to it grandam, child:
Give grandam kingdom, and it grandam will Give it a plum, a cherry, and a fig.'

The form 'its' was only beginning to come into use about 1611. The usual substitutes in AV are 'his' and 'thereof.' Thus Mt 6³ 'But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness,' where Tindale has 'the rightwisnes thereof' (RV takes the pronoun to be masculine, referring to God, not kingdom, and retains 'his').

ITTAL.—1. A Gittite leader who, with a following of six hundred Philistines, attached himself to David at the outbreak of Absalom's rebellion. In spite of being urged by David to return to his home, he determined to follow the king in his misfortune, affirming his faithfulness in the beautiful words: 'As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether for death or for life. even there also will thy servant be' (2 S 15²¹). He therefore remained in the service of David, and soon rose to a position of great trust, being placed in command of a third part of the people (2 S 18³). 2. A Benjamite, son of Ribai, who was one of David's mighty men (2 S 23²⁸, 1 Ch 11²¹ [in the latter Ithal]).

ITURÆA [the name is probably derived from Jetur who is mentioned in Gn 25¹⁸ and 1 Ch 1³¹ as a son of Ishmael], with Trachonitis, constituted the tetrarchy of Philip (Lk 3¹). But whether 'Ituræa' is employed by the Evangelist as a noun or an adjective is a disputed point. Ramsay contends (Expositor, Jan., Feb., Apr., 1894) that no Greek writer prior to Eusebius in the 4th cent. A.D. ever uses it as the name of a country. The Ituræans as a people were well known to classical writers. According to Cicero (Philipp. ii. 112), they were a 'predatory people'; according to Cæsar (Bell. Afr. 20), they were 'skillful archers'; according to Strabo (xvi. ii. 10 etc.), they were 'lawless.' They seem to have migrated originally from the desert to the vicinity of Southern Lebanon and Cæle-Syria. Both Strabo and Josephus (Ant. xiii. xi. 3) locate them in these parts. The Romans probably caused them to retreat towards the desert again shortly before the Christian era. Lysanias the son of Ptolemy is called by Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) 'king of the Ituræans.' He was put to death by Mark Antony in B.C. 34. Zenodorus his successor died in B.C. 20, whereupon a part of his territory fell into the hands of Herod the Great; and when Herod's kingdom was divided, it became the possession of Philip (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3). Whether Ituræa and Trachonitis overlapped (as Ramsay thinks), or were two distinct districts (as Strabo), is uncertain; G. A. Smith in his art. 'Ituræa' in Hastings' DB is non-committal. The passage in Luke seems to favour a distinct and definite district, which was probably somewhere N.E. of the Sea of Galilee.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

IVORY (shēn, lit. 'tooth'; and shenhabbīm, 'elephants' teeth' [but reading doubtful], 1 K 10², 2 Ch 9¹¹).—Ivory has been valued from the earliest times. In Solomon's day the Israelites imported it from Ophir (1 K 10²); it was used in the decorations of palaces (22¹⁹). The 'tower of ivory' (Ca 7⁴) may also have been a building decorated with ivory. Solomon had a throne of ivory (1 K 10¹⁸⁻²⁰). 'Beds of ivory,' such as are mentioned in Am 6⁴, were, according to a cuneiform inscription, included in the tribute paid by Hezekiah to Sennacherib.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

IVVAH.—A city named in 2 K 18²⁴ 19¹³. Is 37¹⁸, along with Sepharvaim and Hena, as conquered by the Assyrians. Its real name and location are both uncertain. It is frequently identified with Avva of 2 K 17²⁴. Some would make it the name not of a city but of a god. See, further, art. HENA.

IVY.—This plant (Hedera helix) grows wild in Palestine and Syria. It is mentioned in 2 Mac 6⁷. See DIONYSIA.

IYE-ABARIM ('Iyim of the regions beyond, distinguishing this place from the Iim of Jos 15²³).—The station mentioned in Nu 21¹¹ 33⁴ (in v. 4 Iyim alone) and described (21¹¹) as 'in the wilderness which is before Moab toward the sun-rising,' and more briefly (33⁴) as 'in the border of Moab.' Nothing is known as to its position beyond these indications.

IYIM ('heaps' or 'ruins').—1. Short form of Iye-abarim in Nu 33⁴. 2. Jos 15²³ (AV and RV incorrectly Iim), a town in Judah, one of the 'uttermost cities toward the border of Edom.'

IYYAR.—See TIME.

IZHAR

IZHAR.—1. Son of Kohath the son of Levi (Ex 6¹², Nu 3¹⁹ 16¹, 1 Ch 6² 18, 23¹² 10); patron. Isharites (Nu 3²⁷, 1 Ch 24²² 26²² 29). 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁷).

IZLIAH.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8¹²).

IZRAHIAH.—A chief of Issachar (1 Ch 7²).

JACHIN

IZRAHITES.—Gentile name in 1 Ch 27¹, possibly another form of Zerahites, vv. 11, 12.

IZRI.—Chief of one of the Levitical choirs (1 Ch 25¹¹); called in v. 3 Zeri.

IZZIAH.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²²); called in 1 Es 9²² Iedias.

J

JAAKAN.—See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

JAABOBAH.—A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4²⁴).

JAALA (Neh 7²⁴) or JAALAH (Ezr 2⁴).—The name of a family of the 'sons of Solomon's servants' who returned with Zerubbabel; called in 1 Es 5²² Jeeli.

JAAR.—A Heb. name for a wood, forest, thicket, occurring about fifty times in the OT. It occurs once as a proper name, namely in Ps 132², where, speaking of the ark, the Psalmist says that it was heard of at Ephrathah and found at Jaar. The parallelism of Hebrew poetry requires that Jaar shall be regarded here as set over against Ephrathah. The ark was brought from the region of Bethlehem (Ephrathah), yea, from the woody heights of Kiriath-jearim. W. F. COBB.

JAARE-OREGIM.—According to 2 S 21¹⁹, the name of the father of Elhanan, one of David's heroes; but according to 1 Ch 20⁸ his name was plain Jair. Obviously oregim ('weavers') has crept in from the next line. See ELHANAN. W. F. COBB.

JAARESHIAH.—A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8²⁷).

JAASIEL.—The 'ruler' of Benjamin (1 Ch 27²¹), probably identical with the Merobaites of 11¹⁷.

JAASU (Ezr 10²⁷ Kethibh) or JAASAI (Qere, so RVm. —One of those who had married foreign wives).

JAAZANIAH.—1. A Judean, one of the military commanders who came to Mizpah to give in their allegiance to Gedaliah (2 K 25²²—Jer 40⁸ Jezeaniah). 2. A chieftain of the clan of the Rechabites (Jer 35²). 3. Son of Shaphan, who appeared in Ezekiel's vision as ringleader of seventy of the elders of Israel in the practice of secret idolatry at Jerusalem (Ezk 8¹¹). 4. Son of Azzur, against whose counsels Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy (Ezk. 11²⁴).

JAASIAH.—A son of Merari (1 Ch 24²⁷ 27).

JAASIEL.—A Levite skilled in the use of the psalter (1 Ch 15¹⁹); called in v. 20 Aziel.

JABAL.—Son of Lamech by Adah, and originator of the nomadic form of life, Gn 4²⁰ (J).

JABBOK.—A river now called Nahr es-Zerka ('the Blue River'), which rises near Amman the ancient Rabbath-ammon, and after running first N.E., then N., N.W., W., finally bends S.W. to enter the Jordan. On almost the whole of its curved course of 60 miles it runs through a deep valley, and forms a natural boundary. On its curved upper reaches it may be said practically to bound the desert, while the deep gorge of its lower, straighter course divides the land of Gilead into two halves. It is mentioned as a frontier in Nu 21²⁴, Dt 27³, Jos 12², Jg 11¹² 22. The Jabbok is famous for all time on account of the striking incident of Jacob's wrestling there with the Angel (Gn 32²⁴).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JABESH.—Father of Shallum, who usurped the kingdom of Israel by the assassination of king Zechariah (2 K 15¹⁶ 18 19).

JABESH, JABESH-GILEAD.—A city which first appears in the story of the restoration of the Benjamites (Jg 21). Probably it had not fully recovered from this blow when it was almost forced to submit to the disgraceful terms of Nahash the Ammonite (1 S 11). In gratitude for Saul's relief of the city, the inhabitants rescued his body from maltreatment by the Philistines (1 S 31¹¹⁻¹²)—an act which earned them the commendation of David (2 S 2¹).

According to the Onomasticon, the site is 6 Roman miles from Pella. The name seems to be preserved in Yabis, a wady tributary to the Jordan, which runs down at the south part of trans-Jordanic Manasseh. The site itself, however, is not yet identified with certainty.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JABEZ.—1. A city in Judah occupied by scribes, the descendants of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴). 2. A man of the family of Judah, noted for his 'honourable character' (1 Ch 4²⁴); called Ya'beis, which is rendered as if it stood for Ya'tsib, 'he causes pain.' In his vow (v. 10) there is again a play upon his name. W. EWING.

JABIN ('[God] perceives').—A Canaanite king who reigned in Hazor, a place near the Waters of Merom, not far from Kadesh. In the account, in Jg 4, of the defeat of Jabin's host under Sisera, the former takes up quite a subordinate position. In another account (Jos 11¹⁻⁵) of this episode the victory of the two tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali is represented as a conquest of the whole of northern Canaan by Joshua. Both accounts (Jos 11¹⁻⁵, Jg 4) are fragments taken from an earlier, and more elaborate, source; the Jabin in each passage is therefore one and the same person.

JABNEEL.—1. A town on the N. border of Judah, near Mt. Baalah, and close to the sea (Jos 15¹¹). In 2 Ch 26⁶ it is mentioned under the name Jabneh, along with Gath and Ashdod, as one of the cities captured from the Philistines by Uzziah. Although these are the only OT references, it is frequently mentioned (under the name Jamnia) in the Books of Maccabees (1 Mac 4⁴ 5¹ 10¹⁰ 15¹⁰, 2 Mac 12⁸ 9 40) and in Josephus. Judas is said to have burned its harbour; it was captured by Simon from the Syrians. In Jth 2¹ it is called Jemnaan. After various vicissitudes it was captured in the war of the Jews by Vespasian. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Jabneel, now called Jamnia, became the home of the Sanhedrin. At the time of the Crusades the castle Ibelin stood on the site. To-day the village of Yebna stands on the ruined remains of these ancient occupations. It stands 170 feet above the sea on a prominent hill S. of the Wady Rubin. The ancient Majumas or harbour of Jamnia lies to the West. The port would seem to be naturally better than any along the coast of Palestine S. of Caesarea (Warren).

2. An unknown site on the N. boundary of Naphtali not far from the Jordan (Jos 19²³).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JABNEH.—See JABNEEL.

JACAN.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5¹⁴).

JACHIN.—1. Fourth son of Simeon (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁶) called in 1 Ch 4²⁴ Jarib; in Nu 26¹² the patronymic Jachinites occurs. 2. Eponym of a priestly family 1 Ch 9¹⁰, Neh 11¹⁰).

JACHIN AND BOAZ.—These are the names borne by two brazen, or more probably bronze, pillars belonging to Solomon's Temple. They evidently represented the highest artistic achievement of their author, Hiram of Tyre, 'the half-Tyrian copper-worker, whom Solomon fetched from Tyre to do foundry work for him,' whose name, however, was more probably Huram-abi (2 Ch 2¹², Heb. text). The description of them now found in 1 K 7¹⁵⁻²² is exceedingly confused and corrupt, but with the help of the better preserved Gr. text, and of other OT. references (viz. 7⁴⁰, 42, 2 Ch 3¹⁵⁻¹⁷ 4¹², 12, and Jer 52²¹⁻²² = 2 K 25¹⁷), recent scholars have restored the text of the primary passage somewhat as follows:—

'And he cast the two pillars of bronze for the porch of the temple; 18 cubits was the height of the one pillar, and a line of 12 cubits could compass it about, and its thickness was 4 finger-breadths (for it was hollow [with this cf. Jer 52²¹]). And the second pillar was similar. And he made two chapters [i.e. capitals] of cast bronze for the tops of the pillars, etc. [as in RV]. And he made two sets of network to cover the chapters which were upon the tops of the pillars, a network for the one chapter and a network for the second chapter. And he made the pomegranates; and two rows of pomegranates in bronze were upon the one network, and the pomegranates were 200, round about upon the one chapter, and so he did for the second chapter. And he set up the pillars at the porch of the temple,' etc. [as in v.²⁴ RV].

The original description, thus freed from later glosses such as the difficult 'lily work' of v.¹⁹, consists of three parts; the pillars, their capitals, and the ornamentation of the latter. The pillars themselves were hollow, with a thickness of metal equal to three inches of our measure; their height, on the basis of the larger cubit of 20½ inches (see Hastings' DB iv. 907*), was about 31 feet, while their diameter works out at about 6½ feet. The capitals appear from 1 K 7⁴¹ to have been globular or spheroidal in form, each about 8½ feet in height, giving a total height for the complete pillars of roughly 40 feet. The ornamentation of the capitals was twofold: first they were covered with a specially cast network of bronze. Over this were hung festoon-wise two wreaths of bronze pomegranates, each row containing 100 pomegranates, of which it is probable that four were fixed to the network, while the remaining 96 hung free (see Jer 52²²).

As regards their position relative to the Temple, it may be regarded as certain that they were structurally independent of the Temple porch, and stood free in front of it—probably on plinths or bases—Jachin on the south and Boaz on the north (1 K 7²¹), one on either side of the steps leading up to the entrance to the porch (cf. Ezk 40⁹). Such free-standing pillars were a feature of Phœnician and other temples of Western Asia, the statements of Greek writers on this point being confirmed by representations on contemporary coins. A glass dish, discovered in Rome in 1882, even shows a representation of Solomon's Temple with the twin pillars flanking the porch, as above described (reproduced in Benzinger's Heb. Arch. [1907], 218).

The names 'Jachin' and 'Boaz' present an enigma which still awaits solution. The meanings suggested in the margins of EV—'Jachin, 'he shall establish,' Boaz, 'in it is strength'—give no help, and are besides very problematical. The various forms of the names presented by the Greek texts—for which see EBi li. 2304 f. and esp. Barnes in JThSt v. [1904], 447–551—point to a possible original nomenclature as Baal and Jachin—the latter a Phœnician verbal form of the same signification ('he will be') as the Heb. Jahweh.

The original significance and purpose of the pillars, finally, are almost as obscure as their names. The fact that they were the work of a Phœnician artist, however, makes it probable that their presence is to be explained on the analogy of the similar pillars of Phœnician temples. These, though viewed in more primitive times as the abode of the Deity (see PILLAR), had, as civilization and religion advanced, come to be regarded as mere symbols of His presence. To a Phœnician temple-builder, Jachin and Boaz would appear as the natural adjuncts of such a building, and are therefore, perhaps, best explained as conventional symbols of the God for whose worship the Temple of Solomon was designed.

For another, and entirely improbable, view of their original purpose, namely, that they were huge candelabra or cressets in which 'the suet of the sacrifices' was burned, see W. R. Smith's RSZ, 488; and for the latest attempts to explain the pillars in terms of the Babylonian 'astral mythology,' see A. Jeremias, Das alte Test. im Lichte d. alt. Orient's [1906], 494, etc.; Benzinger, op. cit., 2nd ed. [1907], 323, 331. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

JACINTH.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES, p. 467*.

JACKAL.—Although the word 'jackal' does not occur in the AV, there is no doubt that this animal is several times mentioned in OT: it occurs several times in RV where AV has 'fox.' (1) shu'āl is used in Heb. for both animals, but most of the references are most suitably tr. 'jackal.' The only OT passage in which the fox is probably intended is Neh 4³. (2) tannīm (pl.), AV 'dragons,' is in RV usually tr. 'jackals.' See Is 34¹³, Jer 9¹¹ 10²² etc. Post considers 'wolves' would be better. (3) 'iyīm, tr. AV 'wild beasts of the island' (Is 13²² 34¹⁴, Jer 50³⁹), is in RV tr. 'wolves,' but Post thinks these 'howling creatures' (as word implies) were more probably jackals. (4) 'dōlīm, 'doleful creatures' (Is 13²¹), may also have been jackals. The jackal (Canis aureus) is exceedingly common in Palestine; its mournful cries are heard every night. During the day jackals hide in deserted ruins, etc. (Is 13²² 34¹³ 35⁷), but as soon as the sun sets they issue forth. They may at such times be frequently seen gilding backwards and forwards across the roads seeking for morsels of food. Their staple food is carrion of all sorts (Ps 63¹⁰). At the present day the Bedouin threaten an enemy with death by saying they will 'throw his body to the jackals.' Though harmless to grown men when solitary, a whole pack may be dangerous. The writer knows of a case where a European was pursued for miles over the Philistine plain by a pack of jackals. It is because they go in packs that we take the shu'ālīm of Jg 15⁴ to be jackals rather than foxes. Both animals have a weakness for grapes (Ca 2¹⁵). Cf. art. FOX. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JACOB.—1. Son of Isaac and Rebekah. His name is probably an elliptical form of an original Jakob'el, 'God follows' (i.e. 'rewards'), which has been found both on Babylonian tablets and on the pylons of the temple of Karnak. By the time of Jacob this earlier history of the word was overlooked or forgotten, and the name was understood as meaning 'one who takes by the heel, and thus tries to trip up or supplant' (Gn 25²⁶ 27³⁶, Hos 12⁹). His history is recounted in Gn 25¹⁹–50¹⁴, the materials being unequally contributed from three sources. For the details of analysis see Dillmann, Com., and Driver, LOT, p. 16. P supplies but a brief outline; J and E are closely interwoven, though a degree of original independence is shown by an occasional divergence in tradition, which adds to the credibility of the joint narrative.

Jacob was born in answer to prayer (25²¹), near Beersheba; and the later rivalry between Israel and Edom was thought of as prefigured in the strife of the twins in the womb (25²¹, 2 Es 3¹⁶ 6⁸⁻¹⁰, Ro 9¹¹⁻¹²). The differences between the two brothers, each contrasting with the other in character and habit, were marked from the beginning. Jacob grew up a 'quiet man' (Gn 25²⁷ RVm), a shepherd and herdsman. Whilst still at home, he succeeded in overreaching Esau in two ways. He took advantage of Esau's hunger and heedlessness to secure the birthright, which gave him precedence even during the father's lifetime (43²⁶), and afterwards a double portion of the patrimony (Dt 21¹⁷), with probably the domestic priesthood. At a later time, after careful consideration (Gn 27^{11f.}), he adopted the device suggested by his mother, and, allaying with ingenious falsehoods (27²⁰) his father's suspicion, intercepted also his blessing. Isaac was dismayed, but instead of revoking the blessing confirmed it (27³³⁻³⁷), and was not able to remove Esau's bitterness. In both blessings later political and geographical conditions are reflected. To Jacob is promised Canaan, a well-watered land of fields and vineyards (Dt 11¹⁴ 33²⁸), with sovereignty over its peoples, even those who were 'brethren' or descended from the same ancestry as Israel (Gn 19^{37f.}, 2 S 8¹²⁻¹⁴). Esau is consigned to the dry and rocky districts of Idumaea, with a life of war and plunder; but his subjection to Jacob is limited in duration (2 K 8²²), if not also in completeness (Gn 27^{40f.}, which points to the restlessness of Edom).

Of this successful craft on Jacob's part the natural result on Esau's was hatred and resentment, to avoid which Jacob left his home to spend a few days (27⁴¹) with his uncle in Haran. Two different motives are assigned. JE represents Rebekah as pleading with her son his danger from Esau; but P represents her as suggesting to Isaac the danger that Jacob might marry a Hittite wife (27⁴⁶). The traditions appear on literary grounds to have come from different sources; but there is no real difficulty in the narrative as it stands. Not only are man's motives often complex; but a woman would be likely to use different pleas to a husband and to a son, and if a mother can counsel her son to yield to his fear, a father would be more alive to the possibility of an outbreak of folly. On his way to Haran, Jacob passed a night at Bethel (cf. 13¹⁻⁴), and his sleep was, not unnaturally, disturbed by dreams; the crouchees and stone terraces of the district seemed to arrange themselves into a ladder reaching from earth to heaven, with angels ascending and descending, whilst Jehovah Himself bent over him (28¹³ RVm) with loving assurances. Reminded thus of the watchful providence of God, Jacob's alarms were transmuted into religious awe. He marked the sanctity of the spot by setting up as a sacred pillar the boulder on which his head had rested, and undertook to dedicate a tithe of all his gains. Thenceforward Bethel became a famous sanctuary, and Jacob himself visited it again (35¹; cf. Hos 12⁴).

Arrived at Haran, Jacob met in his uncle his superior for a time in the art of overreaching. By a ruse Laban secured fourteen years' service (29²⁷, Hos 12¹², Jth 8²⁶), to which six years more were added, under an ingenious arrangement in which the exacting uncle was at last outwitted (30^{35ff.}). At the end of the term Jacob was the head of a household conspicuous even in those days for its magnitude and prosperity. Quarrels with Laban and his sons ensued, but God is represented as intervening to turn their arbitrary actions (31⁷) to Jacob's advantage. At length he took flight whilst Laban was engaged in sheep-shearing, and, re-crossing the Euphrates on his way home, reached Gilead. There he was overtaken by Laban, whose exasperation was increased by the fact that his teraphim, or household gods, had been taken away by the fugitives, Rachel's hope in stealing them being to appropriate the good fortune of her fathers. The dispute that followed was closed by an alliance of friendship, the double covenant being sealed by setting up in commemoration a cairn with a solitary boulder by its side (31^{48f.} 52), and by sharing a sacrificial meal. Jacob promised to treat Laban's daughters with special kindness, and both Jacob and Laban undertook to respect the boundary they had agreed upon between the territories of Israel and of the Syrians. Thereupon Laban returned home; and Jacob continued his journey to Canaan, and was met by the angels of God (32¹), as if to congratulate and welcome him as he approached the Land of Promise.

Jacob's next problem was to conciliate his brother, who was reported to be advancing against him with a large body of men (32⁶). Three measures were adopted. When a submissive message elicited no response, Jacob in dismay turned to God, though without any expression of regret for the deceit by which he had wronged his brother, and proceeded to divide his party into two companies, in the hope that one at least would escape, and to try to appease Esau with a great gift. The next night came the turning-point in Jacob's life. Hitherto he had been ambitious, steady of purpose, subject to genuine religious feeling, but given up almost wholly to the use of crooked methods. Now the higher elements in his nature gain the ascendancy; and henceforth, though he is no less resourceful and politic, his fear of God ceases to be spoilt by intervening passions or a competing self-confidence. Alone on the banks of the Jabbok (Wady Zerka), full of doubt as to the fate that would overtake him, he recognizes at last that his real antagonist is not Esau but God. All his fraud and deceit had been pre-eminently sin against God; and what he needed supremely was not reconciliation with his brother, but the blessing of God. So vivid was the impression, that the entire night seemed to be spent in actual wrestling with a living man. His thigh was sprained in the contest; but since his will was so fixed that he simply would not be refused, the blessing came with the daybreak (32²⁸). His name was changed to Israel, which means etymologically 'God perseveres,' but was applied to Jacob in the sense of 'Perseverer with God' (Hos 12^{4f.}). And as a name was to a Hebrew a symbol of nature (Is 1²⁶ 61³), its change was a symbol of a changed character; and the supplanter became the one who persevered in putting forth his strength in communion with God, and therefore prevailed. His brother received him cordially (33⁴), and offered to escort him during the rest of the journey. The offer was courteously declined, ostensibly because of the difference of pace between the two companies, but probably also with a view to incur no obligation and to risk no rupture. Esau returned to Seir; and Jacob moved on to a suitable site for an encampment, which received the name of Succoth, from the booths that were erected on it (33¹⁷). It was east of the Jordan, and probably not far from the junction with the Jabbok. The valley was suitable for the recuperation of the flocks and herds after so long a journey; and it is probable, from the character of the buildings erected, as well as from the fact that opportunity must be given for Dinah, one of the youngest of the children (30²¹), to reach a marriageable age (34²²), that Jacob stayed there for several years.

After a residence of uncertain length at Succoth, Jacob crossed the Jordan and advanced to Shechem, where he purchased a plot of ground which became afterwards of special interest. Joshua seems to have regarded it as the limit of his expedition, and there the Law was promulgated and Joseph's bones were buried (Jos 24²⁶⁻²⁸; cf. Ac 7⁶); and for a time it was the centre of the confederation of the northern tribes (1 K 12¹, 2 Ch 10¹). Again Jacob's stay must not be measured by days; for he erected an altar (33²⁰) and dug a well (Jn 4¹²), and was detained by domestic troubles, if not of his own original intention. The troubles began with the seduction or outrage of Dinah; but the narrative that follows is evidently compacted of two traditions. According to the one, the transaction was personal, and involved a fulfilment by Shechem of a certain unspecified condition; according to the other, the entire clan was involved on either side, and the story is that of the danger of the absorption of Israel by the local Canaanites and its avoidance through the interposition of Simeon and Levi. But most of the difficulties disappear on the assumption that Shechem's marriage was, as was natural, expedited, a delight to himself and generally approved amongst his kindred (34¹⁹). That pressing matter being settled, the question of an alliance between the two clans, with the sinister motives that prevailed on either side, would be gradually, perhaps slowly, brought to an issue. There would be time to persuade the Shechemites to consent to be circumcised, and to arrange for the treacherous reprisal. Jacob's part in the proceedings was confined chiefly to a timid reproach of his sons for entangling his household in peril, to which they replied with the plea that the honour of the family was the first consideration.

The state of feeling aroused by the vengeance executed on Shechem made it desirable for Jacob to continue his journey. He was directed by God to proceed some twenty miles southwards to Bethel. Before starting, due preparations were made for a visit to so sacred a spot. The amulets and images of foreign gods in the possession of his retainers were collected and buried under a terebinth (35⁴; cf. Jos 24²⁶, Jg 9⁸). The people through whom he passed were smitten with such a panic by the news of what had happened at Shechem as not to interfere with him. Arrived at Bethel, he added an altar (35⁷) to the monolith he had erected on his previous visit, and received in a theophany, for which in mood he was well prepared, a renewal of the promise of royal prosperity. The additional pillar he set up (35¹⁴) was probably a sepulchral stele to the memory of Deborah (cf. 35²⁰), dedicated with appropriate religious services; unless the verse is out of place in the narrative, and is really J's version of what E relates in 28¹⁸. From Bethel Jacob led his caravan to Ephrath, a few miles from which place Rachel died in childbirth. This Ephrath was evidently not far from Bethel, and well to the north of Jerusalem (1 S 10¹⁴, Jer 31¹⁵), and therefore the gloss 'the same is Bethlehem' must be due to a confusion with the other Ephrath (Ru 4¹¹, Mic 5²), which was south of Jerusalem. The next stopping-place was the tower of Eder (35²¹) or 'the flock'—a generic name for the watch-towers erected to aid in the protection of the flocks from robbers and wild beasts. Mic 4⁸ applies a similar term to the fortified southern spur of Zion. But it cannot be proved that the two allusions coalesce; and actually nothing is known of the site of Jacob's encampment, except that it was between Ephrath and Hebron. His journey was ended when he reached the last-named place (35²⁷), the home of his fathers, where he met Esau again, and apparently for the last time, at the funeral of Isaac.

From the time of his return to Hebron, Jacob ceases to be the central figure of the Biblical narrative, which thenceforward revolves round Joseph. Among the leading incidents are Joseph's mission to inquire after his brethren's welfare, the inconsolable sorrow of the old man on the receipt of what seemed conclusive evidence of Joseph's death, the despatch of his surviving sons except Benjamin to buy corn in Egypt (cf. Ac 7^{12a}), the bitterness of the reproach with which he greeted them on their return, and his belated and despairing consent to another expedition as the only alternative to death from famine. The story turns next to Jacob's delight at the news that Joseph is alive, and to his own journey to Egypt through Beersheba, his early home, where he was encouraged by God in visions of the night (46¹⁻⁷). In Egypt he was met by Joseph, and, after an interview with the Pharaoh, settled in the pastoral district of Goshen (47⁵), afterwards known as 'the land of Rameses' (from Rameses II. of the nineteenth dynasty), in the eastern part of the Delta (47¹¹). This migration of Jacob to Egypt was an event of the first magnitude in the history of Israel (Dt 26⁶⁻⁸, Ac 7¹⁴⁻¹⁶), as a stage in the great providential preparation for Redemption. Jacob lived in Egypt seventeen years (47²⁸), at the close of which, feeling death to be nigh, he extracted a pledge from Joseph to bury him in Canaan, and adopted his two grandsons, placing the younger first in anticipation of the pre-eminence of the tribe that would descend from him (48¹, He 11²¹). To Joseph himself was promised, as a token of special affection, the conquered districts of Shechem on the lower slopes of Gerizim (48²², Jn 4⁵). Finally, the old man gathered his sons about him, and pronounced upon each in turn a blessing, afterwards wrought up into the elaborate poetical form of 49²⁻²⁷. The tribes are reviewed in order, and the character of each is sketched in a description of that of its founder. The atmosphere of the poem in regard alike to geography and to history is that of the period of the judges and early kings, when, therefore, the genuine tradition must have taken the form in which it has been preserved. After blessing his sons, Jacob gave them together the directions concerning his funeral which he had given previously to Joseph, and died (49²⁸). His body was embalmed, conveyed to Canaan by a great procession according to the Egyptian custom, and buried in the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (50¹³).

Opinion is divided as to the degree to which Jacob has been idealized in the Biblical story. If it be remembered that the narrative is based upon popular oral tradition, and did not receive its present form until long after the time to which it relates, and that an interest in national origins is both natural and distinctly manifested in parts of Genesis, some idealization may readily be conceded. It may be sought in three directions—in the attempt to find explanations of existing institutions, in the anticipation of religious conceptions and sentiments that belonged to the narrator's times, and in the investment of the reputed ancestor with the characteristics of the tribe descended from him. All the conditions are best met by the view that Jacob was a real person, and that the incidents recorded of him are substantially historical. His character, as depicted, is a mixture of evil and good; and his career shows how, by discipline and grace, the better elements came to prevail, and God was enabled to use a faulty man for a great purpose.

2. Father of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 1^{15f}).
R. W. Moss.

JACOB'S WELL.—See SYCHAR.

JACUBUS (1 Es 9⁴⁸) = Neh 8⁷ Akkub.

JADA.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2²⁸, 27).

JADDUA.—1. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²¹). 2. A high priest (Neh 12¹¹, 22). He is doubtless the Jaddua who is named by Josephus in connexion with Alexander the Great (Jos. Ant. xi. viii. 5, cf. vii. 2, viii. 7).

JADDUS (AV Addus).—A priest whose descendants were unable to trace their genealogy at the return under Zerub., and were removed from the priesthood (1 Es 5³⁹). He is there said to have married Augia, a daughter of Zorzelleus or Barzillai, and to have been called after his name. In Ezr 2⁶¹ and Neh 7⁶⁸ he is called by his adopted name Barzillai.

JADON.—A Meronothite, who took part in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3⁷). The title 'Meronothite' occurs again 1 Ch 27³⁰, but a place Meronoth is nowhere named. According to Jos. (Ant. viii. viii. 5, ix. 1), Jadon was the name of the man of God sent from Judah to Jeroboam (1 K 13).

JAEI.—The wife of Heber, the Kenite (Jg 4¹¹, 17). The Kenites were on friendly terms both with the Israelites (1¹⁶) and with the Canaanites, to whom Jabin and his general, Sisera, belonged. On his defeat by the Israelites, Sisera fled to the tent of Jael, a spot which was doubly secure to the fugitive, on account both of intertribal friendship and of the rules of Oriental hospitality. The act of treachery whereby Jael slew Sisera (Jg 4²¹) was therefore of the basest kind, according to the morals of her own time, and also to modern ideas. The praise, therefore, accorded to Jael and her deed in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5²⁴⁻²⁷) must be accounted for on the questionable moral principle that an evil deed, if productive of advantage, may be rejoiced over and commended by those who have not taken part in it. The writer of the Song of Deborah records an act which, though base, resulted in putting the seal to the Israelite victory, and thus contributed to the recovery of Israel from a 'mighty oppression' (Jg 4⁸); in the exultation over this result the woman who helped to bring it about by her act is extolled. Though the writer of the Song would probably have scorned to commit such a deed himself, he sees no incongruity in praising it for its beneficial consequences. This is one degree worse than 'doing evil that good may come,' for the evil itself is extolled; whereas, in the other case, it is deplored, and unwillingly acquiesced in because it is 'necessary.' The spirit which praises such an act as Jacl's is, in some sense, akin to that of a Jewish custom (Corban) which grew up in later days, and which received the condemnation of Christ, Mk 7¹¹; in each case a contemptible act is condoned, and even extolled, because of the advantage (of one kind or another) which it brings.

In Jg 5⁸ the words 'in the days of Jacl' create a difficulty, which can be accounted for only by regarding them, with most scholars, as a gloss. See also BARAK, DEBORAH, SIBERA. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

JAGUR.—A town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15²¹). The site is unknown.

JAH.—See God, § 2 (g).

JAHATH.—1. A grandson of Judah (1 Ch 4²). 2. A great-grandson of Levi (1 Ch 6^{20, 43}). 3. A son of Shimei (1 Ch 23¹⁰). 4. One of the 'sons' of Shelomoth (1 Ch 24²⁰). 5. A Merarite Levite in the time of Josiah (2 Ch 34¹²).

JAHAZ (In 1 Ch 6⁷⁸, Jer 48²¹ Jahzah).—A town at which Sihon was defeated by Israel (Nu 21²³, Dt 3², Jg 11²⁰). After the crossing of the Arnon, messengers were sent to Sihon from the 'wilderness of Kedemoth' (Dt 2²⁶), and he 'went out against Israel into the wilderness and came to Jahaz' (Nu 21²³). Jahaz is mentioned in connexion with Kedemoth (Jos 13¹⁸ 21³⁶). These passages indicate a position for Jahaz in the S.E. portion of Sihon's territory. Jahaz was one of the Levite cities of Reuben belonging to the children of Merari (Jos 13¹⁸ 21³⁶ [see note in RVm], 1 Ch 6⁷⁸). According to the Moabite Stone (ll. 18-20), the king of Israel dwelt at Jahaz while at war with king Mesha, but was driven out, and the town was taken and added to Moabite territory. Isaiah (15⁴) and Jeremiah (48²¹ 24) refer to it as in the possession of Moab. The site has not yet been identified.

JAHAZIEL.—1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁴). 2. One of the two priests who blew trumpets before the ark when it was brought by David to Jerusalem (1 Ch 16⁶). 3. A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 23¹⁹ 24²³). 4. An Asaphite Levite who encouraged Jehoshaphat and his army against an invading host (2 Ch 20¹⁴). 5. The ancestor of a family of exiles who returned (Ezr 8⁶); called in 1 Es 8²² Jezelus.

JAHDAL.—A Calebite (1 Ch 24⁷).

JAHDIEL.—A Manassite chief (1 Ch 5²⁴).

JAHD.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹⁴).

JAHLEEL.—Third son of Zebulun (Gn 46¹⁴, Nu 26³⁰); patron. Jahleelites (Nu 26³⁰).

JAHMAI.—A man of Issachar (1 Ch 7²).

JAHWEH.—See God, § 2 (f).

JAHZAH.—The form of Jahaz (wh. see) in 1 Ch 6⁷⁸ and Jer 48²¹.

JAHZEEL.—Naphtali's firstborn (Gn 46²⁴, Nu 26⁴⁵); in 1 Ch 7¹³ Jahziel; patron. Jahzeelites (Nu 26⁴⁵).

JAHZELAH.—One of four men who are mentioned as opposing (so RV) Ezra in the matter of the foreign wives (Ezr 10¹⁴). The AV regarded Jahzeiah and his companions as supporters of Ezra, rendering 'were employed about this matter.' This view is supported by LXX, 1 Es 9¹⁴ RVm; but the Heb. phrase here found elsewhere (cf. 1 Ch 21¹, 2 Ch 20²³, Dn 11¹⁴) expresses opposition.

JAHZERAH.—A priest (1 Ch 9¹²); called in Neh 11¹¹ Ahzai.

JAHZIEL.—See JAHZEEL.

JAIR.—1. A clan of Jairites lived on the east of Jordan who were called after Jair. This Jair was of the children of Manasseh (Nu 32⁴¹), and—if we may assume a traditional fusion—a 'judge' (Jg 10³⁶). The settlement of this clan marks a subsequent conquest to that of the west of Jordan. The gentile Jairite is used for Ira (2 S 20²⁸). 2. The father of Mordecai (Est 2⁹). 3. The father of Elhanan. See ELHANAN, JAARE-OREGIM. W. F. COBB.

JAIRUS (=Jair).—This Greek form of the name is used in the Apocrypha (Ad. Est 11²) for Mordecai's father Jair (Est 2⁹); and (1 Es 5³¹) for the head of a family of Temple servants. In NT it is the name of the ruler of the synagogue whose daughter Jesus raised from the dead (Mk 5²², Lk 8⁴¹). In || Mt. (9¹⁸) he is not named. The story of this raising comes from the 'Petrine tradition.' A. J. MACLEAN.

JAKEH.—Father of Agur, the author of the proverbs contained in Pr 30.

JAKIM.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹⁹). 2. A priest, head of the 12th course (1 Ch 24¹²).

JALAM.—A 'son' of Esau (Gn 36⁴. 14. 18, 1 Ch 1³⁶).

JALON.—A Calebite (1 Ch 4¹⁷).

JAMBRES.—See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAMBRI.—A robber tribe which attacked and captured a convoy under the charge of John the Maccabee. The outrage was avenged by Jonathan and Simon, who waylaid and slaughtered a large party of the 'sons of Jambri' (1 Mac 9³⁶⁻⁴²).

JAMES.—1. James, the son of Zebedee, one of the Twelve, the elder brother of John. Their father was a Galilean fisherman, evidently in a thriving way, since he employed 'hired servants' (Mk 1²⁰). Their mother was Salome, and, since she was apparently a sister of the Virgin Mary (cf. Mt 27⁵⁶ = Mk 15⁴⁰ with Jn 19²⁵), they were cousins of Jesus after the flesh. Like his brother, James worked with Zebedee in partnership with Simon and Andrew (Lk 5¹⁰), and he was busy with boat and nets when Jesus called him to leave all and follow Him (Mt 4²¹. 22 = Mk 1¹⁹. 20). His name is coupled with John's in the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10² = Mk 3¹⁷ = Lk 6¹⁴), which means that, when the Twelve were sent out two by two to preach the Kingdom of God (Mk 6⁷), they went in company. And they seem to have been men of like spirit. They got from Jesus the same appellation, 'the Sons of Thunder' (see BOANERGES), and they stood, with Simon Peter, on terms of special intimacy with Him. James attained less distinction than his brother, but the reason is not that he had less devotion or aptitude, but that his life came to an untimely end. He was martyred by Herod Agrippa (Ac 12²).

2. James, the son of Alphaeus (probably identical with Clopas of Jn 19²⁵ RV), styled 'the Little' (not 'the Less'), probably on account of the shortness of his stature, to distinguish him from the other Apostle James, the son of Zebedee. His mother was Mary, one of the devoted women who stood by the Cross and visited the Sepulchre. He had a brother Joses, who was apparently a believer. See Mk 15⁴⁰, Jn 19²⁵, Mk 16¹.

Tradition says that he had been a tax-gatherer, and it is very possible that his father Alphaeus was the same person as Alphaeus the father of Levi the tax-gatherer (Mk 2¹⁴), afterwards Matthew the Apostle and Evangelist. If these identifications be admitted, that family was indeed highly favoured. It gave to the Kingdom of heaven a father, a mother, and three sons, of whom two were Apostles.

3. James, the Lord's brother (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). Like the rest of the Lord's brethren, James did not believe in Him while He lived, but acknowledged His claims after the Resurrection. He was won to faith by a special manifestation of the risen Lord (1 Co 15⁷). Thereafter he rose to high eminence. He was the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and figures in that capacity on three occasions. (1) Three years after his conversion Paul went up to Jerusalem to interview Peter, and, though he stayed for fifteen days with him, he saw no one else except James (Gal 1¹⁸⁻¹⁹). So soon did James's authority rival Peter's. (2) After an interval of fourteen years Paul went up again to Jerusalem (Gal 2¹⁻¹⁰). This was the occasion of the historic conference regarding the terms on which the Gentiles should be admitted into the Christian Church; and James acted as president, his decision being unanimously accepted (Ac 15²⁴⁻²⁹). (3) James was the acknowledged head of the Church at Jerusalem, and when Paul returned from his third missionary journey he waited on him and made a report to him in presence of the elders (Ac 21¹⁸⁻¹⁹).

According to extra-canonical tradition, James was surnamed 'the Just'; he was a Nazirite from his mother's womb, abstaining from strong drink and animal food, and wearing linen; he was always kneeling in intercession for the people, so that his knees were callous like a camel's; he was cruelly martyred by the Scribes and Pharisees; they cast him down from the pinnacle of the Temple (cf. Mt 4⁵, Lk 4⁹), and as the fall did not kill him, they stoned him, and he was finally despatched with a fuller's club.

This James was the author of the NT Epistle which bears his name; and it is an indication of his character that he styles himself there (1¹) not 'the brother,' but the 'servant of the Lord Jesus Christ.' See next article.

4. James, the father of the Apostle Judas (Lk 6¹⁶ RV), otherwise unknown. The AV 'Judas the brother of James' is an impossible identification of the Apostle Judas with the author of the Epistle (Jude 1).

DAVID SMITH.

JAMES, EPISTLE OF.—1. The author claims to be 'James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ' (1¹). He is usually identified with the Lord's brother the 'bishop' of Jerusalem, not a member of the Twelve, but an apostle in the wider sense (see JAMES, 3). The name is common, and the writer adds no further note of identification. This fact makes for the authenticity of the address. If the Epistle had been pseudonymous, the writer would have defined the position of the James whose authority he wished to claim, and the same objection holds good against any theory of interpolation. Or again, if it had been written by a later James under his own name, he must have distinguished himself from his better known namesakes. The absence of description supports the common view of the authorship of the letter; it is a mark of modesty, the brother of the Lord not wishing to insist on his relationship after the flesh; it also points to a consciousness of authority; the writer expected to be listened to, and knew that his mere name was a sufficient description of himself. So Jude writes merely as 'the brother of James.' It has indeed been doubted whether a Jew of his position could have written such good Greek as we find in this Epistle, but we know really very little of the scope of Jewish education; there was every opportunity for intercourse with Greeks in Galilee, and a priori arguments of this nature can at most be only subsidiary. If indeed the late date, suggested by some, be adopted, the possibility of the brother of the Lord being the author is excluded, since he probably died in 62; otherwise there is nothing against the ordinary view. If that be rejected, the author is entirely unknown. More will be said in the rest of the article on the subject; but attention must be called to the remarkable coincidence in language between this Epistle and the speech of James in Ac 15.

2. Date.—The only indications of date are derived from indirect internal evidence, the interpretation of which depends on the view taken of the main problems raised by the Epistle. It is variously put, either as one of the earliest of NT writings (so Mayor and most English writers), or among the very latest (the general German opinion). The chief problem is the relationships to other writings of the NT. The Epistle has striking resemblances to several books of the NT, and these resemblances admit of very various explanations.

(a) Most important is its relation to St. Paul. It has points of contact with Romans: 12² 4¹¹ and Ro 2¹³ (hearers and doers of the law); 12²⁻⁴ and Ro 5³⁻⁴ (the gradual work of temptation or tribulation); 4¹¹ and Ro 2¹ 14⁴ (the critic self-condemned); 12¹ 4¹ and Ro 7² 13¹²; and the contrast between 2¹ and Ro 4¹ (the faith of Abraham). Putting the latter aside for the moment, it is hard to pronounce on the question of priority. Sanday-Headlam (Romans, p. lxxix.) see 'no resemblance in style sufficient to prove literary connexion'; there are no parallels in order, and similarities of language can mostly be explained from OT and LXX. Mayor, on the other hand, supposes that St. Paul is working up hints received from James.

The main question turns upon the apparent opposition between James and Paul with regard to 'faith and works.' The chief passages are ch. 2, esp. vv. 17, 21^a, and Ro 3²⁸ 4, Gal 2¹⁶. Both writers quote Gn 15^a, and deal with the case of Abraham as typical, but they draw from it apparently opposite conclusions—St. James that a man is justified, as Abraham was, by works and not by faith alone; St. Paul that justification is not by works but by faith. We may say at once with regard to the doctrinal question that it is generally recognized that there is here no real contradiction between the two. The writers mean different things by 'faith.' St. James means a certain belief, mainly intellectual, in the one God (2¹⁹), the fundamental creed of the Jew, to which a belief in Christ has been added. To St. Paul 'faith' is essentially 'faith in Christ' (Ro 3²² etc.). This faith has been in his own experience a tremendous overmastering force, bringing with it a convulsion of his whole nature; he has put on Christ, died with Him, and risen to a new life. Such an experience lies outside the experience of a St. James, a typically 'good' man, with a practical, matter of fact, and somewhat limited view of life. To him 'conduct is three-fourths of life,' and he claims rightly that men shall authenticate in practice their verbal professions. To St. Paul, with an overwhelming experience working on a mystical temperament, such a demand is almost meaningless. To him faith is the new life in Christ, and of course it brings forth the fruits of the Spirit, if it exists at all; faith must always work by love (Gal 5⁶). He indeed guards himself carefully against any idea that belief in the sense of verbal confession or intellectual assent is enough in itself (Ro 2²⁰⁻²⁶), and defines 'the works' which he disparages as 'works of the law' (3²⁰ 28). Each writer, in fact, would agree with the doctrine of the other when he came to understand it, though St. James's would appear to St. Paul as insufficient, and St. Paul's to St. James as somewhat too profound and mystical (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, pp. 102 ff.).

It is unfortunately not so easy to explain the literary relation between the two. At first sight the points of contact are so striking that we are inclined to say that one must have seen the words of the other. Lightfoot, however, has shown (*Galatians*², pp. 157 ff.) that the history of Abraham, and in particular Gn 15^a, figured frequently in Jewish theological discussions. The verse is quoted in 1 Mac 2²², ten times by Philo, and in the Talmudic treatise Mechilta. But the antithesis between 'faith and works' seems to be essentially Christian; we cannot, therefore, on the ground of the Jewish use of Gn 15, deny any relationship between the writings of the two Apostles. This much, at least, seems clear; St. James was not writing with Romans before him, and with the deliberate intention of contradicting St. Paul. His arguments, so regarded, are obviously inadequate, and make no attempt, even superficially, to meet St. Paul's real position. It is, however, quite possible that he may have written as he did to correct not St. Paul himself, but misunderstandings of his teaching, which no doubt easily arose (2 P 3¹⁶). On the other hand, if with Mayor we adopt a very early date for the Epistle, St. Paul may equally well be combating exaggerations of his fellow-Apostle's position, which indeed in itself must have appeared insufficient to him; we are reminded of the Judaizers 'who came from James' before the Council (Ac 15²⁴). St. Paul, according to this view, preserves all that is valuable in St. James by his insistence on life and conduct, while he supplements it with a profounder teaching, and guards against misinterpretations by a more careful definition of terms; e.g. in Gal 2¹⁶ (cf. Ja 2²⁴) he defines 'works' as 'works of the law,' and 'faith' as 'faith in Jesus Christ.' We must also bear in mind the possibility that the resemblance in language on this and other subjects may have been due to personal intercourse between the two (Gal 1¹⁹, Ac 15); in discussing these questions together they may well have come to use very similar terms and illustrations; and this possibility makes the question of priority in writing still more complicated. It is, then, very hard to pronounce with any certainty on the date of the Epistle from literary considerations. On the whole they make for an early date. Such a date is also suggested by the undeveloped theology (note the non-technical and unusual word for 'begat' in 1¹⁸) and the general circumstances of the Epistle (see below); and the absence of any reference to the Gentile controversy may indicate a date before the Council of Ac 15, i.e. before 52 A.D.

(b) Again, the points of contact with 1 Peter (1¹⁰ 5¹⁹; 1 P 1²⁴ 4⁹) and Hebrews (2²⁶; He 11³¹), though striking, are inconclusive as to date. It is difficult to acquiesce in the view that James is 'secondary' throughout, and makes a general use of the Epp. of NT.

(c) It will be convenient to treat here the relation to the Gospels and particularly to the Sermon on the Mount, though this is still less decisive as to date. The variations are too strong to allow us to suppose a direct use of the Gospels; the sayings of Christ were long quoted in varying forms, and in 5¹² St. James has a remarkable agreement with Justin (Ap. i. 16), as against Mt 5³⁷. The chief parallels are the condemnation of 'hearers only' (1²² 26, Mt 7²⁶, Jn 13¹⁷), of critics (4¹¹, Mt 7¹⁻⁴), of worldliness (1¹⁰ 26, etc., Mt 6¹⁹ 24, Lk 6²⁴), the teaching about prayer (1⁵ etc., Mt 7⁷, Mk 11²³), poverty (2⁶, Lk 6²⁰), humility (4¹⁰, Mt 23¹²), the tree and its fruits (1³¹, Mt 7¹⁸; see Salmon, Introd. to NT⁹ p. 455). This familiarity with our Lord's language agrees well with the hypothesis that the author was one who had been brought up in the same home, and had often listened to His teaching, though not originally a disciple; it can hardly, however, be said necessarily to imply such a close personal relationship.

3. The type of Christianity implied in the Epistle.—We are at once struck by the fact that the direct Christian references are very few. Christ is only twice mentioned by name (1¹ 2¹); not a word is said of His death or resurrection, His example of patience (5¹⁰ 11; contrast 1 P 2²¹), or of prayer (5¹⁷; contrast He 5⁷). Hence the suggestion has been made by Spitta that we have really a Jewish document which has been adapted by a Christian writer, as happened, e.g., with 2 Esdras and the Didache. The answer is obvious, that no editor would have been satisfied with so slight a revision. We find, indeed, on looking closer, that the Christian element is greater than appears at first, and also that it is of such a nature that it cannot be regarded as interpolated. The parallels with our Lord's teaching already noticed, could not be explained as due to independent borrowing from earlier Jewish sources, even on the very doubtful assumption that any such existed containing the substance of His teaching. Again, we find Christ mentioned (probably) in connexion with the Parousia (5⁷ 8) [5¹¹ are probably not references to the crucifixion, and 'the Lord' is not original in 1¹²]; 'beloved brethren' (1¹⁶ 19 25), the new birth (1¹⁸), the Kingdom (2⁶), the name which is blasphemed (2⁷), and the royal law of liberty (1²⁵ 26) are all predominantly Christian ideas. It cannot, however, be denied that the general tone of the Epistle is Judaic. The type of organization implied is primitive, and is described mainly in Jewish phraseology: synagogue (2²), elders of the Church (5¹⁴), anointing with oil and the connexion of sin and sickness (ib.). Abraham is 'our father' (2²¹), and God bears the OT title 'Lord of Sabaoth' (5⁴) [only here in NT]. This tone, however, is in harmony with the traditional character of James (see JAMES, 3), and with the address 'to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion' (1¹), taken in its literal sense. St. James remained to the end of his life a strict Jew, noted for his devotion to the Law (Ac 15. 21²⁰), and in the Epistle the Law, though transformed, is to the writer almost a synonym for the Gospel. His argument as to the paramount importance of conduct is exactly suited to the atmosphere in which he lived, and of which he realized the dangers. The Rabbis could teach that 'they cool the flames of Gehinnom for him who reads the Shema [Dt 6⁴], and Justin (Dial. 141) bears witness to the claim of the Jews, 'that if they are sinners and know God, the Lord will not impute to them sin.' His protest is against a ceremonialism which neglects the weightier matters of the Law; cf. esp. 1²⁷, where 'religion' means religion on its outward side. His Epistle then is Judaic, because it shows us Christianity as it appeared to the ordinary Jewish Christian, to whom it was a something added to his old religion, not a revolutionary force altering its whole character, as it was to St. Paul. It seems to belong to the period described in the early chapters of the Acts, when the separation between Jews and Christians was not complete; we have already, on other grounds, seen that it seems to come before the Council. Salmon (Introd. to NT p. 456) points out that its attitude towards the rich agrees with what we know of Jewish society during this period, when the tyranny of the wealthy Sadducean party was at its height (cf. Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 8; ix. 2); there are still apparently local Jewish tribunals (2⁶). The movement from city to city supposed in 4¹³ may point to the frequent Jewish migrations for purposes of trade, and the authority which the writer exercises over the Diaspora may be paralleled by that which the Sanhedrin claimed outside Palestine. We may note that there are indications that the Epistle has in mind the needs and circumstances of special communities (2¹² 4¹ 5¹³); it reads, too, not like a formal treatise, but as words of advice given in view of particular cases.

On the other hand, many Continental critics see in these conditions the description of a later age, when Christianity had had time to become formal and secularized, and moral degeneracy was covered by intellectual orthodoxy. The address is supposed to be a literary device, the Church being the true Israel of God, or to have in view scattered Essene conventicles. It is said that the absence of Christian doctrine shows that the Epistle was not written when it was in the process of formation, but at an altogether later period. This argument is not altogether easy to follow, and, as we have seen, the indications, though separately indecisive, yet all combine to point to an early date. Perhaps more may be said for the view that the Epistle incorporates Jewish fragments, e.g. in 3¹⁻¹⁸ 4¹¹⁻⁵; the apostrophe of the rich who are outside the brotherhood is rather startling. We may indeed believe that the Epistle has not yet yielded its full secret. It cannot be denied that it omits much that we should expect to find in a Christian document of however early a date, and that its close is very abrupt. Of the theories, however, which have so far been advanced, the view that it is a primitive Christian writing at least presents the fewest difficulties, though it still leaves much unexplained.

4. Early quotations and canonicity.—The Epistle presents points of contact with Clement of Rome, Hermas, and probably with Irenæus, but is first quoted as Scripture by Origen. Eusebius, though he quotes it himself without reserve, mentions the fact that few 'old writers' have done so (HE ii. 23), and classes it among the 'disputed' books of the Canon (iii. 25). It is not mentioned in the Muratorian Fragment, but is included in the Peshitta (the Syriac version), together with 1 Peter and 1 John of the Catholic Epistles. The evidence shows that it was acknowledged in the East earlier than in the West, possibly as being addressed to the Eastern (?) Dispersion, though its apparent use by Clem. Rom. and Hermas suggests that it may have been written in Rome. The scarcity of quotations from it and its comparative neglect may be due to its Jewish and non-doctrinal tone, as well as to the facts that it did not claim to be Apostolic and seemed to contradict St. Paul. Others before Luther may well have found it 'an epistle of straw.'

5. Style and teaching.—As has been said, the tone of the Epistle is largely Judaic. In addition to the Jewish features already pointed out, we may note its insistence on righteousness, and its praise of wisdom and poverty, which are characteristic of Judaism at its best. Its illustrations are drawn from the OT, and its style frequently recalls that of Proverbs, and the Prophets, particularly on its sterner side. The worldly are 'adulteresses' (4); cf. the OT conception of Israel as the bride of Jehovah, whether faithful or unfaithful, and the whole Epistle is full of warnings and denunciations; 54 imperatives have been counted in twice as many verses. The quotations, however, are mainly from the LXX; 'greeting' (1) is the LXX formula for the Heb. 'peace,' and occurs again in NT only in the letter of Ac 15². The points of contact with our Lord's teaching have been already noticed; the Epistle follows Him also in its fondness for metaphors from nature (cf. the parables), and in the poetic element which appears continually; 117 is actually a hexameter, but it has not been recognized as a quotation. The style is vivid and abrupt, sometimes obscure, with a great variety of vocabulary; there are 70 words not found elsewhere in NT. There is no close connexion of ideas, or logical development of the subject; a word seems to suggest the following paragraph (e.g. ch. 1). Accordingly it is useless to attempt a summary of the Epistle. Its main purpose was to encourage endurance under persecution and oppression, together with consistency of life; and its leading ideas are the dangers of speech, of riches, of strife, and of worldliness, and the value of true faith, prayer, and wisdom. The Epistle is essentially 'pragmatic'; i.e. it insists that the test of belief lies in 'value for conduct.' It does not, indeed, ignore the deeper side; it has its theology with its teaching about regeneration, faith, and prayer, but the writer's main interest lies in ethics. The condition of the heathen world around made it necessary to insist on the value of a consistent life. That was Christianity; and neither doctrinal nor moral problems, as of the origin of evil, trouble him. The Epistle does not reach the heights of a St. Paul or a St. John, but it has its value. It presents, sharply and in emphasis, a side of Christianity which is always in danger of being forgotten, and the practical mind in particular will always feel the force of its practical message. C. W. EMMET.

JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF.—See GOSPELS [APOCRYPHAL], § 5.

JAMIN.—1. A son of Simeon (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵, Nu 26¹², 1 Ch 4²⁴). The gentilic name Jaminites occurs in Nu 26¹². 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 27⁷). 3. A priest (? or Levite) who took part in the promulgating of the Law (Neh 8⁷; in 1 Es 9⁴ Iadinus).

JAMLECH.—A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4²⁴).

JAMNIA (1 Mac 4¹⁵ 5⁵⁸ 10⁶⁹ 15¹⁰, 2 Mac 12² s. 40).—The later name of Jabneel (wh. see). The gentilic name Jaminites occurs in 2 Mac 12².

JANAI.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5¹²).

JANGLING.—'Jangling,' says Chaucer in the Parson's Tale, 'is whan man speketh to moche before folk, and clappeth as a mille, and taketh no kepe what he seith.' The word is used in 1 Ti 1⁶ 'vain jangling' (RV 'vain talking'); and in the heading of 1 Ti 6 'to avoid profane janglings,' where it stands for 'babblings' in the text (1 Ti 6²⁰).

JANIM.—A town in the mountains of Hebron, near Beth-tappuah (Jos 15³⁴). The site is uncertain.

JANNAI.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3³⁴).

JANNES AND JAMBRES.—In 2 Ti 3⁸ these names are given as those of Moses' opponents; the Egyptian magicians of Ex 7¹¹.²² are doubtless referred to, though their names are not given in OT. They are traditional, and we find them in the Targumic literature (which, however, is late). Both there and in 2 Ti 3⁸ we find the various reading 'Mambres' (or 'Mamre'). 'Jannes' is probably a corruption of 'Johannes' (John); 'Jambres' is almost certainly derived from a Semitic root meaning 'to oppose' (imperfect tense), the participle of which would give 'Mambres'. The names were even known to the heathen. Pliny the Elder (A.D. 23-79) mentions 'Moses, Jamnes (or Jannes) and Jotapes (or Lotapes)' as Jewish magicians (Hist. Nat. xxx. 1 ff.); thus 'Jannes,' at least, must have been a traditional name before the Christian era. Apuleius (c. A.D. 130) in his Apology speaks of Moses and Jannes as magicians; the Pythagorean Numenius (2nd cent. A.D.), according to Origen (c. Cels. iv. 51), related 'the account respecting Moses and Jannes and Jambres,' and Eusebius gives the words of Numenius (Præp. Ev. ix. 8). In his Commentary on Mt 27⁸ (known only in a Latin translation), Origen says that St. Paul is quoting from a book called 'Jannes and Mambres' (sic). But Theodoret (Com. in loc.) declares that he is merely using the unwritten teaching of the Jews. Jannes and Jambres are also referred to in the Apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus § 5 (4th or 5th cent. in its present form?), and in the Apostolic Constitutions, viii. 1 (c. A.D. 375). Later Jewish fancy ran wild on these names; according to some they were Balaam's sons; according to others they were drowned in the Red Sea; or they were put to death, either for inciting Aaron to make the Golden Calf or at a later stage of the history. A. J. MACLEAN.

JANOAH.—1. A town in the northern mountains of Naphtali, near Kedesh (2 K 15²⁹). It is probably the modern Yanah. 2. A place on the border of Ephraim (Jos 18²⁵ 7); situated where the present Yanun now stands, with the supposed tomb of Nun.

JAPHETH (Heb. Yepheth).—1. One of the sons of Noah. The meaning of the name is quite uncertain. In Gn 9²⁷ there is a play on the name—'May God make wide (yapht) for Yepheth [i.e. make room for him] that he may dwell in the tents of Shem.' The peoples connected with Japheth (10¹⁻⁴) occupy the northern portion of the known world, and include the Mada (Medes) on the E. of Assyria, Javan (Ionians, i.e. Greeks) on the W. coast and islands of Asia Minor, and Tarshish (Tartessus) on the W. coast of Spain. On the two traditions respecting the sons of Noah see HAM. 2. A known locality mentioned in Jth 2².

A. H. M'NEILE.

JAPHIA.—1. King of Lachish, defeated and slain by Joshua (Jos 10²⁵). 2. One of David's sons born at Jerusalem (2 S 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 1 Ch 3²⁻³ 14⁷). 3. A town on the south border of Zebulun (Jos 19¹²); probably the modern Yāfa, near the foot of the Nazareth hills.

JAPHLET.—An Asherite family (1 Ch 7²¹).

JAPHLETTES.—The name of an unidentified tribe mentioned in stating the boundaries of the children of Joseph (Jos 16⁹).

JARAH.—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 9⁴². In 8³⁶ he is called Jehoaddah.

JAREB.—It is not safe to pronounce dogmatically on the text and meaning of Hos 5¹³ 10⁶. But our choice lies between two alternatives. If we adhere to the current text, we must regard Jareb (or Jarib) as a sobriquet coined by Hosea to indicate the love of conflict which characterized the Assyrian king. Thus 'King Jarib' = 'King Warrior,' 'King Striver,' 'King Combat,' or the like; and the events referred to are those of a.c. 738 (see 2 K 15¹⁹). Most of the ancient versions support this, as, e.g., LXX 'King Jareim'; Symm. and Vulg. 'King Avenger.' If we divide the Hebrew consonants differently, We get 'the great king,' corresponding to the Assy. sharru rabbu (cf. 2 K 18¹⁹, 2⁸, Is 36⁴). It has even been thought that this signification may be accepted without any textual change. In any case linguistic and historical evidence is against the idea that Jareb is the proper name of an Assyrian or an Egyptian monarch. Other, less probable, emendations are 'king of Arabia,' 'king of Jathrib or of Aribi' (both in N. Arabia). J. TAYLOR.

JARED.—The father of Enoch (Gn 5¹⁸, 18, 19, 20, 1 Ch 1³, Lk 3³⁷).

JARHA.—An Egyptian slave who married the daughter of his master Sheshan (1 Ch 2⁴⁶).

JARIB.—1. The eponym of a Simeonite family (1 Ch 4²⁴ = Jachin of Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵, Nu 26¹²). 2. One of the 'chief men' who were sent by Ezra to Casiphia in search of Levites (Ezr 8¹⁶); called in 1 Es 8⁴⁴ Joribus. 3. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10¹⁸); called in 1 Es 9¹⁰ Joribus.

JARIMOTH (1 Es 9²⁸) = Ezr 10²⁷ Jeremoth.

JARMUTH.—1. A royal city of the Canaanites (Jos 10⁵ etc.), in the Shephelah, assigned to Judah (Jos 15⁴⁸). It is probably identical with 'Jermucha' of the Onomasticon, 10 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, on the Jerusalem road. This is now Khirbet Yarmūk, between Wādy es-Sārūr and Wādy es-Sant, about 8 miles N. of Beit Jibrin. 2. A city in Issachar, allotted to the Gershonite Levites (Jos 21²⁹, LXX B Remmath). It corresponds to Ramoth in 1 Ch 6⁷³, and Remeth appears in Jos 19²¹ among the cities of Issachar. Guthe suggests er-Rāmech, about 11 miles S.W. of Jentn, but this is uncertain. W. EWING.

JAROAĦ.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5¹⁴).

JASAEUS (1 Es 9²⁰) = Ezr 10²⁹ Sheal.

JASHAR, BOOK OF (šēphēr ha-yāšār, 'Book of the Righteous One').—An ancient book of national songs, which most likely contained both religious and secular songs describing great events in the history of the nation. In the OT there are two quotations from this book—(a) Jos 10¹³, 12; the original form must have been a poetical description of the battle of Gibeon, in which would have been included the old-world account of Jahweh casting down great stones from heaven upon Israel's enemies. (b) 2 S 1¹⁹⁻²⁷; in this case the quotation is a much longer one, consisting of David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan. In each case the Book of Jashar is referred to as well known; one might expect, therefore, that other quotations from it would be found in the OT, and perhaps this is actually the case with, e.g., the Song of Deborah (Jg 5) and some other ancient pieces, which originally may have had a reference to their source in the title (e.g. 1 K 8²¹).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

JASHEN.—The sons of Jashen are mentioned in the list of David's heroes given in 2 S 23²². In the parallel list (1 Ch 11⁴) they appear as the sons of Hasheh, who is further described as the Gizonite (wh. see).

JASHOBEAM.—One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11¹¹ 12²⁷). There is reason to believe that his real name was Ishbosheth, i.e. Eshbaal ('man of Baal'). Cf. ADINO and JOSHUR-BASSHEBETH.

JASHUB.—1. Issachar's fourth son (Nu 26²⁴, 1 Ch 7¹⁴ called in Gn 46¹³ Iob; patron. Jashubites (Nu 26²⁴). 2. A returned exile who married a foreigner (Ezr 10²⁹), called in 1 Es 9¹⁰ Jasubus.

JASHUBI-LEHEM.—The eponym of a Judahite family (1 Ch 4²²). The text is manifestly corrupt.

JASON.—This Greek name was adopted by many Jews whose Hebrew designation was Joshua (Jesus). 1. The son of Eleazar deputed to make a treaty with the Romans, and father of Antipater who was later sent on a similar errand, unless two different persons are meant (1 Mac 8¹⁷ 12¹⁴ 14²). 2. Jason of Cyrene, an author, of whose history 2 Mac. (see 22²³, 2⁸) is an epitome (written after B.C. 160). 3. Joshua the high priest, who ousted his brother Onias III. from the office in B.C. 174 (2 Mac 4²⁴), but was himself driven out three years later, and died among the Lacedaemonians at Sparta (2 Mac 5²⁴). 4. In Ac 17⁶⁴, a Jason was St. Paul's host at Thessalonica, from whom the politarchs took bail for his good behaviour, thus (as it seems) preventing St. Paul's return to Macedonia for a long time (see art. PAUL THE APOSTLE, § 8). The Jason who sends greetings from Corinth in Ro 16²³, a 'kinsman' of St. Paul (i.e. a Jew), is probably the same man. A. J. MACLEAN.

JASPER.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES, p. 467^a.

JASUBUS (1 Es 9¹⁰) = Ezr 10²⁹ Jashub.

JATHAN.—Son of Shemalah 'the great,' and brother of Ananias the pretended father of Raphael (To 5¹³).

JATHNIEL.—A Levitical family (1 Ch 26³).

JATTIR.—A town of Judah in the southern mountains, a Levitical city (Jos 15⁴⁸ 21¹⁴, 1 Ch 6⁶²). It was one of the cities to whose elders David sent of the spoil from Ziklag (1 S 30²⁷). Its site is the ruin Attir, N.E. of Beersheba, on a hill spur close to the southern desert.

JAVAN, the Heb. rendering of the Gr. Ἰᾶν, 'Ionian,' is a general term in the Bible for Ionians or Greeks; very similar forms of the name occur in the Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions. In the genealogical table in Gn (10², 4) and 1 Ch (1⁵, 7) Javan is described as a son of Japheth and the father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (or better, Rodanim, i.e. Rhodes); from the reference to Kittim (Kition) as his son, it is possible that the passage refers particularly to Cyprus. In Is 66¹⁹ Javan is included among the distant countries that will hear of Jahweh's glory; in Jl 3⁶ the sons of the Javanites are referred to as trading in Jewish captives with the Phœnicians and Philistines; in Ezk 27¹³ Javan, with Tubal and Meshech, is described as trading with Tyre in slaves and vessels of brass. In all three passages the references are to the Ionian colonies on the coast of Asia Minor. In Ezk 27¹³ Javan appears a second time among the nations that traded with Tyre; clearly the Ionians are not intended, and, unless the text is corrupt (as is very probable), the reference may be to an Arab tribe, or perhaps to a Greek colony in Arabia. In Dn 8²¹ 10²⁰ 11², where 'the king,' 'the prince,' and 'the kingdom' of Javan are mentioned, the passages have reference to the Græco-Macedonian empire.

L. W. KING.

JAVELIN.—See ARMOUR, ARMS, § 1 (b).

JAZER.—An Amorite town N. of Heshbon, taken by Israel (Nu 21²⁵), allotted to Gad (Jos 13²⁵ etc.), and fortified by it (Nu 32²⁸). It lay in a district rich in vines (Is 16⁸ etc., Jer 48²⁸). It is probably represented oy Khirket Sār, about 7 miles W. of 'Ammān, a mile E. of Wādī Sār. Judas Maccabæus took the city, which was then in the hands of the Ammonites (1 Mac 5⁹; Jos. Ant. xii. viii. 1). W. EWING.

JAZIZ.—A Hagrite who was 'over the flocks' of king David (1 Ch 27¹¹).

JEALOUSY.—The law of the 'jealousy ordeal' (in which a wife suspected of unfaithfulness had to prove her innocence by drinking the water of bitterness ['holy water' mixed with dust from the floor of the Tabernacle]) is found in Nu 5¹¹⁻³¹. The conception of idolatry as adultery and of Jehovah as the Husband of Israel led the OT writers frequently to speak of Him as a jealous God (Ex 20⁵, Dt 5⁹, Jos 24¹⁹, 1 K 14²², Ps 78²⁸, Ezk 36⁶, Nah 1²). This jealousy is the indication of Jehovah's desire to maintain the purity of the spiritual relation between Himself and His people. Extraordinary zeal for this same end is characteristic of the servants of Jehovah, and is sometimes called jealousy with them (2 Co 11², Nu 25¹¹⁻¹³, 1 K 19¹⁰). A few times the word is used in a bad sense (Ro 13¹⁴, 1 Co 3³, 2 Co 12²⁰, Gal 5²⁰, Ja 3¹⁴⁻¹⁶). D. A. HAYES.

JEARIM, MOUNT.—Mentioned only in Jos 15¹⁰, where it is identified with Chesalon (wh. see).

JEATHERAI.—An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6²¹); called in v. 4 Ethni.

JEHERECHIAH.—The father of Zechariah, a friend of Isaiah (Is 8²).

JEHUS, JEBUSITES.—The former is a name given to Jerusalem by J in Jg 19¹ and imitated by the Chronicler (1 Ch 11¹); the latter is the tribe which inhabited Jerusalem from before the Israelitish conquest till the reign of David. It was formerly supposed that Jehus was the original name of Jerusalem, but the letters of Abdi-Khiba among the el-Amarna tablets prove that the city was called Jerusalem (Uru-salim) about B.C. 1400. No trace of Jebusites appears then. When they gained possession of it we do not know. J states that at the time of the Israelite conquest the king of Jerusalem was Adoni-zedek (Jos 10⁹), and that the Israelites did not expel the Jebusites from the city (Jos 15⁸, Jg 1¹). During the time of the Judges he tells us that it was in possession of the Jebusites (Jg 19¹), and gives a brief account of its capture by David (2 S 5⁶⁻⁹). E mentions the Jebusites only once (Nu 13²⁹), and then only to say that, like the Hittite and Amorite, they inhabit the mountain. The favourite list of Palestinian nations which D and his followers insert so often usually ends with Jebusite, but adds nothing to their history. P mentions them once (Jos 15⁸). They are mentioned in Neh 9⁸ and Ezr 9¹ in lists based on D, while Zec 9⁷ for archaic effect calls dwellers in Jerusalem 'Jebusite' (so Wellhausen, Nowack, and Marti). The name of the king, Adoni-zedek, would indicate that the Jebusites were Semitic,—probably related to the Canaanite tribes.

David captured their city and dwelt in it, and it was subsequently called the 'city of David.' From references to this (cf. JERUSALEM) it is clear that the Jebusite city was situated on the southern part of the eastern hill of present Jerusalem, and that that hill was called Zion. Its situation was supposed by the Jebusites to render the city impregnable (2 S 5⁶).

One other Jebusite besides Adoni-zedek, namely, Araunah, is mentioned by name. The Temple is said to have been erected on a threshing-floor purchased from him (cf. 2 S 24¹⁸⁻²⁴, 2 Ch 3¹). It would seem from this narrative that the Jebusites were not exterminated or expelled, but remained in Jerusalem, and were gradually absorbed by the Israelites.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

JECHILIAH (in 2 K 15¹⁸ Jecoliah).—The mother of king Uzziah (2 Ch 26⁴).

JECHONIAH.—See JEHOIACHIN.

JECHONIAS.—1. The Gr. form of the name of king Jecoliah, employed by the English translators in the books rendered from the Greek (Ad. Est 11⁴, Bar 1²); called in Mt 1¹¹ Jechoniah. 2. 1 Es 8²²—Ezr 10³ Shecaniah.

JECHOLIAH.—See JECHILIAH.

JECONIAH.—See JEHOIACHIN.

JECONIAS.—1. One of the captains over thousands in the time of Josiah (1 Es 1⁹); called in 2 Ch 35² Onaniah. 2. See JEHOAHAZ, 2.

JEDIAH.—1. A priestly family (1 Ch 9¹⁰ 24⁷, Ezr 2³⁶ [in 1 Es 5²⁴ Jeddu], Neh 7³⁹ 11¹⁰ 12⁶, 7. 19. 21). 2. One of the exiles sent with gifts of gold and silver for the sanctuary at Jerusalem (Zec 6¹⁰⁻¹⁴). 3. A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4³⁷). 4. One of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3¹⁰).

JEDDU (1 Es 5²⁴) = Ezr 2³⁶ Jediah.

JEDEUS (1 Es 9³⁰) = Ezr 10³⁹ Adaiah.

JEDIAEL.—1. The eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 7⁹⁻¹⁰⁻¹¹). 2. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴), probably identical with the Manassite of 12²⁰. 3. The eponym of a family of Korahite porters (1 Ch 26²).

JEDIDAH.—Mother of Josiah (2 K 22²).

JEDIDIAH ('beloved of J^h').—The name given to Solomon by the prophet Nathan (2 S 12²⁴) 'for the Lord's sake.' See SOLOMON.

JEDUTHUN.—An unintelligible name having to do with the music or the musicians of the Temple. According to 1 Ch 25¹ etc., it was the name of one of the three musical guilds, and it appears in some passages to mask the name Ethan. Jeduthun (Jedithun) occurs in the headings of Pss 39. 62. 77, and appears to refer to an instrument or to a tune. But in our ignorance of Hebrew music it is impossible to do more than guess what Jeduthun really meant. W. F. COBB.

JEELI (1 Es 5³⁰) = Ezr 2³⁴ Jaalah, Neh 7⁵⁸ Jaala.

JEELUS (1 Es 8²²) = Ezr 10³ Jehiel.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA ('calm of witness').—The name said to have been given by Laban to the cairn erected on the occasion of the compact between him and Jacob (Gn 31⁴⁷).

JEHALLELEL.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 4¹⁸). 2. A Levite (2 Ch 29¹²).

JEHDEIAH.—1. The eponym of a Levitical family (1 Ch 24²⁰). 2. An officer of David (1 Ch 27¹⁰).

JEHEZEKEL ('God strengtheneth,' the same name as Ezekiel).—A priest, the head of the twentieth course, 1 Ch 24¹⁶.

JEHIAH.—The name of a Levitical family (1 Ch 15²⁴).

JEHIEL.—1. One of David's chief musicians (1 Ch 15¹⁸⁻²⁰⁻¹⁶). 2. A chief of the Levites (1 Ch 23⁵⁻²⁹). 3. One who was 'with (=tutor of?) the king's sons' (1 Ch 27²). 4. One of Jehoshaphat's sons (2 Ch 21³). 5. One of Hezekiah's 'overseers' (2 Ch 31¹³). 6. A ruler of the house of God in Josiah's reign (2 Ch 35⁸). 7. The father of Obadiah, a returned exile (Ezr 8⁹); called in 1 Es 8³⁰ Jezelus. 8. Father of Shecaniah (Ezr 10²); called in 1 Es 8²² Jeolus, perhaps identical with 9. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁰); called in 1 Es 9²⁷ Jezrielus. 10. A priest of the sons of Harim who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²¹); called in 1 Es 9²¹ Hicreel.

JEHIELI.—A patronymic from Jehiel No. 2 (1 Ch 26²¹⁻²²; cf. 23⁵⁻²⁹).

JEHIZKIAH.—An Ephraimite who supported the prophet Oded in opposing the bringing of Judæan captives to Samaria (2 Ch 28¹⁸⁻¹⁹).

JEHOADDAD.—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁰); called in 9² Jarah.

JEHOADDAN (2 Ch 25¹ and, as vocalized, 2 K 14². The consonants of the text in 2 K 14² give the form Jehoaddin [so RV]).—Mother of Amaziah king of Judah.

JEHOAHAZ.—1. Jehoahaz of Israel (in 2 K 14¹ and 2 Ch 34¹ 36². ⁴ Joahas) succeeded his father Jehu. Our records tell us nothing of him except the length of his reign, which is given as seventeen years (2 K 13¹), and the low estate of his kingdom, owing to the aggressions of Syria. A turn for the better seems to have come before his death, because the forces of Assyria pressing on the north of Damascus turned the attention of that country away from Israel (vv.³⁻⁴).

2. Jehoahaz of Judah (in 1 Es 1³⁴ Joachaz or Jeconias; in v.²⁸ Zarakes) was the popular choice for the throne after the death of Josiah (2 K 23³⁰). But Pharaoh-necho, who had obtained possession of all Syria, regarded his coronation as an act of assumption, deposed him in favour of his brother Jehoiaikim, and carried him away to Egypt, where he died (v.²⁴). Jeremiah, who calls him Shallum, finds his fate sadder than that of his father who fell in battle (Jer 22¹⁰⁻¹²).

3. 2 Ch 21¹⁷ 25²³ = Ahaziah, No. 2. H. P. SMITH.

JEHOASH, in the shorter form JOASH, is the name of a king in each of the two lines, Israel and Judah.

1. Jehoash of Judah was the son of Ahaziah. When an infant his brothers and cousins were massacred, some of them by Jehu and some by Athaliah. After being kept in concealment until he was seven years old, he was crowned by the bodyguard under the active leadership of Jehoiaada, the chief priest. In his earlier years he was under the influence of the man to whom he owed the throne, but later he manifested his independence. Besides an arrangement which he made with the priests about certain moneys which came into their hands, the record tells us only that an invasion of the Syrians compelled him to pay a heavy tribute. This was drawn from the Temple treasury. Jehoash was assassinated by some of his officers (2 K 11 f.).

2. Jehoash of Israel was the third king of the line of Jehu. The turn of the tide in the affairs of Israel came about the time of his accession. The way in which the Biblical author indicates this is characteristic. He tells us that when Elisha was about to die Jehoash came to visit him, and wept over him as a great power about to be lost to Israel. Elisha bade him take bow and arrows and shoot the arrow of victory towards Damascus, then to strike the ground with the arrows. The three blows which he struck represent the three victories obtained by Jehoash, and the blame expressed by Elisha indicates that his contemporaries thought the king slack in following up his advantage. Jehoash also obtained a signal victory over Judah in a war wantonly provoked, it would seem, by Amaziah, king of Judah (2 K 13¹⁰⁻¹⁵).

H. P. SMITH.

JEHOHANAN.—1. 1 Ch 26³ a Korahite doorkeeper. 2. 2 Ch 17¹⁸ one of Jehoshaphat's five captains. 3. Ezr 10⁶ (Jonas, 1 Es 9¹; Johanani, Neh 12²². ³; Jonathan, Neh 12¹¹) high priest. He is called son of Eliashib in Ezr 10⁶, Neh 12²³, but was probably his grandson, Joiada being his father (Neh 12¹¹. ²³). 4. Ezr 10²⁸ (= Joannes, 1 Es 9²⁹), one of those who had taken 'strange' wives. 5. Neh 6¹⁸ son of Tobiah the Ammonite. 6. Neh 12¹⁹ a priest in the days of Joiakim. 7. Neh 12²⁴ a priest present at the dedication of the walls.

JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah, ascended the throne when Nebuchadnezzar was on the march to punish the rebellion of Jehoiaikim. On the approach of the Chaldean army, the young king surrendered and was carried away to Babylon (2 K 24¹⁻²). His reign had lasted only three months, but his confinement in Babylon extended until the death of Nebuchadnezzar—thirty-seven years. Ezekiel, who seems to have regarded him as the rightful king of Judah even in captivity, pronounced a dirge over him (19¹⁸). At the accession of Evil-merodach he was freed from durance, and received a daily allowance from the palace (2 K 25²⁷). Jeremiah gives his name in 24¹ 27²⁰ 28¹ 29² as Jeconiah, and in 22²⁴. ²⁸ 37¹ as Coniah. In 1 Es 1⁴³ he is called Joakim, in Bar 1³. ⁹ Jechonias, and in Mt 1¹¹. ¹² Jechoniah.

H. P. SMITH.

JEHOIADA.—1. Father of Benaiah, the successor of Joab, 2 S 8¹⁸ 20²³ etc. It is probably the same man that is referred to in 1 Ch 12²⁷ 27²⁴, where we should probably read 'Benaiah the son of Jehoiaada.' 2. The chief priest of the Temple at the time of Ahaziah's death (2 K 11⁴ etc.). The Book of Chronicles makes him the husband of the princess Jehosheba (or Jehoshabeath, 2 Ch 22¹¹), by whose presence of mind the infant prince Jehoash escaped the massacre by which Athaliah secured the throne for herself. Jehoiaada must have been privy to the concealment of the prince, and it was he who arranged the coup d'état which placed the rightful heir on the throne. In this he may have been moved by a desire to save Judah from vassalage to Israel, as much as by zeal for the legitimate worship.

H. P. SMITH.

JEHOIAKIM, whose original name was Eliakim, was placed upon the throne of Judah by Pharaoh-necho, who deposed the more popular Jehoahaz. His reign of eleven years is not well spoken of by Jeremiah. The religious abuses which had been abolished by Josiah seem to have returned with greater strength than ever. At a time when the kingdom was impoverished by war and by the exactions of Egypt, Jehoiaikim occupied himself in extravagant schemes of building to be carried out by forced labour (2 K 23²⁴⁻²⁴⁷). Things were so bad that in the fourth year of his reign Jeremiah dictated to Baruch a summary of all his earlier discourses, and bade him read it in public as though to indicate that there was no longer any hope. The king showed his contempt for the prophetic word by burning the roll. Active persecution of the prophetic party followed, in which one man at least was put to death. Jeremiah's escape was due to powerful friends at court (Jer 22¹³⁻¹⁹ 36¹⁻²⁶ 26²⁰⁻²⁴). It was about the time of the burning of the Book of Jeremiah that the Egyptian supremacy was ended by the decisive battle of Carchemish. The evacuation of Palestine followed, and Jehoiaikim was obliged to submit to the Babylonians. His heart, however, was with the Pharaoh, to whom he owed his elevation. After three years he revolted from the Babylonian rule. Nebuchadnezzar thought to bring him into subjection by sending guerilla bands to harry the country, but as this did not succeed, he invaded Judah with an army of regulars. Before he reached Jerusalem, Jehoiaikim died, and the surrender which was inevitable, was made by his son. Whether Jeremiah's prediction that the corpse of the king should be denied decent burial was fulfilled is not certain.

H. P. SMITH.

JEHOIARIB (1 Ch 9¹⁰ 24⁷, elsewhere Joiarib; called in 1 Mac 2¹ Joarib).—The name of one of the twenty-four courses of priests; first in David's time (1 Ch 24⁷), but seventeenth in the time of Zerub. (Neh 12²⁴) and of the high priest Joiakim (12¹⁹). The name is omitted, probably by accident, in the list of the priests that 'sealed to the covenant' (Neh 10). The clan is mentioned among those that dwelt in Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (11¹⁰).

JEHONADAB or JONADAB.—1. Son of Shimeah, David's brother, and the friend of Amnon the son of David. He is described as 'a very subtil man.' He aided Amnon to carry out his intrigue against his half-sister Tamar (2 S 13³⁸), and after the assassination of Amnon was the first to grasp the true state of affairs, and to allay the king's distress by his prompt report of the safety of the royal princes (2 S 13³⁰⁻³²). 2. Son of Rechab, of the clan of the Kenites (1 Ch 2³⁴), and formulator of the rules imposed upon descendants, the Rechabites (Jer 35; see RECHABITES). Jehonadab was thoroughly in sympathy with the measures adopted by Jehu for the vindication of the religion of J' (2 K 10^{16, 23}).

JEHONATHAN.—A more exact rendering of the name usually represented in English as Jonathan. In RV this form occurs twice. 1. 2 Ch 17¹ one of the Levites sent out by Jehoshaphat with the Book of the Law to teach the people in the cities of Judah. 2. Neh 12¹⁸ the head of the priestly family of Shemaiah in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua.

JEHORAM, in the shorter form JORAM, is the name of two kings in the OT.

1. Jehoram of Israel was a son of Ahab (2 K 3¹), and came to the throne after the brief reign of his brother Ahaziah. The first thing that claimed his attention was the revolt of Moab. This he endeavoured to suppress, and with the aid of Jehoshaphat of Judah he obtained some successes. But at the crisis of the conflict the king of Moab sacrificed his son to his god Chemosh. The result was that the invading army was discouraged, and the allies retreated without having accomplished their purpose (2 K 3²⁷). It is probable that the Moabites assumed the offensive, and took the Israelite cities of whose capture Mesha boasts. The prophet Elisha was active during the reign of Jehoram, and it is probable that the siege of Samaria, of which we have so graphic an account in 2 K 6 and 7, also belongs to this period. Jehoram engaged in the siege of Ramoth-gilead, and was wounded there. The sequel in the revolt of Jehu is well known. See JEHU.

2. Jehoram of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat, came to the throne during the reign of the other Jehoram in Israel. He was married to Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. All that the history tells us is that he walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, and that Edom revolted successfully from Judah in his time. In endeavouring to subdue this revolt Jehoram was in great danger, but with a few of his men he cut his way through the troops that surrounded him (2 K 8¹⁶⁻²⁴).

3. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law (2 Ch 17⁹). H. P. SMITH.

JEHOSHABEATH.—See JEHOSHEBA.

JEHOSHAPHAT.—1. The 'recorder' in the reigns of David and Solomon (2 S 8¹⁸ etc., 1 K 4³). 2. One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4¹⁷). 3. Father of king Jehu (2 K 9^{2, 14}). 4. The son of Asa, king of Judah. He receives a good name from the compiler of the Book of Kings (1 K 22⁹). This is chiefly because he carried out the religious reforms of his father. The important thing in his reign was the alliance of Judah with Israel (v. 4), which put an end to their long hostility. Some suppose the smaller kingdom to have been tributary to the larger, but on this point our sources are silent. The alliance was cemented by the marriage of the crown prince Jehoram to Ahab's daughter Athaliah (2 K 8¹⁸). Jehoshaphat appears as the ally of Ahab against Syria, and himself went into the battle of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22). He also assisted Ahab's son against the Moabites (2 K 3). He seems to have had trouble with his own vassals in Edom, and his attempt to renew Solomon's commercial ventures on the Red Sea was unsuccessful (1 K 22²⁸). H. P. SMITH.

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (Jl 3^{2, 12}).—The deep valley to the E. of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mt. of Olives, has since the 4th cent. A.D. been identified by an unbroken Christian tradition with the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Moslems and Jews have also for centuries looked upon this valley as the scene of the Last Judgment. The Jews especially consider this of all places on earth the most suitable for burial, as it is taught that all bodies buried elsewhere must find their way thither at the last day. The valley was the ordinary place for graves in pre-exilic times (2 K 23⁶ etc.). In spite, however, of these traditions, it is quite probable that the name of this valley was at one time Wady Sha'fat, from the neighbouring village of Sha'fat, and that this suggested to early Christian pilgrims, in search of sites, the Biblical name Jehoshaphat. The so-called 'Tomb of Jehoshaphat,' which lies near the traditional 'Tomb of Absalom,' is an impossible site, for in 1 K 22³⁰ and 2 Ch 21¹ it is stated that he was buried in the city of David. The valley, moreover, does not suit the conditions, in that it is a nachal (wady)—the nachal Kidron (wh. see),—whereas the Valley of Jehoshaphat was in Heb. an 'emeq (a wide, open valley). It has been suggested that the valley ('emeq) of Beracah, where Jehoshaphat returned thanks after his great victory (2 Ch 20²⁶), may be the place referred to by Joel. It is, however, at least as probable that the prophet did not refer to any special locality and gave the name Jehoshaphat, i.e. 'Jehovah judges,' to an ideal spot. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JEHOSHEBA (2 K 11¹; Jehoshabeath in 2 Ch 22¹¹).—Daughter of Jehoram of Judah. On the death of her half-brother Ahaziah, she was instrumental in preserving the Davidic stock, by concealing the infant Jehoash in a lumber-room of the palace (RVm). According to the Chronicler, she was wife of Jehoiada.

JEHOVAH.—See GOD, § 2 (f).

JEHOVAH-JIREH.—The name given by Abraham (Gn 22¹⁴) to the spot where he offered a ram in place of his son. The name means 'Jehovah sees,' and probably also (with reference to Gn 22⁸) 'Jehovah provides.' The proverb connected in v. 14 with the name clearly relates to the Temple hill, 'the mount of the Lord.' But it is not easy to see the exact connexion between the name and the proverb. The most obvious translation is 'in the mount of Jehovah one appears' (referring to the festal pilgrimages to Jerusalem), but in that case the connexion can be only verbal. Other possible translations are: (1) 'In the mount of Jehovah it is seen,' i.e. provided; this is a possible translation in the context; but it appears to be suggested that the proverb had an existence independently of the tradition of Abraham's sacrifice; in which case the meaning assigned to the verb is not a natural or obvious one. (2) 'In the mount of Jehovah, Jehovah is seen.' The significance of the phrase would then be that, as Jehovah sees the needs of those who come to worship Him, so as a practical result He is seen by them as a helper. Other translations have been suggested which do not, however, alter the general sense. Driver decides that, unless the connexion be regarded as purely verbal, the last suggestion quoted above seems the most satisfactory. In any case, the point lies in the relation between the name which Abraham gave to the place of his sacrifice and some popular proverb dealing with the Temple at Jerusalem. A. W. F. BLUNT.

JEHOVAH-NISSI ('J' is my banner').—The name given by Moses to the altar he erected after the defeat of Amalek, Ex 17¹⁵ (E). God is considered the centre or rallying point of the army of Israel, and the name of God as their battle-cry (cf. Ps 20¹). The interpretation of v. 15 is somewhat doubtful. Many critics read nās ('banner') for kās (= kāseh, 'throne'), but this appears neither to be necessary nor to yield a suitable sense. The meaning is probably either 'J' hath sworn' (EV), or 'I (Moses) swear' (with hand uplifted to J's throne).

JEHOVAH-SHALOM.—The name given by Gideon to the altar he erected in Ophrah (Jg 6²⁴). The name means 'J' is peace' (i.e. well-disposed), in allusion to J's words in v. 23 'Peace be unto thee.'

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH ('J' is there').—The name to be given to the restored and glorified Jerusalem (Ezk 48³; cf. Is 60⁴⁻²² 62², Rev 21¹). 'The prophet beheld the Lord forsake His temple (ch. 11), and he beheld Him again enter it (ch. 43); now He abides in it among His people for ever.'

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU ('J' is our righteousness, or 'J' our righteousness, Jer 23⁶ 33¹⁶).—In both passages (which are in fact the same prophecy repeated) it is the title of the Branch, the perfectly Righteous King, who is to rule over the people on their return from the Captivity.

JEHOZABAD.—1. One of the servants of king Joash who conspired against his master and joined in his assassination (2 K 12²¹ = 2 Ch 24²⁶). 2. A Benjamite chief (2 Ch 17¹⁸). 3. A Levitical family (1 Ch 26⁴). A shortened form of the name is Jozabad (wh. see).

JEHOZADAK.—Father of Joshua the high priest (1 Ch 6¹⁴, 16, Hag 1¹, 12, 14, 22, 4, Zec 6¹¹). The name is shortened to Jozadak in Ezr 3², 8, 5², 10¹⁸, Neh 12²⁶. It appears as Josedek in 1 Es 5⁴, 48, 46, 6², 9¹⁰, Sir 49¹².

JEHU.—1. A prophet, the son of Hanani (1 K 16¹ etc.). 2. A Judahite (1 Ch 2³⁸). 3. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4³⁸). 4. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 12³). 5. A king of Israel. Like the other founders of dynasties in that country, he obtained the throne by the murder of his monarch. It is evident that a considerable party in Israel had long been dissatisfied with the house of Ahab. This was partly on account of its religious policy, but perhaps even more for its oppression of its subjects,—so emphatically illustrated by the story of Naboth. The leader of the opposition was Elijah, and after him Elisha. Jehu, when in attendance upon Ahab, had heard Elijah's denunciation of the murder of Naboth (2 K 9²⁴ etc.). Later he was general of the army, and commanded in the operations at Ramoth-gilead in the absence of king Jehoram. The latter had gone to Jezreel on account of wounds he had received. Elisha saw this to be the favourable moment to start the long-planned revolt. His disciple anointed the general, and the assent of the army was easily obtained. The vivid narrative of Jehu's prompt action is familiar to every reader of the OT. The king was taken completely by surprise, and he and his mother were slain at once (2 K 9, 10).

The extermination of Ahab's house was a foregone conclusion. The skill of Jehu is seen in his making the chief men in the kingdom partners in the crime. The extermination of the royal house in Judah seems uncalculated for, but was perhaps excused by the times on account of the close relationship with the family of Ahab. It has been suggested that Jehu purposed to put an end to the independence of Judah, and to incorporate it fully with his own kingdom. But we have no direct evidence on this head. Hosea saw that the blood of Jezreel rested upon the house of Jehu, and that it would be avenged (Hos 1⁴).

Elisha's activity extended through the reign of Jehu, but the narrative of the prophet's life tells us little of the king. From another source—the Assyrian inscriptions—we learn that Jehu paid tribute to Shalmaneser in the year 842 B.C., which must have been the year of his accession. He probably hoped to secure the great king's protection against Damascus. But he was disappointed in this, for after a single expedition to the West in 839 the Assyrians were occupied in the East. The latter portion of Jehu's reign was therefore a time of misfortune for Israel. H. P. SMITH.

JEHUBBAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁹).

JEHUCAL.—A courtier sent by king Zedekiah to entreat for the prayers of Jeremiah (Jer 37³¹); called in Jer 38¹ Jucal.

JEHUD.—A town of Dan, named between Baalath and Bene-berak (Jos 19⁴⁶). It is probably the modern el-Yehūdīyeh, 8 miles E. of Joppa.

JEHUDI (generally = 'a Jew,' but appears to be a proper name in Jer 36¹⁴, n. 23).—An officer of Jehoiakim, at whose summons Baruch read to the princes of Judah the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies, and who was afterwards himself employed to read the roll to the king.

JEHUDIJAH (1 Ch 4¹⁸ AV).—See HAJEHUDIJAH.

JEHUEL.—A Hemanite in Hezekiah's reign (2 Ch 29¹⁴).

JEIEL.—1. A Reubenite (1 Ch 5⁷). 2. An ancestor of Saul (1 Ch 8²⁹, supplied in RV from 9²⁵). 3. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴). 4. 5. The name of two Levite families: (a) 1 Ch 15¹⁴, 21, 16⁵, 5, 2 Ch 20¹⁴; (b) 2 Ch 35⁹ [1 Es 1⁹ Ochielus]. 6. A scribe in the reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26¹¹). 7. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10⁴³). In 2. 3. 6. Kethibh has Jeuel.

JEKABZEEL (Neh 11²⁵).—See KABZEEL.

JEKAMEAM.—A Levite (1 Ch 23¹⁹ 24²⁸).

JEKAMIAH.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 2⁴¹). 2. A son of king Jeconiah (1 Ch 3¹⁸).

JEKUTHIEL.—A man of Judah (1 Ch 4¹⁸).

JEMIMAH.—The eldest of Job's daughters born to him after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42¹⁴).

JEMNAAN (Jth 2²⁵).—See JABNEEL.

JEMUEL.—A son of Simeon (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵) — Nemuel of Nu 26¹², 1 Ch 4²⁴.

JEPHTHAH.—Spoken of simply as 'the Gileadite,' and as being a 'mighty man of valour.' In Jg 11¹ it is said that he was 'the son of a harlot,' for which cause he was driven out from his home in Gilead by his brethren. Hereupon he gathers a band of followers, and leads the life of a freebooter in the land of Tob. Some time after this, Gilead is threatened with an attack by the Ammonites, and Jephthah is besought to return to his country in order to defend it; he promises to lead his countrymen against the Ammonites on condition of his being made chief (king?) if he returns victorious. Not only is this agreed to, but he is forthwith made head of his people (Jg 11⁴⁻¹¹).

In the long passage which follows, 11¹²⁻²⁸, Israel's claim to possess Gilead is urged by messengers who are sent by Jephthah to the Ammonite king; the passage, however, is concerned mostly with the Moabites (cf. Nu 20, 21), and is clearly out of place here.

The 'spirit of the Lord' comes upon Jephthah, and he marches out to attack the Ammonites. On his way he makes a vow that if he returns from the battle victorious, he will offer up, as a thanksgiving to Jahweh, whoever comes out of his house to welcome him. He defeats the Ammonites, and, on his return, his daughter, an only child, comes out to meet him. The father beholds his child, according to our present text, with horror and grief, but cannot go back upon his word. The daughter begs for two months' respite, in order to go into the mountains to 'beware her virginity.' At the end of this period she returns, and Jephthah fulfils his vow (an archaeological note is here appended, 11⁴⁰, concerning which see below). There follows then an episode which recalls Jg 8¹⁻³; the Ephraimites resent not having been called by Jephthah to fight against the Ammonites, just as they resented not being called by Gideon to fight against the Midianites; in the present case, however, the matter is not settled amicably; a battle follows, in which Jephthah is again victorious; the Ephraimites flee, but are intercepted at the fords of Jordan, and, being recognized by their inability to pronounce the 'sh' in the word Shibboleth, are slain. Jephthah, after continuing his leadership for six years, dies, and is buried in Gilead, but the precise locality is not indicated.

Whether the story of the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter be historical or not, its mention is of considerable interest, inasmuch as it bears witness to the prevalence among the early Israelites of practices which were widely recognized among ancient peoples as belonging to the essentials of religion. In the story before us we obviously must not expect to see the original form; it is a compilation from more than one source, and has been worked over in the interests of later religious conceptions; that two totally distinct practices have, therefore, got mixed up together need cause no surprise. The first of these practices was the sacrifice of a human being at times of special stress (the sacrifice of the firstborn belongs to a different category); the second is that known as the 'Weeping for Tammuz.' Among early peoples there were certain rites which represented the death and resurrection of vegetation, in connexion with which various myths arose. In their original form (in which human sacrifice played a part) these rites were intended, and believed, to be the means of assisting Nature to bring forth the fruits of the earth. Among such rites was that known as 'the Weeping for Tammuz' (= Adonis), cf. Ezk 8¹⁴; the rite was based on the myth that Tammuz, a beautiful youth, was killed by a boar; Tammuz was the personification of the principle of vegetation, and represented the Summer, while the boar represented the Winter. This death of Tammuz was celebrated annually with bitter wailing, chiefly by women (Jg 14¹⁰); often (though not always, for the rite differed in different localities) his resurrection was celebrated the next day, thus ensuring by means of imitative magic the re-appearance of fresh vegetation in its time.

The 'bewailing of virginity' (v.³⁷), and the note, 'she had not known a man' (v.³⁹), are inserted to lay stress on the fact that if Jephthah's daughter had had a husband, or had been a mother, her father would have had no power over her; since, in the one case, her husband would have been her possessor, and in the other, she could have claimed protection from the father of the child, whether the latter were alive or not.

JEPHUNNEH.—1. The father of Caleb (Nu 13⁶). 2. A son of Jether an Asherite (1 Ch 7²⁸).

JERAH.—Mentioned in the genealogies of Gn 10²⁶ and 1 Ch 1²⁰ as a son of Joktan. Probably, in analogy with other names in this connexion, Jerah is to be taken as the designation of an Arabian tribe. The Arabic geographers refer to places named Wardkh, Yurakh, and Yardch, with any one of which it might be identified. On the other hand, in Hebrew the word signifies 'new moon'; it may therefore be the translation of a totemic clan-name. In fact, Bochart pointed out that 'sons of the moon' is a patronymic still found in Arabia.

JERAHMEEL ('May El have compassion!') 1. A non-Israelite clan in the extreme S. of Palestine, with which David cultivated friendly relations during his exile (1 S 27¹⁰ 30²⁹). After Saul's death the Jerahmeelites formed part of the little principality over which he reigned in Hebron. How indistinct the recollection of them was appears from the various forms assumed by their name in MSS of the LXX: Jesmege, Isramelei, Aermon, Israel, Jeramelei. Subsequently they were considered to have been a Judahite clan (1 Ch 2⁹ 25⁴ 26-42; here Jerahmeel is Caleb's elder brother; the list of his descendants in vv. 25-42 is of later origin than vv. 9, 25-27 and brings them down to the Chronicler's day). We have no historical or other records connected with these names, save that Molod (v.²⁹) is a town mentioned elsewhere (Jos 19², Neh 11²⁰). 2. LXX and Old Lat. read 'Jerahmeel' at 1 S 11 as the name of Samuel's grandfather. In all probability the Jeroham of MT is an abbreviated form, like Jacob for Jacob-el, or the Yarkhamu found in a Babylonian list of Hammurabi's time. 3. One of the three men ordered by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36²). AV follows Vulg. (filius Amelech), calling him 'son of Hammelech'; RV, with LXX, 'the king's son.' He was a scion of the royal house, but not necessarily a child of Jehoiakim. 4. In a list of Levites (1 Ch 24²⁰⁻³¹) drawn up considerably later than that in 23⁴, Jerahmeel's name is added as son of Kish (MT 'sons': the text is in a confused state). There must at the time have been a division of Levites called after him, and not, as previously, after Kish. J. TAYLOR.

JEREOHU (1 Es 5²²) = Ezr 2⁴ Neh 7³⁸ Jericho.

JERED (the same name as Jared in Gn 5¹⁸ 16, 18, 20, 1 Ch 1²).—A Judahite (1 Ch 4¹⁸).

JEREMAI.—A Jew of the family of Hashum who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³⁸ [1 Es 9⁴ Jeremias]).

JEREMIAH.—1. A warrior of the tribe of Gad, fifth in reputation (1 Ch 12¹⁰). 2. The tenth in reputation (1 Ch 12¹³) of the same Gadite band. 3. A bowman and slinger of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 12¹). 4. The head of a family in E. Manasseh (1 Ch 5²⁴). 5. A Jew of Libnah, whose daughter, Hamutal or Hamital, was one of the wives of Josiah, and mother of Jehohaz (2 K 23³¹) and Zedekiah (2 K 24¹⁸, Jer 52¹). 6. The son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah, the head of the Rechabites (Jer 35²) in the time of the prophet Jeremiah. 7. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12¹). His name was given to one of the twenty-two courses of priests (Ezr 2³⁶⁻³⁹, Neh 7³⁰⁻⁴² 12¹³). 8. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²) and took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12³⁹). 9. The prophet. See next article.

JEREMIAH.—1. The times.—Jeremiah the prophet was born towards the close of Manasseh's long and evil reign (c. B.C. 696-641), the influence of which overshadowed his life (Jer 15⁴, 2 K 23²⁸). He prophesied under Josiah and his sons from the year 626 to the fall of Jerusalem in B.C. 586 (12¹), and for some short time after this until he vanishes from sight amongst the fugitive Jews in Egypt (chs. 40-44).

Through Josiah's minority (see JOSIAH) the ethnizing régime of Manasseh continued; Jeremiah's earliest preaching (chs. 2-6), and the prophecies of his contemporary Zephaniah (wh. see), reveal a medley of heathen worship in Jerusalem, gross oppression and profligacy, insolence and insensibility characterizing both court and people. Meanwhile an international crisis is approaching. The giant power of Asshur, which for a century had dominated Israel's world, is in rapid decline, and is threatened by the new Median State on its eastern border; Nahum (wh. see) had already celebrated Nineveh's downfall in his splendid verses. The Assyrian capital was saved for the time by the irruption of the Scythian nomads (Ezekiel's Gog and Magog), who were swarming southwards from the Oxus plains and over the Caucasus passes. These hordes of wild horsemen overran Western Asia for a generation, leaving a lasting horror behind them. Nineveh avoided capture by the Medes in 625 only at the expense of seeing her lands wasted and her dependencies stripped from her. The war-cloud of the Scythian invasion overhangs the sky of Zephaniah, and of Jeremiah at the outset of his ministry. The territory of Judah seems, after all, to have escaped the Scythian deluge, which swept to the borders of Egypt. The nomad cavalry would reach with difficulty the Judæan highlands; and if Josiah, coming of age about this time, showed a bold front against them and saved his country from their ravages, we can account for the prestige that he enjoyed and used to such good purpose. At the same date, or even earlier, the Assyrian over-lordship had been renounced; for we find Josiah exercising independent sovereignty. It was not as the vassal of Nineveh, but in the assertion of his hereditary rights and as guardian of the old territory of Israel, that he challenged Pharaoh-necho, who was attempting to seize the lost western provinces of Assyria, to the fatal encounter of Megiddo in the year 608 (2 K 22² 23¹⁵⁻²⁰, 2 Ch 35²⁰). The Pharaoh pointedly calls him 'thou king of Judah,' as if bidding him keep within his bounds (2 Ch 35²). Jeremiah praises Josiah, in contrast to his son, as an upright and prosperous king, good to the poor and commending his religion by his rule (Jer 22¹⁵ 17).

The great event of Josiah's reign was the reformation effected by him in its eighteenth year (B.C. 621), upon the discovery of 'the book of the law' in the Temple (2 K 22^{8-23²⁵}; see DEUTERONOMY). So far as concerned outward religion, this was a drastic and enduring revolution. Not merely the later idolatries imported from the East under the Assyrian supremacy, but also the indigenous rites of Molech and the Baalim were abolished. Above all, an end was put to the immemorial cultus of the local 'high places,' at which the service of Jehovah had been corrupted by mixture with that of the Canaanite divinities. Worship was centralized at the royal Temple of Jerusalem; and the 'covenant' with Jehovah made by king and people there in the terms of Deuteronomy, followed by the memorable Passover feast, was designed to inaugurate a new order of things in the life of the people; this proved, in fact, a turning-point in Israel's history. However disappointing in its immediate spiritual effects, the work of Josiah and his band of reformers gave the people a written law-book and a definitely organized religious system, which they carried with them into the Exile to form the nucleus of the OT Scriptures and the basis of the later Judaism.

The fall of Josiah in battle concluded the interval of freedom and prosperity enjoyed by Judah under his vigorous rule. For three years the country was subject to the victorious Pharaoh, who deposed and deported Shallum-Jehoaahaz, the national choice, replacing him on the throne of Judah by his brother Eliakim-Jehoiakim. The great battle of Carchemish (605), on the Euphrates, decided the fate of Syria and Palestine; the empire of Western Asia, quickly snatched from Egypt, passed into the strong hands of the Chaldean king Nebuchadrezzar, the destined destroyer of Jerusalem. From this time 'Babylon' stands for the tyrannous and corrupting powers of the world; she becomes, for Scripture and the Church, the metropolis of the kingdom of Satan, as 'Jerusalem' of the kingdom of the saints. The Chaldean empire was a revival of the Assyrian,—less brutal and destructive, more advanced in civilization, but just as sensual and sordid, and exploiting the subject races as thoroughly as its predecessor. The prophecies of Habakkuk (chs. 1 and 2) reveal the intense hatred and fear excited by the approach of the Chaldeans; the ferocity of Nebuchadrezzar's troops was probably aggravated by the incorporation with them of Scythian cavalry, large bodies of which still roamed south of the Caspian. The repeated and desperate revolts made by the Judeans are accounted for by the harshness of Nebuchadrezzar's yoke, to escape which Tyre endured successfully a thirteen years' siege. His enormous works of building (see Hab 2¹¹⁻¹³) must have involved crushing exactions from the tributaries.

Jehoiakim, after Carchemish, transferred his allegiance to Babylon. For three years he kept faith with Nebuchadrezzar, and then—apparently without allies or reasonable hope of support—rebelled (2 K 24¹). Jehoiakim was a typical Eastern despot, self-willed, luxurious, unprincipled, oppressive towards his own people, treacherous and incompetent in foreign policy. Jeremiah denounces him vehemently; the wonder is that he did not fall a victim to the king's anger, like his disciple Uriah (Jer 26²⁰⁻²⁴ 36²⁶⁻³⁰ 22²⁴⁻²⁶). The revived national faith in Jehovah, which had rested on Josiah's political success, was shaken by his fall; the character of the new king, and the events of his reign, furthered the reaction. A popular Jehovist party existed; but this was the most dangerous factor in the situation. Its leaders—the prophet Hananiah amongst them (Jer 28)—preached out of season Isaiah's old doctrine of the inviolability of Zion; even after the capture of Jerusalem in 597 and the first exile, 'the prophets' promised in Jehovah's name a speedy re-instatement. The possession of the Temple and the observance of the Law, they held, bound Jehovah to His people's defence. The fanaticism thus excited, of which the Jewish race has given so many subsequent examples, brought about the second, and fatal, rupture with Babylon.

Nebuchadrezzar showed a certain forbearance towards

Judah. On Jehoiakim's first revolt, in 601, he let loose bands of raiders on the Judæan territory (2 K 24²; cf. Jer 12⁹⁻¹⁴); four years later he marched on the capital. Jehoiakim died just before this; his youthful son Jehoiachin (called also Jecooniah and Coniah) surrendered the city, and was carried captive, with the queen-mother and the élite of the nobles and people, to Babylon, where he lived for many years, to be released upon Nebuchadrezzar's death in 561 (2 K 24¹⁸⁻¹⁷ 25²⁷⁻³⁰, Jer 22²⁴⁻³⁰).

The reign of Mattaniah-Zedekiah, raised to the throne by Nebuchadrezzar, was in effect a repetition of that of his elder brother. Zedekiah failed through weakness more than through wickedness; he sought Jeremiah's advice, but lacked decision to follow it. Early in his reign a conspiracy was on foot in Palestine against the Chaldeans, which he was tempted to join (Jer 27¹⁻¹¹; see RVm on v. 1). The Judeans, instead of being cowed by the recent punishment, were eager for a rising; public opinion expressed itself in Hananiah's contradiction to Jeremiah's warnings (ch. 28). The same false hopes were exciting the exiles in Babylon (ch. 29). Nebuchadrezzar, aware of these movements, summoned Zedekiah to Babylon (Jer 51¹⁰); the latter was able, however, to clear himself of complicity, and returned to Jerusalem. At last Zedekiah yielded to the tide; he broke his oaths of allegiance to Nebuchadrezzar—conduct sternly condemned by Ezekiel (17¹¹⁻²¹) as well as by Jeremiah—and the Jewish people were launched on a struggle almost as mad as that which it undertook with Rome 650 years later. The siege of Jerusalem was stubbornly prolonged for two years (588-586). The Egyptians under the new and ambitious Pharaoh-hophra (Apries, 588-569), effected a diversion of the Chaldean troops (Jer 37⁵⁻¹⁰, Ezk 17¹⁵); but, as often before, Pharaoh proved 'a broken reed to those who trusted in him.' Reduced by famine, Jerusalem was stormed, Zedekiah being captured in his attempt to escape, and meeting a pitiable death (2 K 25¹⁻⁷). This time Nebuchadrezzar made an end of the rebels. Jerusalem was razed to the ground; the survivors of the siege, and of the executions that followed, were carried into exile. A remnant, of no political importance, was left to till the ground; the bulk of these, after the tragic incidents related in Jer 39-43, fled to Egypt. Jeremiah, who had in vain resisted this migration, was carried with the runaways; he had the distress of seeing his companions relapse into open idolatry, protesting that they had fared better when worshipping 'the queen of heaven' than under the national Jehovah. Jewish tradition relates that he died at the hands of his incensed fellow-exiles. The prophet's prediction that the sword of Nebuchadrezzar would follow the fugitives, was fulfilled by the Chaldean invasion of Lower Egypt in the year 569, if not earlier than this. The Babylonian empire lasted from B.C. 605 to 538,—a little short of the '70 years' assigned to it, in round numbers, by Jeremiah (25¹¹ 29¹⁰).

2. The man.—The Book of Jeremiah is largely autobiographical. The author became, unconsciously, the hero of his work. This prophet's temperament and experience have coloured his deliverances in a manner peculiar amongst OT writers. His teaching, moreover, marks an evolution in the Israelite religion, which acquires a more personal stamp as its national framework is broken up. In Jeremiah's life we watch the spirit of revelation being driven inwards, taking refuge from the shipwreck of the State in the soul of the individual. Jeremiah is the prophet of that 'church within the nation,' traceable in its beginnings to Isaiah's time, to which the future of revealed religion is henceforth committed. This inner community of heart-believers survived the Exile; it gave birth to the Bible and the synagogue.

Jeremiah was a native of Anathoth, a little town some 3½ miles N.E. from Jerusalem, perched high on the mountain-ridge and commanding an extensive view over the hills of Ephraim and the Jordan valley, towards which his memory often turned (4¹⁵ 7¹⁴. 15 12⁵ 31⁴⁻⁶. 18 49¹⁹). Jeremiah had no mere Judæan outlook; the larger Israel was constantly in his thoughts. His father was 'Hilkiah [not the Hilkiah of 2 K 22¹], of the priests that were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin' (1¹); but he does not show, like the contemporary priest-prophet Ezekiel, the sacerdotal mind. Anathoth had been the settlement of Abiathar, the last high priest of Eli's house, who was banished thither by Solomon (1 K 2²⁶); Jeremiah may have been a scion of this deposed line. His mission brought him, probably at an early period, into conflict with 'the men of Anathoth,' who sought his life (11¹⁸⁻²⁰). His attempt to visit Anathoth during the last siege of Jerusalem, and the transaction between himself and his cousin over the field at Anathoth (32²⁵. 37¹¹⁻¹⁴), go to show that he was not entirely cut off from friendly relations with his kindred and native place.

Jeremiah's call (ch. 1) in a.c. 626 found him a diffident and reluctant young man,—not wanting in devotion, but shrinking from publicity, and with no natural drawing towards the prophetic career; yet he is 'set over the nations, to pluck up and to break down, and to build and to plant'! Already there begins the struggle between the implanted word of Jehovah and the nature of the man, on which turns Jeremiah's inner history and the development of his heroic character,—all things considered, the noblest in the OT. His ministry was to be a long martyrdom. He must stand as 'a fenced city and an iron pillar and brazen walls against the whole land,'—a solitary and impregnable fortress for Jehovah. The manner of his call imports an intimacy with God, an identification of the man with his mission, more close and complete than in the case of any previous prophet (see vv. 5 and 9). No intermediary—not even 'the spirit of Jehovah,'—no special vehicle or means of prophetic incitement, is ever intimated in his case: simply 'the word of Jehovah came to' him. He conceives the true prophet as 'standing in Jehovah's council, to perceive and hear his word' (23¹⁸; cf. Is 50¹). So that he may be in person, as well as in word, a prophet of the coming tribulation, marriage is forbidden him and all participation in domestic life (16¹⁻¹³),—a sentence peculiarly bitter to his tender and affectionate nature. Jeremiah's imagination was haunted by his lost home happiness (7²⁴ 16⁹ 25¹⁰ 33¹¹). Endowed with the finest sensibilities, in so evil a time he was bound to be a man of sorrows.

Behind the contest waged by Jeremiah with kings and people there lay an interior struggle, lasting more than twenty years. So long it took this great prophet to accept with full acquiescence the burden laid upon him. We may trace through a number of self-revealing passages, the general drift of which is plain notwithstanding the obscurity of some sentences and the chronological uncertainty, Jeremiah's progress from youthful consecration and ardour, through moods of doubt and passionate repugnance, to a complete self-conquest and settled trust (see, besides chs. 1. 11. 16 already cited, 8¹⁻⁶ 9¹⁵ 10. 11 and 15-21 17¹⁴⁻¹⁸ 18¹⁸⁻²² 20. 26 and 30-32). The discipline of Jeremiah may be divided into four stages, following on his supernatural call:—(a) the youthful period of fierce denunciation, a.c. 626-621; (b) the time of disillusion and silence, subsequent to Josiah's reforms, 621-608; (c) the critical epoch, 608-604, opened by the fall of Josiah at Megiddo and closing in the fourth year of Jehoiakim after the battle of Carchemish and the advent of Nebuchadnezzar, when the paroxysm of the prophet's soul was past and his vision of the future grew clear; (d) the stage of full illumination, attained during the calamities of the last days of Jerusalem.

To (a) belongs the teaching recorded in chs. 2-6, subject to the modifications involved in condensing from memory discourses uttered 20 years before. Here

Jeremiah is on the same ground as Zephaniah. He strongly recalls Hosea, whose love for 'Ephraim' he shares, and whose similitude of the marriage-union between Jehovah and Israel supplies the basis of his appeals. Judah, he insists, has proved a more faithless bride than her northern sister; a divorce is inevitable. Ch. 5 reflects the shocking impression made by Jeremiah's first acquaintance with Jerusalem; in ch. 6 Jehovah's scourge—in the first instance the Scythians—is held over the city. With rebukes mingle calls to repentance and, more rarely, hopes of a relenting on the people's part (31²⁻²²; in other hopeful passages critics detect interpolation). Jeremiah's powerful and pathetic preaching helped to prepare the reformation of 621. But as the danger from the northern hordes passed and Josiah's rule brought new prosperity, the prophet's vaticinations were discounted; his pessimism became an object of ridicule.

(b) Jeremiah's attitude towards Josiah's reformation is the enigma of his history. The collection of his prophecies made in 604 (see chs. 1-12), apart from the doubtful allusion in 11⁴, ignores the subject; Josiah's name is but once mentioned, by way of contrast to Jehoiakim, in 22¹³⁻¹⁹. From this silence we must not infer condemnation; and such passages as 7²². 23 and 8⁸ do not signify that Jeremiah was radically opposed to the sacrificial system and to the use of a written law. We may fairly gather from 11⁴, if not from 17¹⁹⁻²⁷ (the authenticity of which is contested), that Jeremiah commended the Deuteronomistic code. His writings in many passages show a Deuteronomistic stamp. But, from this point of view, the reformation soon showed itself a failure. It came from the will of the king, not from the conscience of the people. It effected no 'circumcision of the heart,' no inward turning to Jehovah, no such 'breaking up of the fallow ground' as Jeremiah had called for; the good seed of the Deuteronomistic teaching was 'sown among thorns' (4¹⁻⁴), which sprang up and choked it. The cant of religion was in the mouths of ungodly men; apostasy had given place, in the popular temper, to hypocrisy. Convinced of this, Jeremiah appears to have early withdrawn, and stood aloof for the rest of Josiah's reign. Hence the years 621-608 are a blank in the record of his ministry. For the time the prophet was nonprussed; the evil he had foretold had not come; the good which had come was a doubtful good in his eyes. He could not support, he would not oppose, the work of the earnest and sanguine king. Those twelve years demonstrated the emptiness of a political religion. They burnt into the prophet's soul the lesson of the worthlessness of everything without the law written on the heart.

(c) Josiah's death at Megiddo pricked the bubble of the national religiousness; this calamity recalled Jeremiah to his work. Soon afterwards he delivered the great discourse of 7^{1-8³}, which nearly cost him his life (see ch. 26). He denounces the false reliance on the Temple that replaced the idolatrous superstitions of 20 years before, thereby making 'the priests and the prophets,' to whose ears the threat of Shiloh's fate for Zion was rank treason, from this time his implacable enemies. The post-reformation conflict now opening was more deadly than the pre-reformation conflict shared with Zephaniah. A false Jehovism had entrenched itself within the forms of the Covenant, armed with the weapons of fanatical self-righteousness. To this phase of the struggle belong chs. 7-10 (subtracting the great interpolation of 9^{2-10¹⁶}, of which 10¹⁻¹⁶ is surely post-Jeremianic); so, probably, most of the matter of chs. 14-20, identified with the 'many like words' that were added to the volume of Jeremiah burnt by Jehoiakim in the winter of 604 (36²⁷⁻²⁸).

The personal passages of chs. 15. 17. 18. 20 belong to this decisive epoch (608-605, between Megiddo and Carchemish). The climax of Jeremiah's inward agony was brought about by the outrage inflicted on him by Pashhur, the Temple overseer (ch. 20), when, to stop his mouth, the prophet was scourged and put in the stocks. He breaks out, 'O Jehovah, thou hast befooled me, and I have been befooled!' and ends by 'cursing the day of his birth' (vv. 7-18). Jehovah has used His almighty power to play with a weak, simple man, and to make him a laughing-stock! Jehovah's word is 'a fire in his bones'; he is compelled to speak it, only to meet ridicule and insult! His warnings remain unfulfilled, and God leaves him in the lurch! He desires nothing but the people's good; yet they count him a traitor, and put down his terrifying visions to malignity! This last reproach cut Jeremiah to the heart; again and again he had repelled it (15¹⁰ 17¹⁸ 18²⁰). The scene of ch. 20 was Jeremiah's Gethsemane. It took place not long before the crisis of 'the fourth year of Jehoiakim,'—the occasion when the roll of doom was prepared (ch. 36) which was read to the people and the king, and when, after the battle of Carchemish, Nebuchadrezzar was hailed as Jehovah's servant and executioner (ch. 25). At this juncture the conclusive breach with Jehoiakim came about, when the faithless king, by running his knife through Jeremiah's book, severed the ties which had bound prophecy to the secular throne of David since Samuel's day. Recalling at this date his misgivings and inward fightings against God, the prophet virtually tells us that they are past. From the years 605-4 he marches with firm step to the goal; he sees the end of God's kingdom, and the way. Jeremiah is at last equal to his office, ready 'to pluck up and to break down the nations, and to build and to plant.' Master of himself, he is master of the world.

(d) Chs. 30-33 (33¹⁴⁻²⁶ are wanting in the LXX; the remainder of 33, along with 32¹⁶⁻⁴⁴, lies under grave critical suspicion) contain a distinct 'word of Jehovah,' committed to a separate 'book.' This is 'the Book of the Future of Israel and Judah' (Duhm), and the crown of Jeremiah's life-work. Like the Christian prophet who wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, Jeremiah fled to the ideal and eternal from the horrors of the national downfall; as the earthly Zion sinks, the image of God's true city rises on his soul. The long foreseen catastrophe has arrived; Jeremiah meets it bravely, for 'days are coming,' Jehovah tells him, 'when I will restore the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, and I will cause them to return to the land of their fathers' (30²⁰). The prophet adds deeds to words: he takes the opportunity of buying, before witnesses, a field at Anathoth offered during the siege by his cousin Hanameel, in token that 'houses and fields and vineyards shall yet again be bought in this land' (32¹⁵). But the restoration means something far better than recovery of the land; it will be a spiritual renovation, a change of heart going deeper than Josiah's renewal of the old covenant. 'They shall be my people,' Jehovah promises, 'and I will be their God; and I will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear me for ever. . . . And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, and I will put my fear in their hearts' (32^{38, 39}; vv. 41-44 of this disputed chapter are full of Jeremician traits). The announcement of the 'new covenant' in ch. 31³¹⁻³⁴ is the kernel of the 'Book of the Future'; this is Jeremiah's greatest contribution to the progress of the Kingdom of God. This passage touches the high-water mark of OT prophecy; it was appropriated by the Lord Jesus at the Last Supper, and supplied the basis of the NT doctrine of salvation (see He 10¹⁴⁻¹⁶). To deprive Jeremiah of the New-Covenant oracle (as B. Duhm, e.g., would do) is to remove the top-stone of his life's edifice; it is to make his rôle one of 'plucking up and breaking down,' with no commensurate 'building and planting' (1¹⁰) upon the desolated site. Jeremiah had read first in his own heart the secret thus conveyed to Israel. The mission which he had borne for long as a painful yoke, he learnt to rest in with entire contentment. He is able to say, 'I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart'; and he prophesies that, under the new covenant, every man shall say this.

Jeremiah's style and powers as a writer have been underestimated; better justice is done to them by recent scholars. The gloom overshadowing many of his pages has been repellent; and the mistaken attachment of his name to 'Lamentations' has brought on him the disparaging epithet of 'the weeping prophet.' Much of the book comes to us from other pens; in its narrative parts we recognize the hand of Baruch; and allowance should be made for editorial glosses and additions, here and there interrupting the flow and impairing the force of the original. Jeremiah's language is touched with occasional Aramaisms, and shows some falling off from the perfection of the classical Hebrew of the 8th century. Jeremiah has neither the sublimity and sustained oratorical power of Isaiah, nor the pungency of Amos, nor the poignancy of Hosea, nor the fire and verve of Nahum, nor the subtlety of Habakkuk; but in richness of imagery, in fullness of human interest, in lucidity and naturalness, in his command of the various resources of poetry, eloquence, pathos, and practical appeal, by virtue of the combination of excellences he presents and the value of his total output, Jeremiah is the greatest of the writing prophets.

3. The Book.—We owe the Book of Jeremiah to his collaborator Baruch (ch. 36). In fairness, this should be entitled 'The Book of Jeremiah the prophet and Baruch the scribe.' With Baruch's help Jeremiah issued in 604 'a roll of a book,' containing the sum of his public teaching up to that date. This volume was not too large to be read to the assembled people, and read aloud twice more in the course of the same day. In size and contents it corresponded to chs. 2-12 of the existing book (the two fragments of 9²³⁻²⁶ seem to be a later Jeremician, and 10¹⁻¹⁶ a post-Jeremician insertion; some would also refer 12¹⁷⁻¹⁷ to a subsequent date). The destruction of the first roll by Jehoiakim called for a new edition, containing 'many like words,' which added to the bulk of the first publication: chs. 1 and 14-20, with (possibly) 25, may be taken to contain the supplementary matter referred to in 36²², extending and illustrating chs. 2-12 (ch. 13 is out of place, since it bears in the allusion of vv. 18, 19 manifest reference to the captivity of 597). With the exceptions named, and some others of less moment, chs. 1-20 may be read as the re-written roll of Jer 36²², which dated from the winter of B.C. 604.

In chs. 21¹¹⁻²³ we find a distinct collection of oracles, relating to the kings (down to Jehoiachin) and prophets, associated under the designation of 'shepherds'; it is prefaced by a story (in 3rd person: 21¹¹⁻¹⁰) about king Zedekiah, germane to the later collection of chs. 37-39. Chs. 13 and 24 and 27-29 are reminiscences of Jeremiah relative to the early years of Zedekiah's reign, subsequent to the First Captivity (597)—surely ch. 35, the story of the Rechabites (in 1st person), relating to Jehoiakim's closing years, should come in here. This added matter may have gone to make up a third edition of Jeremiah-Baruch's work, published about this date, extending over chs. 1-29, with the deductions and addition previously noted (ch. 26 is mentioned below).

Chs. 30-33 form a totally distinct work from the Book of Doom thus far analyzed; this is Jeremiah's book of promise or consolation, recording the revelation of his people's future given to him during the last siege of Jerusalem. Chs. 37-39, to which 21¹¹⁻¹² should be attached, and 40-44, are two distinct memoirs, bearing on Jeremiah's history (a) in the final siege, and (b) after the capture of Jerusalem; the authorship of his secretary is indicated by the fact that the short oracle concerning Baruch (ch. 45) is set at the end of these narratives, though the event related took place earlier, in 604. It is to be noted that the data of 11⁴ do not cover the matter of chs. 40-44. It looks as though that superscription was drawn up when the book extended only from ch. 1-39, and as though we ought to recognize a fourth stage in the growth of Jeremiah's book—a redaction made soon after the fall of Jerusalem, which was supplemented afterwards when Baruch added chs. 40-45, making the fifth (enlarged) edition. To (a) is prefixed the supremely important Baruch story (ch. 36), of the same date as the above-mentioned (ch. 45) which concludes (b). Ch. 26 is a detached narrative piece, out of place where it stands; this appears to be Baruch's account of the crisis in Jeremiah's work to which 71-83 relates (b.c. 608). Altogether, we may credit to Baruch's memoirs of Jeremiah chs. 26, 36, 37-39 and 40-45; to some extent he probably worked over and edited the matter received by dictation from his master.

This leaves remaining only the collection of Foreign Oracles, which have been separately placed at the end of Jeremiah's works, in chs. 46-51; and the Historical Appendix, ch. 52, borrowed by his editors from the Book of Kings (or by the compilers of Kings from this place). The great doom of the Chaldeans and Babylon in chs. 50-51¹⁸, judged by internal evidence, was certainly a postscript to Jeremiah's work and a product of the Exile; critical doubts, of less gravity, attach to other parts of the Foreign Oracles. In 38²⁶-39¹⁰ we find already inserted, in shorter form, the first part of the narrative incorporated in ch. 52. Ch. 52²⁸⁻³⁰ supplies a valuable bit of tradition about the Captivity wanting in Kings, missing also in the LXX text of Jeremiah. The final redaction of the canonical 'Jeremiah' (the sixth edition?) dates considerably posterior to the Exile; for 50²-51¹⁸, if written by an exile prophet, could hardly have been ascribed to Jeremiah until a late age. On the other hand, chs. 50-52 are found in the LXX, which dated c. b.c. 200, and must therefore have been incorporated in the book before this time.

The LXX departs from the Massoretic text in two main respects: (1) in arrangement,—the Foreign Oracles (chs. 46-51) being let in between vv.¹³ and ¹⁴ of ch. 25, and running in a different order. It is not unlikely that the Dooms of the Nations were originally associated with ch. 25; but their Greek position cannot possibly be sustained. (2) Again, the LXX text differs from the MT in quantity, being shorter by some 2700 words, or one-eighth of the whole. The subtracted matter consists partly of omissions of paragraphs and sentences—amongst the chief of these being 117: 8 171-4 291¹⁰⁻²⁰ 331²⁶ 486-47 514⁴⁸ 522: 3, 28-30; partly of abbreviations,—titles shortened, proper names dispensed with, synonyms dropped and descriptions curtailed. The former phenomena point, in a number of instances, to accretions gathered by the MT subsequently to the date of translation; the abbreviations betray in the translator a studied attempt at conciseness. It has been supposed that the LXX rested on an older and purer recension of the Hebrew text, preserved in Egypt; but this theory is abandoned. 'Both texts' of Jeremiah 'have the same archetype; but this archetype underwent a gradual process of expansion, and the process is represented at an earlier stage in the MS or MSS underlying the LXX, and at a more advanced stage in those at the basis of the MT. . . . Speaking generally, the MT is qualitatively greatly superior to the Greek; but, on the other hand, quantitatively, the Greek is nearer the original text. This judgment is general, admitting many exceptions,—that is, cases where the quality of the Greek text is better, and its readings more original than the Hebrew; and also cases where, in regard to quantity, the Hebrew is to be preferred, the omissions in the LXX being due to faults in the translator's MS, to his own oversight, or to his tendency to scamp and abridge' (A. B. Davidson).

SYNOPSIS OF THE BOOK.

- I. The great Book of Doom, dictated by Jeremiah in a.c. 604: chs. 1-20, 25, with parts (probably) of 46-51, corresponding to the original volume read by Baruch (36² 10) and the 'many like words' added on re-writing (36²³).
 - (a) The book burnt by Jehoiakim: chs. 2-12 (minus 9²³-10¹⁶ etc.). This included—
 1. The Judgment upon Judah's treachery towards Jehovah: chs. 2-6, embodying Jeremiah's pre-reformation teaching [36¹⁸ has slipped out of its place; this oracle should come either before (Cornill), or after (Buston), the rest of chs. 2-3].
 2. The Judgment upon Judah's hypocrisy: chs. 7-12 (? 12¹⁷⁻¹⁷; minus 9²³-10¹⁶); belonging to the post-reformation preaching of 608 and onwards.
 - (b) The 'many like words,' illustrating (a): chs. 1, 14-20, and probably 25, etc.; consisting of scenes and reminiscences from Jeremiah's earlier ministry, up to b.c. 604 [ch. 13 was later; it has been displaced; see § V.]
- II. The Judgment on the Shepherds (kings, priests, and prophets): chs. 21-23 [21¹⁰ has been transferred from § V.; the remainder of this section need not have been later than c. b.c. 597].
- III. Later memoranda of Jeremiah, extending from c. 600 to 593: chs. 12¹⁷⁻¹⁷ (?) 13, 24, 27, 29 and 35. §§ II. and III. may have been added to § I. to form a third (enlarged) edition of the great Book of Doom, issued in the middle of Zedekiah's reign and before the final struggle with Nebuchadnezzar.
- IV. The little Book of Consolation: chs. 30-33, dating from the second siege.
- V. Baruch's Memoirs of Jeremiah:
 - (a) Before the Fall of Jerusalem (covered by the title in 1-3): chs. 26, 36, 37, 39, with 21¹⁰.
 - (b) After the Fall of Jerusalem: chs. 40-44.
 - (c) Baruch's personal note: ch. 45.
 Whether the above memoirs were introduced by Baruch or extracted later by other editors from a separate work of his, cannot be determined with certainty. The position of ch. 45 speaks for his editing up to this point; but if so, some later hand has disturbed his arrangement of the matter. In some instances the displacements we have noted may be due to accidents of transcription.
- VI. The Collection of Foreign Oracles: chs. 46-49 [50²-51¹⁸, 51¹⁹⁻⁶⁴—against Egypt (2), Philistia, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar and Hazor, Elam (Babylon)]. In the LXX the Dooms are differently arranged, attached to 25¹³, and slightly shorter. The Babylon Doom admittedly betrays the hand of a late compiler; additions to Jeremiah's work are suspected in other parts of the section, particularly in the Dooms of Egypt and Moab.
- VII. The Historical Appendix: ch. 52, nearly identical, by general admission, with 2 K 24¹⁸-25²⁰.
The above must be taken as a general outline and sketch of the growth of the work. There are a number of detached fragments, such as 9²³, 24 and 25, the true connexion of which is lost. And post-Jeremianic interpolations and annotations, relatively numerous, must be recognized; the most conspicuous of these, besides the last three chapters, are 10¹⁶ and 33⁴⁻²⁸. G. G. FINDLAY.

JEREMIAS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Jeremai in Ezr 10³.

JEREMIEL.—The archangel who in 2 Es 4³⁰ answers the questions of the righteous dead. AV has Uriel, the angel sent to instruct Esdras (2 Es 4¹ 5³⁰ 10²⁸).

JEREMOTH.—1. 2. Two Benjamites (1 Ch 7⁸ 8¹⁴). 3. 4. Two Levites (1 Ch 23²² 25²²); the latter called in 24³⁰ Jerimoth. 5. A Naphtalite (1 Ch 27¹⁹). 6. 7. 8. Three of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁶, 27, 28). In the last instance Qerē has 'anc Ramoth' (so AV). For Nos. 6 and 8 1 Es. (9²⁷, 30) has Hieremoth; for No. 7 it has (v. 28) Jerimoth.

JEREMY.—The form in which the name of the prophet Jeremiah appears in both AV and RV of 1 Es 1²⁸, 22, 47, 57 2¹, 2 Es 2¹⁸, as well as in AV of 2 Mac 2¹, 5, 7, Mt 2¹⁷ 27⁹. In the last three passages RV has Jeremiah. The form Jeremy is used also in both AV and RV in the title of the Epistle ascribed to the prophet in Bar 6¹. See art. APOCRYPHA, § 10.

JERICHO.—A city situated in the Jordan valley about 5 miles from the north end of the Dead Sea, now represented by the miserable village of er-Rtha. It was the first city conquered by the Israelites after their passage of the Jordan. The course of events, from the sending of the spies to the destruction of Achan for infraction of the tabu on the spoil, is too well known to need repetition here (see Jos 1-7). A small hamlet remained on the site, belonging to Benjamin (Jos 18²¹), which was insignificant enough for David's ambassadors to retire to, to recover from their insulting treatment by Hanun (2 S 10⁴, 1 Ch 19⁵). The city was re-founded by Hiel, a Bethelite, who apparently endeavoured to avert the curse pronounced by Joshua over the site by sacrificing his sons (1 K 16³⁴). A college of prophets was shortly afterwards founded here (2 K 2⁴), for whose benefit Elisha healed its bitter waters (v. 18). Hither the Israelites who had raided Judah, in the time of Ahaz, restored their captives on the advice of the prophet Oded (2 Ch 28¹⁴). Here the Babylonians finally defeated Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, and so destroyed the Judahite kingdom (2 K 25⁵, Jer 39⁵ 52⁹). Bacchides, the general of the Syrians in the Maccabæan period, captured and fortified Jericho (1 Mac 9⁵⁰); Aristobulus also took it (Jos. Ant. xiv. i. 2). Pompey encamped here on his way to Jerusalem (ib. xiv. iv. 1). Its inhabitants, whom the great heat of the Ghôr had deprived of fighting strength, fled before Herod (ib. xiv. xv. 3) and Vespasian (BJ iv. viii. 2). In the Gospels Jericho figures in the stories of Bartimæus (Mt 20²⁹, Mk 10⁴⁶, Lk 18³⁵), Zacchæus (Lk 19¹), and the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰).

The modern er-Rtha is not exactly on the site of ancient Jericho, which is a collection of mounds beside the spring traditionally associated with Elisha. The Roman and Byzantine towns are represented by other sites in the neighbourhood. Ancient aqueducts, mills, and other antiquities are numerous, as are also remains of early monasticism.

The site, though unhealthy for man, is noted for its fertility. Josephus (BJ iv. viii. 3) speaks of it with enthusiasm. Even yet it is an important source of fruit supply. The district round Jericho is the personal property of the Sultan. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JERIEL.—A chief of Issachar (1 S 7⁷).

JERIJAH (1 Ch 26³).—See JERIAH.

JERIMOTH.—1. 2. Two Benjamites (1 Ch 77 12⁶). 3. 4. 5. Three Levites (1 Ch 24³⁰ [called in 25²² Jeremoth] 25⁴, 2 Ch 31¹³). 6. A son of David and father of Rehoboam's wife (2 Ch 11¹⁴).

JERIOTH.—One of Caleb's wives (1 Ch 2¹⁸), but almost certainly the MT is corrupt.

JEROBOAM is the name of two kings of Israel.

1. Jeroboam I. was the first king of the northern tribes after the division. His first appearance in history is as head of the forced labourers levied by Solomon. This was perhaps because he was hereditary chief in Ephraim, but we must also suppose that he attracted the attention of Solomon by his ability and energy. At the same time he resented the tyranny of the prince whom he served, and plotted to overthrow it. The design came to the knowledge of Solomon, and Jeroboam fled to Egypt. On the king's death he returned, and although he did not appear on the scene when the northern tribes made their demand of Rehoboam, he was probably actively enlisted in the movement. When the refusal of Rehoboam threw the tribes into revolt, Jeroboam appeared as leader, and was made king (1 K 11²⁶, 12-14²⁰). Jeroboam was a warlike prince, and hostilities with Judah continued throughout his reign. His country was plundered by the Egyptians at the time of their invasion of Judah. It is not clearly made out whether his fortification of Shechem and Penuel was suggested by the experiences of this campaign or not. His religious measures have received the reprobation of the Biblical writers, but they were intended by Jeroboam to please the God of Israel. He embellished the ancestral sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan with golden bulls, in continuance of early Israelite custom. It is fair to assume also that he had precedent for celebrating the autumn festival in the eighth instead of the seventh month.

2. Jeroboam II. was the grandson of Jehu. In his time Israel was able to assert its ancient vigour against its hereditary enemy Syria, and recover its lost territory. This was due to the attacks of the Assyrians upon the northern border of Damascus (2 K 14²⁸⁻²⁹). The temporary prosperity of Israel was accompanied by social and moral degeneracy, as is set forth distinctly by Amos and Hosea.

H. P. SMITH.

JEROHAM.—1. The father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel (1 S 1¹). 2. A Benjamite family name (1 Ch 8²⁷ 9⁸). 3. A priestly family (1 Ch 9¹², Neh 11¹²). 4. 'Sons of Jeroham' were amongst David's heroes (1 Ch 12⁷). 5. A Danite chief (1 Ch 27²²). 6. The father of Azariah, who helped Jehoiada in the overthrow of Athaliah (2 Ch 23¹).

JERUBBAAL.—A name given to Gideon (Jg 6³² 7¹ 8²⁹ 36 9¹, 2. 6. 16. 19. 24. 28. 57). It is = 'Baal strives,' Baal being a name for J^h, as in Ishbaal, Meribbaal; it cannot = 'one who strives with Baal,' as Jg 6³² would suggest. This name was altered to Jerubbesheth (besheth = 'shame') when Baal could no longer be used of J^h without offence (2 S 11²¹); cf. Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth.

JERUBBESHETH.—See JERUBBAAL.

JERUEL.—The part of the wilderness of Judæa that faces the W. shore of the Dead Sea below En-gedi. It was here that Jehoshaphat encountered a great host of the children of Moab, Ammon, and other trans-Jordanic tribes (2 Ch 20¹⁶).

JERUSALEM.—I. SITUATION.—Jerusalem is the chief town of Palestine, situated in 31° 46' 45" N. lat. and 35° 13' 25" E. long. It stands on the summit of the ridge of the Judæan mountains, at an elevation of 2500 feet above the sea-level. The elevated plateau on which the city is built is intersected by deep valleys, defining and subdividing it.

1. The defining valleys are: (1) the Wady en-Nâr, the Biblical Valley of the Kidron or of Jehoshaphat, which, starting some distance north of the city, runs at first (under the name of Wady el-Jôz) in a S.E. direction; it then turns southward and deepens rapidly, separating the Jerusalem plateau from the ridge of the Mount of Olives on the east; finally, it meanders through the wild mountains of the Judæan desert, and finds its exit on the W. side of the Dead Sea. (2) A deep cleft now known as the Wady er-Rabâbi, and popularly identified with the Valley of the son of Hinnom, which commences on the west side of the city and runs down to and joins the Wady en-Nâr about half a mile south of the wall of the present city. In the fork of the great irregular Y which these two valleys form, the city is built.

2. The chief intersecting valley is one identified with the Tyropæon of Josephus, which commences in some olive gardens north of the city (between the forks of the Y), runs, ever deepening, right through the modern city, and finally enters the Wady en-Nâr, about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile above the mouth of the Wady er-Rabâbi. There is also a smaller depression running axially across the city from West to East, intersecting the Tyropæon at right angles. These intersecting valleys are now almost completely filled up with the accumulated rubbish of about four thousand years, and betray themselves only by slight depressions in the surface of the ground.

3. By these valleys the site of Jerusalem is divided into four quarters, each on its own hill. These hills are traditionally named Acra, Bezetha, Zion, and Ophel, in the N.W., N.E., S.W., and S.E. respectively; and Ophel is further subdivided (but without any natural line of division) into Ophel proper and Moriah, the latter being the northern and higher end. But it must be noticed carefully at the outset that around these names the fiercest discussions have raged, many of which are as yet not within sight of settlement.

4. The site of Jerusalem is not well provided with water. The only natural source is an intermittent spring in the Kidron Valley, which is insufficient to supply the city's needs. Cisterns have been excavated for rain-storage from the earliest times, and water has been led to the city by conduits from external sources, some of them far distant. Probably the oldest known conduit is a channel hewn in the rock, entering Jerusalem from the north. Another (the 'low-level aqueduct') is traditionally ascribed to Solomon: it brings water from reservoirs beyond Bethlehem; and a third (the 'high-level aqueduct') is of Roman date. Several conduits are mentioned in the OT: the 'conduit of the upper pool, in the highway of the fuller's field' (Is 7²), which has not been identified; the conduit whereby Hezekiah 'brought the waters of Gihon straight down on the west side of the city of David,' also referred to as the 'conduit' whereby he 'brought water into the city' (2 K 20³⁰, 2 Ch 32³⁰), is probably to be identified with the Siloam tunnel, famous for its (unfortunately undated) Old Hebrew inscription.

II. HISTORY.—1. Primitive period.—The origin of the city of Jerusalem is lost in obscurity, and probably, owing to the difficulties in the way of excavation, must continue to be matter of speculation. The first reference that may possibly be connected with the city is the incident of the mysterious 'Melchizedek, king of Salem' (Gn 14¹⁸), who has been the centre of much futile speculation, due to a large extent to misunderstanding of the symbolic use of his name by the authors of Ps 110 (v. 4) and Hebrews (chs. 5-7). It is not even certain that the 'Salem' over which this contemporary of Hammurabi ruled is to be identified with Jerusalem (see SALEM); there is no other ancient authority for this name being applied to the city. We do not touch solid ground till some eight or nine hundred years later, when, about 1450, we find 'Abd-khiba, king of Urusalim, sending letters to his Egyptian over-lord, which were discovered with the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. The contents of these letters are the usual meagre record of mutual squabbles between the different village communities of Palestine, and to some extent they raise questions rather than answer them. Some theories that have been based on expressions used by 'Abd-khiba, and supposed to illuminate the Melchizedek problem, are now regarded as of no value for that desirable end. The chief importance of the Tell el-Amarna correspondence, so far as Jerusalem is concerned, is the demonstration of the true antiquity of the name 'Jerusalem.'

Where was the Jerusalem of 'Abd-khiba situated? This question, which is bound up with the authenticity or otherwise of the traditional Zion, and affects such important topographical and archaeological questions as the site of David's tomb, is one of the most hotly contested of all the many problems of the kind which have to be considered by students of Jerusalem. In an article like the present it is impossible to enter into the details of the controversy and to discuss at length the arguments on both sides. But the majority of modern scholars are now coming to an agreement that the pre-Davidic Jerusalem was situated on the hill known as Ophel, the south-eastern of the four hills above enumerated, in the space intercepted between the Tyropæon and Kidron valleys. This is the hill under which is the only natural source of water in the whole area of Jerusalem—the 'Virgin's Fountain,' an intermittent spring of brackish water in the Kidron Valley—and upon which is the principal accumulation of ancient débris, with ancient pottery fragments strewn over the surface. This hill was open for excavation till three or four years ago, though cumbered with vegetable gardens which would make digging expensive; but lately houses have commenced to be built on its surface. At the upper part of the hill, on this theory, we cannot doubt that the high place of the subjects of 'Abd-khiba would be situated; and the tradition of the sanctity of this section of the city has lasted unchanged through all the varying occupations of the city—Hebrew, Jewish, Byzantine, Arab, Crusader, and modern Mohammedan. Whether 'his be the 'land of Moriah' of Gn 22² is doubtful: it has been suggested that the name is here a copyist's error for 'land of Midian,' which would be a more natural place for Jahweh worship in the days of Abraham than would the high place of the guardian numen of Jerusalem.

In certain Biblical passages (Jos 18²⁸ [but see RV], Jg 19¹⁰, 1 Ch 11⁴) an alternative name, Jebus, is given for the city; and its inhabitants are named Jebusites, mentioned in many enumerations with the rest of the Amorites (Gn 10¹⁶, Ex 23²³, Jos 3¹⁰ etc.), and specially assigned to this city in Jg 1¹. Until the discovery of the Tell el-Amarna correspondence it was supposed that Jebus was the primitive name of the city, changed on the Israelite conquest to Jerusalem; but this has been rendered untenable, and it now seems probable that the name of Jebus is a mere derivative, of no authority, from the ethnic Jebusites, the meaning and etymology of which are still to seek. Cf. art. JEBUS.

At the Israelite immigration the king of Jerusalem was Adoni-zedek, who headed a coalition against Gibeon for having made terms with Joshua. This king is generally equated with the otherwise unknown Adoni-bezek, whose capture and mutilation are narrated in Jg 1³⁻⁷ (see Moore's Judges, ad loc.). The statement that Judah burnt Jerusalem (Jg 1⁸) is generally rejected as an interpolation; it remained a Jebusite city (Jg 1² 19¹¹) until its conquest by David. According to the cadastre of Joshua, it was theoretically still within the south border of the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 15⁸ 18¹⁶ 23).

2. David and Solomon.—The city remained foreign to the Israelites (Jg 19¹¹) until the end of the period of 7½ years which David reigned in Hebron, when he felt himself powerful enough to attack the Jebusite stronghold. The passage describing his capture of the city is 2 S 5⁴⁻¹⁰, and few passages in the historical books of the Old Testament are more obscure, owing partly to textual corruption and partly to topographical allusions clear to the writer, but veiled in darkness for us. It appears that the Jebusites, trusting in the strength of their gates, threw taunts to the Israelite king that 'the blind and the lame would be enough to keep him out'; and that David retorted by applying the term to the defenders of the city: 'Go up the drain,' he said to his followers, 'and smite those blind and lame ones.' He evidently recognized the impregnability of the defences themselves; but discovered and utilized a convenient drain, which led underground into the middle of the city. A similar drain was found in the excavation at Gezer, with a device in the middle to prevent its being used for this purpose. During the revolt of the fellahin against Ibrahim Pasha in 1834, Jerusalem, once more besieged, was entered through a drain in the same way. It need hardly be said that David's 'gutter' has not yet been identified with certainty.

If the identification of the Jebusite city with Ophel be admitted, we cannot fail to identify it also with the 'city of David,' in which he dwelt (2 S 5⁹). But when we read further that David 'built round about from Millo and inward' we are perplexed by our total ignorance as to what Millo may have been, and where it may have been situated. The word is by the LXX rendered Acra, and the same word is used by Josephus. The position of the Acra is a question as much disputed as the position of the Jebusite city, and it is one for which far less light can be obtained from an examination of the ground than in the case of the other problem mentioned. As soon as David had established himself in his new surroundings, his first care was to bring the ark of Jahweh into the city (2 S 6), but his desire to erect a permanent building for its reception was frustrated by Nathan the prophet (2 S 7). The site of the Temple was chosen, namely, the threshing-floor of Araunah (2 S 24¹⁶) or Ornan (1 Ch 21¹⁸), one of the original Jebusite inhabitants, and preparations were made for its erection.

As soon as Solomon had come to the throne and quelled the abortive attempts of rivals, he commenced the work of building the Temple in the second month of the fourth year of his reign, and finished it in the eighth month of his eleventh year (1 K 6). His royal palace occupied thirteen years (1 K 7¹). These erections were not in the 'city of David' (1 K 9²⁴), which occupied the lower slopes of Ophel to the south, but on the summit of the same hill, where their place is now taken by the Mohammedan 'Noble Sanctuary.' Besides these works, whereby Jerusalem received a glory it had never possessed before, Solomon built Millo, whatever that may have been (1 K 9²⁴), and the wall of Jerusalem (9¹⁵), and 'closed up the breach of the city of David' (11¹⁷),—the latter probably referring to an extension of the area of the city which involved the pulling down and rebuilding elsewhere of a section of the city walls.

3. The Kings of Judah.—In the fifth year of Rehoboam, Jerusalem sustained the first siege it had suffered after David's conquest, being beleaguered by Shishak, king of Egypt (1 K 14²⁵), who took away the treasures of the Temple and of the royal house. Rehoboam provided copper substitutes for the gold thus lost. The royal house was again pillaged by a coalition of Philistines and Arabs (2 Ch 21¹⁸) in the time of Jehoram. Shortly afterwards took place the stirring events of the usurpation of Athaliah and her subsequent execution (2 K 11). Her successor Joash or Jehoash distinguished himself by his repair of the Temple (2 K 12); but he was obliged to buy off Hazael, king of Syria, and persuaded him to abandon his projected attack on the capital by a gift of the gold of the Temple (2 K 12¹⁸). Soon afterwards, however, Jehoash of Israel came down upon Jerusalem, breached the wall, and looted the royal and sacred treasures (2 K 14¹⁴). This event taught the lesson of the weakness of the city, by which the powerful king Uzziah profited. In 2 Ch 26⁹⁻¹⁰ is the record of his fortifying the city with additional towers and ballistas; the work of strengthening the fortifications was continued by Jotham (2 K 15²⁵, 2 Ch 27³). Thanks probably to these precautions, an attack on Jerusalem by the kings of Syria and of Israel, in the next reign (Ahaz's), proved abortive (2 K 16⁴). Hezekiah still further prepared Jerusalem for the struggle which he foresaw from the advancing power of Assyria, and to him, as is generally believed, is due the engineering work now famous as the Siloam Tunnel, whereby water was conducted from the spring in the Kidron Valley outside the walls to the reservoir at the bottom of the Tyropoeon inside them. By another gift from the apparently inexhaustible royal and sacred treasures, Hezekiah endeavoured to keep Sennacherib from an attack on the capital (2 K 18¹³); but the attack, threatened by insulting words from the emissaries of Sennacherib, was finally averted by a mysterious calamity that befell the Assyrian army (2 K 19³⁵). By alliances with Egypt (Is 36⁶) and Babylon (ch. 39) Hezekiah attempted to strengthen his position. Manasseh built an outer wall to the 'city of David,' and made other fortifications (2 Ch 33¹⁴). In the reign of Josiah the Book of the Law was discovered, and the king devoted himself to the repairs of the Temple and the moral reformation which that discovery involved (2 K 22). The death of Josiah at Megiddo was disastrous for the kingdom of Judah, and he was succeeded by a series of petty kinglings, all of them puppets in the hands of the Egyptian or Babylonian monarchs. The fall of Jerusalem could not be long delayed. Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon captured and looted it, and carried away captive first Jehoiachin (2 K 24¹²), and finally Zedekiah, the last king of Judah (ch. 25).

The aspect and area of the Jerusalem captured by Nebuchadnezzar must have been very different from that conquered about 420 years before by David. There is no direct evidence that David found houses at all on the hill now known as Zion; but the city must rapidly have grown under him and his wealthy successor; and in the time of the later Hebrew kings included no doubt the so-called Zion hill as well. That it also included the modern Acra is problematical, as we have no information as to the position of the north wall in pre-exilic times; and it is certain that the quite modern quarter commonly called Bezetha was not occupied. To the south a much larger area was built on than is included in modern Jerusalem: the ancient wall has been traced to the verge of the Wady er-Rababi. The destruction by Nebuchadnezzar and the deportation of the people were complete: the city was left in ruins, and only the poorest of the people were left to carry on the work of agriculture.

4. The Return.—When the last Semitic king of Babylon, Nabonidus, yielded to Cyrus, the representatives of the ancient kingdom of Judah were, through the favour of Cyrus, permitted to re-establish themselves in their old home and to rebuild the Temple. The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are the record of the works then undertaken, the former being specially concerned with the restoration of the Temple and the religious observances, the latter with the reconstruction of the fortifications of the city.

The Book of Nehemiah contains the fullest account that we have of the fortifications of Jerusalem, and it has been the most carefully studied of any source of information on the subject. A paper by Prof. H. G. Mitchell on the 'Wall of Jerusalem according to Nehemiah' (in the JBL for 1903, p. 85) is a model of exhaustive treatment. Careful comparison is made therein between the statements of Nehemiah and the results of excavation. We cannot here go into all the arguments brought forward for the identifications, but they seem conclusive. Starting at the head of the Wady er-Rababi (Valley of Hinnom so-called), we find at the S.W. corner of the wall a rock-scarp which seems to have been prepared for a strong tower, identified with the tower of the furnaces (Neh 3¹¹). Then comes the Valley-gate, which has been found half-way down the valley (Neh 3¹³). At the bottom of the valley, where it joined the Kidron, was the Dung-gate (Neh 3¹³), outside of which was found what appears to have been a cess-pit. Turning northward, we find the Fountain-gate (Neh 3¹⁵) in close proximity to the 'made pool,' i.e. the pool of Siloam at the foot of the Tyropoeon Valley; and the Water-gate on Ophel, over the 'Virgin's Fountain.' The gates on the north-east and north sides of the wall cannot be identified, as the course of that part has not been definitely determined. They seem to have been, in order, the Horse-gate, the East-gate, the gate Ham-miphkad ('the appointed?'), after which came the corner of the wall. Then on the north side followed the Sheep-gate, the Fish-gate, and, somewhere on the north or north-west side, the Old-gate. Probably the Ephraim- and Corner-gates (2 K 14¹³) were somewhere in this neighbourhood. Besides these gates, the Temple was provided with entrances, some of whose names are preserved; but their identification is an even more complex problem than that of the city-gates. Such were the gate Sur and the Gate of the guard (2 K 11¹⁶), the Shallecheth-gate at the west (1 Ch 26¹⁶), Farbar (26¹⁸), and the East-gate (Ezk 11¹). The Beautiful-gate, of Ac 3¹⁰ was probably the same as the Nicanor-gate, between the Women's and the Priests' Court: it is alluded to in the epitaph of the donor, Nicanor, recently discovered at Jerusalem.

5. From Alexander the Great to the Maccabees.—By the battle of Issus (B.C. 333) Alexander the Great became master of Palestine; and the Persian suzerainty, under which the Jews had enjoyed protection and freedom to follow their own rites, came to an end. Alexander's death was the signal for the long and complicated struggle between the Seleucids and the Ptolemys, between whom Jerusalem passed more than once. One result of the foreign influences thus brought to bear on the city was the establishment of institutions hitherto unknown, such as a gymnasium. This leaven of Greek customs, and, we cannot doubt, of Greek religion also, was disquieting to those concerned for the maintenance of Deuteronomic purity, and the unrest was fanned into revolt in 168, when Antiochus Epiphanes set himself to destroy the Jewish religion. The desecration of the Temple, and the attempt to force the Jews to sacrifice to pagan deities (1 Mac 1. 2), led to the rebellion headed by the Maccabæan family, wherein, after many vicissitudes, the short-lived Hasmonæan dynasty was established at Jerusalem. Internal dissensions wrecked the family. To settle a squabble as to the successor of Alexander Jannæus, the Roman power was called in. Pompey besieged Jerusalem, and profaned the Temple, which was later pillaged by Crassus; and in B.C. 47 the Hasmonæans were superseded by the Idumæan dynasty of the Herods, their founder Antipater being established as ruler of Palestine in recognition of his services to Julius Cæsar.

6. Herod the Great.—Herod the Great and his brother Phasael succeeded their father in B.C. 43, and in 40 Herod became governor of Judæa. After a brief exile, owing to the usurpation of the Hasmonæan Antigonus, he returned, and commenced to rebuild Jerusalem on a scale of grandeur such as had never been known since Solomon. Among his works, which we can only catalogue here, were the royal palace; the three towers—Hippicus, Phasaelus (named after his brother), and Antonia; a theatre; and, above all, the Temple. Of these structures nothing remains, so far as is known, of the palace or the theatre, or the Hippicus tower; the base of Phasaelus, commonly called David's tower, is incorporated with the citadel; large fragments of the tower Antonia remain incorporated in the barracks and other buildings of the so-called Via Dolorosa, the street which leads through the city from the St. Stephen's gate, north of the Temple enclosure; while of the Temple itself much remains in the substructures, and probably much more would be found were excavation possible. See TEMPLE.

7. From the time of Christ to the destruction of Jerusalem.—The events in the life of Christ, in so far as they affect Jerusalem, are the only details of interest known to us for the years succeeding the death of Herod in B.C. 4. These we need not dwell upon here, but a word may fitly be spoken regarding the central problem of Jerusalem topography, the site of the Holy Sepulchre. The authenticity of the traditional site falls at once, if it lie inside the north wall of Jerusalem as it was in Christ's time, for Christ suffered and was buried without the walls. But this is precisely what cannot be determined, as the line of the wall, wherever it may have been, is densely covered with houses; and it is very doubtful whether such fragments of wall as have from time to time been found in digging foundations have anything to do with each other, or with the city rampart. A priori it does not seem probable that the traditional site of the Holy Sepulchre should have been without the walls, for it assumes that these made a deep re-entrant angle for which the nature of the ground offers no justification, and which would be singularly foolish strategically. The identification of the site cannot with certainty be traced back earlier than Helena; and, though she visited Jerusalem as early as 326, yet it must not be forgotten that in endeavouring then to find the tomb of Christ, without documents to guide her, she was in as hopeless a position as a man who under similar circumstances should at the present year endeavour to find the tomb of Shakespeare, if that happened to be unknown. Indeed, Helena was even worse off than the hypothetical investigator, for the population, and presumably the tradition, have been continuous in Stratford-on-Avon, which certainly was not the case with Jerusalem from A.D. 30 to 326. A fortiori these remarks apply to the rival sites that in more recent years have been suggested. The so-called 'Gordon's Calvary' and similar fantastic identifications we can dismiss at once with the remark that the arguments in their favour are fatuous; that powerful arguments can be adduced against them; that they cannot even claim the minor distinction of having been hallowed by the devotion of sixteen centuries; and that, in short, they are entirely unworthy of the smallest consideration. The only documents nearly contemporary with the crucifixion and entombment are the Gospels, which supply no data sufficient for the identification of the scenes of these events. Except in the highly improbable event of an inscription being at some time found which shall identify them, we may rest in the certainty that the exact sites never have been, and never will be, identified.

In A.D. 35, Pontius Pilate was recalled; Agrippa (41–44 A.D.) built an outer wall, the line of which is not known with certainty, on the north side of the city, and under his rule Jerusalem grew and prospered. His son Agrippa built a palace, and in A.D. 64 finished the Temple courts. In 66 the Jews endeavoured to revolt against the Roman yoke, and brought on themselves the final destruction which was involved in the great siege and fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

8. From the destruction of Jerusalem to the Arab conquest.—The events following must be more briefly enumerated. In 134 the rebellion of the Jews under Bar Cochba was crushed by Hadrian, and the last traces of Judaism extinguished from the city, which was rebuilt as a pagan Roman town under the name of Ælia Capitolina. By 333 the Jews had acquired the right of visiting annually and lamenting over the pierced stone on which their altar had been erected. Under Constantine, Christianity was established, and the great flood of pilgrimage began. Julian in 362 attempted to rebuild the Temple; some natural phenomenon—ingeniously explained as the explosion of a forgotten store of naphtha, such as was found some years ago in another part of the city—prevented him. In 450 the Empress Eudocia retired to Jerusalem and repaired the walls; she built a church over the Pool of Siloam, which was discovered by excavation some years ago. In 532 Justinian erected important buildings, fragments of which remain incorporated with the mosque; but these and other Christian buildings were ruined in 614 by the destroying king Chosroës II. A short breathing space was allowed the Christians after this storm, and then the young strength of Islam swept over them. In 637 Omar conquered Jerusalem after a four months' siege.

9. From the Arab conquest to the present day.—Under the comparatively easy rule of the Omeyyad Califs, Christians did not suffer severely; though excluded from the Temple area (where 'Abd el-Melek built his beautiful dome in 688), they were free to use the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre. This, however, could not last under the fanatical Fatimites, or the Seljuks who succeeded them; and the sufferings of the Christians led to that extraordinary series of piratical invasions, commonly called the Crusades, by which Palestine was harried for about a hundred years, and the undying tradition of which will retard indefinitely the final triumph of Christianity over the Arab race. The country was happily rid of the degraded and degrading Latin kingdom in 1187, when Jerusalem fell to Saladin. For a brief interval, from 1229 to 1244, the German Christians held the city by treaty; but in 1244 the Kharezmian massacre swallowed up the last relics of Christian occupation. In 1517 it was conquered by Sultan Selim I., and since then it has been a Turkish city. The present walls were erected by Suleiman the Magnificent (1542). In recent years the population has enormously increased, owing to the establishment of Jewish refugee colonies and various communities of European settlers; there has also been an extraordinary development of monastic life within and around the city. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JERUSHA (2 K 15³³—JERUSAH 2 Ch 27¹).—Mother of Jotham king of Judah.

JESAIAS.—See JESHAIAH, 4.

JESHAIAH.—1. A grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²¹). 2. One of the sons of Jedaiah (1 Ch 25^{3, 12}). 3. A Levite (1 Ch 26²⁰). 4. The chief of the Benê-Elam who returned (Ezr 8⁷ [1 Es 8³³ Jesaias]). 5. Chief of the Merarites (Ezr 8¹⁹ [1 Es 8³⁴ Osaias]). 6. A Benjamite (Neh 11⁷).

JESHANAH.—A town taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (2 Ch 13¹⁹). It is the modern 'Ain Sina, about 3½ miles north of Bethel.

JESHARELAH.—See ASHARELAH.

JESHEBEAB.—A Levite, the head of the fourteenth course (1 Ch 24¹³).

JESHER.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2¹⁸).

JESHIMON.—This word, derived from a Heb. root meaning 'to be waste or desolate,' is used either as a common noun (= 'desert,' 'wilderness') or (with the art., 'the Jeshimon') as a proper name (Nu 21²⁰ 23²⁸, 1 S 23^{19, 24} 26^{1, 3}). In the latter usage the reference is either to the waste country in the Jordan valley N. of the Dead Sea and east of the river (so apparently in Numbers), or to the eastern part of the hill-country of Judah on the western shore of the Dead Sea (so 1 Sam.).

JESHISHAI.—A Gadite family (1 Ch 5¹⁴).

JESHUA (another form of Joshua).—1. Joshua the son of Nun (Neh 8¹⁷). 2. The head of the ninth course of priests (1 Ch 24¹¹). 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31¹⁵). 4. A man of the house of Pahath-moab whose descendants returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁶, Neh 7¹¹ [1 Es 5¹¹ Jesus]); perhaps identical with No. 2 above. 5. A Levitical house or its successive heads in the times of Zerub., Ezra, and Nehemiah; mentioned in connexion with the building of the Temple (Ezr 3⁹), the explanation of the Law (Neh 8⁷, cf. 9¹¹), and the sealing of the covenant (10⁹). Cf. also Ezr 2⁴⁰ [1 Es 5³⁶ Jesus] 8³³ [1 Es 8³³ Jesus], Neh 7⁴³ 12²⁴. 6. The high priest who along with Zerub. headed the first band of exiles. In Ezr. and Neh. he is called Jeshua, in Hag. and Zec. Joshua. He took a leading part in the erection of the altar of burnt-offering and the laying of the foundations of the Temple (Ezr 3²²). In Hag. and Zec. he is frequently coupled with Zerub., after these prophets had begun to stimulate the people to undertake building operations in earnest (Hag 1^{12, 14}, Zec 3¹⁰, 6^{10, 11}). He is eulogized in Sir 49¹² [Jesus]. 7. A priestly family, Ezr 2³⁶ = Neh 7³⁰ = 1 Es 5³⁴ [Jesus]. 8. A town in the south of Judah (Neh 11³⁰). The site is possibly at the ruin Sa'wi west of Tell 'Arad and south of 'Atfir.

JESHURUN.—A poetic or a pet-name for Israel which occurs four times in the OT (Dt 32¹⁸ 33^{26, 29}, Is 44⁷). It is found in the later writings, and represents a patriotic feeling that Israel was = yashar-El, 'the upright of God.' If this be so, then we may accept the rendering of Jeshurun as the 'righteous little people.' In Balaam's elegy, 'Let me die the death of the righteous' seems to refer to the Israel of the preceding clause, and in Ps 83¹ the thought which underlies Jeshurun appears, if we adopt the tempting reading. 'Truly God is good to the upright.' W. F. COBB.

JESUS CHRIST

JESIAS (1 Es 8³²)—Ezr 8⁷ Jeshaiah.

JESIMIEL.—The eponym of a Simeonite family (1 Ch 4³⁶).

JESSE (more correctly Jishai, cf., as regards formation, Ithai; perhaps an abbreviated form; the meaning of the name is quite uncertain).—A Bethlehemite, best known as the father of David. The earliest historical mention of him (1 S 17¹²; see DAVID, § 1) represents him as already an old man. On this occasion he sends David to the Israelite camp with provisions for his brothers; this was destined to be a long separation between Jesse and his son, for after David's victory over the Philistine giant he entered definitely into Saul's service. There are two other accounts, each of which purports to mention Jesse for the first time: 1 S 16¹⁸, in which Samuel is sent to Bethlehem to anoint David; and 1 S 16¹⁸, in which Jesse's son is sent for to play the harp before Saul. Nothing further is heard of Jesse until we read of him and his 'house' coming to David in the 'cave' of Adullam; David then brings his father and mother to Mizpeh of Moab, and entrusts them to the care of the king of Moab (1 S 22^{3, 4}). This is the last we hear of him. In Is 11¹ the 'stock of Jesse' is mentioned as that from which the Messiah is to issue; the thought probably being that of the humble descent of the Messiah contrasted with His glorious Kingdom which is to be.

JESUS, the Gr. form of the name Joshua or Jeshua, is employed as a designation of—1. Joshua the son of Nun (AV of 1 Mac 2²⁸, 2 Es 7⁷, Sir 46¹, Ac 7⁴, He 4⁸, in all of which passages RV has Joshua). 2. 1 Es 5¹¹ = Jeshua of Ezr 2⁶ and Neh 7¹¹. 3. 1 Es 5³⁴ = Jeshua of Ezr 2³⁶ and Neh 7³⁰. 4. Jeshua (Joshua), the high priest (1 Es 5^{36, 38, 48, 50, 53, 70} 6² 9¹², Sir 49¹²). 5. A Levite (1 Es 5^{36, 58} 8³³ 9³⁴) who in Ezr 2⁴⁰ 3⁹ is called Jeshua. 6. An ancestor of our Lord (Lk 3³⁹ RV, where AV has Jose). 7. Jesus, son of Sirach. 8. Jesus called Justus, a Jewish Christian residing in Rome, saluted by St. Paul in Col 4¹¹. 9. See next article.

JESUS CHRIST.—There is no historical task which is more important than to set forth the life and teaching of Jesus Christ, and none to which it is so difficult to do justice. The importance of the theme is sufficiently attested by the fact that it is felt to be His due to reckon a new era from the date of His birth. From the point of view of Christian faith there is nothing in time worthy to be set beside the deeds and the words of One who is adored as God manifest in the flesh, and the Saviour of the world. In the perspective of universal history, His influence ranks with Greek culture and Roman law as one of the three most valuable elements in the heritage from the ancient world, while it surpasses these other factors in the spiritual quality of its effects. On the other hand, the superlative task has its peculiar difficulties. It is quite certain that a modern European makes many mistakes when trying to reproduce the conditions of the distant province of Oriental antiquity in which Jesus lived. The literary documents, moreover, are of no great compass, and are reticent or obscure in regard to many matters which are of capital interest to the modern biographer. And when erudition has done its best with the primary and auxiliary sources, the historian has still to put the heart-searching question whether he possesses the qualifications that would enable him to understand the character, the experience, and the purpose of Jesus. 'He who would worthily write the Life of Jesus Christ must have a pen dipped in the imaginative sympathy of a poet, in the prophet's fire, in the artist's charm and grace, and in the reverence and purity of the saint' (Stewart, The Life of Christ, 1906, p. vi.).

1. The Literary Sources.—(A) CANONICAL: (1) The Gospels and their purpose.—It is now generally agreed that the Gospel according to Mk. is the oldest of the four. Beginning with the Baptism of Jesus, it gives a sketch of His Public Ministry, with specimens of His teaching, and carries the narrative to the morning of the Resurrection. The original conclusion has been lost, but there can be no doubt that it went on to relate at least certain Galilean appearances of the risen Lord. This Gospel supplies most of our knowledge of the life of Jesus, but its main concern is to bring out the inner meaning and the religious value of the story. It is, in short, a history written with the purpose of demonstrating that Jesus was the expected Messiah. In proof of this it is sufficient to point out that it describes itself at the outset as setting forth the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God (Mk 1¹), that the faith of the disciples culminates in Peter's confession that He is the Christ (8²⁹), that the ground of His condemnation is that He claims to be 'the Christ, the Son of the Blessed' (14⁶¹⁻⁶²), and that the accusation written over His cross is 'The King of the Jews' (15²⁶).

The Gospel according to Mt. is now usually regarded as a second and enlarged edition of an Apostolic original. The earlier version, known as the Logia on the ground of a note of Papias (Euseb. HE iii. 39), was a collection of the Memorabilia of Jesus. As the Logia consisted mainly of the sayings of our Lord, the later editor combined it with the narrative of Mk. in order to supply a more complete picture of the Ministry, and at the same time added fresh material from independent sources. Its didactic purpose, like that of Mk., is to exhibit Jesus as the Messiah, and it supports the argument by citing numerous instances of the fulfilment in the life of Jesus of OT prediction. It is sometimes described as the Gospel of the Jewish Christians; and it appears to have addressed itself specially to the difficulties which they felt in view of the destruction of Jerusalem. Could Jesus, they may well have asked, be the Messiah, seeing that His mission had issued, not in the deliverance of Israel, but in its ruin? In answer to this the Gospel makes it plain that the overthrow of the Jewish State was a punishment which was foreseen by Jesus, and also that He had become the head of a vaster and more glorious kingdom than that of which, as Jewish patriots, they had ever dreamed (28¹⁸⁻²⁰).

The Gospel according to Luke is also dependent on Mk. for the general framework, and derives from the original Mt. a large body of the teaching. It follows a different authority from Mt. for the Nativity, and to some extent goes its own way in the history of the Passion; while 'the great interpolation' (9⁶¹–18¹⁴), made in part from its special source, forms a priceless addition to the Synoptic material. Lk. approached his task in a more consciously scientific spirit than his predecessors, and recognized an obligation to supply dates, and to sketch in the political background of the biography (23³¹⁻³²). But for him also the main business of the historian was to emphasize the religious significance of the events, and that by exhibiting Jesus as the Saviour of the world, the Friend of sinners. He is specially interested, as the companion and disciple of St. Paul, in incidents and sayings which illustrate the graciousness and the universality of the gospel. Prominence is given to the rejection of Jesus by Nazareth and Jerusalem (4¹⁸⁻³⁰ 19⁴¹⁻⁴⁴), and to His discovery among the Gentiles of the faith for which He sought (17¹⁸⁻¹⁹). It is also characteristic that Lk. gives a full account of the beginnings of the missionary activity of the Church (10¹⁻²⁰).

The author of the Fourth Gospel makes considerable use of the narratives of the Synoptists, but also suggests that their account is in important respects defective, and in certain particulars erroneous. The serious defect, from the Johannine point of view, is that they represent Galilee as the exclusive scene of the Ministry until shortly before the end, and that they know nothing of a series of visits, extending over two years, which Jesus made to Jerusalem and Judæa in fulfilment of His mission. That there was a design to correct as well as to supplement appears from the displacement of the Cleansing of the Temple from the close to the beginning of the Ministry, and from the emphatic way in which attention is drawn to the accurate information as to the day and the hour of the Crucifixion. And still more designedly than in the earlier Gospels is the history used as the vehicle for the disclosure of the secret and the glory of the Person of Jesus. The predicate of the Messiah is reaffirmed, and as the Saviour He appears in the most sublime and tender characters, but the Prologue furnishes the key to the interpretation of His Person in a title which imports the highest conceivable dignity of origin, being, and prerogative: 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. And the Word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, glory as of the only-begotten from the Father), full of grace and truth' (1¹⁻¹⁴).

Trustworthiness of the Gospels.—It is impossible to proceed on the view that we possess four biographies of Jesus which, being given by inspiration, are absolutely immune from error. The means by which they were brought into shape was very different from the method of Divine dictation. The Evangelists were severely limited to the historical data which reached them by ordinary channels. They copied, abridged, and amplified earlier documents, and one document which was freely handled in this fashion by Mt. and Lk. was canonical Mk. That mistakes have been made as to matters of fact is proved by the occurrence of conflicting accounts of the same events, and by the uncertainty as to the order of events which is often palpable in Mt. and Mk., and which to some extent baffled Lk. in his attempt 'to trace the course of all things accurately.' There is also considerable diversity in the report of many of our Lord's sayings, which compels us to conclude that the report is more or less inaccurate. Whether giving effect to their own convictions, or reproducing changes which had been made by the mind of the Church on the oral tradition, writers coloured and altered to some extent the sayings of our Lord. At the same time the Synoptics, when tested by ordinary canons, must be pronounced to be excellent authorities. They may be dated within a period of forty to fifty years after the death of Christ—Mk. about A.D. 69, Mt. and (probably) Lk. not later than A.D. 80. The great mass of the Synoptic Gospels had assumed its permanent shape not later than the decade A.D. 60–70, and the changes which it underwent after the great catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem were but small, and can without difficulty be recognized (Sanday, Outlines). Further, that Gospels composed in the second generation can be trusted to have reproduced the original testimony with general accuracy may be held on two grounds. There is every reason to believe the ecclesiastical traditions that the contents of original Mt. were compiled by one of the Twelve, and that the reminiscences of Peter formed the staple of Mk. (Euseb. HE iii. 39). It is also certain that the Synoptic material was used throughout the intervening period in the Christian meetings for worship, and the memory of witnesses must thus have been in a position to ensure the continuity of the report, and to check any serious deviations from the oldest testimony. The general trustworthiness is further supported by the consideration of the originality of the Synoptic picture of Jesus and His teaching. The character of Jesus, and the acts in which it is revealed, form a whole which has the unmistakable stamp of historical reality, and forbids us to think that to any great extent it can have been the product of the collective Christian mind. Jesus, in short, is needed to explain the Church and cannot be Himself explained as the product of His own creation. It is also to be noticed that the Synoptic teaching has a clear-cut individuality of its own which shows that it has sturdily refused to blend with the Apostolic type of theology.

With the Fourth Gospel the case stands somewhat differently. If it be indeed the work of John the beloved disciple, its authority stands higher than all the rest. In that case the duty of the historian is to employ it as his fundamental document, and to utilize the Synoptics as auxiliary sources. In the view of the present writer the question is one of great difficulty. It is true that there is a powerful body of Patristic testimony in support of the tradition that the Fourth Gospel was composed by the Apostle John in Ephesus

In his old age—about A.D. 95. It is also true that the Gospel solemnly stakes its credit on its right to be accepted as the narrative of an eye-witness (Jn 19³⁵ 21²⁴). And its claim is strengthened by the fact that, in the judgment even of many unsympathetic witnesses, it embodies a larger or smaller amount of independent and valuable information. On the other hand, it is a serious matter that a Gospel, appearing at the close of the century, should practically recast the story of Jesus which had circulated in the Church for sixty years, and should put forward a view of the course of the Ministry which is not even suspected in the other Apostolic sources. Passing to the teaching, we find that the process which was indiscoverable in the Synoptic report has here actually taken place, and that the discourses of Jesus are assimilated to a well-marked type of Apostolic doctrine. There is reason to believe that for both history and doctrine the author had at his disposal Memorabilia of Jesus, but in both cases also it would seem that he has handled his data with great freedom. The treatment of the historical matter, it may be permitted to think, is more largely topical, and the chronological framework which it provides is less reliable, than is commonly supposed. The discourses, again, have been expanded by the reporter, and cast in the moulds of his own thought, so that in them we really possess a combination of the words of Jesus of Nazareth with those of the glorified Christ speaking in the experience of a disciple. The hypothesis which seems to do justice to both sets of phenomena is that John was only the author in a similar sense to that in which Peter was the author of Mk., and Matthew of canonical Mt., and that the actual composer of the Fourth Gospel was a disciple of the second generation who was served heir to the knowledge and faith of the Apostle, and who claimed considerable powers as an executor. In view of these considerations, it is held that a sketch of the life of Jesus is properly based on the Synoptic record, and that in utilizing the Johannine additions it is desirable to take up a critical attitude in regard to the form and the chronology. There is also much to be said for expounding the teaching of Jesus on the basis of the Synoptics, and for treating the Johannine discourses as primarily a source for Apostolic doctrine. It is a different question whether the interpretation of Christ which the Fourth Gospel supplies is trustworthy, and on the value of this, its main message, two remarks may be made. It is, in the first place, substantially the same valuation of Christ which pervades the Pauline Epistles, and which has been endorsed by the saintly experience of the Christian centuries as answering to the knowledge of Christ that is given in intimate communion with the risen Lord. Moreover, the doctrine of Providence comes to the succour of a faith which may be distressed by the breakdown of the hypothesis of inerrancy. For it is a reasonable belief that God, in whose plan with the race the work of Christ was to be a decisive factor, took order that there should be given to the after world a record which should sufficiently instruct men in reply to the question, 'What think ye of Christ?'

(2) The Epistles.—From the Epistles it is possible to collect the outstanding facts as to the earthly condition, the death, and the resurrection of Christ. Incidentally St. Paul shows that he could cite His teaching on a point of ethics (1 Co 7¹¹), and give a detailed account of the institution of the Lord's Supper (11^{23f}). It is also significant that in allusions to the Temptation (He 4¹⁵), the Agony (5⁷), and the Transfiguration (2 P 1¹⁷), the writers can reckon on a ready understanding.

(B) EXTRA-CANONICAL SOURCES: (1) Christian; (a) Patristic references.—The Fathers make very trifling additions to our knowledge of the facts of the life of Jesus. There is nothing more important than the statement of Justin, that as a carpenter Jesus made ploughs and yokes (Dial. 88). More valuable are the additions to the canonical sayings of Jesus (Westcott, Intro. to the Gospels, 1895; Resch, Agrapha, 1907). Of the 70 Logia which have been claimed, Ropes pronounces 43 worthless, 13 of possible value, and 14 valuable (Die Sprüche Jesu, 1896). The following are deemed by Hück to be noteworthy (Synopse der drei ersten Evangelien, 1906):—

(1) 'Ask great things, and the small shall be added to you; and ask heavenly things, and the earthly shall be added to you' (Origen, de Orat. 8, 2).

(2) 'If ye exalt not your low things, and transfer to your right hand the things on your left, ye shall not enter into my kingdom' (Acta Philippi, ch. 34).

(3) 'He who is near me is near the fire, he who is far from me is far from the kingdom' (Origen, Hom. in Jer. xx. 3).

(4) 'If ye kept not that which is small, who will give you that which is great?' (Clem. Rom. ii. 8).

(5) 'Be thou saved and thy soul' (Ecc. e. Theod. ap. Clem. Alex. § 2).

(6) 'Show yourselves tried bankers' (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 28).

(7) 'Thou hast seen thy brother, thou hast seen God' (ib. i. 19).

More recent additions to the material are to be found in Grenfell and Hunt, Sayings of our Lord (1897) and New Sayings of Jesus (1904).

(b) Apocryphal Gospels.—These fall into three groups according as they deal with the history of Joseph and Mary (Protogospelium of James), the Infancy (Gospel of Thomas), and Pilate (Acts of Pilate). They are worthless elaborations, with the addition of grotesque and sometimes beautiful fancies ('Apocryphal Gospels, Acts and Revelations,' vol. xvi. of the Ante-Nicene Library, 1870). Of more value are the fragments of the Gospels of the Hebrews, the Egyptians, and Peter (Hilgenfeld, NT extra canonem receptum, 1876-84; Swete, The Akhmim Fragment of the Gospel of Peter, 1903).

(2) Jewish sources.—Josephus mentions Jesus (Ant. xx. ix. 1), but the most famous passage (xviii. lii. 3) is mainly, if not entirely, a Christian interpolation. The Jews remembered Him as charged with deceiving the people, practising magic and speaking blasphemy, and as having been crucified; but the calumnies of the Talmud as to the circumstances of His birth appear to have been comparatively late inventions (Huldricus, Sepher Toledot Jeschua, 1705; Laible, Jesus Christus im Talmud, 1900).

(3) Classical sources.—There is evidence in the classical writers for the historical existence, approximate date, and death of Jesus, but otherwise their attitude was ignorant and contemptuous (Tac. Ann. xv. 44; Suetonius, Lives of Claudius and Nero; the younger Pliny, Epp. x. 97, 98; Lucian, de Morte Peregrini; Celsus in Origen; cf. Keim, Jesus of Nazara [Eng. tr.], 1876, l. pp. 24-33).

2. Presuppositions.—It is impossible to write about Christ without giving effect to a philosophical and religious creed. The claim to be free from presuppositions commonly means that a writer assumes that the facts can be accommodated to a purely naturalistic view of history. As a fact, there is less reason to construe Christ in naturalistic terms than to revise a naturalistic philosophy in the light of 'the fact of Christ.' A recent review of the whole literature of the subject (Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede, 1906) shows how profoundly the treatment has always been influenced by a writer's attitude towards ultimate questions, and how far the purely historical evidence is from being able to compel a consensus sapientium. There are, in fact, as many types of the Life of Christ as there are points of view in theology, and it may be convenient at this stage to indicate the basis from which the work has been done in the principal monographs.

TYPES OF THE LIFE OF CHRIST.—

1. Elimination of the supernatural, from the standpoint of (1) Eighteenth Century Deism—Paulus, Das Leben Jesu, 1828; (2) Modern Pantheism—D. F. Strauss, Leben Jesu, 1835-36 (Eng. tr. 1846); (3) Philosophical Scepticism—Renan, La Vie de Jésus, 1863 (Eng. tr. 1864).

11. Reduction of the supernatural, with eclectic reservation, from the standpoint of Theism—Seelye, Eccle Homo, 1866; Hase, Die Gesch. Jesu, 1876; Keim, Die Gesch. Jesu von Nazara, 1867-72 (Eng. tr. 1873-77); O. Holtzmann, Das Leben Jesu, 1901 (Eng. tr. 1904).

Within the rationalistic school there have emerged somewhat radical differences in the conception formed of Jesus and His message. One group conceives of Him as a man who is essentially modern because the value of His ideas and of His message is perennial (Harnack, Das Wesen des Christentums, Eng. tr. 1901); another regards Him as, above all, the spokesman of unfulfilled apocalyptic dreams (J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, 1892). Bousset mediates between the two views (Jesus, 1906).

III. Reproduction of the Biblical account in general agreement with the faith of the Church.—Nearider, Das Leben Jesu Christi, 1837 (Eng. tr. 1848); B. Weiss, Das Leben Jesu, 1882 (Eng. tr. 1883); Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 1884; Didon, Jésus Christ, 1891; Sanday, Outlines of the Life of Christ, 1906.

The books of this group have a second common feature in their acceptance of the Fourth Gospel as a valuable history. The works of Weiss and Sanday dispose of the arrogant assumption of Schweitzer (op. cit.) that competent scholarship now regards the cardinal questions as settled in a negative sense. (For a full bibliography see Schweitzer, op. cit.; art. 'Jesus Christ' in PRE.)

3. The Conditions in Palestine (Schürer, *GJ V*³[HJP II, i. 1 ff.]).—The condition of the Jews at the birth of Christ may be summarily described as marked by political impotence and religious decadence.

(1) The political situation.—From the age of the Exile, the Jews in Palestine were subject to a foreign domination—Persian, Greek, Egyptian, Syrian, in rapid succession. Following upon a century of independence under the Maccabees, the country was incorporated in the Roman Empire as a division of the province of Syria. In certain circumstances, which have a parallel in British India, the Romans recognized a feudatory king, and it was with this status that Herod the Great reigned over Palestine. At his death in B.C. 4, his dominions were divided among his three sons; but on the deposition of Archelaus in 6 A.D., Judæa and Samaria were placed under a Roman procurator. Herod Antipas and Philip continued to rule as vassal princes, with the title of tetrarchs, over Galilee and Ituræa respectively. The pressure of the Roman rule was felt in the stern measures which were taken to suppress any dangerous expressions of national feeling, and also in the exactions of the publicans to whom the taxes were farmed. Internal administration was largely an affair of the Jewish Church. To a highly spirited people like the Jews, with memories of former freedom and power, the loss of national independence was galling; and their natural restlessness under the foreign yoke, combined as it was with the Messianic hopes that formed a most vital element of their religion, was a source of anxiety not only to the Roman authorities but to their own leaders.

(2) The religious situation.—From the religious point of view it was a decadent age. No doubt there is a tendency to exaggerate the degradation of the world at our Lord's coming, on the principle that the darkest hour must have preceded the dawn; and in fairness the indictment should be restricted to the statement that the age marked a serious declension from the highest level of OT religion. It had, in fact, many of the features which have re-appeared in the degenerate periods of the Christian Church. (a) One such feature was the disappearance of the prophetic man, and his replacement as a religious authority by representatives of sacred learning. As the normal condition of things in the Christian Church has been similar, it cannot in itself be judged to be symptomatic of anything worse than a silver age that the exponents of the Scriptures and of the tradition were now the chief religious guides of the people (see SCRIBES). Moreover, a very genuine religious originality and fervour had continued to find expression in the Apocalyptic literature of later Judaism (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE). (b) A more decisive proof of degradation is the exaltation of the ceremonial and formal side of religion as a substitute for personal piety and righteousness of life. This tendency had its classic representatives in the Pharisees. The best of their number must have exhibited, as Josephus shows, a zeal for God and a self-denial like that of Roman Catholic saints—otherwise the veneration of the people, which Josephus shared, would be inexplicable (Ant. xvii. ii. 4); but as a class our Lord charges them with sins of covetousness and inhumanity, which gave the colour of hypocrisy to their ritualistic scruples (Mt 24; see PHARISEES). (c) A further characteristic of decadence is that the religious organization tends to come in the place of God, as the object of devotion, and there appears the powerful ecclesiastic who, though he may be worldly and even sceptical, is indispensable as the symbol and protector of the sacred institution. This type was represented by the Sadducees—in their general outlook men of the world, in their doctrine sceptics with an ostensible basis of conservatism,—who filled the priestly offices, controlled the Sanhedrin, and endeavoured to maintain correct relations with their Roman masters. It can also well be believed that, as Josephus tells us, they professed an aristocratic dislike to public business, which they nevertheless dominated; and that they humoured the multitude by an occasional show of religious zeal (see SADDUCEES).

In this world presided over by pedants, formalists, and political ecclesiastics, the common people receive a fairly good character. Their religion was the best that then had a footing among men, and they were in earnest about it. They had been purified by the providential discipline of centuries from the last vestiges of idolatry. It is noteworthy that Jesus brings against them no such sweeping accusations of immorality and cruelty as are met with in Amos and Hosea. Their chief fault was that they were disposed to look on their religion as a means of procuring them worldly good, and that they were blind and unresponsive in regard to purely spiritual blessings. The influence which the Pharisees had over them shows that they were capable of reverencing, and eager to obey, those who seemed to them to speak for God; and their response to the preaching of John the Baptist was still more to their honour. There is evidence of a contemporary strain of self-renouncing idealism in the existence of communities which sought deliverance from the evil of the world in the austerities of an ascetic life (Jos. Ant. xviii. i. 5; see ESSENEES). The Gospels introduce us to not a few men and women who impress us as exemplifying a simple and noble type of piety—nourished as they were on the religion of the OT, and waiting patiently for the salvation of God. Into a circle pervaded by this atmosphere Jesus was born.

4. Date of Christ's Birth (cf. art. CHRONOLOGY, p. 135^b, and in Hastings' DB).—If John began to baptize in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar (Lk 3¹)—being A.D. 29—and if Jesus was thirty years of age when He was baptized (v. 22), the traditional date fixed by Dionysius Exiguus would be approximately correct. But it is probable that the reign of Tiberius was reckoned by Lk. from his admission to joint-authority with Augustus in A.D. 11–12, so that Jesus would be thirty in A.D. 25–6, and would be born about B.C. 5. This agrees with the representation of Mt. that He was born under Herod, since Herod died B.C. 4, and a number of events of the Infancy are mentioned as occurring before his death. A reference in Jn 2²⁰ to the forty-six years during which the Temple had been in course of construction leads to a similar result—viz. A.D. 26 for the second year of the Ministry, and B.C. 5 for the Birth of Jesus.

5. Birth and Infancy (cf. Sweet, The Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 1907).—Mt. and Lk. have a narrative of the Infancy, and agree in the following points:—that Jesus was of David's line, that He was miraculously conceived, that He was born in Bethlehem, and that the Holy Family permanently settled in Nazareth. The additional incidents related by Mt. are the appearance of the angel to Joseph (11¹⁸⁻²⁴), the adoration of the Magi (21¹²), the flight into Egypt (vv. 13-15), the massacre at Bethlehem (vv. 16-18). Lk.'s supplementary matter includes the promise of the birth of John the Baptist (15-22), the Annunciation to Mary (vv. 26-38), the visit of Mary to Elisabeth (vv. 39-46), the birth of the Baptist (vv. 47-56), the census (21^a), the vision of angels (2⁸⁻¹⁴), the adoration of the shepherds (vv. 16-17), the circumcision (v. 21), the presentation in the Temple (vv. 22-29).

The narratives embody two ideas which are singly impressive, and in conjunction make a profound appeal to the feelings and the imagination. The humiliation of the Saviour is emphasized by one set of events—the lowly parentage, the birth in a stable, the rage of Herod, the flight of His parents to a distant land. The other series shows Him as honoured and accredited by heaven, while earth also agrees, in the representatives of its wealth and its poverty, its wisdom and its ignorance, to do Him honour at His coming. 'A halo of miracles is formed around the central miracle, comparable to the rays of the rising sun' (Lange, Life of Christ, Eng. tr. i. 257, 258).

At this point the influence of theological standpoint makes itself acutely felt. In the 'Lives,' written from the naturalistic and Unitarian standpoints, the mass of the material is described as mythical or legendary, and the only points left over for discussion are the sources of invention, and the date at which the stories were incorporated with the genuine tradition. The residuum of historical fact, according to O. Holtzmann, is that 'Jesus was born at Nazareth in Galilee, the son of Joseph and Mary, being the eldest of five brothers and several sisters, and there He grew up' (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 89). The chief grounds on which the negative case is rested may be briefly considered.

(1) The narratives of the Infancy are not a part of the original tradition, since they are known to only two of the Evangelists, and have no Biblical support outside these Gospels. To this it seems a sufficient reply that additions may have been made later from a good source, and that there were obvious reasons why some at least of the incidents should have been treated for a time with reserve.

(2) The two Gospels which deal with the Infancy discredit one another by the incompatibility of their statements. Mt., it is often said, supposes that Bethlehem was Joseph's home from the beginning; Lk. says that he made a visit to Bethlehem on the occasion of a census. According to Mt., the birth in Bethlehem was followed by a flight into Egypt; according to Lk., they visited Jerusalem and then returned to Nazareth. But the difficulties have been exaggerated. Though it is quite possible that Mt. did not know of an original residence in Nazareth, he does not actually deny it. And although neither Evangelist may have known of the other's history, it is quite possible, without excessive harmonistic zeal, to work the episodes of Mt. into Lk.'s scheme. 'The accounts may be combined with considerable plausibility if we suppose that Joseph and Mary remained a full year in Bethlehem, during which the presentation in the Temple took place, and that the visit of the Magi was much later than the adoration of the shepherds' (Gloag, Intro. to the Synoptic Gospels, pp. 136, 137).

(3) The events narrated are said to be inconsistent with the indirect evidence of other portions of the Gospels. If they really occurred, why was Mary not prepared for all that followed? and why did Jesus' brethren not believe in Him? (Mk 3²¹, Mt 12⁴⁶⁻⁵⁰). In particular, the body of the Gospels contains, it is said, evidence which is inconsistent with the Virgin-birth. The difficulty is a real one, but hardly greater than the difficulty presented in the fact that the mighty works of the Ministry did not overbear doubt and disbelief in those who witnessed them.

(4) The narratives in question are also said to have had their origin in man's illusory ideas as to the proper manner of the coming of a Divine messenger. The history of the founders of other religions—e.g. Confucius and Gautama—shows a fond predisposition to invest the birth of a Saviour or a mighty prophet with a miraculous halo; and it is suggested that similar stories were invented about Christ, with the effect of obscuring the distinctive thought and purpose of God. They are 'deforming investitures, misplaced, like court-dresses on the spirits of the just' (Martineau, Loss and Gain). There is undeniable force in this, but it will be noticed that it is an observation which would make an end, as indeed those who use it intend, of the whole miraculous element in the life. If, on the other hand, we believe that the life of Christ was supernatural, it is easily credible that the rising of the Sun was heralded, in Lange's image, by rays of glory.

Of the events of the glorious cycle which have the joint support of Mt. and Lk. there are three which have been felt to have religious significance.

(1) The Davidic descent.—It was an article of common belief in the primitive Church that Jesus was descended from David (Ro 1³). Mt. and Lk. supply genealogies which have the purpose of supporting the belief, but do not strengthen it prima facie, as one traces the descent through Solomon (Mt 1⁶), the other through a son of David called Nathan (Lk 3³¹). The favourite way of harmonizing them is to suppose that Mt. gives the descent through Joseph, Lk. through Mary, while others think that Mt. gives the list of heirs to the Davidic throne, Lk. the actual family-tree of Jesus. It may well be believed that descendants of the royal house treasured the record of their origin; and on the other hand it seems unlikely that Jesus could have been accepted as Messiah without good evidence of Davidic origin, or that a late fabrication would have been regarded as such.

(2) The Virgin-birth (cf. Gore, Dissertations on the Incarnation, 1895; Lobstein, The Virgin-Birth of Christ, Eng. tr. 1903).—The student is referred for a full statement on both sides to the works above cited, but a remark may be made on the two branches of the evidence. (a) The objections based on historical and literary grounds, as distinct from anti-dogmatic prejudice, are of considerable weight. No account of Mk.'s purpose satisfactorily explains his omission if he knew of it, and it seems incredible that, if known, it would not have been utilized in the Pauline theology. Upon this it can only be said that it may have been a fact, although it had not yet come to the knowledge of Mk. and Paul. Further, Mt. and Lk. themselves raise a grave difficulty, since the whole point of the genealogies seems to be that Jesus was descended from David through Joseph. The usual, though not quite convincing, answer is, that Jesus was legally the son of Joseph, and therefore David's heir. It must probably be admitted that the original compilers of the genealogies shared the ignorance of the earliest Gospel, but ignorance or silence is not decisive as to a fact. (b) It has been common to exaggerate the doctrinal necessity of the tenet. It is usually held to have been necessary to preserve Jesus from the taint of original sin; but as Mary was truly His mother, an additional miracle must have been necessary to prevent the transmission of the taint through her, and this subsidiary miracle could have safeguarded the sinlessness of Jesus without the miraculous conception. Nor can it be said that it is a necessary corollary of the Eternal Sonship of Christ, since it is found in the Gospels which say nothing of His pre-existence, and is absent from the Gospel which places this in the forefront. And yet it would be rash to say that it has no value for Christian faith. The unique character of Christ, with its note of sinless perfection, cannot be explained by purely natural factors; and the doctrine of the Virgin-birth at least renders the service of affirming the operation of a supernatural causality in the constitution of that character. It must also be said that the negation is generally felt to be a phase of an anti-supernatural campaign to which the overthrow of this position means the capture of an outwork, and a point of departure for a more critical attack. It is also difficult for a Christian thinker to abandon the dogma without feeling puzzled and distressed by the alternative explanations which open up.

(3) The Birth at Bethlehem (cf. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? 1902).—For the birth at Bethlehem we have the statement of the Gospels. Lk. seems to have investigated the point with special care, and explains the presence of Joseph and Mary at Bethlehem as due to a census which had been ordered by Augustus (Lk 2⁴). It has frequently been assumed that Lk. has blundered, as Quirinius was not governor of Syria until A.D. 6, when he made an enrolment; and the impossible date to which we are thus led seems to discredit the whole combination. In defence of Lk. it is pointed out that Quirinius held a military appointment in Syria about B.C. 6 which may have been loosely described as a governorship, and that there is evidence for a twelve years' cycle in Imperial statistics which would give a first enrolment about the same date.

6. Years of Preparation (cf. Keim, vol. ii. pt. 2).—The silence of the Gospels as to the boyhood and early manhood of Jesus is broken only by the mention of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Lk 2^{41ff.}). Even if it be true that none of His townsfolk believed on Him, it might have been expected that the piety of His disciples would have recovered some facts from the public memory, and that in any case the tradition would have been enriched at a later date by members of the family circle. The only possible explanation of the silence is that during the years in Nazareth Jesus did and said nothing which challenged notice. It is also evident that the silence is an indirect testimony to the credibility of the great events of the later years, as there was every reason why the tradition, had it not been bound by facts, should have invested the earlier period with supernatural surprises and glories.

(1) Education of Jesus.—Earliest in time, and probably chief in importance, was the education in the home. The Jewish Law earnestly impressed upon parents, especially upon fathers, the duty of instructing their children in the knowledge of God, His mighty acts and His laws, and also of disciplining them in religion and morality. 'We take most pains of all,' says Josephus, 'with the instruction of children, and esteem the observation of the laws, and the piety corresponding with the laws, the most important affairs of our whole life' (c. Apion, i. 12). 'We know the laws,' he adds, 'as well as our own name.' It was the home in Nazareth that opened to Jesus the avenues of knowledge, and first put Him in possession of the treasures of the OT. It also seems certain that in His home there was a type of family life which made fatherhood stand to Him henceforward as the highest manifestation of a love beneficent, disinterested, and all-forgiving. It is probable that Jesus had other teachers. We hear in the course of the same century of a resolution to provide teachers in every province and in every town; and before the attempt was made to secure a universal system, it was natural that tuition should be given in connexion with the synagogue to boys likely to 'profit above their equals.' Of the officers connected with the synagogue, the ruler and the elders may sometimes have done their work as a labour of love, and there is evidence that it could be laid on the chazzan as an official duty. The stated services of the synagogue, in which the chief part was the expounding of the Scriptures by any person possessed of learning or a message, must have been an event of the deepest interest to the awakening mind of Jesus. From early childhood He accompanied His parents to Jerusalem to keep the Feast—the utmost stress being laid by the Rabbis upon this as a means for the instilling of piety. It has also been well pointed out that the land of Palestine was itself a wonderful educational instrument. It was a little country, in size less than the Scottish Highlands, of which a great part could be seen from a mountain-top, and every district visited in a few days' journey; and its valleys and towns, and, above all, Jerusalem, were filled with memories which compelled the citizen to live in the story of the past, and to reflect at every stage and prospect on the mission of his people and the ways of God (Ramsay, The Education of Christ, 1902). To these has to be added the discipline of work. Jesus learned the trade of a carpenter, and appears to have practised this trade in Nazareth until He reached the threshold of middle age (Mk 6³). It is perhaps remarkable that none of His imagery is borrowed from His handicraft. One has the feeling that the work of the husbandman and the vine-dresser had more attraction for Him, and that His self-sacrifice may have begun in the workshop. The deeper preparation is suggested in the one incident which is chronicled. The point of it is that even in His boyhood Jesus thought of God as His Father, and of His house as His true sphere of work (Lk 2⁴⁹). The holy of holies in the silent years was the life of communion with God in which He knew the Divine Fatherhood to be a fact, and became conscious of standing to Him in the intimate relationship of a Son.

(2) Knowledge of Jesus.—There is no reason to suppose that Jesus studied in the Rabbinical schools. Nor is there more ground for the belief, which has been made the motive of certain 'Lives of Christ' (Venturini, Natürliche Gesch. des grossen Propheten von Nazareth, 1800–2), that He had acquired esoteric wisdom among the Essenes. It has also become difficult for those who take their impressions from the historical records to believe that, while in virtue of His human nature His knowledge was progressive and limited, in virtue of His Divine nature He was simultaneously omniscient. All we can say is that He possessed perfect knowledge within the sphere in which His vocation lay. The one book which He studied was the OT, and He used it continually in temptation, conflict, and suffering. He knew human nature in its littleness and greatness—the littleness that spoils the noblest characters, the greatness that survives the worst pollution and degradation. He read individual character with a swift and unerring glance. But what must chiefly have impressed the listeners were the intimacy and the certainty with which He spoke of God. In the world of nature He pointed out the tokens of His bounty and the suggestions of His care. The realm of human affairs was to Him instinct with principles which illustrated the relations of God and man. He spoke as One who saw into the very heart of God, and who knew at first hand His purpose with the world, and His love for sinful and sorrow-laden men.

7. Jesus and the Baptist.—The religious commonplaceness of the age, which has been described above, was at length broken by the appearance of John the Baptist, who recalled the ancient prophets. He proclaimed the approach of the Day of the Lord, when the Messiah would take to Himself His power and reign. He rejected the idea that the Jews could claim special privileges on the ground of birth (Mt 3⁹), and proclaimed that the judgment, with which His work would begin, would be searching and pitiless. Along with other Galileans Jesus repaired to the scene of the ministry in the lower Jordan valley, and received baptism (Mk 1⁹), not, indeed, as though He needed repentance, but as a symbol and means of consecration to the work which lay before Him. The Gospels are more deeply interested in the impression made by Jesus on John, modern writers in the influence exerted by John upon Jesus. According to all the Synoptics, John proclaimed the near advent of the Messiah; according to Mt., he may have implied that Jesus was the Messiah (3¹⁴); while the Fourth Gospel states that he explicitly pointed Him out as the Messiah to his disciples (1²⁰, 3²⁸). If we suppose that Jesus held intercourse for a time with the Baptist, it is easy to believe that the stainlessness and commanding greatness of His character at least evoked from the Baptist an avowal of his own inferiority. That he went so far as to declare Him the Messiah whom he preached is a statement which it is difficult to accept literally, or as meaning more than that the school of the Baptist pointed to its consummation in the school of Christ. On the other hand, contact with the Baptist's ministry evidently precipitated the crisis in the life of Christ. The man who re-discovered the need and the power of a prophetic mission was an instrument in bringing Jesus face to face with His prophetic task; while his proclamation of the impending advent of the Messiah must have had the character for Jesus of a call to the work for which, as the unique Son, He knew Himself to be furnished. It is evident that the act of baptism was accompanied by something decisive. According to Mk., Jesus then had a vision of the Spirit descending upon Him like a dove, and heard a voice from heaven, 'Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (11^o, 11^o). This is more probable than the statement that it was a public revelation (Lk 3²¹⁻²²), or that it was the Baptist to whom the vision was vouchsafed (Jn 1²⁹). We shall hardly err if we suppose that Jesus spoke to the disciples of His baptism as the time when His Messianic consciousness became clear, and He received an endowment of strength for the task to which He was called.

8. The Temptation.—The view taken of the significance of the Baptism is confirmed by the narrative of the Temptation, which would naturally follow closely upon the acceptance of the Messianic vocation (Mk 1¹²⁻¹³, Mt 4¹⁻¹¹, Lk 4¹⁻¹²). Like the scene at the Baptism, the temptations probably came to Jesus in the form of a vision, which He afterwards described to His disciples. It has generally been agreed that the temptations must be understood as growing out of the Messianic commission, but there is wide difference of opinion as to their precise significance. The view which seems most probable to the present writer may be briefly set forth, it being premised that Luke's order seems to answer best to the logic of the situation. Assuming that in the Baptism Jesus accepted the Messianic call, the possibilities of the ensuing ordeal of temptation were three—that He should recoil from the task, that He should misconceive it, or that, rightly apprehending it, He should adopt wrong methods. The first temptation, accordingly, may very naturally be supposed to have consisted in the suggestion that He should choose comfort rather than hardship—that He should turn back, while there was yet time, from the arduous and perilous path, and live out His days in the sheltered life of Nazareth. This He rejected on the ground that there are higher goods than comfort and security; 'man shall not live by bread alone' (Mt 4⁴). The heroic course resolved on, the great question to be next faced was if He was to aim at establishing a kingdom of the political kind which the people generally expected, or a kingdom of a spiritual order. To found and maintain an earthly kingdom, He knew, meant the use of violence, craft, and other Satanic instruments; and of such means, even if the end had approved itself to Him as His vocation, He refused to make use (Mt 4²³). This decision taken, the question remained as to the way in which He was to win belief for Himself and His cause. For one with perfect trust in God it was a natural suggestion to challenge God to own Him by facing risks in which His life could be saved only through the interposition of a stupendous miracle (4²⁴). But this He put aside as impious, and cast upon the Father the care of making His path plain, while He awaited, prudently as well as bravely, the gradual disclosure of His call to work and danger.

9. Duration of the Ministry (cf. art. CHRONOLOGY above and in DB).—The Synoptics give no certain indication of the length of the period. It is argued that the incident of plucking the ears of corn (Mk 2²³) points to April or June of one year, and that at the feeding of the five thousand we are in the spring ('green grass,' Mk 6³⁹) of the year following; while at least another twelve months would be required for the journeys which are subsequently recorded. The chronological scheme usually adopted is based on the Fourth Gospel, which has the following notes of time:—a Passover (2⁶), four months to harvest (4³⁵), a feast of the Jews (5¹), another Passover (6⁴), the feast of Tabernacles (7⁷), the feast of Dedication (10²²), the last Passover (11¹⁵). The first four 'can be combined in more than one way to fit into a single year—e.g. (a) Passover—May—any lesser feast—Passover; or (b) Passover—January—Purim (February)—Passover.' 'From 6⁴ to 11¹⁵ the space covered is exactly a year, the autumn Feast of Tabernacles (7⁷), and the winter Feast of Dedication (10²²), being signalized in the course of it' (art. 'Chronology' in DB i. 409*, 408*).

It was a wide-spread opinion in Patristic times, supported by the phrase 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (Lk 4¹⁹), that the ministry lasted only one year; and in the opinion of some modern scholars it can be maintained that even the Fourth Gospel includes its material between two Passovers (Westcott and Hort, Greek Test.; Briggs, New Light on the Life of Jesus). On the other hand, it was asserted by Irenæus (adv. Hær. ii. 22) on the ground of Jn 8⁵⁷, and of an alleged Johannine tradition, that from ten to twenty years elapsed between the Baptism and the Crucifixion. Jn 8⁵⁷ is quite inconclusive, and the best authority for the Johannine tradition must be the Gospel, the evidence of which may be summed up by saying that 'while two years must, not more than two years can, be allowed for the interval from Jn 2¹³⁻²² to Jn 11¹⁵' (art. 'Chronology' in DB).

10. Periods of the Life of Christ.—The divisions are necessarily affected by the view which is taken of the value of the chronological scheme of the Fourth Gospel.

Keim, who generally follows the guidance of the Synoptics, divides as follows:—

Preliminary period of self-recognition and decision.

1. The Galilean spring-time, beginning in the spring of A.D. 34 [certainly much too late], and lasting for a few months. Characteristics: the optimism of Jesus, and the responsiveness of the people.

2. The Galilean storms, extending over the summer and autumn of A.D. 34 and the spring of the following year. Scene: Galilee and the neighbouring regions. Characteristics: increasing opposition, and intensification of the polemical note in the teaching of Jesus.

3. The Messianic progress to Jerusalem, and the Messianic death at the Passover of A.D. 35. Scene: Peræa and Jerusalem (Jesus of Nazareth).

The Johannine material can be combined with the Synoptic in two periods, each of which lasted about a year. The following is the scheme of Hase:—

Preliminary history.

1. The 'acceptable year of the Lord,' marked by hopefulness, active labour, and much outward success. Scene: Judæa and Galilee. Time: from the Baptism to the Feeding of the Multitude (some months before Passover of the year A.D. 30 or 31 to shortly before Passover of the following year).

2. The year of conflict. Scene: Galilee, Peræa, Judæa. Time: from the second to the last Passover.

3. The Passion and Resurrection. Scene: Jerusalem. Time: Passover (Gesch. Jesu).

The months between the Baptism and the first Passover may be regarded as a period with distinct characteristics, and we may distinguish (1) the year of obscurity, (2) the year of public favour, (3) the year of opposition (Stalker, Life of Jesus Christ, 1879).

The division into sub-periods has been most elaborately carried out by Dr. Sanday (Outlines of the Life of Jesus Christ).—

A. Preliminary period—from the Baptism to the call of the leading Apostles. Sources: Mt 3¹⁻⁴, Mk 1¹⁻¹³, Lk 3¹⁻⁴, Jn 1⁶⁻⁴⁴. Scene: mainly in Judæa, but in part also in Galilee. Time: winter A.D. 26 to a few weeks before Passover, A.D. 27.

B. First active or constructive period. Sources: Mt 4¹²⁻¹³, Mk 1¹⁴⁻¹⁶, Lk 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶, Jn 5. Scene: mainly in Galilee, but also partly in Jerusalem. Time: from about Pentecost, A.D. 27, to shortly before Passover, A.D. 28.

C. Middle or culminating period of the active ministry. Sources: Mt 14¹⁻¹⁸, Mk 6¹⁴⁻²⁸, Lk 9⁷⁻¹⁰, Jn 6. Scene: Galilee. Time: Passover to shortly before Tabernacles, A.D. 28.

D. Close of the active period—the Messianic crisis in view. Sources: Mt 19¹⁻²⁰, Mk 10¹⁻⁴², Lk 9⁵¹⁻¹⁹, Jn 7¹⁻¹¹, 7¹¹, 7¹¹. Scene: Judæa and Peræa. Time: Tabernacles, A.D. 28, to Passover, A.D. 29.

E. The Messianic crisis—the last week, passion, resurrection, ascension. Sources: Mt 21¹⁻²⁸, Mk 11¹⁻¹⁶ [16⁷⁻²⁰], Lk 19²⁸⁻²⁴, Jn 12¹⁻²¹. Scene: mainly in Jerusalem. Time: six days before Passover to ten days before Pentecost, A.D. 29.

Weiss's scheme agrees with the above so far as regards the duration of the ministry (from 2 to 3 years), and the date of the Crucifixion (Passover, A.D. 29). His periods are:

(1) the preparation, corresponding to Dr. Sanday's 'preliminary period' down to the wedding in Cana of Galilee; (2) the seed-time, including the remainder of 'the preliminary period,' and the first active or constructive period; (3) the period of first conflicts, and (4) the period of crisis, corresponding to the 'middle or culminating period'; (5) the Jerusalem period, corresponding to the close of the active period; (6) the Passion and the subsequent events.

Useful as the above schemes of Weiss and Sanday are for arranging the subject-matter, and deserving as they are of respect for their scholarly grounding, the writer doubts if we can pretend to such exact knowledge of the course of events. Even if we assume that the Fourth Gospel gives a reliable chronological framework, it is a very precarious assumption that the Synoptic material, which is largely put together from a topical point of view, can be assigned its proper place in the scheme. Further, it is by no means clear that we are right in supposing that there was a Judean ministry which ran parallel with the Galilean ministry. There is much to be said for the view that the narratives of the Fourth Gospel presuppose a situation towards the close of them, and that in interweaving them with the Synoptic narratives of the Galilean period, we anticipate the actual march of the history. The view here taken is that there was a Galilean ministry, for which the Synoptics are almost the sole source; that this was followed for some months before the end by a Judean ministry, the materials of which are supplied mainly by the Fourth Gospel; and that finally the sources unite to give a picture of the Last Week, the Passion, and the Resurrection.

(A) THE GALILEAN MINISTRY.—Jesus seems to have remained with the Baptist until the latter was put in prison (Mk 1⁴), when He returned to Galilee. The change of scene, which in any case was natural in view of the blow that had been struck, served to mark the distinctness of His mission from that of John. He may also have been influenced by His knowledge of the greater receptiveness of the Northern stock. The centre of His activity was the populous district, studded with prosperous towns, which lay around the Sea of Galilee. From Capernaum, in which He lived for a time (Mt 4¹³, Mk 9³³), He had easy access to the other cities on the Lake, and He also appears to have made wider circuits throughout Galilee, in the course of which He preached in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶). At the close of the period He penetrated to the regions beyond—being found on the 'borders' of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7²⁴), then in the heathen district of Decapolis to the east of Jordan (v. ³¹), afterwards in the towns of Caesarea Philippi in the dominions of the tetrarch Philip (8²⁷). Except for the incidental references above referred to, there is nothing to fix the duration of the Galilean ministry; but though crowded with labours and incidents, it seems to have been comparatively short. Its importance is measured by the fact that it set the Christian gospel in circulation in the world, and laid the foundation of the Christian Church.

(1) Treatment of the materials.—In dealing with this period, the characteristic task of the historian may almost be said to begin where that of the Evangelists ends. The modern student is not only interested in chronology and in the details of the environment, but he tries to bring the course of events under the point of view of development, and to penetrate to the causes which explain the movement and the issue of the history. The Gospels, on the other hand, contribute a picture rather than a history—a picture, moreover, in which the setting is presupposed rather than described, while they leave us in ignorance of much that we should like to know about hidden forces and springs of action. It seems advisable to begin by reproducing in its salient aspects the Synoptic picture of the Galilean ministry, based primarily on Mk., and thereafter to advert to some contributions which have been made to the better elucidation of the course of events.

(2) The picture of the Galilean Ministry.—The principal source is the sketch in Mk., which sets forth the Ministry from the point of view of one who regarded it as the manifestation of the Messiah. The chronological order of events is necessarily mirrored to some extent, as the narrative describes a mission and its outcome; but the arrangement as well as the selection of the material is largely governed by topical considerations. The topics of Mk. may be summarized as follows:—(a) the preliminary attestation of Jesus as the Messiah; (b) the Messianic activities; (c) the opposition to Jesus, and His self-vindication; (d) the attitude of Jesus Himself to the question of His Messiahship; (e) the results of the Galilean Ministry.

The above argument is taken over by Mt., with some change in the order of the sections, while he supplements from the older Apostolic source the meagre account given by Mk. of the contents of the teaching of Jesus. Lk. follows Mk. more closely in the sections dealing with the Galilean ministry, but incidentally shows the uncertainty of the chronological scheme by transferring to the beginning the visit to Nazareth (4¹⁶⁻³⁰; cf. Mk 6¹⁻⁶, Mt 13⁵³⁻⁵⁸), on the apparent ground that it could be regarded as in some respects a typical incident.

(a) The preliminary attestation.—The Synoptic tradition puts in the forefront certain credentials of Jesus. John the Baptist predicted His coming (Mk 1⁷⁻⁸), a voice from heaven proclaimed Him to be the Son (v. ¹¹), the demons knew Him (vv. ^{23, 24}; cf. 5⁷); while the chosen few, though as yet not knowing Him for what He is, instinctively obeyed His call (1¹⁸), and the multitude recognized in Him an extraordinary man (1²³). Apart from the references to the Baptist and the vision at the Baptism, the facts which underlay this apologetic argument were that demons were peculiarly susceptible to His influence, and that upon the uncorrupted and unprejudiced heart Jesus made the impression of a commanding authority which was entitled to be obeyed.

(b) The Messianic activities.—Upon the credentials follows a description of the labours by which Jesus proceeded to carry out His plan, and which revealed Him as the Messiah. The means employed were three—to teach the nature, the blessings, and the laws of the Kingdom, to exemplify its power and its spirit in mighty works, and to call and train men who should exemplify the new righteousness, and also share and continue His labours.

(i) The ministry of teaching (cf. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, Eng. tr. 1892).—The work which lay nearest to the hand of Jesus, as the Messiah, was to preach. He needed to preach repentance, as the condition of the reception of the Kingdom; He needed to gain entrance for a true conception of its nature; and He had to legislate for the society which was to own Him as its King. It is accordingly as the Messiah prophet that He is introduced: 'Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe in the gospel' (Mk 1¹⁴⁻¹⁵). Following upon a similar notice (4²³), Mt. interpolates the Sermon on the Mount, in which the principles of the gospel of the Kingdom are set forth, on the one hand as a revision of the OT moral code, on the other as an antithesis to the maxims and the practice of contemporary Judaism. The meagre specimens of our Lord's teaching which Mk. thought it sufficient for his purpose to give, are further supplemented by Mt. in his collection of the parables of the Kingdom, and by Lk. in the peculiar section which includes the parables of the Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, and the Lost Son.

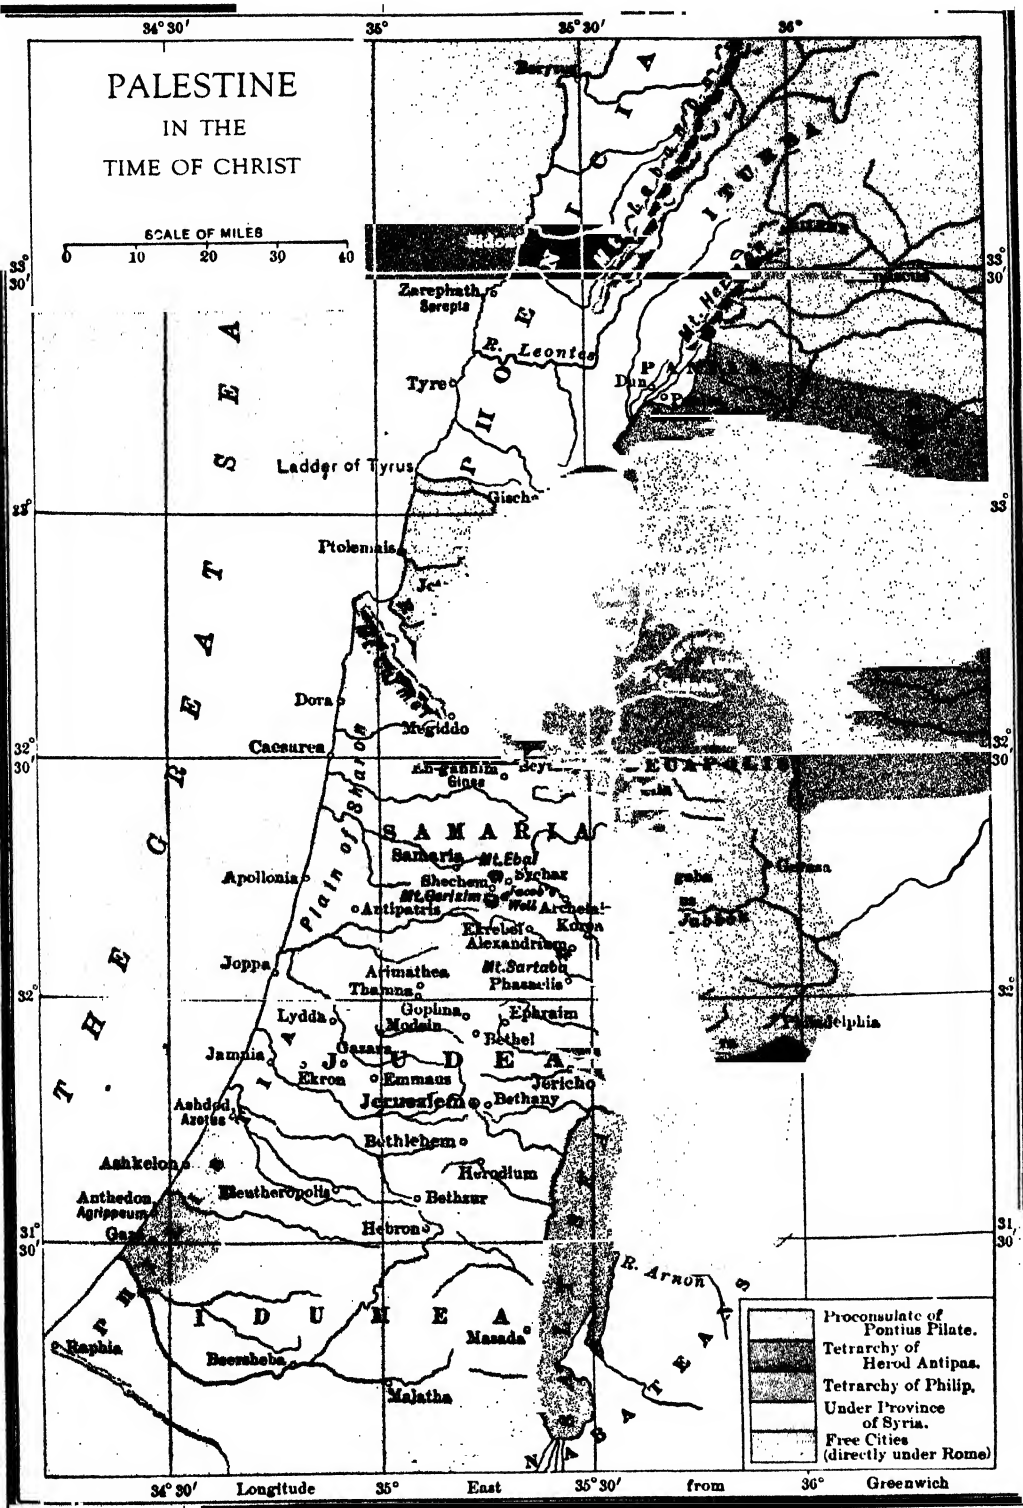

The synagogues were open, at least in the first period, to Jesus. He also taught wherever opportunity offered—in the house, on the mountain-side, from a boat moored by the shore of the Lake. To a large extent His teaching was unsystematic, being drawn forth by way of comment on some casual incident, or of a rejoinder made to a question or an objection. On other occasions, e.g. when preaching in the synagogue, we must suppose Him to have treated of some large subject in a set discourse, but it is unlikely that any one contained more than an exposition of an OT passage (Lk 4^{16f.}), or the message of one of the parables (Mt 13^{1f.}). The grand characteristic of His manner of teaching has been described as the combination of the utmost degree of popular intelligibility with memorable pregnancy of expression (Wendt, § 2). (a) The means by which intelligibility was attained was the copious use of the concrete example, and of the comparison of ideas. The comparison is used in three forms—the simile, the metaphor, and the parable. The parables, again, obviously fall into three classes. In one class we have a story which illustrates by a concrete example an attitude which Jesus desired to commend or to condemn (the Good Samaritan, Lk 10^{30f.}; the Pharisee and the Publican, 18^{10f.}). Those of a second class draw attention to a law operating in the natural world which has its counterpart in the Kingdom of God (the Seed Growing Secretly, Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹; the Mustard Seed, 4³⁰⁻³²). In a third class there is a description of an event which has occurred in special circumstances, whether in nature or in the dealings of man with man, and the particular event is employed to illustrate some aspect of the Divine message (the Sower, Mt 13^{1f.}; the Prodigal Son, Lk 15^{11f.}). (b) The second note of the teaching of Jesus, which might perhaps be called incisiveness, is illustrated in the numerous short sayings, or aphorisms, into which He condenses a body of doctrine or precept (Mk 4²²⁻²⁴ 10³¹). It is also seen in the naked, often paradoxical, fashion, in which He states a principle. The doctrine of non-resistance, e.g., He teaches in uncompromising form by means of the special instance (Mt 5³⁸⁻⁴¹), and leaves it to the disciple to discover the other considerations which cross and limit its application. The latter observation is of importance as a preservative against the errors of an excessive literalism in the interpretation of the teaching of Jesus. It is also desirable to bear in mind the rule, which is one of the gains of modern exegesis, that each of the parables of Jesus is to be regarded as the vehicle of one great lesson, and that it is illegitimate to treat it as an allegory every detail of which has been consciously filled with didactic meaning. As regards the aim of Jesus in His teaching, it might be thought self-evident that it could be nothing else than to make His message clear to His hearers. It is therefore surprising to read that the parables are spoken by Jesus with the purpose of obscuring to them that are without the truths which they reveal to the disciples—‘that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand’ (Mk 4¹⁰⁻¹², Mt 13¹⁰⁻¹⁵, Lk 8⁹⁻¹⁰). That the teaching of Jesus was largely misapprehended is, of course, true, and also that it had the effect of making those worse who rejected it, but this would appear to be an instance in which the Church has misreported a tragic consequence as an original and deliberate intention.

(ii) The mighty works (cf. Bruce, The Miraculous Element in the Gospels, 1886).—The teaching ministry was accompanied from the first by acts of healing, and these were followed later by other acts involving superhuman power. The Synoptic account of the mighty works may be briefly summarized.—(1) They were very numerous, and were of different kinds. In addition to the miracles which are described in detail, there are references of a general sort which imply that Jesus’ work was cast to a large extent in the form of a healing ministry (Mk 1³⁴). Some of the miracles might be understood as faith-cures wrought upon persons suffering from nervous disorders or mental derangement, but those are inextricably bound up with others which are not explained by moral therapeutics, while a third group not explained imply a supernatural control of the forces of external nature. The healing miracles may be divided as follows:—(a) cure of organic defects (the blind, Mk 10⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸; the deaf and dumb, 7³¹⁻³⁷); (b) disease (leprosy, Mk 1⁴⁰⁻⁴⁵, Lk 17¹¹⁻¹⁶; fever, Mk 1²⁹⁻³¹; dropsy, Lk 14¹⁻⁶; paralysis, Mk 2¹⁻¹², Mt 8¹⁻¹²); (c) death (Mk 5^{22f.}, Lk 8⁴¹). As a special group, conceived as miracles in the spirit world, are the cures of epilepsy and lunacy (Mk 1²¹⁻²⁸ 5¹⁻²⁰ 7²⁴⁻³⁰ 9^{14f.}). The Nature-miracles have been classified as (a) miracles of creative power (feeding of the multitude, Mk 6³⁴⁻⁴⁴ 8¹⁻¹⁰; walking on the water, 6⁴⁸ 8¹¹); (b) Miracles of Providence, including (i.) miracles of blessing (the miraculous draught of fishes, Lk 5¹⁻¹¹; the stilling of the tempest, Mk 4³⁵⁻⁴¹) and (ii.) a miracle of judgment (the cursing of the fig-tree, Mk 11¹²⁻¹⁴ 20; cf. Westcott, *Introd. to the Gospels*³, 1895, App. E).—(2) The working of miracles was conditioned in various ways. The general condition on the side of the patients was the presence of faith (the woman with the issue, Mk 5²⁵⁻³⁴; Bartimæus, Mk 10⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸). In the absence of faith Jesus could do nothing or little (Mk 6⁴⁻⁵, Mt 13⁵⁸). It was not, however, necessary that this faith should be personal: in some cases it was the vicarious faith of a parent or of a friend that had power and prevailed (the centurion’s servant, Mt 8⁵⁻¹²; the daughter of the Syrophenician woman, Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰). In some instances the miracle is represented as having its spring in sympathy, apart from any reference to the spiritual condition of the sufferer (the fever, Mk 1²⁹⁻³⁴; dropsy, Lk 14¹⁻⁶); while in cases of possession it could take place in the face of reluctance and antagonism (the unclean spirit, Mk 1^{21f.} the man in the tombs, 5¹⁻¹⁷). As regards the powers of Jesus, the impression is not given that He was in possession of an omnipotence which He was able to wield at will. For what He is able to accomplish He is dependent on the Father, who supplies Him with power in the measure in which it is needed for the discharge of His mission. In the background of the miracles was the life of communion with God which Jesus lived. ‘This kind,’ He significantly says, ‘can come out by nothing, save by prayer’ (Mk 9²⁹). It would also appear that the cures made a demand upon His energies which gave rise to a feeling of physical exhaustion (Mk 5³⁰).—(3) The significance of the miracles. The leading point of view in which they are regarded in the Gospels is undeniably the evidential. In the fundamental narrative the argument advances from the testimonies as the first link, to the mighty works as the second link, in the chain of Messianic proof. It would be impossible to state the evidential aspect more strongly than is done in the reply to the question of John the Baptist (Mt 11^{2f.}).

(iii) The calling and teaching of disciples (cf. Bruce, The Training of the Twelve, 1877).—The effect of the Ministry was that Jesus, like the prophets of old, John the Baptist, and the Rabbis, gathered around Him a group of disciples. The great body of those who regarded Him as a Divinely sent teacher must have remained in their homes, and been content to hear Him when they had a convenient opportunity; and there is no reason to think that they were organized in any way into societies, except in so far as a natural instinct would prompt them to meet and speak one to another of the things which they had seen and heard. There was a second body of disciples, sometimes large but fluctuating in size, which accompanied Jesus on His journeys. Some He invited to join this company, others He sternly invited to count the cost (Mt 8^{18f.}). Within this company He formed an inner circle of twelve, who left all for His sake and with a few breaks were found constantly at His side. The call of Simon and Andrew, James and John (Mk 1^{16f.}), is related to have occurred in the first days of the Galilean ministry. An early Christian tradition (Ep. Barn. 5) speaks of the Apostles as reclaimed sinners of the worst type, but this is manifestly an exaggeration designed to illustrate the regenerative power of the gospel. The leading members of the band were fishermen—of a craft which is pursued under a sense of dependence on Providence, and therefore tends to foster the spirit of piety. The sons of Zebedee seem to have been in better circumstances than the rest, and Matthew the tax-gatherer doubtless wielded a competent pen; but they were ignorant men as tested by the standard of the schools, whether ancient or modern. Humility, sincerity, and prudence, coupled with trust in God and devotion to Himself, were the qualifications which chiefly guided Jesus in selecting them (Mt 10²⁰. 16¹⁷). In calling the Apostles, Jesus was satisfying a need of His own inner life. It was a maxim of the Rabbis that it was a sin to have no friend with whom to discourse of the Divine Law, and for Jesus this opportunity was provided by their intimate converse. It is also evident that He was wont to feel strengthened by their sympathy (Mk 14³⁷). On the other hand, He needed them for the work of the Kingdom. It was necessary that in them the righteousness of the Kingdom should be personally manifested, so that men might see their good works and glorify the Father (Mt 5¹⁶). For this reason we find that it becomes increasingly the peculiar care of Jesus to perfect their training in knowledge and in character. He also looked to them as instruments to aid Him in His work.

'To the disciples were left the details of the daily provision of food; they furnished the boat, they rowed Him across the lake; sometimes one and sometimes another of them executed His commissions; they were His channels of communication with the people, with the sick, with the Pharisees' (Keim, iii. p. 280).

They were to Jesus 'arms and eyes,' and even in a sense 'an extended personality.' He assigned to them powers and duties similar to His own. He appointed 'twelve that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach and to have authority to cast out devils' (Mk 3¹⁴). 'And they went out and preached that men should repent. And they cast out many devils and anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them' (6¹². 13).

(c) The opposition and self-vindication.—Two sections in Mk., with parallels in Mt. and Lk., are devoted to explaining why certain classes refused to believe in Jesus, and to showing how He replied to their objections. The charges may be reduced to three heads—blasphemy, irreligious conduct, and insanity.

(i) The charge of blasphemy was early brought against Jesus by certain of the scribes, on the ground that He professed to forgive sins (Mk 2⁷). The reply of Jesus is that in healing the paralytic He gives evidence that He has received this authority from God. The same general charge is implied in the request of the Pharisees, 'seeking of Him a sign from heaven, tempting him' (8¹¹)—the ground taken being that it was impious to teach as He did, unless He could produce satisfying evidence of a Divine sanction. Had the Evangelist edited his material with inventive licence, we should have expected to this question the same reply as was sent to John the Baptist. Instead, we have the startlingly authentic word, 'Why doth this generation seek a sign? There shall no sign be given' (v. 12). It is incredible that this should mean that Jesus disclaimed to work miracles; but it certainly implies that He did not, and probably that He could not, when He was challenged to perform them out of connexion with moral conditions, and as a mere contribution to a controversy.

(ii) Irreligious conduct.—There are charges of sins of omission and of sins of commission. Among the sins of omission charged against Jesus is His neglect of fasting—a recognized exercise of the holy life, which had been enforced by John the Baptist (Mk 2¹⁸). The reply is that there is a time to fast, and that the time will come for His disciples when their Master is taken away (vv. 19. 20). To the same category belongs the accusation which was preferred by the Pharisees and certain of the scribes, that some of His disciples neglected the laws of ceremonial purity and ate with unwashed hands (7¹⁵). Jesus replies that defilement consists in the impure heart, which is the source of all evil (v. 20). Of the sins of commission the chief transgression charged was that He and His disciples did not keep the Sabbath (22²³⁻²⁸), and He defended Himself by appealing to OT precedent, and by laying down the principle that the Sabbath law could not be broken by doing good to man on that day. It was also a common ground of accusation that His manner of life, especially His consorting with disreputable persons, stamped Him as wanting in the character of sanctity (2¹⁶). He replied that He visited them as a physician (v. 17).

(iii) The charge of insanity was also made. The Evangelist does not shrink from recording that some of His friends thought that He was beside Himself (Mk 3²¹). Scribes from Jerusalem repeated this in the form that He was the tool of diabolical influences (v. 22). 'How can Satan,' He asked, 'cast out Satan?' (v. 23).

(d) The attitude of Jesus Himself to the Messiahship.—While the Synoptics labour to show by accumulated proofs that Jesus was the Messiah, they do not represent Him as obtruding the claim. On the contrary, He enjoins silence upon those who know. He forbids the spirits to testify (12³). He even takes steps to keep secret the notable miracles—such as the healing of the leper (14¹), and the raising of the daughter of Jairus (5⁴²), which would have been likely to carry conviction to the general mind. The impression which is conveyed is that Jesus desired that His disciples, without being prompted, and as the result of their knowledge of Him, should draw the right inference as to His dignity and mission. Even when the grand discovery was made and proclaimed by Peter at Caesarea Philippi—and in all the Gospels this confession is recognized as momentous—Jesus enjoined reserve (Mk 8²⁷⁻³⁰, Mt 16¹³⁻²⁰). Henceforward, He spoke of it freely to the Twelve with the purpose of preparing them for the unexpected issue of His Messiahship in suffering and death. Following upon Peter's confession, 'He began to teach them that he must suffer many things, and be killed, and on the third day rise again' (Mk 8³¹). The same was the burden of His teaching on the last journey through Galilee (9³⁰⁻³²). These predictions of His Passion, it may be added, were manifestly precious to the Primitive Church as removing a stumbling-block in the way of believing the Messiahship. The Crucifixion was a very real difficulty to faith, but it would have been much greater had not the Apostolic witnesses testified that He who claimed to be the Messiah had also foretold His own death.

(e) The results of the Galilean ministry.—The Synoptic tradition, while not concealing the darker side of the picture, is most concerned with the achievements and the gains of the Galilean period. It is well known that, as Jesus foretold, much of the seed fell on bad soil or came to nothing. We read of a Woe pronounced by Jesus on Chorazin and Bethsaida which expresses a sense that He had failed to produce a general change for the better in the cities by the Lake (Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴). Luke, in particular, puts in the forefront His rejection by the people of His own town (Lk 4²⁸⁻³⁰). But as the Primitive Christians looked back on it, it might well seem, in the light of later confidence and optimism, that the success was more conspicuous than the failure. The people revered in Him One of superlative greatness—either the Baptist, or Elijah, or 'the prophet' (Mk 8²⁸). He had gathered round Him a body of disciples, who were the germ of the future Church (Mt 16¹⁸). Above all, they had risen, in spite of prejudice and opposition, to a heroic avowal of the faith in His Person and in His mission which was to move and to transform the world (Mk 8³⁹).

The epic treatment of the Galilean ministry.—In the treatment of this period many modern 'Lives' proceed on the footing that the Galilean ministry has the tragic interest of a splendid failure following on the brightest hopes. It has been common enough in public life for great men to sink from popularity through conflict, to neglect and impotence; and there is not a little to suggest that it was so with Jesus in Galilee. The usual representation is that, after being borne along on a tide of popular enthusiasm, the opposition grew more persistent and envenomed. He was forsaken by the multitude, and was forced to move from place to place with a handful of faithful followers. The dramatic effect is sedulously laboured by Keim, who represents Him as becoming a homeless fugitive, seeking safety from His enemies in distant journeys or in obscure places. Graphic pictures are drawn of the change in the popular attitude. 'Formerly the multitude of hearers thronged Jesus, so that He could not eat in the house in peace, and had to betake Himself from the shore to the lake. Now He sits alone in the house with the disciples, and the collectors of the Temple-tax know not whether they are to assess Him as still a member of their community' (O. Holtzmann, Christus, 1907, p. 71). In explanation of His desertion by the multitude, use is made of the incident recorded in Mk 7¹⁹, which, it is thought, was popularly regarded as meaning that He had been definitely repudiated by the highest religious tribunal. The latter, it is supposed, moved the Galilean authorities to action which menaced the liberty of Jesus, and even His life.

This dramatic treatment is not wholly justified by the records and is to some extent dependent on inherent probability. In the idyllic early days, when we are told that only the first murmurs of opposition were heard, Mk. says that the cry of blasphemy and of Sabbath-breaking was already raised against Jesus, and that there was a conspiracy to murder Him (3⁶). At the close of the period again, when He is pictured as a discredited popular hero, the verdict of Galilee still is that He is a Divine messenger (8²⁸), while at the Transfiguration, which falls in the darkest days, a great multitude still attends upon His steps (9⁴). The truth would seem to be that the Synoptics, especially Mk., have given insufficient expression to the element of movement and to the proportion of failure, and that modern biographers have striven too much after strong effects. At the same time the modern work has certainly brought into clearer relief certain points. It seems certain that there was a growing bitterness and violence on the part of the religious authorities, as seen in the fact that Jesus ceased to preach in the synagogues. There was also a measure of popular disappointment, which was the inevitable result of the absence of the patriotic note from the teaching of Jesus, and of the high-pitched spirituality of His demands. Jesus, moreover, regarded the response of Galilee to His preaching as having been representatively given, and as tantamount to a refusal to repent and believe the gospel. As to the motive of the journeys of the last months, there are various considerations to be taken into account. That one motive was to avoid the machinations of His enemies is quite possible, as this would have been in accordance with a counsel given by Him to His disciples (Mt 10²³). But this was quite consonant with a purpose to proclaim the gospel in regions hitherto unevangelized. And if, as is true, there is little evidence that these journeys had a missionary aim, it may well be that for Jesus the most pressing necessity now was to devote Himself to the training of the disciples, and in their society to prepare them, along with Himself, for the trials and the tasks that awaited them at Jerusalem.

Theories of development.—It is characteristic of the modern writing of history to postulate a process of evolution and to try to explain its causes; and reference may here be made to the treatment from this point of view of the central theme of the period—the Messianic consciousness of Jesus. The Gospels know of development only in the form of a growth in the faith of the disciples, and of a modification of the educative method of Jesus, but the question is raised whether the original plan of Jesus, and the means by which He proposed to accomplish it, were not also altered during its course. The theories which may be noticed are those of (1) a modification of His earlier ideas under the influence of John the Baptist; (2) the substitution of the idea of a purely spiritual Kingdom for that of a theocratic State, under the impression which had been made upon Him by the providential course of events; (3) His more complete adoption, also as the outcome of experience, of the Apocalyptic conception of a heavenly Kingdom to be founded on the ruins of the earthly world.

(1) The Galilean ministry which has been described is supposed by Renan to represent a declension from an earlier stage. He supposes that for some months, perhaps a year, previously, Jesus had laboured in Galilee as the teacher of a simple gospel of Divine and human love. On joining

John the Baptist He absorbed his ideas and his spirit, and after the arrest of the latter began to publish a new message. 'Jesus is no longer simply a delightful moralist aspiring to express simple lessons in short and lively aphorisms. He is the transcendent revolutionary who essays to revolutionize the world from its very basis, and to establish on earth an ideal which He had conceived' (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 108). It is clear, as already said, that a time came when Jesus became certain of His Messianic vocation; but that He was already engaged in teaching before He came into contact with the Baptist, there is no evidence whatever. And 'the Galilean spring-tide,' as Keim calls it, certainly does not bear out the idea that the influence of the Baptist had tinged the spirit of Jesus with gloom.

(2) According to Hase, the experiences of the Galilean ministry led to a modification of the hopes and plans of Jesus. At the outset He expected to found a Kingdom such as the OT prophets had foretold, viz. a Kingdom which, while distinguished by piety and righteousness, would be in form a glorious revival of the Kingdom of David. He also hoped that the people as a whole would repent and believe the gospel, and accept Him as the great emancipator. 'Down to the time when His earthly career was approaching the catastrophe, we never hear a rebuke of the worldly hopes which the Messianic idea everywhere called forth; and on the other hand, He spoke of the Apostles as sitting on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and answered questions of the disciples about places of supreme honour and power.' 'But when, in view of the falling away of the people, His earthly destruction seemed impending, He recognized it to be the purpose of God, and made it His own purpose, to establish only a spiritual Kingdom in loyal hearts, and left it to the wonder-working energy of His Heavenly Father to make it grow into a world-power' (*Gesch. Jesu*², 517 ff.). This construction derives a certain plausibility from the fact that it seems to be a general law of Providence that God only gradually reveals His purpose to His chosen instruments, and that the founding and reformation of religions has seldom been carried out in accordance with a predetermined plan. But apart from the doctrinal difficulty of supposing that Jesus was ignorant of a matter so vital, the weight of the historical evidence is against the hypothesis. The story of the Temptation makes it clear that Jesus from the beginning rejected the idea of a Messiahship resting on a basis of political power. He was, moreover, too deeply versed in OT history not to know the usual fate of the prophets. An early saying is preserved, in which He compared the Galilean spring-tide to a wedding which would be followed by bereavement and mourning (Mk 21⁹, 20).

(3) A more recent phase of the discussion was initiated by Baldensperger (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 1888), who made use of the ideas of the Jewish Apocalyptic literature to explain the later teaching of Jesus. He differs from Hase in that he holds that the political ideal was completely rejected in the wilderness, and that during the Galilean period Jesus made prominent the spiritual nature of the Kingdom—although not knowing when and how it was to be realized. At the later date, when the fatal issue became probable, He would welcome the thought of His death as solving many difficulties, while He more fully appropriated the current Apocalyptic ideas of the Kingdom, and promised to return in the clouds to establish by supernatural means a Kingdom of a heavenly pattern. The interesting fact brought out by this line of investigation is that in His Messianic utterances Jesus applied to Himself, to a much greater extent than was formerly supposed, the contemporary Jewish conceptions about the Messiah, the manner of His advent, and the exercise of His power. But the attempt so to enter into His consciousness as to trace a development in His attitude towards these ideas is too speculative to be readily endorsed.

At the opposite pole is the theory of Wrede (Das Messiasgeheimnis, 1901), who denies that Jesus ever claimed to be the Messiah, and regards the relative passages, and also the injunctions to secrecy, as fiction. But even the Resurrection would not have created the belief in the Messiahship had Jesus not made the claim in life (Jülicher, New Lines, 1906, p. 23).

(B) THE JUDEAN MINISTRY.—In seeking to follow the footsteps of Jesus after His departure from Galilee, we have to choose between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. All that the former directly tell us is that He next entered upon a mission in Judaea and beyond Jordan, Mk 10¹ ('Judaea beyond Jordan,' Mt 19¹), and that after an undefined interval He travelled by way of Jericho, with a company, to keep the last Passover in Jerusalem. According to the Fourth Gospel, the Peræan sojourn was only an episode in a Southern ministry which extended over six months, and of which the scene was laid mainly in Jerusalem. There can be little doubt that at this point the Fourth Gospel is in possession of reliable information. Mk. and Mt. are very vague in their notices, and Lk. uses the journey to Jerusalem (9¹¹-18¹⁴) as the framework of a mass of material which obviously belongs to a number of different places and times. It is to be noticed that there are incidental references in Mk. and Lk. which imply that there were visits to Jerusalem before the end—notably the incident at the inhospitable Samaritan village, which may well have occurred when Jesus went up on an earlier occasion from Galilee (Lk. 9¹¹-18¹⁴; cf. 17¹¹-19¹⁹). We may hold, as Tatian held that the Fourth Gospel misplaces important events, and even that events of the Judean ministry are altogether ante-dated; but it seems certain that it is right in placing a mission to Jerusalem immediately after the closing scenes in Galilee. Apart from the confidence and circumstantiality of the report, there are various considerations which make it probable that He proceeded to Jerusalem. For Jesus Himself, with His knowledge of the destined end, felt the necessity of bringing things to a decisive issue. He was straitened till His baptism should be accomplished (12⁴⁰). From the point of view of the disciples, who could not believe in the tragic event, it was natural to expect Him to lay before the religious leaders and the people of the capital the evidence that had created their own faith. We also hear of a natural taunt of those who believed not. Why hesitate to submit the case to those who are really competent to judge? (Jn 7⁴). On the other hand, there are facts which are difficult to explain on the supposition that Jesus only arrived in Jerusalem a few days before the Crucifixion. The knowledge and the hatred of His enemies disclosed in the last week, point to earlier collisions, and an earlier ministry of some duration seems clearly implied in the words, 'How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' (Mt 23³⁷).

(1) Sequence of events.—At the Feast of Tabernacles, which fell in the third week of the month Tishri (Sept.-Oct.), Jesus appeared in Jerusalem, where He taught and disputed in the courts of the Temple, making many disciples (Jn 8¹²). The healing of the man blind from his birth belongs to this time. After a brief retirement (8¹⁴), He returned to the Feast of Dedication (10²²) on the last week of the ninth month (Nov.-Dec.), when His claims and rebukes led to a threat of stoning, and to plans for His arrest (10³¹, 39). He next withdrew beyond Jordan, where His ministry met with much success (Jn 10⁴⁰-42, with which matter in Mk 10, Mt 19, 20, Lk 18¹⁴-19²⁷ may be parallel). Hence He returns to Bethany on hearing of the sickness of Lazarus, whom He raises from the dead (Jn 11¹-46). Next follows a sojourn with His disciples at Ephraim, a town supposed to be in the N.E. of Judea (11⁵⁴). The narratives are combined by the hypothesis that from Ephraim He proceeded to join the train of Galilean pilgrims—probably at Jericho (Mk 10⁴⁶, Mt 20²⁹, Lk 18³⁵); and that in their company He made His last journey to Jerusalem. He arrived on the Friday, before the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath, and lodged at Bethany (Jn 12¹).

(2) The Johannine picture.—In passing from the Synoptics to the Fourth Gospel we are conscious of many differences. In contrast to the free movement of act and speech, there is something stereotyped in the way in which events develop and arguments are sustained. In place of the vividness and the rich variety of the Synoptic discourses, we have the frequent recurrence of a few themes, and the reiteration and exemplification of the fundamental ideas of the Gospel. But what is most noticeable is that, while with the Synoptics the Messiahship of Jesus is a secret which is spoken of only after a great venture of faith in the Apostolic circle, there is here no evidence whatever of reserve. The confession of Peter is mentioned (8²⁹), but many have known Him before,—Andrew as far back as the Baptism (14¹). Moreover, the point of most of the discourses delivered by Jesus is that He is the Messiah, and more than the Messiah, and that His claim rests upon the strongest authentication. That this was the burden of His teaching after Cæsarea Philippi, we may well believe, for it is quite in accordance with the situation disclosed by the Synoptics at the close of the Galilean ministry, that Jesus, after being assured of the faith of the Apostles, should have proceeded to urge His claim in the boldest and most public way. But for the same reason it is difficult to believe that the discourses connected with earlier visits to Jerusalem, which contain the same message, are properly dated. The interview with Nicodemus, as well as the cleansing of the Temple, may well belong to the later phase of the ministry; and the story of the woman of Samaria may be an incident of the journey from Galilee to the Feast of Tabernacles. The supposition that the Fourth Gospel has interwoven with the Galilean period events which all belong to the one Judean ministry of the last six months seems to the writer to go far to lighten the difficulties of the harmonist, and to make it possible to profit, without being misled, by its history.

(a) The self-witness of Jesus.—He publicly claims to be the Messiah. 'If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly.' Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believed not. (10²⁴, 25; cf. 9³⁵-37). There is also developed a high doctrine of His origin and primordial dignity. He is from God (7²⁹); He is before Abraham was (8⁵⁶); He and the Father are one (10³⁰)—which last is interpreted to mean that being a man, He makes Himself God (v. 43). Proportional to His dignity are the blessings which He bestows— repose and refreshment of soul (7³⁷; cf. 4¹⁴), true life (5⁴⁰), spiritual freedom (8³²), resurrection and life everlasting (11²⁵).

(b) The proof of Christ's claim.—To the repeated demand for corroboration Jesus appeals to God as His witness. The source of His doctrine, God also attests its truth (8¹⁸). In this connexion the healing of the blind man (ch. 7) is thought of as decisive: When the Christ shall come, the multitude ask, 'will he do more signs than those which this man hath done?' (v. 31). His divine mission, it is further declared, is accredited by His disinterested zeal for God's glory (8⁴⁹, 50). On the other hand, great stress is laid on the fact that the attitude to Christ is determined by the spirit and the life of those who come in contact with Him. Those who are of the truth instinctively recognize Him for what He is, as the sheep know the voice of their shepherd (10⁴, cf. 18²⁷). To a good man Christ is self-evidencing. 'If any man willet to do his will, he shall know of the teaching whether it be of God' (7¹⁷).

(c) The explanation of the Passion.—He speaks of His sufferings and death not merely to His disciples, but to the half-believing (3¹⁴), and before the multitude (10¹, 20). The points of view under which the Passion is presented are that it is not an evidence of God's rejection, but an act of self-surrender which calls forth the Father's love (10¹⁷), that death comes in the line of the vocation of a good shepherd (10¹¹), that it is His own voluntary act (10¹⁸), and that it is at once the ground of salvation (3¹⁴) and the secret of the gospel's spell (12²⁴).

(d) The response of the hearers.—The Fourth Gospel shows us Jesus surrounded by three classes—a band of believers, the multitude which, though divided and wavering, is deeply impressed, and the religious leaders who regard Him with hatred or contempt. The charges, as in Galilee, are mainly Sabbath-breaking (7²²) and blasphemous utterances (10³³); and the attempt is made further to discredit Him as unlearned (7¹⁵) and a Galilean (v. 41). Finally, a definite resolution is formed to destroy Him. What brought matters to a head, according to this Gospel, was the raising of Lazarus, which produced a popular excitement that portended the acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah, and gave reason to fear the infliction of the most severe retribution by the Romans (11¹⁸).

11. The week of the Passion.—A view may be given of the probable order of events between the arrival of Jesus in Bethany on the eve of the Sabbath and the Crucifixion.

Saturday: the supper in the house of Simon the leper (Jn 12¹⁴, Mk 14³⁰).

Sunday: the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mk 11¹⁻¹⁰), visit to the Temple, return to Bethany (Mk 11¹¹).

Monday: visit to Jerusalem, the cursing of the fig-tree (Mk 11¹²⁻¹⁴), the cleansing of the Temple (Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸), return to Bethany (v.¹⁹).

Tuesday: visit to Jerusalem, teaching in the Temple, interrogation by members of the Sanhedrin (Mk 11²⁷⁻³³), Pharisees (12¹³⁻¹⁷), and Sadducees (12¹⁸⁻²⁷), and others; parables (Mk 12²⁸⁻³⁴); return to Bethany.

Wednesday: visit to Jerusalem, denunciation of the Pharisees (Mk 12³⁵⁻⁴⁰), discourse on the last things (Mk 13³⁻³⁷), deliberations of the Sanhedrin (14¹), the overtures of Judas (14¹⁰), return to Bethany.

Thursday: preparation for the Passover (Mk 14¹²⁻¹⁶) the Last Supper (14¹⁷⁻²⁰) the Agony (14²¹⁻²⁶), the betrayal and the arrest (14²⁷⁻²⁸).

The chief difficulties presented by the narratives may be briefly noticed. (a) The Synoptists make the triumphal entry take place on the arrival of Jesus with the pilgrims from Galilee (Mk 11⁸), while according to John it was arranged while Jesus was staying at Bethany (12¹⁻¹²). (b) The anointing in Bethany, which is seemingly placed by Mk. (14¹) two days before the Passover, is expressly dated by Jn. (12¹) six days before the Passover. (c) The day of our Lord's death, according to all accounts, was on the Friday; but while the Synoptists make this to have been the Passover day, or the 15th Nisan (Mk 14¹²⁻¹⁷), the Fourth Gospel represents it as the day before the Feast of the Passover (13¹), or the 14th Nisan. In each of these cases there is reason to believe that the Fourth Gospel is accurate. As regards the day of our Lord's death, it is unlikely that the Passover day, which had the sanctity of a Sabbath, would have been profaned by the Jewish authorities engaging in business, while the evidence of haste in carrying out the crucifixion points to the same conclusion.

(1) The activity of Jesus.—In agreement with the general view of the Judaean ministry given in the Fourth Gospel, the work of Jesus during the last week falls mainly under the point of view of an affirmation of His Messiahship in deed and word. Naturally, also, His mind is turned to the future, and His discourses set forth the power and glory reserved for the crucified Messiah in the counsels of God. The explanation and vindication of His mission have their counterpart in an attack upon the principles of those who had rejected Him and who were plotting His destruction.

(i) The Messianic acts.—The triumphal entry, in which Jesus was offered and accepted the homage of the multitude (Mk 11⁸), is decisive evidence that He made the claim to be the Messiah. Evidently, also, there is a natural connexion between the public assumption of His dignity and the cleansing of the Temple. According to one account, Jesus proceeded immediately after His triumphal entry to carry out the reform of the Temple of God (Mt 21¹²⁻¹³).

(ii) The Messianic discourses.—The burden of the discourses in which the Messianic claim is prominent is that there awaits Him the same fate as the prophets—that He will be rejected by His people and put to death (parables of the Vineyard, Mk 12¹⁻¹²; and the Marriage Feast, Mt 22¹⁻¹⁴). But beyond this seeming failure, two vistas open up into the future. The death is the prelude to a glorious future, when Christ will return a second time, accompanied by the angels, and will have at His command all power needed for the establishment and defence of His Kingdom. For this type of teaching the main source is the so-called 'Synoptic Apocalypse' (Mk 13³⁻³⁷, Mt 24¹⁻⁵⁰, Lk 21¹⁻³⁶), with the topics of the Day of the Son of Man, the Passover, and the Last Judgment. The other leading thought is that the guilt of the rejection of their Messiah will be terribly avenged upon the Jews in the horrors of the last days, and especially in the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Temple (Mk 13¹⁻², Mt 24¹⁻², 15¹⁻²).

(iii) The polemics.—The self-vindication of Jesus naturally involved an examination of the position of those who rejected His claim. We have already seen the nature of His replies to the detailed objections which were made to His teaching. As the crisis approaches, He advances, in the manner represented by the Fourth Gospel to be characteristic of the whole Judaean ministry, to an attack upon the religious position of His adversaries—especially of the professed saints and religious guides. Their hypocrisy, their spiritual pride, their blindness, the cupidity and cruelty which their pretended sanctity cannot wholly mask, are exposed in the most merciless invective (the Woes of Mt 23¹⁻³⁶).

(2) Reasons for the hatred of Jesus.—We are accustomed to think of the opposition to Jesus as due to a temporary ascendancy of a diabolic element in human nature, but as a fact the hatred of the principal parties, and the murderous conspiracy in which it issued, are too easily intelligible from the point of view of average political action. The chief responsibility rests with the Sadducees, who dominated the Sanhedrin, and who set in motion the machinery of the law. As we saw, they were statesmen and ecclesiastics, and it is the recognized business of the statesman to maintain social order, of the ecclesiastic to defend the interests of an institution, by such measures as the exigencies of the case seem to demand. And if they were convinced that the popular excitement aroused by Jesus was likely to be made a pretext by the Romans for depriving them of the last vestiges of national existence (Jn 11⁴⁸); and if, on the other hand, His reforming zeal in the Temple was an attack on one of the sources of the revenues of the priesthood (Mk 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸), they could claim that what they did was to perform an administrative act under the compulsion of higher expediency. The Pharisees, while less able to strike, exhibited a more venomous hatred. They represented the standpoint of religious conservatism; and it has been no uncommon thing, or universally censured, for men to believe that what is essential in religion is old and unchangeable, and that it is a duty to God to suppress, if necessary by violence, the intrusion of new and revolutionary ideas. And though it is true that the old, to which they clung, itself contained the promise of the new, the new approached them in such unexpected shape that the conservative spirit could feel justified in attempting to crush it. Again, political and ecclesiastical leaders depend greatly on public respect and confidence, and are moved by the instinct of self-preservation to protect themselves against those who humiliate them or threaten to supplant them. It is therefore no surprising conjunction that soon after the exposure of the religion of the scribes and Pharisees, we read of a consultation to 'take him and kill him' (Mk 14¹, Mt 26³, Lk 20¹⁹). On the whole, therefore, it would appear, not indeed that the enemies of Jesus were excusable, but that they were so closely representative of normal ways of judging and acting in public life as to involve mankind, as such, in the guilt of the plot which issued in the death of Jesus.

(3) The preparation of a case.—Unless resort was to be had to assassination, it was necessary to frame a capital charge which could be substantiated before a legal tribunal, and a series of attempts were made at this time to extract from Jesus statements which could be used for this purpose. To convict Him of blasphemy might be sufficient, but as the consent of the Roman authorities had to be procured to the death penalty, it was an obvious advantage to have the charge of sedition in reserve. The first question, evidently framed by the Sanhedrin, was as to His authority (Mk 11²⁷⁻³³)). If we may believe the Fourth Gospel, He had often enough claimed to be from God, and to speak the things which the Father had showed Him; but He refused to fall in with their design, and puts a question about John the Baptist which reduces them to confusion. It is quite probable that the incident of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7⁵³⁻⁸¹) occurred at the same time—the intention being to compromise Jesus by eliciting a merciful judgment which would have the character of the repudiation of a Mosaic commandment. Jesus avoided the snare—inasmuch as He did not challenge the law which visited adultery with death, but at the same time made an appeal to the consciences of the accusers which constrained them to fall away from the charge. The question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar (Mk 12¹³⁻¹⁷)) was designed to procure a deliverance which would support the charge of treason. The answer of Jesus clearly meant that He regarded the Roman rule as part of the providential order which He did not propose to disturb, while yet it implied that there was a region into which the authority of Rome did not extend. While this answer balked the immediate purpose of His questioners, it may be that it so far served their end as to damp the popular enthusiasm with which He had been welcomed to Jerusalem. The question of the Sadducees about re-marriage and immortality (Mk 12¹⁸⁻²⁷) does not seem to have had any more serious purpose than to make a sceptical point; while the question of the scribe touching the first commandment of all likewise appears to have lain outside of the plot (12^{28d})).

(4) The maturing of the plan.—On the Wednesday a meeting of the Sanhedrin was held in the house of Caiaphas (Mt 26³; cf. Mk 14¹), at which it was resolved to apprehend Jesus. It was of importance to avoid a tumult, and they found a welcome instrument in Judas, who could undertake to guide them to His place of retirement (Mk 14¹⁰⁻¹¹). It is suggested in all accounts that the motive was mercenary (Mk 14¹¹; cf. Jn 12⁶), but it is also implied that Judas was beside himself when he lent himself to such an act of treachery (Lk 22³, Jn 13²⁷). Many moderns, following De Quincey, have thought that the action of Judas was intended to force Jesus to put forth His power. It would thus be of a kind with the policy of Themistocles when he knew that the Greek fleet could conquer if driven into a corner, and sent a seemingly treacherous message to the Persians urging them to advance to the attack. It is more probable that Judas was a patriotic fanatic who could not reconcile himself to the new conception of the Messiah, and now judged it to be a lost cause.

12. The Last Supper.—The Wednesday night, as before, was passed at Bethany. On the forenoon of the Thursday Jesus sent two of His disciples into the city, to bespeak a room from one of His friends, and to make the necessary preparation for the Paschal meal. The chronological difficulty already referred to is best surmounted by supposing that Jesus in partaking of the Passover with His disciples anticipated by a day the regular celebration. The matters recorded are the feet-washing (Jn 13⁴), the announcement of the betrayal (Mk 14¹⁸⁻²¹)), the institution of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper (Mk 14²²⁻²⁶, Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁹, Lk 22¹⁶⁻²⁰, 1 Co 11^{23d}), and the farewell discourses (Jn 14-17).

13. The Institution of the Lord's Supper.—It was in accordance with a deeply human instinct that Jesus, knowing the hour of separation to be at hand, desired to celebrate in the company of His disciples, whom He sometimes called His children, the most solemn domestic observance of OT religion (Lk 22¹⁵). It was further in agreement with His method of teaching that, in distributing to them bread and wine, He should have given to the act the significance of a parable and made it to testify of spiritual things (Mk 14^{22d}).

In the older period of controversy the questions agitated were of a kind which could be settled only by high doctrinal considerations, but there has been a recent discussion of the whole subject, conducted on literary and historical grounds, in which the following questions have been raised. (1) Did Jesus intend to institute a rite which should be repeated among His followers as the sacrament of the Lord's Supper? The main reason for denying it is that there is no injunction to repeat it in Mk. or Mt., or in the oldest text of Lk., and that we are thus thrown back on St. Paul as the sole authority. Some have therefore thought of the Apostle, who was familiar with the power of mysteries, as the founder of the institution (P. Gardner, The Origin of the Lord's Supper, 1893). But the recollection of its repetition as a sacrament goes back to the earliest days of the Church (Ac 24¹⁴); and, besides, it is incredible that 'a usage which was practically the invention of St. Paul could have spread from an outlying Gentile Church over the whole of Christendom' (Sanday, Outlines).

(2) Are the elements of bread and wine an essential part of the observance? It has been contended by Harnack (TU vii. 2) that in the primitive usage the only constant element was bread, and that water was frequently, if not commonly, used in place of wine. If a liberty is to be allowed with the original institution, there is less to be said in favour of unfermented wine, which destroys the symbolism, than of water, which was expressly used by our Lord as an emblem of the highest blessings which He bestows (Jn 4¹⁴ 7³⁷).

(3) How was the sacrament intended to be observed? Was it intended to become an element in a purely religious service, or to be grafted as an actual meal upon the social life of a community? It was certainly instituted in connexion with a common meal; in Apostolic times it followed on, if it was not identical with, the Agape; and this mode of observance continued to be popular, as Augustine attests, down to the fifth century. But, while there may be reason to regret that a mode of observance ceased which was calculated to have a hallowing influence in the sphere of social intercourse, now almost entirely secularized, we must believe with St. Paul that the primitive association of it with a common supper entailed the greater danger of secularizing, and even profaning, the sacrament (1 Co 11²¹ 22).

(4) What meaning did Jesus intend the sacrament to convey? In recent discussion it has been conceived as essentially predictive in character—i.e. as a foretaste of the communion which the disciples would enjoy with their Master in the future Kingdom of Heaven. Its central lesson has also been declared to be that food and drink when rightly used are a means of grace—that they become 'the food of the soul when partaken of with thanksgiving, in memory of Christ's death' (Harnack). Without denying to these suggestions an element of truth, it may be firmly held that the average thought of the Church has more nearly divined the meaning of Jesus in interpreting it as a parable of salvation through His sacrifice. The bread and wine were symbols of the strength and joy which Christ bestowed through His life-giving gospel, and He desired His death to be remembered as the sacrifice which in some way ratified and ushered in the new dispensation (Mk 14²⁴).

The attitude of the Fourth Gospel to the Lord's Supper is enigmatical. It relates the incident of the feet-washing (13^{2d}), and furnishes in another context a discourse which has the aspect of containing the sacramental teaching of the Gospel (6^{5d}). It is incredible that there was a purpose of denying the institution of the ordinance by Christ, but it may well be that the Fourth Gospel intended to emphasize the truth that 'eating of the flesh and drinking of the blood' of Christ is a spiritual act which is not tied exclusively to the rite of the Lord's Supper.

14. The inner life of Jesus during the period.—The soul of Jesus was agitated by a succession of deep and conflicting emotions. Amid the hosannas of the triumphal entry He wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19⁴¹). In pain and wrath He contended with His enemies, and in the intervals of conflict He spoke of a peace which the world could not take away, and uttered words of thanksgiving and joy. He was gladdened by tokens of faith and devotion from His followers (Jn 12³), and He was also wounded in the house of His friends, when one of the Twelve became the tool of His enemies, and even Peter's faith failed. More and more exclusively He felt Himself thrown for sympathy on the unseen presence of the Father (16³²). 'Every night he went out, and lodged in the mount that is called the mount of Olives' (Lk 21³⁷). He probably spent the night in the open air and gave hours of vigil to the duty, which He now so earnestly enforced, of watching and praying. It was to look around and before, and to look upward to the Father, that He left the supper-room and 'went unto a place called Gethsemane' (Mk 14³²⁻⁴²). It may well be that there were many thoughts that burdened His mind in the Agony, but the plain sense of the narrative is that He prayed that He might be enabled, in some other way than through shame and death, to accomplish the work which had been given Him. Being truly man, He could shrink from the impending ordeal of humiliation and suffering, and ask to be spared; being the perfect Son, He added, 'howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt' (v. 39). 'To such a prayer the only possible answer was that He received from the Father the assurance that according to His holy and loving counsel there was no other possible way' (Weiss, ii. 500). Then He arose and went forward to meet the armed band which Judas had guided through the darkness to His retreat.

15. The Passion.—The order of events.—

The arrest, in Gethsemane, on the Thursday, some time before midnight (Mk 11¹⁻⁴², Mt 26¹⁻⁵⁶, Lk 22¹⁷⁻⁶², Jn 18¹⁻²). Removal to the palace of the high priest, private examination by Annas (Jn 18³⁰).

Trial in the early morning before the Sanhedrin, meeting in the high priest's palace, and presided over by Caiaphas, condemnation and buffeting (Mk 14⁵³⁻⁶⁵, Mt 26⁵⁷⁻⁶⁸, Lk 22⁶⁶⁻⁷¹), Peter's denial (Mk 14⁶⁶⁻⁷²).

Trial before Pilate at daybreak, probably in the Fort of Antonia (Mk 15²⁻⁵, Mt 27¹¹⁻¹⁴, Lk 23²⁻⁴, Jn 18³³⁻³⁸). Jesus before Herod (Lk 23¹²).

The Roman trial resumed, the sentence, the mocking, and the scourging (Mk 15⁶⁻²⁰, Mt 27¹⁵⁻³⁰, Lk 23¹²⁻²⁵, Jn 18³⁹, 19¹⁻³).

The journey to the Cross (Mk 15²⁰⁻²³, Mt 27³¹⁻³⁴, Lk 23²⁶⁻³², Jn 19⁴⁻¹⁷).

The Crucifixion, beginning at 9 A. M. (Mk 15²⁵), or after noon-day (Jn 19¹⁴); death and burial (Mk 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁷, Mt 27⁴⁵⁻⁶¹, Lk 23⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸, Jn 19²⁻⁴²).

The primary source is the narrative in Mk., which, however, becomes meagre and somewhat external in its report of the events subsequent to Peter's fall. The author of the Fourth Gospel claims to have had opportunities for a more intimate view of things (Jn 18¹⁵), and as a fact gives illuminating information about the more secret proceedings of the authorities. Lk. adds some incidents, notably the appearance before Herod.

(1) The trials.—In the Jewish trial there are usually distinguished two stages—a private examination before Annas (Jn 18^{13ff.}), and the prosecution before the Sanhedrin under the presidency of Caiaphas (Mk 14⁵³). There is, moreover, reason to suppose that the second of these was a meeting of a committee of the Sanhedrin held during the night, or of the Sanhedrin meeting as a committee, and that it was followed by a regular session of the Council at daybreak, at which the provisional finding was formally ratified (Mk 15¹).

(i) The examination before Annas.—Annas, who had been deposed from the high priesthood twenty years before, continued to be the de facto leader of the Council, and it was natural for him to wish to see Jesus, with a view to putting matters in train. In reply to his question about His disciples and His teaching, Jesus asked him to call his witnesses—the point being that according to Jewish law a man was held to be innocent, and even unaccused, until hostile witnesses had stated their case.

(ii) The trial before the Sanhedrin.—At the subsequent meeting of the Council the ordinary procedure was followed, and the indictment was made by witnesses. The charge which they brought forward was a constructive charge of blasphemy, founded on the statement that He had attacked sacred institutions in threatening to destroy the Temple (Mk 14⁵⁸). The evidence not being consistent (v. 59), the high priest appealed directly to Jesus to say if He claimed to be the Christ (v. 61). Though this question was contrary to law, which forbade any one to be condemned to death on his own confession, Jesus answered 'I am.' The supernatural claim was forthwith declared, with signs of horror and indignation, to amount to blasphemy, and He was 'condemned to be worthy of death' (v. 64). That a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin was thereafter held to ratify the judgment is implied in Mk 15¹, and was probably necessary to regularize the proceedings, as capital trials might be begun only in the daytime. (On this and cognate points, see Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ, 1905.)

(iii) The Roman trial.—It is not quite certain whether the Sanhedrin had the right of trying a person on a capital charge; in any case, a death-sentence required to be endorsed by the Roman governor. The Jews obviously took the position that in a case of the kind it was the duty of the governor to give effect to their judgment without going into its merits; but Pilate insisted on his right to make a full review of the charge and its grounds. In this situation, against which they protested, they felt the difficulty of securing sentence on the religious charge of blasphemy, and accordingly fell back on the political charge of treason. 'They began to accuse him, saying, We found this man perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king' (Lk 23²). In reply to Pilate's question, Jesus claimed to be a king, but doubtless disarmed the governor's suspicion by some such addition as that He was a king in the realm of the truth (Jn 18³⁶). Then follow three devices of Pilate to evade responsibility—the remand to the tribunal of the vassal-prince of Galilee, Herod Antipas (Lk 23^{6ff.}); the proposal to scourge Him and release Him (v. 19); and the reference to the multitude (Mk 15^{6ff.}). Foiled in each attempt, he still hesitated, when the accusers put the matter in a light which overwhelmed his scruples. They threatened to complain that he had not supported them in stamping out treason (Jn 19¹²). Tiberius was known to be peculiarly sensitive on the point of laesa majestas, while Pilate's hands were not so clean that he could welcome any investigation; and he therefore pronounced Him guilty of sedition as the pretended king of the Jews, and delivered Him to be crucified (v. 16). He was then scourged, dressed with mock emblems of royalty, treated with derision and insult, and led forth to the place of execution (Mk 15^{16ff.}).

The action of the judges.—There has been considerable discussion of the action of the judges of Jesus from the point of view of Jewish and Roman law. That the procedure and verdict of the Jewish authorities were according to the law which they were set to administer has been ably argued by Salvador (Hist. des Institutions de Moïse, 1862), but it seems to have been shown that in the proceedings the most sacred principles of Jewish jurisprudence were violated, and that 'the process had neither the form nor the fairness of a judicial trial' (Taylor Innes, op. cit.). It has also been argued that in view of the requirements of the Roman law, and of the duties of his position, Pilate was right in passing sentence of death (Fitzjames Stephen, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity). On this it must be said that as Pilate did not believe Jesus to be guilty of the crime imputed to Him, he must be held to have transgressed the spirit of Roman justice. On the other hand, it is true that 'the claim of Jesus was truly inconsistent with the claim of the State which Caesar represented,' and that in sentencing Jesus to death Pilate faithfully, if unconsciously, interpreted the antagonism of the Roman Empire and the Christian religion (Taylor Innes, op. cit. p. 122).

(2) The disciples in the crisis.—The disciples made no heroic figure in the catastrophe. They took to flight at the arrest (Mk 14⁵⁰), and Peter, who followed afar off, denied his Master with curses (v. 68). It is also significant that no attempt was made to capture the Apostles; apart from Jesus it was evidently thought that they were quite negligible. In fairness it should, however, be remembered that the two opportunities which they might have had of showing their courage were denied them—they were forbidden by Jesus to resist when He was arrested (Mt 26⁵²), and no witnesses were allowed to come forward in His defence at the trial. The beloved disciple, along with Mary, the mother of Jesus, and two other women, was present at the crucifixion (Jn 19²⁵).

(3) The bearing of Jesus.—The words of Jesus during the last day were few. For the most part He listened to the accusations, and bore the indignities, in silence. The oldest report, while making Him testify that He suffered and died as the Messiah, represents Him as deliberately refusing to answer the false witnesses, or to plead before Pilate. The other accounts relate that He condescended, as is probable enough, to point out the iniquity of the procedure (Mt 26⁶³, Jn 18³¹), and to explain to Pilate the true nature of His claim (Jn 18³⁶). The decision in Gethsemane gave Him the insight and the resolution that bore Him unshaken through the ordeal of the trials. He expressed the assurance that, had He asked, the Father would have delivered Him by His angels (Mt 26⁵³); but He knew the Father's will, to which He had bowed, to be that, according to the Scriptures (v. 54) He should be led as a lamb to the slaughter. What He felt towards His enemies can only be gathered from His silence—which may have had in it an element of holy scorn, but certainly also involved compassion for the blinded men who were now fixedly committed to their murderous purpose. Whether actually heard by witnesses or not, the first word on the cross (Lk 23³⁴) assuredly expresses an authentic thought of Him who had taught, 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you' (Mt 5⁴⁴). Only less striking is the self-forgetting sympathy that came to expression in the journey of Jesus to the cross, when the women bewailed and lamented Him: 'Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children' (Lk 23²⁸).

(4) The Crucifixion.—The scene of the execution was Golgotha (Mk 15²²), possibly so named from the skull-like contour of the eminence. Crucifixion was a form of death by torture which was reserved by the Romans for slaves and rebels, and that combined the height of ignominy with the extremity of suffering. 'Terrible were the sufferings caused by the piercing of the hands and the feet in the most sensitive parts, the extension of the limbs with their burning wounds, the impeding of the circulation of the blood, the growing oppression and exhaustion, the increasing thirst under the long-drawn mortal agonies' (Weiss, ii. 536). The indignity of such a death was heightened by the spectacle of the soldiers casting lots for His garments (Mk 15²⁴), and by the taunts of His fellow-sufferers, of the multitude, and of the priests (vv. 25-28). The narcotic draught which was usually offered to the victim, was refused by Jesus (v. 23). For six hours, according to vv. 25-28, His torments endured; and late in the afternoon, with a loud cry, He expired (v. 37). The accompanying signs, according to Mk., were a darkness lasting for three hours (v. 33), and the rending of the veil of the Temple (v. 38), to which Mt. adds the portent—'many bodies of the saints that had fallen asleep were raised' (27⁵²). Both, along with Lk. (23⁴⁷), record a confession of faith by the Roman centurion. Jn. relates, with a solemn affirmation of the authority of an eye-witness, that a soldier 'pierced his side with a spear, and straightway there came out blood and water' (19³⁴).

The Seven Words on the cross are commonly supposed to have been spoken in the following order:—

- (1) 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do' (Lk 23³⁴)—assigned to the time when He was being nailed to the cross.
- (2) 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise' (v. 43)—spoken to the penitent robber.
- (3) 'Woman, behold thy son'; 'Behold thy mother' (Jn 19²⁶⁻²⁷)—spoken to Mary, and to the beloved disciple.
- (4) 'I thirst' (v. 28).
- (5) 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mk 15³⁴, Mt 27⁴⁶).

- (6) 'It is finished' (Jn 19³⁰).
- (7) 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23⁴⁶).

The 'words' are not all equally certain. On textual grounds (1) is placed by WH in double brackets, and is regarded by Weiss as unquestionably a second-century gloss. The incident of the penitent robber was unknown to the oldest tradition. Evidently there was also uncertainty as to the last utterance of Jesus. That reported by Mk.—Mt. is certainly authentic; none could have invented a saying which ascribed to Jesus a sense of desertion by the Father in the hour of death. On the other hand, the character of Jesus requires us to believe that upon the agony there supervened the filial trust and resignation which find expression in the Lukan and Johannine words.

(5) The burial.—There were friends of Jesus who, though powerless to resist the general will, were at least able to secure the seemingly burial of the body. With Pilate's permission, Joseph of Arimathea, with whom Nicodemus is associated (Jn 19³⁹), had the corpse removed from the cross, wrapped in a linen cloth, and laid in a rock-hewn tomb—the entrance to which was closed by a great stone (Mk 15⁴⁶). Mt. adds that, at the request of the Jewish authorities, the stone was sealed, and a guard set over the tomb (27⁶²⁻⁶⁴).

16. The Resurrection.—Nothing in history is more certain than that the disciples of Jesus believed that, after being crucified, dead and buried, He rose again from the dead on the third day, and that at intervals thereafter He met and conversed with them in different places. The proof that they believed this is the existence of the Christian Church. It is simply inconceivable that the scattered and disheartened remnant could have found a rallying-point and a gospel in the memory of one who had been put to death as a criminal, if they had not believed that God had owned Him and accredited His mission in raising Him up from the dead. There are many difficulties connected with the subject, and the narratives, which are disappointingly meagre, also contain irreconcilable discrepancies; but those who approach it under the impression of the uniqueness of Christ's Person and of His claim on God, find the historical testimony sufficient to guarantee the credibility of the central fact.

(1) The rising on the third day.—There is a consensus of testimony in the Gospels to the following facts—that on the morning of the first day of the week certain women went to the sepulchre, that they found the stone rolled away and the grave empty, that they were informed by an angel that Jesus was risen, and that they were bidden to convey the news to the other disciples. Whether the discovery was first made by Mary Magdalene alone (Jn 20¹), or in company with other women (Mk 16¹); whether there was one angel (Mt 28²), or two (Jn 20¹²); whether fear or joy preponderated (Mk 16⁸, Mt 28⁸), were points on which the report varied. A more serious discrepancy is that, according to the oldest source, the message to the disciples was that they would meet the risen Lord in Galilee (Mk 16⁷, Mt 28⁷); while as a fact all the Gospels, except the mutilated Mk., proceed to narrate appearances in Jerusalem, and Lk. knows of no other. It cannot, however, be said that the inconsistency is insuperable, as Mt. has consciously combined the Galilean promise with a reference to a preliminary appearance in Jerusalem (Mt 28⁹⁻¹⁰).

(2) The places and number of the appearances.—Subject to the possibility of confusion arising from the slightness of the allusions, the Biblical list is as follows:—

- (1) To certain women as they returned from the sepulchre (Mt 28⁹⁻¹⁰).
- (2) To Mary Magdalene on the same day (Jn 20¹¹⁻¹⁴).
- (3) To Peter, on the day of the Resurrection, in Jerusalem (Lk 24³⁴, 1 Co 15⁵).
- (4) To two disciples on the same day on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24¹³⁻³⁵; cf. Mk 16¹²⁻¹³).

(6) To the ten Apostles on the same day in Jerusalem (Mk 16¹⁴⁻¹⁵, Lk 24³⁶⁻⁴⁹, Jn 20¹⁹⁻²³, 1 Co 15⁵).

(6) To the eleven Apostles a week later in Jerusalem (Jn 20²⁶⁻²⁹).

(7) To several disciples, including at least four Apostles, at the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21¹⁻²⁴).

(8) To five hundred brethren (1 Co 15⁶; cf. perhaps Mt 28¹⁶⁻²⁰).

(9) To James (1 Co 15⁷).

(10) To the Apostles at Jerusalem before the Ascension (Lk 24⁵⁰⁻⁵², Ac 1²⁻⁵; cf. Mk 16¹⁹). St. Paul adds the appearance to himself on the way to Damascus (1 Co 15⁹). (Milligan, Resurrection of our Lord, 259-261).

The accounts present many difficulties. Why does Mt. relate the appearance in Jerusalem to the women only, and ignore the all-important manifestations to the Twelve? If, according to the message of the angel, the scene of the intercourse of the risen Lord with His disciples was to be in Galilee, why does Lk. record only appearances in Jerusalem and in the neighbourhood? Further, as the disciples are in Jerusalem eight days after the Resurrection, and again at the Ascension, it seems difficult to interpolate a return to Galilee in which the Apostles resumed their former avocations (Jn 21³). It has been supposed by some that after the Crucifixion the disciples returned to Galilee, that it was among the haunts which were instinct with memories of Him that Jesus returned to them in vision, and that this older recollection, though not altogether eradicated, has been blurred in the Gospels by later manipulation. But the most certain of all the facts is that belief in the Resurrection began on the third day—which points to Jerusalem; while the difficulty about fitting the Galilean appearances into the chronological scheme is reduced by consideration of the rapidity with which the little country could be traversed.

(3) The mode of existence of the risen Christ.—There are two sets of notices which are not easily combined in an intelligible conception. On the one hand, there are several statements which create the impression that Jesus resumed the same mode of bodily existence which was interrupted at His death upon the cross. The story of the empty tomb (Mk 16¹⁻⁸) meant that the body which had hung upon the cross was revived. That it was a body of flesh and blood, capable of being handled, and sustained by food and drink—not an apparition of a spiritualistic kind,—is a point which is specially emphasized in details of the narratives (Jn 20²⁷, Lk 24⁴⁰). On the other hand, it is far from being a normal life in the body. His face and form have a strange aspect. He appears suddenly in the midst, the doors being shut (Jn 20²⁶), and as suddenly vanishes out of their sight (Lk 24³¹). To this series belong the references of St. Paul, who places the appearance to himself on a level with the others, and speaks of Christ as possessing a body which is not of flesh and blood, but has been transfigured and glorified (1 Co 15⁵⁰, Ph 3²¹). The explanation of the phenomena, according to Schleiermacher, is that in the one set of statements we have the matter described from the side of the risen Christ, in the other an account of the impression which He made on the disciples (Leben Jesu). Others conceive that while after the Resurrection He existed as a spiritual being, He yet assumed material substance and form at special moments for special purposes (Rothe, Theologische Ethik). The primitive theory probably was that after the Resurrection His mode of existence was the same as during the ministry, with an augmentation of the power over His body which He even then possessed (Mk 6⁴⁵⁻⁵⁰), and that only at the Ascension was the body transformed. Some modern theologians hold that the body was raised from the grave as a spiritual body, others that it was gradually spiritualized in the period between the Resurrection and the Ascension. The phenomena belong to a sphere about which we cannot dogmatize.

(4) Denial of the Resurrection.—The negative case has two branches: (1) a critical examination of the historical evidence; (2) a hypothesis which shall explain how the Church came to believe that Jesus had risen from the dead. On the first head it has already been suggested that it is unfair to magnify the discrepancies and ignore the important consensus.

The explanations began with (1) the theory of imposture. The disciples, it was said, were unwilling to return to work, and in order that they might still have a message, they stole the body, and pretended that Christ had risen (Reimarus, Von dem Zwecke Jesu u. seiner Jünger, 1892). No one now believes that any great religion, least of all Christianity, was founded on fraud. The disciples might indeed have been themselves deceived by finding the tomb empty. Joseph of Arimathea might have removed the body to another grave without the knowledge of the disciples (O. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, 1901). But it is difficult to believe that a misapprehension so easily corrected could have been allowed to develop into the universal belief that He had been seen alive.

(2) In the school of Eighteenth Century Rationalism the favourite explanation was that Jesus did not really die on the cross, but revived in the cool of the sepulchre, and again appeared among His disciples (most recently Hase, *Gesch. Jesu*², 727 ff.). It is true that to escape with His life after being nailed to the cross might have been described as a resurrection from the dead; but it is incredible that the Roman soldiers should have failed to carry out the execution of a condemned man, and equally incredible that a lacerated and emaciated man, who soon afterwards died of His wounds, should have made the impression of having come off as more than a conqueror.

(3) The usual explanation now given from the naturalistic standpoint is that the appearances were purely visionary. Visions are common phenomena of the religious life in times of excitement; they are, moreover, often contagious, and it is supposed that they began with the women, probably with Mary Magdalene (Renan, Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 206), and were repeated for a time in the Apostolic circle. The most weighty objections to this hypothesis are, that while in other cases the visions have followed faith, in the case before us they created it out of sorrow and despair, and also that while other visions have led to nothing considerable, these brought the Church into existence and immeasurably enriched the higher life of the world.

(4) The hypothesis of Keim is to the effect that the appearances were real in so far that Jesus, whose spirit had returned to God, produced upon the minds of believers impressions which they interpreted as bodily manifestations. Christian faith oversteps these boundaries (of the natural order), not merely in the certain assurance that Jesus took His course to the higher world of spirits, but also in the conviction that it was He and no other who, as dead yet risen again, as celestially glorified even if not risen, vouchsafed visions to His disciples. It thus completes and illumines what to science remained an obscure point and a vexatious limitation of its knowledge (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. vi. p. 360). This theory deserves to be treated with more respect than it has commonly received from apologists. It at least rejects the idea that the visions were hallucinations; and we are not so well-informed as to the nature of existences as to be able to deny reality to what is given in experiences which are due to the power, and which are according to the purpose, of God. The most serious difficulty for those who follow the records is that it supposes that the grave was not left empty, and that the body underwent corruption.

(5) Another theory, which has recently had some currency (Martineau, Seal of Authority in Religion, pp. 363-7), finds the basis of the belief in a physical resurrection in a misconception of the meaning of mystical utterances of the disciples about union and communion with Christ. It is, however, clear that St. Paul distinguished very clearly between the experience that to him 'to live was Christ,' or that 'Christ lived in him,' and the appearance which he had witnessed on the way to Damascus. 'They said they had seen Jesus after His death, and their hearers understood them to mean they had seen Him in the body.' If they were not put right by the Apostles, it is fairly said that this somewhat compromised their character for candour (Bruce, *Apologetics*², 396 f.).

The impression conveyed by a review of the various theories is that the phenomena which generated the faith of the Church have not been explained on naturalistic principles. They are intelligible only as an intermingling of two universes of being ordinarily kept distinct. They have something in common with the phenomena of Spiritualism, and as a fact the Spiritualist claims to understand elements in the story which Christians have humbly accepted in faith, and to find supremely credible what the ordinary rationalism dismisses as superstition. It is, however, only in a very indirect way, if at all, that Christian faith can derive support from Spiritualism. It seems to be proved that if communication is established at all with the spirit-world, it is merely with 'the dregs and lees of the unseen universe'—with spirits who either have not the power or else the will to communicate anything of importance to man; and, this being so, the Resurrection and appearances of Christ, with their unique and far-reaching spiritual result, come under a totally different Divine economy. In the risen Christ we have the one authentic glimpse of the world which otherwise can do no more than attest its existence to those who peep and mutter (Waite, Studies in Mysticism, 1906).

(5) Significance of the Resurrection.—(a) In the Primitive Church the Resurrection was regarded as at once the authentication of Christianity, and a vitally important element of doctrine. Its apologetic value was appraised equally highly in the appeal to Jews and to Gentiles (Ac 4th 17th). The argument was that God had accredited Jesus' mission and accepted His work in raising Him up from the dead. In recent apologetic, at least of the English school, there has been a tendency to stake the truth of Christianity on the evidence for the Resurrection (Row, Christian Evidences, 1887); but it is always to be remembered that the evidence for the miracle itself depends for its credibility on the anterior impression of the supernatural made by the Person of Christ. It is not so generally recognized that the Resurrection has the value of a vindication of the ways of God. Had the Ruler of the Universe given no sign when the spotless and loving Christ was made away with by His murderers, the problem of evil would have been well-nigh overwhelming, and faith in the supremacy of a moral order would have lacked one of its strongest supports. (b) Doctrinally the Resurrection was regarded as possessing a high significance for Christ Himself. It is, indeed, an exaggeration to say that for St. Paul the Resurrection had the importance which earlier thought claimed for the Baptism, and later thought for the Virgin Birth, viz. of constituting Jesus Son of God; but he at least regarded it as marking the transition from the foreshadowing to the full reality of the power and glory of the Son of God (Ro 1st). It was also the source of the most characteristic and vital elements of his eschatological teaching. In the life of the risen Christ he saw the prototype of the life which awaits those that are His in the future state (Phil 3rd). He also used the resurrection of Christ, though assuredly without any suggestion that it was only a figure, as a parable of the beginning, the manifestation, and the goal of the new life (Ro 6th).

16. The character of Jesus.—In this section it is not proposed to deal with the doctrine of the Person of Christ (see PERSON OF CHRIST), but only to gather up the main features of the character of the Man Christ Jesus as it is portrayed in the Gospels. The point of view is somewhat modern, but does not necessarily imply a naturalistic or Unitarian interpretation of Christ (Keim, Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. vol. ii.; Peabody, Jesus Christ and the Christian Character, 1906, ch. ii.).

The task of describing the character of Jesus is difficult. Jesus is one of the most real and life-like figures in history, and there is a way of observing, feeling, and judging which is unmistakably Christ-like; but when we try to describe Him we are in danger of setting forth 'a mere personified system of morals and psychology, consisting of a catalogue of all possible virtues and capabilities' (Hase). There is therefore something to be said for leaving the matter where it is left by the Gospels, which simply reveal the character in telling the story of the life. The general observation which is most convincing is that in Jesus there were combinations of qualities which are usually found in isolation, and regarded as mutually inconsistent. This holds good, first, in the region of temperament. It is easy to show that at least three of the recognized temperaments—the sanguine, the melancholic, and the choleric, were manifested by Jesus, and that what is good in the phlegmatic had its counterpart in His repose and purposefulness. From a similar point of view it has been said that 'there was in Him the woman-heart as well as the manly brain—all that was most manly and all that was most womanly' (F. W. Robertson, Serm. ii. 231; but contrariwise Hase: 'His character was thoroughly masculine,' §31). It has been held by some that He belonged to the class of ecstatic men, by others that He reasoned and acted with the serenity of the sage; the truth is that repose was the normal condition of His spirit, but that it was intermittently broken by prophetic experiences of vision and tumult. On the intellectual side we find the abstract power which unerringly seizes upon the vital principle, united with the poet's mind which delights to clothe the idea with form and colour and to find for it the most perfect artistic expression. Another and more impressive contrast is presented in the force and the gentleness of His character. From Him there went out an influence which either awed men into docile submission or roused them to a frenzy of opposition, while the same Jesus spoke words of tender solace to a penitent Magdalene, and called the little children to His side. He also combined with wide outlook and sublime purpose an active interest in small things and in inconsiderable persons. Recognizing it as His vocation to build the Kingdom of God, He did not consider a day lost in which He conversed with a woman of Samaria at a wayside well.

While these and similar traits help to give greater vividness to our conception of Jesus, the essential content of what is called His character lies in His attitude, on the one hand to the Father, on the other to the problems of duty which arise for a man among men.

(1) Beginning with the God-ward side of the character of Jesus, that which we describe as piety, we find that it combines familiar traits with others which are novel and unique. To a large extent it is a fulfilment of the Jewish ideal of piety, but it shows impressive omissions and deviations from the OT pattern. He fulfils it in that He has a constant sense of the presence of God, and regards all events as instinct with a Divine meaning of guidance, of blessing, or of judgment. He lives in habitual prayerfulness, giving thanks, supplicating, interceding for others. He shows a sensitive reverence for all that is called God—His name, His word, His house, and is full of prophetic zeal for His honour. It is His meat and His drink to labour in the tasks which are made known to Him as the will of God. When that will approaches Him as a call to suffer and die, He trusts implicitly in the wisdom and goodness of the Father, and prays that His will be done.

There are, however, two significant particulars in which the religion of Jesus, if we may so term it, differed from the piety of Hebrew saints, as well as of the saints of Christian times. (a) The penitential note is one of the most distinctive features of the OT. The depth of the sense of sin may almost be said to be the measure of sanctity, and the same may be said of those whom the Christian Church has chiefly venerated as its religious heroes. But of penitence the experience of Jesus shows no trace. While teaching His disciples to pray, 'Forgive us our debts,' He Himself never confessed sin. Neither in Gethsemane nor on the cross, when the near approach of death challenged Him to pass righteous judgment on His past life, was He conscious of any lapse from fidelity to the Father's commands.—(b) A second note of Hebrew piety is a sense of dependence upon God, accompanied by the knowledge that to Him belongs the glory, and that the human instrument counts for nothing in comparison. But Jesus, while confessing His dependence on the Father in teaching and healing, does not speak of Himself as a mere agent who delivers a message and accomplishes a work—and is forthwith forgotten. Enjoying a filial intimacy with God which contrasts markedly with the aloofness of God in OT times, and the fear manifested in His presence even by prophets, He claimed prerogatives which they would have regarded as a usurpation of the sphere of God. For He forgave sins, claimed a faith and a devotion toward Himself which were indistinguishable from worship, and foretold that He would return to judge the world. What makes these utterances the more striking is that He simultaneously invited men to learn of Him as meek and lowly in heart (Mt 11²⁹). We therefore seem to be driven to the conclusion that Jesus was less than a saint, unless He was more than a man. Unless He was sinless, He was guilty of a self-righteousness which was more blinded than that of the Pharisees; and unless He had a unique dignity and commission, He was guilty of an overweening arrogance. The hypothesis of a unique experience and vocation, or the belief that He was in a unique sense Divine, is more credible than the charge of imperfect piety.

(2) In studying the character of Jesus on the ethical side, it is useful to observe the form in which He recognized and realized the fundamental virtues. Wisdom He would scarcely have described as a virtue. He did not Himself possess or value it in the range which it began to have with the Greeks, but He assuredly had wisdom in the grand way of thinking deep thoughts about God and man which have been worked up in philosophical systems, and also in the homely form of prudent dealing with tasks and dangers. Courage He certainly did not illustrate in the typical form that it assumes in a man of war; but there is abundant proof of physical as well as of moral courage in the heroism which led Him, while discarding force and foreseeing the issue, to go up to confront His powerful enemies in the name of God and truth. One glimpse of His bearing is unforgettable. 'And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus was going before them; and they were amazed; and they that followed were afraid' (Mk 10³²). The virtue of temperance or self-control might seem to lie on a plane on which He did not condescend to be tried. But in its essence, as the virtue which requires the surrender of the lower for the higher, of the temporary for the enduring good, it has its illustration, not merely in the victory of the Temptation, but in the mould of self-sacrifice in which His whole life was cast. Justice, as the virtue which renders to all their due, entered deeply into the thought and life of Jesus. The parable of the Unjust Steward, which on a superficial view makes light of dishonesty, is placed in a setting of words of Jesus from which it appears that He thought it useful to give His disciples the test of an honest man, and even made common honesty a condition of admission to life (Lk 16¹⁰⁻¹²). It is also noteworthy how often He commends the wise and faithful servant; while His own ideal might be summed up as the performance with fidelity of His appointed work. Not even the sympathy of Jesus is more distinctive than His conscientiousness in regard to the claims both of God and of man.

The character of Jesus also exemplified the fundamental quality of steadfastness. He praised it in others: John the Baptist, who was no reed shaken with the wind; Simon, whom He surnamed the rock-like man. His whole ministry, which began with victory in the Temptation, had behind it the force of steady and of resolute purpose. 'He steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (Lk 9³¹) may serve for a description of the way in which He held straight on to His preconceived and predetermined goal.

On this general groundwork of character there emerges the love of Jesus, which was marked by extraordinary range and intensity. For man as man He had 'a prodigality of sympathy' and looked on Himself as a debtor to all who were burdened by suffering or sin. It may indeed be observed that His love, while all-embracing had degrees. The centurion of Capernaum and the Syro-phenician woman came within its scope, but He looked on the people of Israel as those who had the first claim on His affection and service. He shared the feelings for Jerusalem which are expressed in many of the Psalms, and yearned over the holy city more than over the cities of the Lake. Within the house of Israel there were three—perhaps four classes, whom He regarded with a peculiar tenderness. First in order came the disciples, next the common people and the social outcasts, and doubtless we may add the children. It is hard to believe that the family-circle at Nazareth was not also one of the nearer groups, but during the period of the Ministry the attitude of His kinsfolk, with the probable exception of Mary (Jn 19²⁵), diverted His strong natural affection to those who were His kinsfolk after the spirit. The ways in which His love expressed itself were on the one hand to seek to make those He loved truly His own by binding them to Himself by their faith and devotion; on the other, to bestow on them, and that at whatever cost to Himself, all benefits which it lay within his vocation to confer. The forms of service to which His sympathy prompted Him were as many as the forms of human distress. His mission, indeed, proceeded on the footing that the worst evils from which men suffer are spiritual, and that the benefactor whom they chiefly need is one who will lead them to repentance and show them the Father. But no small part of His ministry also was occupied with works of the philanthropic kind, which it would be altogether wrong to interpret on the analogy of some modern enterprises, as having the mere purpose of creating a favourable disposition for the gospel. His distinctive work was to comfort by saving, but He also acted as one who felt that the relief of pain had its own independent claim.

In seeming contrast with the gentleness of the sympathetic Christ was the sternness which marked many of His words and acts. It is of interest to note that the disciple whom Jesus loved is remembered in the Synoptics (Lk 9⁴⁹⁻⁵⁰) chiefly as a man with a capacity for fiery indignation; and this quality may well have been one that drew Jesus and John more closely together. If there were some sins that moved Jesus chiefly to compassion, there were others that roused Him to holy wrath. Those who, like prodigals and fallen women, could be described as their own worst enemy, He chiefly pitied, but sterner measure was never meted out than by Jesus to those whose guilt had the quality of profanity or of inhumanity. The profanity which irreverently dealt with the things of God—in swearing, in corrupting His word, in polluting His Temple, was unsparringly rebuked—on one memorable occasion by act; and the great offence of the Pharisees in His eyes was that, while making a parade of sanctity before men, they were insulting God by acting a lie. The second type of sin which provoked His burning invective was inhumanity towards the weak. An example is the sin of those who make one of the little ones to offend (Mt 18⁶), which may perhaps be taken literally of those who pervert children; and the unpardonable aggravation of the guilt of the scribes was that, while making long prayers, they devoured widows' houses (Mk 12⁴⁰).

While the character of Jesus has commonly been regarded, even by non-Christians, as the noblest that the world has seen, it has not escaped criticism in ancient or modern times. Two forms of the indictment may be alluded to. Renan professes to find evidence of deterioration, and in this the real tragedy of the life of Jesus. Writing of the last days, he says: 'His natural gentleness seems to have abandoned Him: He was sometimes harsh and capricious, contact with the world pained and revolted Him. The fatal law which condemns an idea to decay as soon as it is applied to convert men applied to Him.' He is even said to have yielded to the wishes of His enthusiastic friends; and to have acquiesced in a pretended miracle by which they sought to revive His sinking cause. His death was a happy release 'from the fatal necessities of a position which each day became more exact and more difficult to maintain' (p. 252). To a pessimistically tinged scepticism there may be something congenial in this representation. As a fact the idea of degeneration is borrowed from the career of Mohammed and has no support except in the assumption that Jesus was uncommissioned to represent the Divine wrath against sin. Very different was the insight of him who wrote that He 'learned obedience by the things which he suffered,' and was thus made perfect (He 5:8-9).

From the Hellenic point of view it is a common criticism that the character of Jesus is one-sided or fragmentary. There are, it is said, elements of human excellence which He either did not possess or which He deliberately undervalued and renounced. There were whole spheres of valuable human experience into which He did not enter—married life, political service, scientific labour, the realm of æsthetic interests. His attitude, also, to the economic side of human affairs was unsatisfactory: He taught men to despise wealth and distribute it among the poor, and thus struck at the very foundations of the social fabric. In reply to this indictment, it is sometimes urged that the character of Jesus actually included most elements which enter into the Hellenic ideal—notably the æsthetic sense as seen in His close observation and love of things beautiful, intellectual vitality and acquisitiveness, and the temperate enjoyment of the pleasures of the table in the society of His friends. It is also pointed out that His principles sanction a much wider range of activity than He Himself actually exemplified. In His love to man, which designed to bestow every form of real good, there lay the sanction of all the activities—scientific, economic, political, as well as religious and philanthropic, which fill out with helpful service the various spheres of duty in the modern world. At the same time it must be admitted that Jesus was not the universal man in the literal sense, but was limited in His equipment and aim by the special character of His mission. He was ascetic in the sense that in His scheme of values He severely subordinated all the goods of this world to spiritual blessings, and taught that the first were to be despised and renounced in the measure in which they imperilled the second. He exemplified self-limitation and self-sacrifice, not indeed as an end in itself, but as a necessary condition of accomplishing the highest for God and man.

17. The fundamental ideas of our Lord's teaching.—It is one of the gains of modern theology that Biblical Theology is separated from Dogmatics, and that the sacred writers are allowed to speak for themselves without being forced into consistency with a system of ecclesiastical doctrine. In pursuance of this historical task, interest has centred chiefly in the attempt to expound and systematize the teaching of Jesus. It was naturally felt that no Christian documents are so valuable for an understanding of the Christian religion as those which contain the teaching of the Founder, and that, indispensable as the Apostolic writings are, they are in a very real sense derivative and supplementary. Experience also showed that the teaching of Jesus, which in the oral tradition was for a time the main sustenance of the Primitive Church, has been able to quicken and refresh the religious life of not a few in the modern world who had ceased to feel the power of the stereotyped phrases of a traditional theology. An account of our Lord's teaching, it has to be added, is properly based on the Synoptics. The authentic matter of the Fourth Gospel is so inextricably blended with believing experience and reflexion that it can only be set forth as a supplement to the heads of doctrine collected from the Synoptists (Wendt), or utilized as a source for the Johannine Theology (Weiss).

In addition to the sketches in the great manuals of NT Theology (Weiss, Bibl. Theol. des NT, Eng. tr. 1882-3; Beyschlag, NT Theol. Eng. tr. 1891; Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der NT Theol., 1897; Stevens, Theol. of NT, 1899), there are numerous monographs, of which the most important is Wendt, Lehre Jesu (Eng. tr. 1892), and the most interesting are Bruce, The Kingdom of God, 1890, and Harnack, Das Wesen des Christenthums (Eng. tr. 1901).

A. THE KINGDOM OF GOD.—The Evangelists give as the summary description of the message of Jesus—'the gospel of the kingdom.' 'And Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom' (Mt 4:23; cf. Mk 1:4, 15, Lk 8:1). As Jesus was conscious of being the promised Messiah, it was natural that His teaching ministry should be largely directed to setting forth the nature, the privileges, and the laws of the Messianic Kingdom. Most modern expositors, accordingly, have treated the idea of the Kingdom as central, and as supplying a scheme under which the whole body of the teaching may be systematically arranged. Thus, after determining the nature of the Kingdom in relation to the past of Israel, and to the ideas of contemporary Judaism, Weiss treats of the coming of the Kingdom in the Messiah and His work, of its realization in the righteousness and the privileges of its members, and of its predicted consummation in the future.

(1) The nature of the Kingdom.—In elucidating Christ's conception of the Kingdom, it is usual to begin by contrasting it with pre-existing ideas. In the first place, it is clear that, while Jesus claimed to fulfil OT prophecy, and to be the Messiah for whom the people waited, He broke with the general strain of Messianic prophecy and expectation in the important particular that He rejected the conception that the Kingdom would exist in the form of a political organization. It was a very natural aspiration for the Jews to desire to be free and powerful, and more than a respectable ambition, when it is remembered that the Empire of which they dreamed was to carry in its train the worship and service of the true God; but Jesus substituted for the political conception the idea of a Kingdom which was spiritual in its nature, and by consequence universal. Its essentially spiritual character is shown by the nature of its blessings—among which there is frequent mention of the forgiveness of sins, righteousness, and the like, but little of earthly good and nothing of political power. A Kingdom which 'cometh not with observation' (Lk 17:20) could not be of the same kind with the kingdom of the Maccabees or the Roman Empire. And if it was a spiritual Kingdom, in which membership was granted on terms of faith and love, it followed that it was in principle a universal Kingdom. It was no monopoly of those of Jewish birth, for not all Jews had faith, and of some who were Gentiles He said that He had not found so great faith in Israel (Mt 8:10). 'Many shall come from the east and the west . . . but the sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth into the outer darkness' (vv. 11, 12).

The further elucidation of its nature may be carried out by the help of an analysis of the idea of a kingdom. It involves authority and rule (doctrine of God and of the Messiah), blessings which are enjoyed by the citizens (the Kingdom as 'a good,' the privileges), laws which are enacted and enforced (the righteousness of the Kingdom), a title to citizenship (conditions of entrance), an organization of the subjects in community of life and service (the Kingdom as a community, doctrine of the Church), a future and a destiny (doctrine of the Last Things).

The Kingdom as present and as future.—One of the difficulties of the subject is that in some passages Jesus speaks of the Kingdom as present, while in many others He speaks of it as future; and there has been a wide difference of opinion as to the relation of the two sets of utterances, and the importance to be attributed to the eschatological series.

(i) The Kingdom as a present reality.—That the Kingdom had come, and was a present reality on earth when He taught and laboured, is stated in a number of passages. He speaks of His mighty works as proof. 'If I by the spirit of God cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come upon you' (Mt 12:28; cf. Lk 10:17). In the same sense it is said 'the kingdom of God is among you,' (not 'within you,' which could not have been said to the Pharisees (Lk 17:21)). It is also implied that there are those who are already in the Kingdom (Mt 11:11). The parables of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven (Mt 13:31-32), and also of the Seed Growing Secretly (Mk 4:26-29), seem clearly to teach that the Kingdom was then present in the world in small and lowly beginnings, which were to be succeeded by a process of wonderful growth and expansion.

(ii) The Kingdom as a future event.—In a larger number of cases He spoke of the Kingdom, and of entrance into as future. Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5²⁰). 'Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world' (Mt 25³⁴). Moreover, a very large portion of His teaching is concerned with the manner of the establishment of the Kingdom in the last days, and with the sublime events by which it is to be ushered in and established.

The time of the Consummation, Jesus declared, was unknown even to the Son (Mk 13³²), but it would be heralded by various signs—persecution, apostasy, the preaching of the gospel throughout the world (Mt 24). Upon this would follow the return of the Son of Man, who would come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory (24³⁰ 25¹; cf. Mk 14⁶²). The immediate purpose of the Return is to sift the righteous and the wicked, to execute judgment upon the enemies of God, and to gather together the elect from the four winds (Mt 24³¹). Thereafter there is established a Kingdom which cannot be moved, in which the blessed enjoy all that is promised them in the love of God. The scene appears to be laid on earth (Mt 5¹). So far as the picture is elaborated, it is by utilizing the tones and the colours of earthly experience, as well as familiar forms of dignity, power, and enjoyment (Mk 10⁴⁰ 14²⁸, Mt 8¹¹). At the same time the spiritual blessings are of course the chiefest (Mt 5³), and the transfiguration of the natural is suggested in a significant particular (Mk 12²⁹).

(iii) Relation of the two aspects of the Kingdom.—There are three main views as to the relation of the two sets of utterances about the Kingdom; they may be distinguished as the traditional, the liberal, and the eschatological.

(a) According to the traditional view, both groups of sayings are authentic and are easily combined into a consistent whole. Jesus could say that the Kingdom was present in respect that it had come, and future in respect that it had not yet fully come in power and glory. Its history falls into two stages, one of which is now under the dispensation of the Spirit, the other to come in stupendous acts of judgment and mercy at the Second Advent.

(b) The liberal view of modern theology is that the eschatological outlook of Jesus was borrowed from, or accommodated to, temporary forms of Jewish thought, and that the valuable and enduring element is the conception of the Kingdom as entering into the life of mankind in this world, growing in range and power, and destined to permeate society and all its institutions with its Divine spirit. From this point of view the Second Coming, the central event of the history, is to be understood as a spiritual return which has been taking place in the events of history from Pentecost down to the present hour. Similarly the Last Judgment is interpreted as a continuous process which runs parallel with the history of nations and churches. That this view has some support in the Fourth Gospel must be admitted. The return of which Christ there speaks with much fulness is the mission of the Spirit, and the Judgment which is before the mind of the Evangelist is almost always the judgment which is simultaneous with character and conduct. There may even be claimed for it some support from the Synoptic teaching—as in the dating of the Return 'from now' (Mt 20⁴), and the distinction of 'days of the Son of Man' (Lk 17²²), and also in the association of the Second Coming with the destruction of Jerusalem (Mt 24). But on the whole it must be said that the attempt to impute the purely spiritual conception to Jesus is unhistorical. It may be argued that His sayings are examples of prophecy, and that theology has a warrant to recast prophetic sayings in new forms. But it can hardly be gainsaid that Jesus thought of the Return as a definite event, visible and impressive, which would challenge the attention of all mankind, and involve acts that would revolutionize the order of our world.

(c) Some modern scholars hold that the distinctive teaching of Jesus was that the Kingdom was a supernatural Kingdom, to be established by Divine power at His Second Coming, and that the references in the Gospels to a present Kingdom with a gradual development are either illusory or unauthentic (J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes). On this view Jesus claimed to be the Messiah only in the sense that He looked forward to becoming the Messiah. He was, like John the Baptist, a forerunner, but with the difference that the future Messiah to whom He bore witness was the Jesus of the Second Advent. The textual evidence which supports the view that Jesus founded a present Kingdom of God on earth before His death is discounted on the ground that an event which is imminent may be intelligibly said to be present. Thus the confession at Caesarea Philippi is to be taken proleptically; it merely meant that Peter believed that He was the Messiah designate, or the heir to the office. 'Jesus departed this life with the consciousness that the Kingdom was not yet established' (J. Weiss). The parables which speak of a gradual development of the Kingdom of God are explained either as having been interpolated or as teaching a different lesson. But this accentuation of the eschatological side of our Lord's teaching is hardly likely to be accepted, as Schweitzer claims, as an assured result of criticism. If even in the OT the Jewish State was sometimes conceived of as the present Kingdom of God, and if the Rabbinical theology sometimes spoke of the Kingdom of God as a power to be yielded to now, it is difficult to see why Jesus should not have entertained the similar conception which is contained or implied in the texts quoted. Above all, it is impossible to believe that Jesus, who taught that the highest blessings are enjoyed in communion with God, did not hold that the Kingdom was present among those who experienced His love and who obeyed His will.

B. THE HEAVENLY FATHER AND HIS CHILDREN.—It may be doubted if the teaching of Jesus is most satisfactorily set forth under the forms of the Kingdom. The difficulty even of the traditional conception, the doubts as to the correctness of this conception which have been referred to, and also the transitoriness of types of political constitution, suggest that the organizing idea may better be sought in another sphere. As a fact the central conceptions of His religious and ethical teaching are borrowed not from the political, but from the domestic sphere. When it is said that 'one is your Father,' and that 'all ye are brethren' (Mt 23⁸⁻⁹), we have the description of a family. To the writer it therefore seems that the teaching is best expounded under the rubric of the Heavenly Father and His children, or the holy family, and in what follows we shall confine ourselves mainly to the elucidation of the heads of this gospel of Divine and human love.

(1) The Heavenly Father.—Christ could take for granted in His hearers the elements of the knowledge of God set forth in the OT, as one God, all-powerful, all-wise, all-holy, all-good. This splendid spiritual inheritance He enriched by the content of His doctrine of God as the Heavenly Father. The name, indeed, was not new. Even the Greeks spoke of Zeus as the father of gods and men; while in not a few OT passages God is likened to and even named a Father. For the Greeks however, the Fatherhood of God hardly meant more than that He was the God of Creation and Providence, while in OT thought God, as Father was the protecting God of Israel, or the Father of the Messianic King. On the lips of Jesus the name meant that God was the Father of individual men, who lavished upon each the utmost resources of a Father's wise and tender care. It may, in fact, be said that if we study human fatherhood at its best, note every lovely and gracious feature which is realized or adumbrated in an earthly home, and then attribute these in perfected form to the heart and the will of the Almighty, we discover the heads of the teaching of Jesus concerning God.

The relation of an earthly father to his children involves at least seven points—to him they owe their existence, from him they borrow his nature and likeness, he provides for their wants, he educates and disciplines them, he holds intimate intercourse with them, he is graciously disposed to forgive their offences, and he makes them his heirs. All this, now, Jesus has affirmed of God in relation to men. The first two points—that it is He that made us, and not we ourselves, and that we are made in His image—were articles of OT doctrine which He did not need to emphasize; though it may be pointed out that His conception of the infinite value of the individual soul had its roots in His belief that man bears the image of the Heavenly Father. The other points mentioned are quite explicitly emphasized.

(a) God provides for the wants of His children. He is aware of their bodily wants (Mt 6²); the God who feeds the fowls and clothes the lilies will not suffer His children to be in want. This, in fact, is deduced directly from the idea of fatherhood. 'If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?' (7¹¹). That the provision includes spiritual blessings as its chief part is made explicit in Lk 11¹².

(b) God educates and disciplines His children. Jesus does not say this expressly, but it may be noticed that there are two aspects of a child's earthly training which are reproduced in what He says about the Divine education of souls. A child's education, though arduous and painful, is designed for its good; and similarly, Jesus says, Blessed are the poor, the mourners, the persecuted, the reviled (Mt 5³⁻⁶). The second aspect is that the children do not always appreciate the wisdom and kindness of the discipline, but must be asked to take it on trust. Similarly, the earthly child must often trust the Heavenly Father's love where he cannot comprehend His purpose, saying, 'Yea, Father, for so it was well-pleasing in thy sight' (Mt 11²⁶).

(c) God holds intimate intercourse with His children. It does not lie in the idea of an earthly parent to hold aloof from his children, and God admits His to close communion with Himself. On their side it takes the form of prayer, on His of response. They are encouraged to seek both spiritual and material blessings, and that importantly (parables of the Importunate Widow, Lk 18¹⁻⁸; the Friend at Midnight, 11⁵⁻⁸), and they are assured that 'whatsoever they shall ask in prayer, believing, they shall receive' (Mt 21²²).

(d) God is graciously disposed to forgive His children's offences. His way with sinners is not the way of a man with his enemy, to whom he refuses on any terms to be reconciled, or of a creditor with his debtor, who insists on full payment, but that of a father, who meets a penitent son in a spirit of magnanimity, rejoices over his return, and receives him back to his home. The point of the three great parables in Lk 15 is that, while the respectable world was sceptical about the restoration of the erring, and frowned on those who attempted it, there is in heaven a charity that believeth all things, and joy unspeakable over one sinner that repenteth.

(e) God destines His children to an inheritance. This is itself, as has been indicated, a distinct and large topic of the teaching of Jesus, and it is sufficient here to refer to a text in which the logic of the relationship is clearly brought out: 'Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Lk 12³²).

In the light of the above analysis we are in a position to deal with the much-discussed question, Did Jesus conceive of God as the Father of all men, or only as the Father of those who are within the family-Kingdom? It may be that Jesus applies the name of Father to God only in relation to the children of the Kingdom, but the palpable meaning of His teaching is that God is the Father of all men, while yet it is not possible for Him to be the Father, in the full sense of the word, of those who are living in impenitence and in alienation from Him. He is the Father of all to the extent that they are created by Him, are made in His image, have their wants supplied by Him, and are disciplined by Him; but just as it is impossible for an earthly father to forgive a contumacious son, to hold intercourse with an absent son, and to make an heir of a son who has already squandered his portion, so is it impossible for God to be in the full sense a Father to those who shun His face and spurn His gifts.

(2) The terms of sonship.—The next great theme is the question how men become members of the family-Kingdom. Negatively Jesus teaches that we are not born into it, as one was born into the Jewish State, and also that membership is not an order of merit conferred in recognition of distinguished attainments in piety and virtue. The most important and comprehensive utterance of our Lord on the point is this:—'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18³). Here again we can trace the fidelity of the detail to the fundamental idea of the family-Kingdom: what should be so necessary in the son as childlikeness? On examination childlikeness proves to include a variety of qualities which are elsewhere declared by Jesus to be conditions of sonship: (a) Trustfulness.—When Jesus proposed the children as a model, there can be little doubt that He had prominently in mind the child's capacity of faith. He would have His followers trust in the wisdom and the love of the Father with the sublime confidence with which a child naturally trusts in an earthly parent. There are examples of the joy which He felt at unexpected cases of heroic faith, e.g. of the centurion of Capernaum and the Syrophenician woman. The grand object of this faith was God. 'Have faith,' He says, 'in God' (Mk 11²²). But this faith in God included also faith in Himself as the appointed instrument for the performance of God's great work with men. (b) Sense of need.—A child, being cast upon others for the supply of its wants, has a keen sense of need. And this sense, which from one point of view is humility, is also a prominent mark of the children of the Kingdom. We are asked to admire the publican, who, in contrast to the self-satisfied Pharisee, confessed his unworthiness and his need of mercy (Lk 18¹³). The self-complacency of the Rich Young Ruler showed that though not far from, he was still outside of, the Kingdom of God (Mk 10¹⁷⁻²²). The Beatitude is for those who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Mt 5⁶). (c) The penitential spirit.—With childlikeness may also be associated the grace of penitence, for childhood, when not spoiled by hardening influences, is the period of the sensitive conscience. In any case penitence is closely bound up with faith as the essential condition. 'He came into Galilee preaching and saying, Repent ye and believe the gospel' (Mk 1¹⁵). The stages of penitence are vividly illustrated in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15¹¹⁻²²). (d) Resolution.—A fourth parallel is that in the child there is, along with a sense of need, a resolute determination to secure what it values. There are some, it is true, who receive the heavenly blessings in response to an invitation, or almost under compulsion, but the rule is that they are like the merchantman seeking goodly pearls, and willing to make any sacrifice to secure what they seek. 'The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force' (Mt 11¹²).

(3) The privileges of the children.—The enumeration of these has already been anticipated in what has been said of the implications of the Divine Fatherhood. The children possess, in fact or in promise, the fullness of the blessings which God as the Heavenly Father, who is also all-powerful, is disposed to bestow. They include the forgiveness of sins, access to the Father in prayer, the provision needed for the supply of bodily and spiritual wants, guidance in perplexity, protection in danger, power of a supernatural kind, and the assurance that their names are written in heaven (Lk 10²⁰). The privileges are summarily described as life (Mt 7¹⁴, Mk 9⁴⁵) and as salvation (Lk 19⁹). Their exceeding value is emphasized in particular maxims (Mt 16²⁶), and in the parables of the Hid Treasure and of the Pearl of Price (Mt 13⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶). In spite of the hardships and perils of the life to which they are called, the habitual mood of the children is one of repose and even of joy (Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰, Lk 6²³).

(4) The filial and fraternal obligations.—The observation that the teaching of Jesus is in substance a system built up out of the higher elements of family life is confirmed when we approach its practical ideal. This is made up of filial obligations towards God, and of fraternal obligations towards men. (i) The duties towards God are those which naturally devolve upon the children in consideration of the Father's greatness, wisdom, and goodness. Love being the great thing manifested by God towards them, their fundamental duty is to love Him in return with all their heart, and with all their soul, and with all their mind, and with all their strength (Mk 12⁹⁰). Their special duties towards God, which are also privileges, are these—to trust Him wholly, to make their desires known to Him in prayer, to perform with fidelity the work He gives them to do, and to submit in meekness and patience when He calls them to suffer.

(ii) Duty towards man.—The supreme fraternal obligation, like the filial, is love. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mk 12³¹). By our neighbour we are to understand all who are in need, and whom it is in our power to help (parable of the Good Samaritan, Lk 10^{30ff.}). When we inquire how this principle manifests itself, it appears that the Christian ethic has three features which are commonly described as inwardness, self-sacrificing service, and the passive virtues. Without going into detail, it is sufficient to illustrate how these form an ethical ideal which has its prototype in the life of the family.

(a) Inwardness.—A distinctive feature of the ethical teaching of Jesus is the insistence that it is not sufficient to refrain from overt acts of wrong, and to perform the overt acts which duty requires. The heart must be pure and the motive right. From this point of view benefactions that are not accompanied by sympathy lose half their value. On the other hand, the evil purpose has the quality of an evil act; hatred is murder in the minor degree. Now, startling as is the demand for a perfect heart in an ethic of general obligation, it is familiar enough in family life. There a woman counts all benefactions as worthless if she do not possess her husband's love; or, again, the hatred of brothers and sisters is at once felt to have an enormity of guilt beyond that of most evil deeds.

(b) Disinterested service.—In what is said of the forms of service the ideal is manifestly suggested by brotherhood. Of the chief forms may be distinguished first beneficence, which is specially directed to the relief of the poor, the entertainment of the homeless, the tending of the sick, the visiting of captives (Mt 25^{34ff.}), the comforting of the sorrowful, the reconciliation of those who are at feud (Mt 5²). Another is the ministry of teaching; without doubt Jesus intended His disciples, as one of their chief forms of service, to follow Him in the disseminating of the truths which He taught. A third is the spiritual ministry proper, which has the same end as His own pastoral work—to save souls from sin, and to help them to rise to higher ends of excellence and nobility. The ideal here, in short, is that the kind of things which the parent, the brother, and the sister do, or may be expected to do, in accordance with the spirit of family life, are made binding in their application to our fellow-men as such. We may also notice two accompanying rules. (a) The service is to be disinterested. This is enforced by the counsel that we are preferably to perform acts of kindness to those who are not in a position to make a return (Lk 6^{34ff.}). (b) They are also to be done unostentatiously—not as by the Pharisees, who blow a trumpet before them, but so that the left hand knoweth not what the right hand doeth (Mt 6³⁻⁴). In the first of these counsels we see a reflexion of the spirit which has its purest expression in maternal devotion. The second states the condition without which the best service in any sphere loses its grace.

(c) The passive virtues.—A third group of graces, specially known as the passive virtues, includes meekness and patience under adversity and wrong, and the forgiveness of injuries. Very great stress is laid on forgiving injuries, of which Jesus alludes to three kinds—injury to the person (Mt 5³⁹), loss of property (v. ⁴⁰), and defamation of character (5⁴¹). Instructions are given as to the steps to be taken in securing reconciliation, beginning with private expostulation (Mt 18¹⁵). As motives to forgiveness we are reminded that we ought to forgive as we hope to be forgiven, and also that, as God sets the example of ready clemency, the child ought to imitate the Father (Mt 5⁴⁸). These virtues, it will again be noticed, were not new on the soil of family life. From the beginning there have been women who within the sphere of the home have borne hardship meekly, endured wrong patiently, and been ready to forgive unto seventy times seven.

(5) The unique Son and His work.—It may be thought that the scheme which has been followed is inconsistent with the witness borne by Jesus to His Person and His work, inasmuch as His claims have no obvious counterpart in the life of the family. The whole subject is treated in a special article (PERSON OF CHRIST), but must be glanced at here in the general context of Synoptic doctrine. In the first place, it is certainly true that Jesus asserted for Himself a peculiar dignity, and for His work a peculiar efficacy. He calls Himself not a Son, but the Son (Mt 11²⁷), who stands in a unique relation to the Father, and who also makes upon the other children a demand for faith and obedience. If now we ask what it is that makes Christ unique, we find that the stress is laid upon three particulars—(a) He is in the Father's confidence, and from Him the other children obtain their knowledge of the Father (ib.). (b) He fully possesses the privileges and fulfils the obligations which are involved in sonship. (c) His death was the means of procuring for them the highest blessings (Mk 14^{24ff.}). Now, all these things, if not explained by, have at least parallels in, the life of the family. The son, who in all respects obeys his father's will, enjoys a position of peculiar intimacy and influence. The eldest son in many countries, and not least in the Jewish tradition, often occupies an intermediate position between the head and the subordinate members of the family. And if Jesus, as He certainly did, looked upon Himself as the eldest brother of the family—Kingdom—who first realized its privileges and its righteousness, and as the Son in whom the Father was well pleased, and whom consequently He took into His deepest confidence—we can see how He could teach that faith in Him was an element in the gospel. Nor are the references to the necessity of His death, as is sometimes said, inconsistent with the gospel of the Heavenly Father. Every death in a family tends to be a means of grace; the death in a noble cause of one who is revered and loved is an almost matchless source of inspiration; and there were reasons, apart from deeper theological explanations, why Jesus should teach that His death would do more even than His life to make effective the gospel of Divine and human love.

(6) The brotherhood as a society.—It followed from the nature of the teaching of Jesus that His followers should form themselves into a society. Community of faith and aim made it natural for them to do so, and those whose relations were of the nature of brotherhood were bound to realize it in a common life and common service as well as in common institutions. That the purpose of Jesus went in this direction from the first appears from the call and training of the twelve Apostles. In the later period of His Ministry we have references to a Christian society under the name of the Church (Mt 16¹⁸ 18¹⁷⁻²⁰). These references have indeed been thought by some critics to be of later ecclesiastical origin; but when the breach with the Jewish authorities became inevitable, He must, in thinking of the future, have conceived of His followers as a separate society. The omissions are as remarkable as the provisions. There is nothing said about forms of worship, nothing about ecclesiastical constitution. The few provisions may be gathered up under the following heads:—

(a) General principles.—The ruling spirit is the desire of each member to help all and each according to the measure of his ability. Titles which involve the assumption of personal authority are to be avoided (Mt 23⁸). Honour and influence are to be proportionate to service (Mk 10⁴³⁻⁴⁴). It is to be a contrast to the natural society in two respects—that no one seeks his own but only the general good, and that there are no distinctions of rank and power resting upon accident, intrigue, or violence. In the light of these maxims the promise to Peter must be interpreted (Mt 16¹⁸). It certainly meant that Peter was the chief instrument by which in the primitive period the Church was to be built up, but the promise was to Peter as confessing Christ, and by implication to all who make themselves his successors by sharing his faith.

(b) The work of the Christian society.—There can be no doubt that this is formulated by Jn. in accordance with the mind of Jesus in the words—'As thou didst send me into the world, even so send I them into the world' (17¹⁸; cf. Mk 3¹⁴). His instructions to the Twelve, and to the Seventy, in which He appoints and equips them for a ministry like His own, show that He conceived of the society as an instrument which should carry on His works of preaching and healing. The risen Lord lays on the conscience the duty of making disciples of all nations (Mt 28¹⁹). The work of the Church which is spoken of in most detail is discipline, the aim of which is declared to be the improvement of the erring brother, while the stages of the procedure are laid down (Mt 18¹⁵⁻¹⁷). Importance is also attached to the function of binding and loosing (v. 18), which is regarded as the prerogative of the Christian society as a whole, not of a particular class. The reference is to forbidding and permitting—i.e. framing maxims and rules of life which should be recognized as operative within the society.

(c) The religious rites.—There is every reason to believe that Jesus instituted two simple rites to be observed in the society. That baptism was appointed by Him has been denied, on the ground that it is vouched for only in the narrative of the post-resurrection life, and that it embodies a Trinitarian formula (Mt 28¹⁹). It is, however, antecedently probable, from the connexion of Jesus with the Baptist, that He took over the rite of baptism, while its use from the beginning of the Christian Church as the sacrament of initiation presupposes its appointment or sanction by Jesus. The institution of the Lord's Supper as a standing ordinance has already been referred to.

(7) The future and the inheritance.—The teaching of Jesus about the future, so far as it deals with the Return, has already been touched on, and it is sufficient now to note—(1) references to the growth of the Christian society on earth; (2) the glimpses of the final inheritance.

(a) The development of the society.—There are a number of passages, especially in the parables, which imply a history of the Church marked by three features—a gradual growth to a world-leavening and world-overshadowing influence, debasement through a large admixture of evil elements, and experiences of trial and persecution (Mt 13).

(b) The final portion.—It is in vain that we look in the teaching of Jesus for instruction upon many eschatological questions which have exercised the minds of theologians. His message may be summed up in the two articles, that there is a fearful punishment reserved for those who come to the Judgment in unbelief and impenitence, and that for those who are His there remains a great and an enduring inheritance. As to the conditions and the content of the blessedness of those who 'enter into life' there is a large measure of reserve. He has no doctrine of the intermediate state. He fixes our gaze on the final state in which there is no longer any human impediment to prevent the bestowal of all that is in the heart of the Father to give—peace, blessedness, glory, with opportunity of service. As to the ultimate fate of the wicked, we can only say that it is a problem for the solution of which the letter of certain sayings makes in one direction (Mt 25⁴⁶), while His proclamation of the Father's unlimited and untiring love makes in the other.

18. The credibility of the teaching.—The teaching of Jesus contains two salient features (apart from the Christology), which are of such fundamental importance in a view of life that they may be briefly touched on from an apologetic point of view. The questions are—Is the Fatherhood of God, as Jesus proclaimed it, a fact? Is the Christian ethic, as expounded in the Sermon on the Mount, practicable?

(1) The doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood, on which virtually everything turns, is inexpressibly beautiful and consoling; but there is evidence that Jesus Himself was conscious of difficulties. Otherwise He would not have spoken of faith as making a demand on the will. His insistence on the need of importunity in prayer shows that He felt that events do not always, and at the first glance, fit into a scheme of things in which the hand of the Heavenly Father is manifest. In Gethsemane and on the cross, if words mean anything, He felt to the full the trial of faith. When we question human experience, there are numberless persons who say that they have been unable to trace the tender individualizing discipline of a Heavenly Father which Jesus assumed, and that things rather seem to have been governed, except in as far as they have themselves compelled results, by a blind and deaf fate. Modern views of the reign of law increase the difficulty. If the Universe is a vast mechanism, grinding on in accordance with inviolable laws to predetermined issues, where is the possibility of the intervention of a Father's hand to control the individual lot, and to mete out such blessings as we need or pray for? These are real difficulties which burden many a sincere mind and trouble many a sensitive heart. But it is to be considered that, apart from the authority which may be claimed for a revelation, there is good ground for believing in the title of man to interpret God, as Jesus did, in the light of the idea of Fatherhood. God is revealed in His works; among these works the greatest thing that has come into view on earth is the self-sacrificing love and the disinterested service which are associated with the sanctities of family life; and we may well be sceptical that God is less in goodness than a human parent, or His purpose with mankind less generous than that of an earthly father with his family. Theistic philosophy construes God in the light of man's rational and moral nature; Christ's method was similar, except that He took as His clue the moral nature as it is revealed at its best, namely, in the life of the home. Nor are the objections of the strength which is often supposed. The Universe is no doubt machine-like, but it does not therefore follow that it puts it out of the power of God to deal paternally and discriminately with His children. In the first place, God's greatest gifts consist of things with which the mechanism of nature has absolutely nothing to do—such as communion with God, forgiveness of sins, peace, joy, spiritual power. And as regards the outward circumstances of our lot, with which it has to do, it is quite possible to hold, as many profound thinkers have held, that God works in and through general laws, and yet is able by their instrumentality to accomplish particular providences and to vouchsafe answers to prayer. Nor does it seem that any bitter human experience can be such as to justify disbelief in the Divine Fatherhood, because the witnesses to the truth include those who have tasted the extremity of human sorrow. The paradox of it is that the belief in the Fatherhood of God comes to us attested by many who were beyond others sons and daughters of affliction; and owes its place in the world's heart above all to Him who, dying in unspeakable agony, said, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.'

(2) The Christian ethic.—The modern criticisms of the morality of the Sermon on the Mount are two—that it is imperfect, and that it is impracticable. The first objection has already been touched on in part, and we need refer now only to the line of criticism which finds fault with its exaltation of the passive virtues as a mark of weakness. What lends some colour to this is that, as a matter of fact, many weak characters naturally behave in a way that bears some resemblance to the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount. They endure wrongs meekly, do not strike back, and are incapable of sustaining a feud. But it may still be, and actually is, a great thing for a strong man to do from principle what a weakling does from indolence or cowardice. The objection that the Christian ethic is impracticable is more frequently heard, at least in Great Britain. Even the Church finds it impracticable to act on our Lord's principle of secrecy in the matter of giving, while it would seem that the individual who carried out His precepts in business would be ruined, and that the nation which followed His programme of non-resistance would perish. The weight of the objection is so far reduced by the observation that our Lord's precepts are designed to be followed, not in the letter, but in the spirit—so that, e.g., the really important thing is, not to give to a thief who may have stolen a coat a cloak in addition, but to cherish kindly feelings for him, and to act in his best interests, which may mean putting him in gaol. Similarly, our duty to the poor is to give wise expression to our love of them, which may very properly take account of the experience that indiscriminate charity increases the distress which it professes to relieve. The really essential thing is that brotherly love should prevail, that that which is to a large extent a fact in the sphere of the family should become truly operative in the class, the community, the nation, and among the peoples of the earth. It is to be remembered, too, that every ideal which has become practicable was once deemed impracticable—there have been states of society in which it seemed impossible to be honest, or temperate, or chaste; and though the Christian ideal towers high above the general practice of our generation, it may be that that practice will one day be looked back on as belonging to the half-savage practice of the world's youth. And in the present it has often been made sublimely practicable for those whom the Holy Spirit touched, and whose hearts were set aflame with a Christ-like love of man. W. P. PATERSON.

JETHER.—1. Father-in-law of Moses (RVm of Ex 4¹⁴ E), prob. a mistake for Jethro. 2. Eldest son of Gideon (Jg 8²⁹). 3. An Ishmaelite, father of Amasa (1 K 2²⁴, 2²⁵, 1 Ch 2¹⁷. See ITHRA). 4. 5. Two men of Judah (1 Ch 2⁴² 4¹⁷). 6. A man of Asher (1 Ch 7²⁸); called in v. 17 Ituran, the name of an Edomite clan (Gn 36²⁸).

JETHETH.—An Edomite clan (Gn 36⁴⁰—1 Ch 1³¹).

JETHRO (once, Ex 4¹⁸ Jether).—An Arab sheik and priest of the Sinaitic Peninsula, the father-in-law of Moses; referred to by this name in Ex 3¹ 4¹⁸ and 18¹. zz. (E), as Reuel in the present text of Ex 2¹⁸ (J), and as Hobab in Nu 10²⁹ (also J). He welcomed Moses and received him into his family (Ex 2²¹), and many years later visited him at Sinai (Ex 18²⁷), heard with wonder and delight of the doings of Jahweh on behalf of Israel (v. ²⁸), and gave advice about administration (vv. 17-20). Later still he probably acted as guide to the Israelites (Nu 10²⁹; cf. the AV of Jg 1¹⁴ and 4¹¹). As to the two or three names, it may be noted that Arabic inscriptions (Minæan) repeatedly give a priest two names. The name Jethro (Heb. Yithrō) may mean 'pre-eminence.' See art. HOBAB. W. TAYLOR SMITH.

JETUR.—See ITURÆA.

JEUËL.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 9⁶). 2. A Levitical family name (2 Ch 29¹³). 3. A contemporary of Ezra (Ezr 8¹⁹). In 2 and 3 Qerē has Jeiel.

JEUSH.—1. A son of Esau by Oholibamah; also the eponym of a Horite clan (Gn 36² 14. 1¹⁸—1 Ch 1³²). 2. A Benjamite chief (7¹⁰). 3. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁹). 4. The name of a Levitical family (1 Ch 23¹⁰). 5. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11¹⁹).

JEUZ.—The eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8¹⁰).

JEW.—The name by which the descendants of Israel have been known for many centuries. It is corrupted from Judah. After the division of the kingdom in B.C. 937, the southern portion was called by the name of the powerful tribe of Judah, which composed most of its inhabitants. It was in this kingdom that the Deuteronomic reform occurred, which was the first step in the creation of an organized religion sharply differentiated from the other religions of the world. This religion, developed during the Exile, bore the name of the kingdom of Judah. All Israelites who maintained their identity were its adherents, hence the name 'Jew' has absorbed the name 'Israel.' For their history, see ISRAEL (I. 21-30) and DISPERSION. For their religion, see ISRAEL (II. 5, 6).

On the special meaning of 'the Jews' in Jn. see p. 481 b f. GEORGE A. BARTON.

JEWEL.—Gn 24³⁵ 'the servant brought forth jewels of silver, and jewels of gold.' They were not jewels set in silver and in gold. Ornaments made of gold or silver were in older English called jewels. Now the word is confined to precious stones.

JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.—The greater number of the precious stones in the Bible occur in three lists which it will be instructive to tabulate at the outset. These are: (A) the stones in the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28¹⁷⁻²⁰ 39¹⁰⁻¹³); (B) those in the 'covering' of the king of Tyre (Ezk 28¹³); (C) those in the foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21¹⁹ 20). The three lists are to some extent mutually connected. A contains 12 stones. B in Heb. has 9, all taken from A, with traces of A's order in their arrangement. In LXX the two lists are identical, and possibly the Heb. of B is corrupt. C also has 12 stones, and is evidently partly dependent on the LXX of A and B.

It seems likely that in List A as well as in List B the LXX iaspis corresponds to the Heb. yashepheh, and that the sixth and twelfth names in the Heb. of A have been interchanged.

Reference to these tables will simplify the use of the following notes, which include other precious stones of the Bible besides those mentioned above. In endeavouring to identify the stones in List A, three things have to be kept in view. From the dimensions of the breast-plate—a span (8 or 9 inches) each way (Ex 28¹⁶)—the 12 stones which composed it must, even after allowing space for their settings, have been of considerable size, and therefore of only moderate rarity. Further, as they were engraved with the names of the tribes, they can have been of only moderate hardness. Lastly, preference should be given to the stones which archaeology shows to have been actually used for ornamental work in early Biblical times. In regard to this point, the article by Professor Flinders Petrie (Hastings' DB iv. 619–21) is of special value.

Agate (List A 8 [Heb. shebo]). The Gr. equivalent achates (whence 'agate') was the name of a river in Sicily. The modern agate is a form of silica, occurring in nodules which when cut across show concentric bands of varying transparency and colour. The ancient achates (Pliny, HN xxxvii. 54) probably included the opaque coloured varieties of silica now distinguished as jasper (see Jasper below). Flinders Petrie suggests that shebo may be the carnelian—also a form of silica (see Sardius below). 'Agates' (RVm 'rubies') stands for Heb. kadkod in Is 54² (LXX iaspis), Ezk 27¹⁶. Red jasper is perhaps to be understood.

Amber.—Doubtful tr. in Ezk 1⁴. 27 8² of chashmal (AVm 'electrum,' Amer. RV 'glowing metal'); cf. also Ligure below.

Amethyst (List A 9 [Heb. 'achlamah, LXX amethystos], C 12 [amethystos]). It is agreed that the common amethyst, properly called amethystine quartz, is meant. This is rock-crystal (transparent silica) coloured purple by manganese and iron. The Oriental amethyst is a much rarer gem, composed of violet corundum (oxide of aluminium).—In short, a purple sapphire. The name of the amethyst is derived from its supposed property, no doubt associated with its wine-like colour, of acting as a preventive of intoxication.

JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES

Beryl (List A 10, B 4; also Ca 5¹⁴, Ezk 1⁶ 10⁸, Dn 10⁶ [Heb. tarshish]). What the 'tarshish stone' was is difficult to say. LXX renders it variously, but never by beryllion or beryllos. Topaz (RVm in Ca 5¹⁴), yellow rock-crystal (false topaz), yellow serpentine, jacinth, and yellow jasper (Flinders Petrie) have been suggested as possible identifications. It is generally agreed that beryl is more likely to correspond to shoham (List A 11, B 5; Gn 2¹², Ex 25⁷ 28³ 35² 27 39⁶, 1 Ch 29², Job 28¹⁶), which LXX renders beryllion in A, EV always 'onyx,' but RVm generally 'beryl.' Beryl is a silicate of aluminium and beryllium, with a wide range of tints from yellow, through green, to blue, according to the proportion of the colouring matter (oxide of chromium). The commonest form of the crystal is a six-sided prism. Now each of the two shoham stones in Ex 28⁹ 10 39⁶ was engraved with the names of six of the tribes of Israel. A hexagonal prism such as beryl would best lend itself to this purpose. In NT beryllos occurs in List C 8.

Carbuncle (List A 3, B 9 [Heb. bareqeth or -ath, LXX smaragdos]). Bareqeth is simply a 'lightning' or 'flashing' stone. But 'carbuncle' (from carbunculus, a small glowing coal) denotes a red or fiery stone, and cannot correspond to the smaragdos, which was green (Pliny, HN xxxvii. 16). It is rather the equivalent of Gr. anthrax (Heb. nophek, List A 4, B 8). Pliny names 12 varieties of smaragdos, the most important of which is doubtless our emerald. This stone should probably be substituted for 'carbuncle' in A and B; so RVm (see Emerald below). Flinders Petrie, however, thinks that the smaragdos was greenish rock-crystal (silica). 'Carbuncle' occurs more appropriately in Is 54¹³ for Heb. 'abhn'eqdach ('stones of burning,' RVm 'rubies'). Any red stone like the garnet may be meant.

Chalcedony (List C 3). The modern stone of this name is semi-opaque or milky silica, but the ancient one was probably the green diopside (silicate of copper). This at least seems to have been the kind of smaragdos that was found in the copper mines of Chalcedon (Pliny, HN xxxvii. 18). There was some confusion, however, between the 'stone of Chalcedon' and the carchedonia (stone of Carthage), which was red (Pliny, ib. xxxvii. 23, 30). Carchedon occurs as a various reading for chalcedon in Rev 21¹⁹.

Chrysolite (RV; AV 'chrysolite'; List C 7). In modern mineralogy this is the peridot (see Topaz below). The ancient gem was some other golden-coloured stone. Yellow quartz, yellow corundum, jacinth, or some variety of beryl may possibly be understood.

Chrysoprase (RV; AV 'chrysoprasus,' List C 10). The prasius of Pliny (HN xxxvii. 34) was a leek-green chalcedony (from Gr. prason, a leek), of which there was a golden-tinted variety. The latter may be the NT chrysoprase. Possibly, however, both chrysoprase and chrysolite in List C refer to yellowish shades of beryl. The modern chrysoprase is a slightly translucent silica, coloured a beautiful apple-green by oxide of nickel.

Coral (Job 28¹⁸, Ezk 27¹⁶) is the calcareous 'skeleton' secreted by some of the compound actinozoa. Red coral (corallium rubrum) is common in the Mediterranean Sea and the Indian Ocean. In the living state the branching calcareous framework is covered by the 'conosarc' or common tissue of the organism, from which the individual polyps protrude. In the coral of commerce the living tissue has of course disappeared, and only the solid 'skeleton' remains. 'Coral' is also a possible rendering of peninim (so RVm in the passages under Ruby below).

Crystal.—In Job 28¹⁷, AV thus renders Heb. zekukith, but RV understands 'glass.' In the near verse, however, RV has 'crystal' for Heb. gabish, instead of AV 'pearls'. In Ezk 1²² 'crystal' stands for Heb. qerach (RVm 'ice'). In NT krystallos appears in Rev 4² 21¹¹ 22¹. In all these cases except the first the reference is probably to rock-crystal (colourless transparent quartz).

Diamond (List A 6, B 3). The Heb. yahalom probably stood in the twelfth place in List A, where LXX has onychion. Hence in this list RVm has 'sardonix' for 'diamond.' The latter is in any case an impossible rendering. The diamond was unknown in ancient times. It would have been too hard to engrave, and a diamond large enough to have borne the name of a tribe and to have filled a space in the high priest's breastplate would have been of incredible value. The yahalom was most likely the onyx, a banded form of silica (see Onyx below). 'Diamond' also occurs in Jer 17⁴ as the material of an engraving tool. The Heb. is shamir, which is rendered 'adamant' in two other passages where it is found (Ezk 3⁹, Zec 7¹²). The reference is probably to corundum or emery (aluminium oxide), a very hard mineral.

Emerald (List A 4, B 8; also Ezk 27¹⁶ [Heb. nophek, LXX anthrax, RVm 'carbuncle']). Some red fiery stone is plainly intended, the red garnet being the most likely. 'Emerald' is more probably the equivalent of Heb. baraqeth in List A 3, B 9 (see Carbuncle above). The common emerald is identical in composition with the beryl, but differs from it in hardness and in its bright green colour. The Oriental emerald (green corundum) is v-ry rare. In NT 'emerald' stands for smaragdos; in List C 4, and in Rev 4³, where the rainbow is compared to it. The latter passage is among Flinders Petrie's grounds for supposing that smaragdos is rock-crystal, which produces by its refraction all the prismatic colours.

Jacinth (Gr. hyakinthos, List C 11). In Rev 9¹⁷ the breastplates of the visionary horsemen are compared to jacinth (RV 'hyacinth'). There is no doubt that hyakinthos denoted the modern sapphire (blue corundum). So RVm in List C. The modern jacinth is a silicate of zircon. RV reads 'jacinth' for Heb. leshem in List A 7 (AV 'ligure').

Jasper (List A 12, B 6). The Heb. is yashpeph, and in B this corresponds to the LXX iaspis. Probably yashpeph should stand sixth in A also, in which case iaspis would again be the LXX equivalent. In NT iaspis occurs in List C 1, and also in Rev 4³ 21¹¹, 18. In 21¹¹ the 'jasper stone' is luminous and clear as crystal. The iaspis of Pliny was primarily a green stone (HN xxxvii. 37), but he enumerates many other varieties. It was also often transparent, and we must apparently take it to mean the green and other shades of chalcedony or semi-transparent silica. In modern terminology jasper denotes rather the completely opaque forms of the same substance, which may be of various colours—black, brown, red, green, or yellow.

Ligure (List A 7). The Heb. leshem is rendered by LXX ligurion, an obscure word which is possibly the same as lyngkurion, the latter being a yellow stone which was supposed to be the congealed urine of the lynx (Pliny, HN xxxvii. 13). Some identify the lyngkurion with the modern jacinth or yellow jargon (silicate of zircon). So RV. Others take the ligurion to be amber, which the Greeks obtained from Liguria (so RVm). Flinders Petrie identifies it with the yellow agate.

Onyx (List A 11, B 5; also Gn 2¹², Ex 25⁷ 28⁹ 35⁹, 27 39⁶, 1 Ch 29², Job 28¹⁶). The Heb. shoham is rendered variously in LXX, but in List A by beryllion, and it is probable that shoham is the beryl; so generally RVm (see Beryl above). Flinders Petrie suggests that green felspar may be intended. It would seem more correct to make 'onyx' the twelfth stone in List A, where LXX has onychion. If, as is probable, the Heb. yahalom (A 6) and yashpeph (A 12) should change places, onychion would thus stand for the former, which RVm renders 'sardonix.' We should then substitute 'onyx' or

'sardonix' for 'diamond' in List B 3 also. The onyx was a banded semi-transparent silica similar to the modern agate, the name being suggested by the contrast between the white and flesh-coloured zones of the finger-nail. In the special variety called the Roman onyx—the modern nicolo (onculus)—the layers are opaque, and alternately whitish-blue and black.

Ruby (always in pl. 'rubies' [Heb. penimim or peniyim], Job 28¹⁸, Pr 3¹⁵ 8¹¹ 20¹⁵ 31¹⁰ [in all which passages RVm has 'red coral' or 'pearls'], La 4⁷ [RVm 'corals'; in this last passage the context shows that some red stone is meant]). The true or Oriental ruby is red corundum (aluminium oxide), a very precious stone. The spinel ruby is an aluminate of magnesium. Both would be included along with red garnets under the general name 'carbuncle.'

Sapphire (List A 5, B 7, also Ex 24¹⁰, Job 28⁶, 18, Ca 5¹⁴, Is 54¹¹, La 4⁷, Ezk 1²⁶ 10¹ [Heb. sappir, LXX sappheiros]). Sappheiros occurs in NT in List C 2. Pliny (HN xxxvii. 32) describes this stone as of an azure colour, opaque, refulgent, with spots of gold. This cannot apply to the transparent modern sapphire, which was the ancient hyakinthos (see Jacinth above). It exactly fits the lapis lazuli (mainly a silicate of calcium, aluminium, and sodium), which is of a bright blue colour and is often speckled with yellow iron pyrites (sulphide of iron). In powdered form it is known as 'ultramarine.'

Sardius (List A 1, B 1 [Heb. 'odem', LXX sardon]). In NT sardon occurs in list C 6, and also in Rev 4³ (AV 'sardine stone', RV 'sardius'). The root meaning of 'odem' is 'red,' and sardon, though popularly derived from Sardis (Pliny, HN xxxvii. 31), is rather the Persian acerd ('yellowish red'). AVm and RVm have 'ruby' in Lists A and B, but it is most likely that the 'sardius' is carnelian (semi-transparent silica, coloured red by oxide of iron). Flinders Petrie suggests red jasper, which is much the same in composition, but opaque.

Sardonix (List C 5; also RVm for 'diamond' in list A 6). A variety of onyx or banded silica in which red layers of sardius were present. The typical sardonix was that in which the bands were alternately black, white, and red, for Pliny (HN xxxvii. 75) describes how the genuine stone was imitated by cementing layers of these colours together.

Topaz (List A 2, B 2; Job 28¹⁹ [Heb. pitdah, LXX topazion]). Topazion stands also in List C 9. The stone so named by the Greeks was not the modern topaz (silicate of aluminium in which some of the oxygen is replaced by fluorine), but the peridot (yellowish-green silicate of magnesium). Flinders Petrie thinks that the name may have been given still earlier to green serpentine, which was actually used in Egyptian work, and is a hydrated form of the same substance as peridot. The Oriental topaz is yellow corundum, and the so-called 'false topaz' is yellow quartz. RVm has 'topaz' for 'beryl' (i.e. the 'tarshish stone') in Ca 5¹⁴.

If the stones above mentioned be classified according to their composition, it will appear that, in spite of the bewildering variety of names, the principal groups are comparatively few.

The largest number of stones come under silica, the crystallized form of which is distinguished as quartz. When colourless or nearly so, quartz is called 'rock-crystal.' Yellow quartz is the false topaz, violet or amethystine quartz the common amethyst. The amorphous semi-opaque varieties of silica are grouped under the modern term 'chalcedony.' This may be red (sardius, carnelian), leek-green (prasiolite, ancient jasper), or banded (onyx, sardonix, modern agate). Opaque silica gives the modern jasper (ancient agate), which may be coloured red, green, yellow, etc.

A second group is formed by the silicates (silica in combination with metallic oxides). Thus we have modern jacinth (silicate of zircon), peridot or ancient topaz (silicate of magnesium), diopside or ancient chalcedony (silicate of copper), modern topaz (mainly silicate of aluminium), felspar (silicate of aluminium with sodium, potassium or calcium), beryl and common emerald (silicate of aluminium and beryllium), lapis lazuli or ancient sapphire (silicate of aluminium, calcium and sodium), garnet (silicate of aluminium and calcium, or a similar combination).

A third group consists of aluminium oxide (alumina), and includes the opaque corundum, of which emery is an impure form, and the transparent modern sapphire (blue), Oriental ruby (red), Oriental topaz (yellow), Oriental amethyst (violet), and Oriental emerald (green).

Lastly, we have an aluminate (alumina in combination with a metallic oxide) in the spinel ruby (aluminate of magnesium).

Alabaster in the modern sense is gypsum or sulphate of lime. The ancient or Oriental alabaster, however, was a form of carbonate of lime, and was largely used for vases, which were thought to be specially adapted for preserving unguents (Pliny, N.H. xiii. 3). The term 'alabaster' seems to have been applied in a general sense to vases even when not made of this material. There are two well-known instances in NT in which an alabaster 'box' (AV) or 'cruse' (RV) of ointment was used (Lk 7³⁷, Mt 26⁷, Mk 14³).

JAMES PATRICK.

JEWRY.—This old form occurs frequently in the older versions, but rarely in AV. In Dn 5¹³ it stands for Judah; in Lk 23⁵, Jn 7¹ and occasionally in the Apoc. for Judæa.

JEZANIAH.—A Judahite military officer who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (Jer 40⁸). He is called in 2 K 25²³ Azaniah, and is apparently to be identified also with Azariah of Jer 43².

JEZEBEL (meaning uncertain).—Daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and previously high priest of the Tyrian Baal; wife of Ahab, king of Israel, of the dynasty of Omri. Jezebel's evil influence in the land of Israel, especially in combating the religion of Jahweh in the interests of Baal-worship, was exercised not only during the twenty-two years of Ahab's reign, but also during the thirteen years of the rule of her two sons, Ahaziah and Joram; moreover, this influence extended, though in a less degree, to the Southern Kingdom of Judah, where Athaliah, the daughter of Jezebel, seems to have followed in the footsteps of her mother (2 K 8¹⁸). In her strength of character, her lust for power, her unshrinking and resolute activity, her remorseless brushing aside of anything and everything that interfered with the carrying out of her designs, she was the veritable prototype of Catherine de Medicis.

In the OT the figure of Jezebel is presented in connexion with some dramatic episodes which are probably recorded as illustrations, rather than as exceptionally flagrant examples, of her normal mode of procedure. These are: the account of the trial of strength between the prophets of Baal and Elijah (1 K 18¹²⁻¹⁹), the narrative about Naboth and his vineyard (1 K 21¹⁻¹⁶), and, as illustrating her obstinate, unbending character to the very end—note especially her words to Jehu in 2 K 9³¹—the story of her death (2 K 9³⁰⁻³⁷).

In Rev 2²⁰ the name of Jezebel occurs; she calls herself a prophetess, and tempts men to wickedness. It is questionable whether the mention of the name here has any reference at all to the queen Jezebel.

JEZELUS.—1. 1 Es 8²² = Ezr 8⁵ Jahaziel. 2. 1 Es 8²⁶ = Ezr 8⁹ Jehiel.

JEZER.—The head of the Jezerites (Nu 26⁴⁸, 1 Ch 7¹³).

JEZIEL.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 12³).

JEZRAHIAH.—The leader of the singers at the dedication of the walls of Jerus. (Neh 12⁴²). In 1 Ch 7³⁰⁻³¹ the same name is rendered Izrahiah.

JEZREEL.—The Hebrew name from which is derived the name of the Plain of Esdraelon (see ESDRAELON). The plain is called 'the Valley of Jezreel' in Jos 17¹⁸, Jg 6²⁵, Hos 1⁵.

1. Primarily, however, it denotes an important city overlooking the Plain on the south in the border of the tribe of Issachar. Here, by 'the fountain of Jezreel'—probably the powerful spring known as 'Ain Jalud'—the Israelites encamped against the Philistines before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29¹). It is named as an important town in the short-lived kingdom of Ishbosheth (2 S 2⁹). Under Solomon it was in the administrative district of Baana (1 K 4¹²). But the chief interest of the town's history centres in the time of the reign of Ahab, who established here a royal residence, to which he retired when the three years' drought came to an end (1 K 21¹ 18⁴), and whence he saw and coveted the vineyard of Naboth (21). It is probable, however, that the 'ivory palace' of 1 K 22³⁹ was not at Jezreel, but at the capital, Samaria. To Jezreel came Joram to recover from the wounds received in battle with the Syrians (2 K 8²⁹); and here, on the revolt of Jehu, were that king and his mother Jezebel slain (ch. 9), as well as all that remained of the house of Ahab (ch. 10). This is the last we hear of Jezreel, which thereafter seems to have sunk into insignificance. The place is represented both in situation and in name by the modern village of Zer'in, a poor and dirty hamlet. Except a few ruined tombs and fragments of sarcophagi, there are no remains of antiquity to be seen in the neighbourhood.

2. There was a second Jezreel, of which nothing is known save that it was in the territory of Judah (Jos 15⁴⁴) and was the native place of one of David's wives, Abinoam (1 S 25⁹). 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁹). 4. The symbolical name of Hosea's eldest son (Hos 1⁹). 5. Jezreel ('whom God soweth') is a title symbolically applied to Israel in Hos 2²¹. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JIDLAPH.—A son of Nahor (Gn 22²²).

JOAB ('Jahweh is father').—1. One of the sons of Zeruah—the eldest according to 2 S 21⁴, the second according to 1 Ch 21⁴—and thus the nephew of David. It is perhaps not too much to say that, humanly speaking, the Davidic dynasty would not have been established had it not been for the military genius and the loyalty of Joab. So consistently loyal was Joab to the royal house (see ADONIJAH), that one is tempted to question whether the passage, 1 K 2³⁵, which describes David's ingratitude, is genuine; certain it is that if David really felt with regard to Abner and Amasa as he is described as feeling in this passage, it is surprising that he should have left to the wisdom of Solomon the duty of inflicting the punishment due; Joab's death would seem to have been due rather to his loyalty in supporting David's rightful heir, Adonijah.

Above all, Joab was a skilled general; this is seen by the number of victories he gained, namely, over the army of Ishbosheth under the leadership of Abner (2 S 21²⁻¹⁰); over the Jebusites (1 Ch 11¹⁻⁹); over the Syrians and Ammonites (2 S 10¹⁻¹⁹ 11¹ 12²⁸⁻²⁹); over Absalom (18¹⁻¹⁷); over Sheba (20⁴⁻⁷). These are specifically mentioned, but there must have been very many more for those which are spoken of generally as David's victories were in all probability due to Joab, who is repeatedly spoken of as David's commander-in-chief (e.g. 2 S 8¹⁶ 20²² etc.).

Secondly, his loyalty to the house of David is illustrated by his whole life of devoted service, and especially by such conspicuous instances as his desire to make his victory over the Ammonites appear to have been gained by David (2 S 12³⁰⁻³¹); his slaying of Abner [though other motives undoubtedly played a part in this act, it is certain that Joab regarded Abner as a real danger to the State (3³⁴⁻³⁵); the reconciliation which he brought about between David and Absalom (14¹⁻¹⁷); his slaying of Absalom when he realized his treachery to David (18¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 19⁶); his words to David in 2 S 19⁴—one of the most striking instances of his attachment; and lastly, his championship of the rightful heir to the throne, which cost him his life (1 K 17²⁴). How close was the tie between David and Joab may be seen, further, in the blind obedience of the latter, who was willing to be partaker in David's sin (2 S 11¹⁻²).

The darker side of Joab's character is to be seen in his vindictiveness and ruthless cruelty; for although it is only fair to plead the spirit of the age, the exigencies of the State's weal, and the demand of blood-revenge, yet the treacherous and bloodthirsty acts of which Joab was guilty constitute a dark blot upon his character (see 2 S 3²⁷⁻³⁷, 1 K 11¹⁶; cf. 2 S 18⁴ 20⁹, 10).

2. Son of Seraiah (1 Ch 4¹⁴; cf. Neh 11³⁵). 3. A family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁶—Neh 7¹¹—1 Es 5⁴; cf. Ezr 8⁹—1 Es 8³⁵).

JOACHAZ.—1 Es 1¹⁴—Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah; cf. 2 Ch 36¹.

JOADANUS.—One of the sons of Jesus, the son of Josedek (1 Es 9¹⁹); called in Ezr 10¹⁸ Gedaliah.

JOAH.—1. Son of Asaph, and 'recorder' at Hezekiah's court (2 K 18¹⁸, 26, 27—1s 36¹¹, 27). 2. A Levitical family name (1 Ch 6²¹ [apparently same as Ethan of v.⁴⁷], 2 Ch 29¹³). 3. A Levite (1 Ch 26⁴). 4. Son of Joahaz, and 'recorder' at Josiah's court (2 Ch 34⁹).

JOAHAZ.—1. Father of Joah the 'recorder' (2 Ch 34⁹). 2. See Jehoahaz, 1.

JOAKIM.—The name is spelt Jehoiakim in canon. books, but Josacim or Joachim in Apocr. AV, and Joakim everywhere in Apocr. RV.

In Apocr. the name belongs to six persons. 1. King Jehoiakim (1 Es 13⁴², Bar 1³). 2. Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, who is erroneously called Joakim in 1 Es 14³. 3. A priest, son of Hilkiah, to whom the captives are said to have sent money for the purchase of offerings and incense (Bar 1⁷). 4. A high priest in the days of Holofernes and Judith (Jth 4⁴, 14). 5. A son of Zorobabel (1 Es 5⁹). 6. The husband of Susanna (Sus. 1. 4, 63).

JOANAN.—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁷).

JOANNA.—The wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Antipas, one of 'certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities.' She ministered to Jesus of her substance, and after the crucifixion helped to anoint His body (Lk 8³ 24⁹).

JOANNES.—1. 1 Es 8³⁵—Ezr 8¹² Johanan. 2. 1 Es 9²⁵—Ezr 10²⁸ Jehohanan.

JOARIB.—The head of the priestly family from which the Maccabees were descended (1 Mac 2¹⁴). Acc. to 1 Ch 24⁷ this family, there called that of Jehoiarib, was the first of the twenty-four courses of priests.

JOASH.—1. See JEHOASH. 2. The father of Gideon (Jg 6¹¹ etc.). 3. A son of Ahab (1 K 22³⁸). 4. A son of Shelah (1 Ch 4²²). 5. A Benjamite (1 Ch 12⁷). 6. A son of Becher (1 Ch 7⁶). 7. A servant of David (1 Ch 27²⁸).

JOB.—1. The man Job.—Job is referred to in the OT in the book bearing his name, and in Ezk 14¹²⁻²⁰, where he is mentioned as a conspicuous example of righteousness; in the Apocr. in Sir 40² [Heb. after Smend and Ryssel], and the Vulg. of To 2¹²; and in the NT in Ja 5⁴, the last two passages alluding to his patience. The reference in Ezk. shows that righteous Job was a familiar figure in some Jewish circles in the 6th cent. B.C. On the assumption that the Job of the book is sketched, as to the main outlines, after ancient tradition, probably the same in substance as that known to Ezk., we have to think of him as a Gentile living in patriarchal times either in the Hauran or on the confines of Idumæa and Arabia (see Uz), and his friends also must be regarded as Gentiles.

This conclusion is supported by the names of God generally employed in the poem. The Tetragrammaton, which is used 31 times by the writer in the prose parts, occurs only once in the poetic portions (12⁹), and is ascribed to Job only in one verse in the Prologue (1²¹). Adonai is also met with once (28²⁸). God is usually referred to by Job and his associates by names not distinctively Jewish: El, 55 times; Eloah, 41 times out of 57 in the whole OT; and Shaddai, 31 times out of 48 in OT; Elohim is comparatively rare in the poem. The entire absence of distinct allusions to Israelitish history points to the same conclusion. The great word torah, 'law,' is used only once (22²), and then in the general sense of 'instruction.' According to a lost work, 'Concerning the Jews,' by one Aristeas, cited by Euseb. (Ev. Praep. ix. 25), and the appendix in the LXX, said to be taken from a Syriac book but standing in some relation to Aristeas, Job is to be identified with Jobab, king of Edom (Gn 36³³). This identification, which appears also in the Testament of Job, a work probably containing an ancient Jewish nucleus, although critically worthless, is not without interest and value, as possibly preserving a fragment of old tradition. The name Job, which probably belongs to the traditional story, is in Heb. יִיבֹב. The apparently similar name Job (AV) of Gn 46¹⁵, a son of Issachar, is differently spelt (in Heb. יֹבֵב), and is therefore given in the RV as Iob. Jobab, which is met with in several connexions (Gn 10²⁹ Joktanite; Gn 36³³ Edomite; Jos 11¹ Canaanite; 1 Ch 8⁹ Benjamite), seems to be quite distinct, although Cheyne remarks (in EBi) that the possibility of a connexion must be admitted. The meaning of יִיבֹב is extremely uncertain. If explained from the Heb., it means either 'attacked' or 'attacker' (Siegfried in JE). If explained with the help of the Arabic ʿayyūb, it means 'returning,' 'penitent.' In all probability it was a foreign name taken over with the story, which seems in the first instance to have been of foreign origin. The name Aiab, which was current in the north of Palestine c. B.C. 1400 (Tell el-Amarna Letters, No. 237 Winckler [118 Petrie]), may be a Canaanitish equivalent, but no stress can be laid on the similarity. It has also been noticed that ayyūb in Bab. meant 'enemy' (ib. 50 Winckler [147 Petrie]), but this cannot be regarded at present as more than a coincidence.

2. The Book of Job.—(1) Place in the Canon.—Except in the Syriac Bible, which locates it between the Pentateuch and Joshua, on account of its supposed great antiquity, the book is always reckoned as one of the Kethubim or Hagiographa, and is often given the third place. It is usually grouped with Ps. and Prov., with which it is associated by the use of a special system of accentuation (except in the Prologue and Epilogue), but the order of the three books varies.

In a baraita in the Bab. Talm. (Baba bathra 14b), which probably gives the most ancient order (Ryle, Canon of OT, 232), it comes after Ruth and Ps.; in many Heb. MSS, especially Spanish, and in the Massorah, after Ch. and Ps.; in the German MSS, which have been followed in most printed editions, after Ps. and Proverbs. Of the LXX MSS Codex B has the remarkable order: Ps., Pr., Ec., Ca., Job, Wis., Sir., A has Ps., Job, Proverbs. In printed editions of the LXX and Vulg. Job usually comes first, and this order is generally adopted in European versions, owing no doubt to the influence of the Latin Bible.

(2) Text.—The Heb. text of Job was long regarded as excellent, but has been much questioned in recent years, some critics resorting very largely to emendation with the help of the Versions and free conjecture. The reaction against the earlier view has probably led some scholars too far. When the difficulty of the theme, its bold treatment in many places, and the large number of words, forms, and uses not met with elsewhere (according to Friedrich Delitzsch, 259) are duly taken into account, the condition of the text is seen to be less corrupt than might have been expected. Much discussion has been occasioned by the peculiar character of the LXX as restored to its original form by means of the Sahidic translation first published in 1889. This version differs in extent from the Massoretic text more widely in Job than in any other book. There are two interesting additions: the expansion of 2⁹ and the appendix at the end of the book; but the chief characteristic is omission. A little less than one-fifth of the Heb. text is absent—about 400 lines out of, roundly speaking, 2200 for the whole book and 2075 for the poetic portions. A few have found in this shorter edition the original text of the book, but most ascribe the minus of the LXX to defective understanding of the Hebrew, imperfect acquaintance with the structure of Heb. poetry, and the desire to conform to Hellenic standards, etc., rather than to variation of text. This version therefore, in the opinion of most competent judges, is of little use for the restoration of the text. Here and there it suggests a better reading, e.g. in 8^{15a} 'latter end' for 'paths,' but in the main the Massoretic text is greatly to be preferred. It is not improbable, however, that the arrangement of the latter is wrong in a few passages: e.g. in ch. 31, where vv. 35-37 form a more fitting close than vv. 38-40.

(3) Analysis.—The book, as we have it, is a poem framed in prose, with bits of prose interspersed. The prose portions are as follows: the introduction, often called the Prologue (ch. 1 f.), stating the problem, 'the undeserved suffering of a good man,' giving a partial solution, and bringing on the scene the hero's three friends; short headings (3¹ 4¹ etc.); a supplementary note (31^{40c}); a brief introduction to the speeches of Elihu (32¹⁻⁴); and the sequel, often called the Epilogue (42¹⁻¹⁷). The poem opens with a monologue in which Job curses the day of his birth (ch. 3). This is followed by a series of three dialogues extending over chs. 4-28: (i.) 4-14; (ii.) 15-21; (iii.) 22-28.

The three friends in succession, probably in order of seniority, reason with Job, all from the generally accepted standpoint that suffering is a sure indication of sin. As the discussion proceeds they become more and more bitter, until the most moderate and dignified of them, Eliphaz, actually taxes Job with flagrant iniquity (22⁵⁻⁹). In the third dialogue, as we have it, one of the speakers, Zophar, is silent. Job replies at length to each expostulation, sometimes sinking into depression on the verge of despair (14¹⁻¹² etc.), occasionally rising for a moment or two into confidence (16⁹ 19²⁵⁻²⁷), but throughout maintaining his integrity, and, notwithstanding passionate utterances which seem near akin to blasphemy (10⁸⁻¹⁷ 16⁷⁻¹⁷), never wholly losing his faith in God.

The dialogues are followed by a monologue spoken by Job (chs. 29-31), consisting of a vivid retrospect of the happy past (ch. 29), a dismal picture of the wretched present (ch. 30), and what Marshall calls 'Job's oath of self-vindication'—an emphatic disavowal of definite forms of transgression, in a series of sentences most of which begin with 'if,' sometimes followed by an imprecation (ch. 31). The succeeding six chapters (32-37) are ascribed to a new character, a young man, Elihu the Buzite, who is dissatisfied with both Job and his friends. The distinctive note of his argument is the stress laid on the thought that God teaches by means of affliction; in other words, that the purpose, or at least one main purpose, of trial is discipline (33¹⁹⁻²⁸ 36¹⁰ 15). Elihu then drops out of the book, and the remainder of the poem (chs. 38-42) is devoted to Jahweh's answer to Job's complaint, calling attention to the Divine power, wisdom, and tenderness revealed in creation, in the control of natural forces and phenomena, in the life of birds and beasts, and in the working of Providence in human history, and suggesting that He who could do all this might surely be trusted to care for His servant; and Job's penitent retraction of his 'presumptuous utterances.'

(4) Integrity.—On the question whether the book, as we have it, is a single whole or a combination of two or more parts, there is a general agreement among scholars in favour of the latter alternative. There are clear indications of at least two hands. The speeches of Elihu (chs. 32-37) are ascribed by most (not by Budde, Cornill, Wildeboer, Briggs, and a few others) to a later writer, who desired to supplement, and to some extent correct, the work of his predecessor.

The chief reasons alleged for this conclusion are: (1) the silence about Elihu in the Epilogue. (2) The fact that the whole section can be removed without any break of continuity, 31^{40c} linking on naturally to 38¹. (3) The Aramaic character of the diction, and the occurrence of words and phrases not found elsewhere in the poem. (4) Literary inferiority. (5) Theological diversity, the conception of God differing from what is met with in the rest of the book (Marshall, Job and his Friends, p. 82ff.).

The third of these reasons has been shown to be inconclusive. The language of Elihu is not inconsistent with the view that these chapters were written by the author of the dialogues. The fourth reason is not without weight, but it must be allowed that there are some very fine things in these chapters, and it must be remembered that they have probably been handed down less carefully than some other parts of the book, on account of the disfavour with which some of the ancient Jews regarded Elihu ('inspired by Satan'—Test. of Job, ch. 41). In any case, Friedrich Delitzsch has gone too far in describing the author as 'a fifth-rate poet.' The remaining three reasons, however, seem to be nearly decisive.

The fine poem in ch. 28, which contrasts the success of man in finding precious ore with his utter failure to find wisdom, does not fit in with the context, and is therefore regarded by many as an addition. The striking, but rather turgid, descriptions of the hippopotamus and the crocodile in chs. 40. 41 are also held by many to be an interpolation. Some question the verses about the ostrich (39¹³⁻¹⁸). The Prologue and Epilogue are considered by some to be the relics of an earlier work in prose.

A few scholars go much further in critical analysis. Bickell, for instance, in his search after the original text, expunges not only the speeches of Elihu and the Prologue and Epilogue, but also the whole of the speeches of Jahweh, and many smaller portions. Cheyne (in EBI) seems to find four main elements in the book, as we have it, 'which has grown, not been made': (1) the Prologue and the Epilogue; (2) the dialogue; (3) the speeches of Jahweh; (4) the speeches of Elihu. Marshall (in Com.), on the ground that there are different strata of theological belief, also finds four elements, but only in part the same. (1) The dialogues up to 27², with the Epilogue, and part of the Prologue; (2) chs. 28-31, and the speeches of Jahweh; (3) the speeches of Elihu; (4) the references to the heavenly council in chs. 1 and 2.

(5) Nature of the Book.—The class of Heb. literature to which the Book of Job belongs is clearly the Chokhmah or Wisdom group, the other representatives of which are Pr., Ec., and Sir.—the group which deals with questions of practical ethics, religious philosophy, and speculation. The book is mainly—not entirely, as one of the Rabbis thought (Baba bathra 15a)—a work of imagination, but, in the judgment of most, with a traditional nucleus, the extent of which, however, is uncertain, as there are features in both the Prologue and the Epilogue which suggest literary invention: e.g., the recurrence of the words 'I only am escaped alone to tell thee' (15. 16. 17. 19), the use of the numbers 3 (12. 17. 21. 42¹³) and 7 (12⁷. 42⁶. 13), and the doubling of Job's possessions (42¹³). The poem, as handed down to us, can hardly be described in modern terms. It contains lyrical elements, but could not appropriately be designated lyrical. It has more than one dramatic feature, but is not really a drama. It reminds one of the epos, but is not an epic. It is didactic, but, as Baudissin has observed, soars high above a mere didactic poem. It is emphatically sui generis. It stands absolutely alone, not merely in the literature of Israel, but in the literature of the world.

(6) Poetic Form.—The Austrian scholar Bickell, who has been followed by Duhm, and in England by Dillon, has tried to show that the poem was written throughout in quatrains, but the textual havoc wrought in the attempt seems to prove clearly that he is, in part at least, on the wrong track. Very few critics accept the theory. The only thing that seems to be certain about the poetic method of the writer or writers is the use throughout of the parallelism of members, which has long been known as the leading feature of ancient Oriental poetry. A verse usually consists of two lines or members, but there are many instances where there are three (34⁹), and one at least where there is only one (14⁴). More than eight hundred out of about a thousand verses, according to Lev, consist of two lines, each of which has three independent words. But here there are many exceptions, some no doubt due to textual corruption, but more in all probability to the poet's mastery of the forms which he employed.

(7) Purpose and teaching.—The chief object of the poet to whom we owe the dialogues, and probably the Prologue and the Epilogue, and the speeches of Jahweh, and we may add, of the compiler or editor of the whole book, is to give a better answer to the question, 'Why are exceptionally good men heavily afflicted?' than that generally current in Jewish circles down to the time of Christ. A subsidiary object is the delineation of spiritual experience under the conditions supposed, of the sufferer's changing moods, and yet indestructible longing for the God whom he cannot understand. The poet's answer, as stated in the speeches of Jahweh, seems at the first reading no answer at all, but when closely examined is seen to be profoundly suggestive. There is no specific reply to Job's bitter complaints and passionate outcries. Instead of reasoning with His servant, Jahweh reminds him of a few of the wonders of creation and providence, and leaves him to draw the inference. He draws it, and sees the God whom he seemed to have lost sight of for ever as he never saw Him before, even in the time of his prosperity; sees Him, indeed, in a very real sense for the first time (42^b). The book also contains other partial solutions of the problem. The speeches of Elihu lay stress, as already observed, on the educational value of suffering. God is a peerless teacher (36^{22b}), who 'delivereth the afflicted by his affliction, and openeth (uncovereth) their ear by adversity' (36¹⁵). The Prologue lifts the curtain of the unseen world, and reveals a mysterious personality who is Divinely permitted to inflict suffering on the righteous, which results in manifestation of the Divine glory. The intellectual range of the book is amazingly wide. Marshall observes that 'every solution which the mind of man has ever framed [of the problem of the adversity of the righteous, and the prosperity of the wicked] is to be found in the Book of Job.' On the question of the hereafter the teaching of the book as a whole differs little from that of the OT in general. There is yearning for something better (14¹³⁻¹⁶), and perhaps a momentary conviction (19²⁸⁻²⁷), but the general conception of the life after death is that common to Hebrews, Assyrians, and Babylonians.

(8) The characters.—The interest of the Book of Job is concentrated mainly on the central figure, the hero. Of the other five leading characters by far the most interesting is the Satan of the Prologue, half-angel half-demon, by no means identical with the devil as usually conceived, and yet with a distinctly diabolical tendency. The friends are not very sharply differentiated in the book as we have it, but it is probable that the parts are wrongly distributed in the third dialogue, which is incomplete, no part being assigned to Zophar. Some ascribe 27⁷⁻¹⁰ 12-22 to Zophar, and add to Bildad's speech (which in the present arrangement consists only of ch. 25) vv. 2-14 of ch. 26, what is left of Job's reply being found in 26¹⁻⁴ 27²⁻⁴ 11¹. Marshall finds Zophar's third speech in chs. 25 and 26⁵⁻¹⁴, and Bildad's in 24¹³⁻²¹. There seems to be considerable confusion in chs. 25-27, so that it is difficult to utilize them for the study of the characters of Bildad and Zophar. Elihu seems to be the oldest and most dignified of the three, with something of the seer or prophet about him (4¹²⁻²¹). Bildad is 'the traditionalist.' Zophar, who is probably the youngest, is very differently estimated, one scholar designating him as a rough noisy fellow, another regarding him as a philosopher of the agnostic type. It must be allowed that the three characters are not as sharply distinguished as would be the case in a modern poem, the writer being concerned mainly with Job, and using the others to some extent as foils. Elihu, who has been shown to be almost certainly the creation of another writer, is not by any means a copy of one of the three. He is an ardent young man, not free from conceit, but with noble thoughts about God and insight into God's ways not attained by them.

(9) Date.—In the Heb. Sirach (49⁸⁻¹⁰) Job is referred to after Ezekiel and before 'the Twelve,' which may possibly suggest that the writer regarded the book as comparatively late. The oldest Rabbinic opinion (Baba bathra, 14b) ascribed the book to Moses. Two Rabbis placed Job in the period of the return from the Exile (ib. 15a), one as late as the Persian period (ib. 15b). These opinions have no critical value, but the first has exercised considerable influence. Modern students are generally agreed on the following points:—(1) The book in all its parts implies a degree of reflexion on the problems of life which fits in better with a comparatively late than with a very early age. (2) The dialogue, which is unquestionably one of the oldest portions, indicates familiarity with national catastrophes, such as the destruction of the kingdom of Samaria, the overthrow of Damascus, and the leading away of large bodies of captives, including priests and nobles, from Jerusalem to Babylon (12¹⁷⁻²⁵), which again, on the assumption that the writer is an Israelite, points to an advanced stage of Israelitish history. Many take a further step. 'The prophet Jeremiah in his persecutions, Job who is called by Jahweh "my servant Job" (42^b), and the suffering Servant of Jahweh in the exilic prophet are figures which seem to stand in the connexion of a definite period' (Baudissin, Einleitung, 768), and so point at the earliest to the Exile and the decades immediately preceding it. These and other considerations have led most recent critics to date the main poem near, or during, or after the Exile.

Some earlier scholars (Luther, Franz Delitzsch, Cox, and Stanley) recommended the age of Solomon, others (Nöldeke, Hitzig, and Reuss) the age of Isaiah, and others (Ewald, Riehm, and apparently Bleek) the period between Isaiah and Jeremiah. Marshall thinks that the dialogue may have been written as early as the time of Tiglath-pileser III (b.c. 745-726), but not earlier. Dillmann, König, Davison (in Hastings' DB), and Driver favour the period of the Exile; Cheyne (in EBI) puts the earliest part after b.c. 519; G. Hoffmann, c. b.c. 500; Duhm, from 500 to 450; Budde, E. Kautzsch, and Peake, c. 400; the school of Kuenen, the 4th or 3rd cent.; O. Holtzmann the age of the Ptolemys; and Siegfried (in the JE), the time of the Maccabees.

At present the period from c. b.c. 600 to c. 400 seems to command most approval. The later portions of the book, especially the speeches of Elihu, may have been written a century or more after the main poem. Marshall thinks that the latest element may be as late as the age of Malachi, and Duhm confidently assigns 'Elihu' to the 2nd cent. b.c. A definite date is evidently unattainable either for the whole or for parts, but it seems to be tolerably certain that even the earlier portions are much later than used to be assumed.

(10) Authorship.—Besides the Talmudic guess cited above, very few attempts have been made to fix on an author. Calmet suggested Solomon, Bunsen Baruch, and Røyer (in 1901) Jeremiah. None of these views needs to be discussed. Whoever was the author of the main poem, he was undoubtedly an Israelite, for a Gentile would not have used the Tetragrammaton so freely. Of familiarity with the Law there are, indeed, very few traces, but that is doubtless owing to the poet's wonderful skill, which has enabled him to maintain throughout a Gentile and patriarchal colouring. There is no reason for thinking that he wrote either in Babylonia or in Egypt. He must have lived in some region where he could study the life of the desert. It has been remarked that all the creatures he names (except the hippopotamus and the crocodile, which may have been introduced by a later hand) are desert creatures. He was intimately acquainted with the life of caravans (6¹⁸⁻²⁰). He knew something of the astronomy of his time (9³, cf. 38³¹⁻⁴). He had some acquaintance with the myths and superstitions of Western Asia. cf. 9¹⁸ 25⁵ 26¹¹, where there may be allusions to the

Babylonian myth about the struggle between the dragon
 1 Chaos and Marduk, the god of light; 3^a 26^{is}, where a reference may be made to popular notions about eclipses and to the claims of magicians; and perhaps 29^{18b}, where some find an allusion to the fabulous phoenix.
 He was probably familiar with the Wisdom-lore of Israel, and possibly of Edom, and may safely be assumed to have known all that was worth knowing in other departments of Heb. literature (cf. Job 7¹⁷. with Ps 84¹, and Job 3³. 10 with Jer 20⁴⁻¹⁸, although the order of dependence is by no means certain in the latter case). The poetic execution reveals the hand of a master. It seems most natural to look for his home in the south or southeast of the Holy Land, not far from Edom, where he would come in frequent contact with Gentile sages, and could glean much from travellers.

(11) Parallels to Job.—Cheyne (in EB) has endeavoured to connect the story of Job with the Babylonian legend of Eabani, but the similarity is too slight to need discussion. A far closer parallel is furnished by a partially preserved poem from the library of Ashurbanipal, which probably reproduces an ancient Babylonian text. It represents the musings of an old king, who has lived a blameless and devout life, but is nevertheless terribly afflicted in body and mind—pursued all day, and without rest at night—and is apparently forsaken of the gods. He cannot understand the ways of Deity towards either himself or others. 'What seems good to a man is bad with his god. . . . Who could understand the counsel of the gods in heaven?' The poem ends with a song of praise for deliverance from sin and disease (Der Alte Orient, vii, No. 3, pp. 27–30, and extra vol. ii, 134–139; and M. Jastrow in JBL xxv [1906], p. 135 ff.).

The Jesuit missionary, Père Bouchet, called attention in 1723 to the story of the ancient Indian king Arichandiren who, in consequence of a dispute in an assembly of gods and _____ and holy men as to the existence of a perfect prince, was very severely tested by the leader of the sceptical party. He was deprived of his property, his kingdom, his only son, and his wife, but still trod the path of virtue, and received as rewards the restoration of wife and son, and other marks of Divine favour. These parallels, however, interesting as they are, do not in the least interfere with the originality and boldness of the Hebrew poem, which must ever be regarded as the boldest and grandest effort of the ancient world to 'justify the ways of God to men.'

W. TAYLOR SMITH,

JOBAB.—1. A son of Joktan in the genealogies (Gn 10²⁹, 1 Ch 1²³), and therefore probably an Arabian geographical name. Glaser identifies Jobab with YHYBB (likely Yuhaybab), a tribe mentioned in the Sabæan inscriptions. Sprenger through the LXX form Iobor relates it to Wabâr, a considerable region in S. Arabia. 2. A king of Edom (Gn 36³¹, 1 Ch 1⁴¹), confused, in the apocryphal appendix to the LXX version of Job, with Job (see Job, § 1). 3. A king of Madon, ally of Jabin of Hazor against Joshua (Jos 11¹). 4. 5. Name of two Benjamites (1 Ch 8⁹ and 18). W. M. NEBIT.

JOCHEBED.—A sister of Kohath, married to Amram, her nephew, and mother of Aaron and Moses (Ex 6²⁰) and Miriam (Nu 26⁵⁹). An earlier writer, E, in narrating the birth of Moses, speaks of his mother as a daughter of Levi, but does not give her name (Ex 2¹).

JOD.—The tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 10th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

JODA.—1. A Levite (1 Es 5⁸); called in Ezr 3⁹ Judah; elsewhere Hodaviah, Ezr 2⁴⁰; Hodevah, Neh 7⁴²; Sudias, 1 Es 5². 2. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3²⁸).

JOED.—A Benjamite (Neh 117).

JOEL.—1. The prophet (see next article). Regarding his personal history we know nothing. 2. A son of Samuel (1 S 8², 1 Ch 6²⁸ [RV 6²²]). 3. An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6²⁸, called in v.²⁴ Shaul). 4. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4³⁶). 5. A Reubenite (1 Ch 5⁴, 8²). 6. A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5¹²). 7. A chief man of Issachar (1 Ch 7⁷). 8. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11²⁸). 9. 10. 11. Levites (1 Ch 15¹⁷⁻¹⁸, 17²³ 26², 2 Ch 29¹⁷). 12. A Mannasse chief (1 Ch 27²⁰). 13. One of those who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10⁴³ [1 Es 9²⁵ Juel]). 14. A Benjamite overseer after the Exile (Neh 11⁹).

JOEL, BOOK OF.—1. Analysis.—The Book of Joel clearly falls into two parts: (1) a call to repentance in view of present judgment and the approaching Day of Jahweh, with a prayer for deliverance (1-2¹⁷); (2) the Divine answer promising relief, and after that spiritual blessing, judgment on the Gentile world, and material prosperity for Judah and Jerusalem (2¹⁸-3 [Heb. 4]²¹).

(1) The immediate occasion of the call to repentance is a plague of locusts of exceptional severity (1st), extending, it would seem from the promise in the second part (2nd), over several years, and followed by drought and famine so severe as to necessitate the discontinuance of the meal- and drink-offering, i.e. probably the daily sacrifice (cf. Ex. 29th), where the same Heb. words are used of the daily meal-offering and drink-offering). This fearful calamity, which is distinctly represented as present ('before our eyes' 1st), heralds 'the great and very terrible day of Jahweh' (2nd), which will be ushered in by yet more fearful distress of the same kind (2nd-11). The reason of all this suffering actual and prospective is national sin, which, however, is not specified. Jahweh's people have turned away from Him (implied in 2nd). Let them turn back, giving expression to their penitent sorrow in tears, mourning garb, general fasting, and prayer offered by priests in the Temple (2nd-17).

(2) The second part opens with the declaration that the prayer for mercy was heard: 'Then ... the Lord ... had pity on his people' (21st RV). It seems to be implied that the people had repented and fasted, and that the priests had prayed in their behalf. The rendering of this passage in the AV, 'Then will ... the Lord pity his people,' is generally rejected by modern scholars as inaccurate, being, according to Driver, 'grammatically indefensible.' What we have in the original is not prediction, but historical statement. This Divine pity, proceeds the prophet, speaking in Jahweh's name, will express itself in the removal of the locusts (22nd) and in the cessation of the drought, which will restore to the land its normal fertility, and so replace famine by plenty (22^{nd-3rd}). But higher blessings yet are in store for the people of Jahweh. His Spirit shall afterwards be poured out on all, inclusive even of slaves (22nd). (Heb. 31st.) And when the Day of Jahweh comes in all its terror, it will be terrible only to the Gentile world which has oppressed Israel. The gathered hosts of the former, among whom Phœnicians and Philistines are singled out for special condemnation (3 [Heb. 4] 4th), shall be destroyed by Jahweh, and His angels in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (3 [Heb. 4] 1st), and then Jerusalem shall be a holy city, no longer haunted by unclean aliens (3 [Heb. 4] 1st), and Judah, unlike Egypt and Edom, will be a happy nation dwelling in a happy because well-watered land, and Jahweh will ever abide in its midst (3 [Heb. 4] 18-21st).

2. Integrity.—The unity of the book was questioned by the French scholar Vernes (in 1881), who, however, admitted the weakness of his case, and by the German scholar Rothstein (in 1896), the latter finding a follower in Ryszel (in the JE). These critics assign the two parts to different writers in different ages. Baudissin (Einleitung) suggests extensive revision. These theories have found little acceptance. Recent criticism generally regards the book, with the exception of a gloss or two, as the work of one hand.

There are indeed two distinctly marked parts, as was shown in the analysis, but that in no way incompatibly with unity of authorship, for the following reasons: (a) The second part does not contradict but supplements the first. (b) The thought of 'the day of Jahweh' as a day of terror is common to both (1¹⁶ and 2²¹ [Heb. 3¹]). (c) The alleged lack of originality in the second part, in so far as it exists, can reasonably be accounted for by its apocalyptic character. (d) The distinctive features of the first part, which is mainly historic, are largely due to the special theme—the description of locusts and their ravages, which is unique in Heb. literature.

3. Date.—There is no external evidence. The place of the book in the Canon is not conclusive, for the Book of Jonah, which was manifestly written after the fall of Nineveh, is also found in the former part of the collection of the Twelve, and comes before Micah, the earliest portions of which are beyond doubt much older. Hence the question can be answered, in so far as an answer is possible, only from the book itself.

The facts bearing upon it may be briefly stated as follows:

(1) The people addressed are the inhabitants of Judah (3 [Heb. 4] 1, 6, 8, 18^b), and Jerusalem (2²² [Heb. 3⁵] 3 [Heb. 4] 8, 16^f, 20). Zion is mentioned in 2¹⁵, 23, 22 [Heb. 3⁵] 3 [Heb. 4] 18, 17, 21. There is no trace of the kingdom of Samaria. The name 'Israel' is indeed used (2²⁷ 3 [Heb. 4] 2¹⁰), but, as the first and last of these passages clearly show, it is not the kingdom of Israel that is meant, but the people of God, dwelling mainly about Jerusalem. (2) There is no mention of royalty or aristocracy. (3) The Temple is repeatedly referred to (1⁹, 13^f, 16, 21³ 3 [Heb. 4] 5), and by implication in the phrase 'my holy mountain' (2¹ 3 [Heb. 4] 1¹); its ritual is regarded as of high importance (1⁹, 13, 21⁴), and its ministers stand between the people and their God, giving expression to their penitence and prayer (1⁹, 13, 21⁴). (4) The people are called on to repent of sin (2²⁷), but in general terms. No mention is made of idolatry or formalism, or sensuality, or oppression—the sins so sternly denounced by Amos and Isaiah. (5) The foreign nations denounced as hostile to Israel are the Phoenicians (3 [Heb. 4] 7), the Philistines (ib.), Egypt and Edom (3 [Heb. 4] 19). Reference is also made to the Grecians ('sons of the Ionians,' 3 [Heb. 4] 5) and the Sabaeans or S. Arabians (3 [Heb. 4] 8) as slave-dealers. Assyria, Babylonia and Aram are neither named nor alluded to. (6) The history of Judah and Jerusalem includes a national catastrophe when the people of Jahweh were scattered among the nations and the land of Jahweh was divided amongst new settlers (3 [Heb. 4] 2). (7) This book of 73 verses contains 27 expressions or clauses to which parallels more or less close, can be added from other OT writings, mainly prophetic. In 12 passages is verbal or almost verbal correspondence: cf. 1^{10b} and Ezk 30²¹; 1¹⁵ and Is 13⁶; 2² and Zeph 1⁶; 2² and Nah 2¹⁰ [Heb. 1¹]; 2¹⁴ and Ex 34⁴; 2¹⁵ and 2 S 12²²; 2^{27b} and Ezk 36¹¹ etc.; 2^{27c} and Is 45²; 1¹⁸, 20^{2b} [Heb. 3⁴], and Mal 4⁵ [Heb. 3²²]; 2²² [Heb. 3⁵] and Ob 1¹; 3 [Heb. 4] 10 and Am 1²; 3 [Heb. 4] 1 and Jer 33¹⁵ etc. In two other places there is contrast as well as parallelism. 2²⁸ [Heb. 3⁵] answers to Ezk 39²⁹, but the latter has 'on the house of Israel,' the former 'on all flesh,' and 3 [Heb. 4] 10 is the reverse of Is 24 and Mic 4². The last clause of 2¹³ is found also in Jon 4² in the same connexion and nowhere else. (8) The Heb. exhibits some features which are more common in late than in the earlier literature. There are a few Aramaisms: 'alāh 'lament' (1⁹); sōph 'hinder part' (2²⁰) for gēs; the Hiphil of nāchath 3 [Heb. 4] 1¹), and rōmach (3 [Heb. 4] 1¹)—a word of Aramaic affinities; and several expressions often met with in late writers. Still, it is not advisable to lay much stress on this point.

With these facts before them critics have concluded that the book must be either very early or late. Many, led by Crœdner, found evidence of pre-exilic date, and most of these, after him, selected the minority of Joash of Judah (c. B.C. 737). König prefers the latter part of the reign of Josiah (B.C. 640-609). Recent critics with a few exceptions (Onelli, Kirkpatrick, Volek, and to some extent Baudissin) regard the book as post-exilic: c. B.C. 500 (Driver, but not without hesitation); after the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah (E. Kautzsch, W. R. Smith, G. A. Smith on the whole, Marti, the school of Kuenen, Nowack, Cornill, and Horton). Positive decision between these widely divergent views is at present impossible. Much can be said, as Baudissin has recently shown, in favour of a pre-exilic date, which, if proved, would modify our conception of the growth of Israelitish religion; but several points seem to strongly favour post-exilic origin: the religious atmosphere, the political situation in so far as it can be discerned, reference to the Greeks, and the literary parallelisms, most of which are more intelligible on the assumption of borrowing by Joel than vice versa.

4. Interpretation.—The ancient Jews, as represented by the Targum, and the Fathers, who have been followed by Pusey, Hengstenberg, and others, to some extent even by Merx, regarded the locusts of the Book of Joel as not literal but symbolic. That view, however, is now generally abandoned. The seemingly extravagant descriptions of the locust-swarms, and the havoc wrought by them, have been confirmed in almost every point by modern observers. What is said about their number (1⁹), the darkness they cause (2¹⁰), their resemblance to horses (2⁴), the noise they make in flight and when feeding (2⁶), their irresistible advance (2¹⁷), their amazing destructiveness (17, 10^f, 2²), and the burnt appearance of a region which they have ravaged (2^{3ab})—can hardly be pronounced exaggerated in view of the evidence collected by Pusey, Driver, G. A. Smith, and other commentators. The colouring of the picture is no doubt Oriental and poetic, but when allowance is made for that, it is seen to be wonderfully true to life. The description of the locusts as 'the northern army' (2²⁰) is indeed still unexplained, but is insufficient of itself to overthrow the literal interpretation. On the apocalyptic character of the latter portion of the book there is general agreement.

5. Doctrine.—As compared with some of the other prophetic writings, say with Deutero-Isaiah and Jonah, the Book of Joel as a whole is particularistic. The writer's hopes of a glorious future seem limited to Judah and Jerusalem, and perhaps the Dispersion (2²² [Heb. 3⁵]). On the other hand, it is remarkable that the outpouring of the Spirit is promised to 'all flesh,' not merely to 'the house of Israel'—a general way of stating the promise which made the NT application possible (Ac 2¹⁷). So the book may be said to contain a germ of universalism. Its other most striking characteristic, from the doctrinal standpoint, is the importance attached to ritual and the priesthood, and the comparatively slight stress laid on conduct. Still, it is here that we find the caustic words: 'Rend your heart and not your garments' (2¹⁹).

6. Style.—In style the Book of Joel takes a very high place in Hebrew literature. It is throughout clearly, elegantly, and forcefully written. Skillful use is made of parallelism—note the five short clauses in 1¹⁰; of Oriental hyperbole (2²⁰, [Heb. 3⁵] 1); and of word-play, e.g. shuddadh sadheh 'the field is wasted' (1¹⁰), yābhēshu . . . hōbhēsh 'are withered . . . is ashamed' (1¹²), shōd mish-shaddai 'destruction from the Almighty' (1¹⁵), and the play on the verb shāphat and the name Jehoshaphat in 3 [Heb. 4] 2¹². JOELAH.—A warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁷).

JOGBEHAI.—A town of Gad in Gilead (Nu 32³⁴), named also in connexion with Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Jg 8¹¹). It is the present ruin el-Jubeihāt (or Ajbeihāt), N.W. from Rabboth-ammon, and about midway between that place and es-Sault.

JOGLI.—The Danite chief who took part in the division of the land (Nu 34²⁷).

JOHA.—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁶). 2. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁶).

JOHANAN.—1. 2 K 25²³, Jer 40⁴-43⁵, the son of Kareah, chief of 'the captains of the forces,' who after the fall of Jerusalem joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. After the murder of Gedaliah he pursued Ishmael and the other conspirators, recovered the captives, and, in spite of the protest of Jeremiah, carried them to Egypt. 2. A son of Josiah (1 Ch 3¹⁴). 3. 1 Ch 3²⁴ a post-exilic prince of the line of David. 4. 1 Ch 6^{9, 10} a high priest. 5, 6. 1 Ch 12^{12, 12} two warriors who came to David at Ziklag, a Benjamite and a Gadite respectively. 7. Ezr 8¹³ (Joannes, 1 Es 8³⁹) one of those who returned with Ezra. 8. 2 Ch 28¹² an Ephraimite. 9. See JONATHAN, No. 7, and JERHOANAN, No. 3.

JOHN.—1. The father of Mattathias, and grandfather of the five Maccabean brothers (1 Mac 2⁷). 2. The eldest son of Mattathias (1 Mac 2⁷). In B.C. 161 he was slain by the 'sons of Jambri' (1 Mac 9³⁰⁻⁴²). In 2 Mac 8²², and perhaps again 10¹⁹, he is by mistake called Joseph. 3. The father of Eupolemus (1 Mac 8¹⁷, 2 Mac 4¹¹), who was sent by Judas Maccabæus as an ambassador to Rome. 4. An envoy sent by the Jews to treat with Lysias (2 Mac 11¹⁷). 5. One of the sons of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16²), commonly known as John Hyrcanus, and described as 'a (valiant) man' (1 Mac 13²⁸). See MACCABEES, § 5. 6. The father of Simon Peter (Jn 1² 21¹⁵⁻¹⁷ RV; AV Jonas), who is called in Mt 16⁷ Bar-Jona(h). In the latter passage the form Jōnds may be a contraction for Jōnēs, or possibly Peter's father had two names, as in the case of Saul—Paul. 7. One of the high-priestly family (Ac 4⁶). 8. John Mark (see MARK). 9. 10. For the Baptist and the Apostle see the following two articles.

JOHN THE BAPTIST.—The single narrative of John's birth and circumcision (Lk 1) states that, as the child of promise (v. 13), he was born in 'a city of Judah' (v. 39), when his parents were old (v. 7). They were both of priestly descent (v. 8), and his mother was a kinswoman of the mother of Jesus (v. 36). John was a Nazirite from his birth (v. 15); he developed self-reliance in his lonely home, and learnt the secret of spiritual strength as he communed with God in the solitudes of the desert (v. 80). In the Judean wilderness—the wild waste which lies to the west of the Dead Sea—this Elijah-like prophet (v. 17) 'on rough food thrived'; but, notwithstanding his ascetic affinities with the Essenes, he was not a vegetarian, his diet consisting of edible locusts (Lv 11²²) as well as the vegetable honey which exudes from fig-trees and palms (Mt 3⁴). For this and for other reasons—as, e.g., his zeal as a social reformer,—John cannot be called an Essene (Graetz). It was not from these 'Pharisees in the superlative degree' (Schürer) that the last of the prophets learnt his message. His familiarity with the OT is proved by his frequent use of its picturesque language (Lk 3¹⁷, cf. Am 9⁸, Is 66²⁴; Jn 1²², cf. Is 40³; Jn 1²⁸, cf. Is 53⁷, Ex 29²⁸ 12³), but he heard God's voice in nature as well as in His word: as he brooded on the signs of the times, the barren trees of the desert, fit only for burning, and the vipers fleeing before the flaming scrub, became emblems of the nation's peril and lent colour to his warnings of impending wrath (cf. G. A. Smith, JHGL p. 495).

In the wilderness 'the word of God came unto John' (Lk 3²). The phrase implies (1 S 15¹⁰ etc.) that, after more than three centuries of silence, the voice of a prophet was to be heard in the land, and the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 3¹⁻¹², Mk 1³⁻⁸, Lk 3¹⁻²⁰) tell of the stirring effects of his preaching in ever-widening circles (Mt 3¹), and give a summary of his message. It is probable that, in the course of his successful six months' ministry, John moved northwards along the then more thickly populated valley of the Jordan, proclaiming the coming of the Kingdom to the crowds that flocked to hear him from 'the whole region circumjacent to Jordan' (Lk 3³); once at least (Jn 10⁴⁰) he crossed the river (cf. Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospel, p. 35 f.; Warfield, Expositor, III. [1885] i. p. 267 ff.; and see BETHANY, SALIM). 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 3²) was the Baptist's theme, but on his lips the proclamation became a warning that neither descent from Abraham nor Pharisaic legalism would constitute a title to the blessings of the Messianic age, and that it is vain for a nation to plead privilege when its sins have made it ripe for judgment. There is a Pauline ring in the stern reminder that Abraham's spiritual seed may spring from the stones of paganism (Lk 3⁸, but also Mt 3⁹, cf. Ro 4¹⁶ 9⁷, Gal 4²³). On the universality of the coming judgment is based John's call to repentance addressed to all men without respect of persons. The axe already 'laid to the root of the trees' (Lk 3⁹) will spare those bringing forth good fruit, and not those growing in favoured enclosures. Soldiers, publicans, and inquirers of different classes are taught how practical and how varied are the good works in which the 'fruits' of repentance are seen (Lk 3⁹⁻¹⁰).

The baptism of John was the declaration unto all men, by means of a symbolic action, that the condition of entrance into God's Kingdom is the putting away of sin. It was a 'repentance-baptism,' and its purpose was 'remission of sins' (Mk 1⁴) [Weiss regards this statement as a Christianized version of John's baptism, but Bruce (EGT, in loc.) agrees with Holtzmann that forgiveness is implied 'if men really repented']. John's baptism was no copying of Essene rites, and it had a deeper ethical significance than the 'divers washings' of the ceremonial law. It has close and suggestive affinities with the prophet's teaching in regard to spiritual cleansing (Is 1¹⁶, Ezk 36²⁵, Zec 13¹), the truth expressed in their metaphorical language being translated by him into a striking symbolic act; but John's baptism has most definite connexion with the baptism of proselytes, which was the rule in Israel before his days (Schürer, HJP II. 322 f.). John sought 'to make men "proselytes of righteousness" in a new and higher order. He came, as Jesus once said, "in the way of righteousness"; and the righteousness he wished men to possess . . . did not consist in mere obedience to the law of a carnal commandment, but in repentance towards God and deliberate self-consecration to His kingdom' (Lambert, The Sacraments in the NT, p. 62). When Jesus was baptized of John (Mt 3¹³, Mk 1⁹, Lk 3²¹), He did not come confessing sin as did all other men (Mt 3⁹); the act marked His consecration to His Messianic work, and His identification of Himself with sinners. It was part of His fulfilment of all righteousness (v. 15), and was followed by His anointing with the Holy Spirit. John knew that his baptism was to prepare the way for the coming of a 'mightier' than he, who would baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mk 1⁸). But after Pentecost there were disciples who had not advanced beyond the Baptist's point of view, and were unaware that the Holy Spirit had been poured out (Ac 18²⁵ 19⁴).

The narrative in Jn 1¹⁵⁻³⁴ assumes as well known the Synoptic account of John's activity as evangelist and baptizer (v. 25 f.). From what John heard and saw at the baptism of Jesus, and from intercourse with Jesus, he had learnt that his mission was not only to announce the Messiah's coming, and to prepare His way by calling men to repent, but also to point Him out to men.

Many critics regard the words, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (v. 29), as inconsistent with John's later question, 'Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?' (Mt 11³); but if John learnt from Jesus what was His ideal of the Messiah's work, it may well be, as Garvie says, 'that Jesus for a time at least raised John's mind to the height of His own insight; that when the influence of Jesus was withdrawn, John relapsed to his own familiar modes of thought; and that the answer of Jesus by the two disciples . . . was a kindly reminder' of an earlier conversation (Expositor, vi. [1902] v. 375).

This heightened sense of the glory of Jesus was accompanied by a deepening humility in John's estimate of his own function as the Messiah's forerunner. In his last testimony to Jesus (Jn 3²⁹) 'the friend of the bridegroom' is said to have rejoiced greatly as he heard the welcome tidings that men were coming to Jesus (v. 29). It was a high eulogy when Jesus said, 'John hath borne witness unto the truth' (Jn 5³³); but it also implied the high claim that the lowlier members of the Church, which is His bride, enjoy greater spiritual privileges than he who, in spite of his own disclaimer (Jn 1²³), was truly the Elijah foretold by Malachi (Mt 11¹⁴; cf. Mal 4⁵),—the herald of the day of which he saw only the dawn. It was not John's fault that in the early Church there were some who attached undue importance to his teaching and failed to recognize the unique glory of Jesus—the Light to whom he bore faithful witness (Jn 1⁷).

The Synoptic narrative of the imprisonment and murder of John yields incidental evidence of his greatness as a prophet. There were some who accounted for the mighty works of Jesus by saying 'John the Baptist is risen from the dead' (Mk 6¹⁴).

Josephus (Ant. xviii. v. 2) makes the preaching of John the cause of his execution, and says nothing of his reproach of Antipas for his adultery with his brother's wife (Mk 6¹⁸). Some historians (e.g. Ranke) arbitrarily use Josephus as their main source, to the disparagement of the Gospels. But Sollertinsky (JThSt. i. 507) has shown that when the person of Antipas is concerned, 'we are bound to consider the historian's statements with the greatest care.' Schürer (op. cit.), who holds that the real occasion of John's imprisonment was Herod's fear of political trouble nevertheless allows that there is no real inconsistency between the statement of Josephus and the further assertion of the Evangelists that John had roused the anger of Herod, and still more of Herodias, by his stern rebuke.

The last mention of John in the Gospels (Mt 21³⁶, Mk 11³², Lk 20⁸) shows that Herod had good cause to fear the popular temper. John's influence must have been permanent as well as wide-spread when the chief priests were afraid of being stoned if they slighted him. After the transfiguration our Lord alluded to the sufferings of John, as He endeavoured to teach His disciples the lesson of His cross: 'I say unto you that Elijah is come, and they have also done unto him whatsoever they listed' (Mk 9¹²). JOHN THE APOSTLE.—The materials for a life of St. John may be divided into three parts: (1) The specific information given in the canonical Scriptures; (2) early and well-attested tradition concerning him; (3) later traditions of a legendary character, which cannot be accepted as history, but which possess an interest and significance of their own. But when all the evidence on the subject is gathered, it is impossible to give more than a bare outline of what was in all probability a long life and an unspeakably important ministry. The present article must be taken in conjunction with those that follow, in view of the controversies which have arisen concerning the authorship of the 'Johannine' writings.

1. The Scripture data.—John was a son of Zebedee, a master-fisherman in good position, plying his craft in one of the towns on the Lake of Galilee, possibly Bethsaida. It is probable that his mother was Salome, one of the women who 'ministered' to Christ in Galilee (Mk 15⁴¹), a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. This may be inferred from a comparison of Mt 27⁵⁶ and Mk 15⁴⁰ 16¹ with Jn 19²⁵.

The last passage is best understood as naming four women who stood by the Cross of Jesus—His mother, His mother's sister Salome, Mary wife of Clopas who was also mother of James and Joseph, and Mary Magdalene. The interpretation which would find only three persons in the list, and identify Mary 'of Clopas' with the sister of Jesus' mother, is open to the objection that two sisters would have the same name, and it involves other serious difficulties.

In Jn 1⁴⁰ two disciples are mentioned as having heard the testimony of John the Baptist to Jesus and having accompanied the new Teacher to His home. One of these was Andrew, and it has been surmised that the other was John himself. If this was so, the incident must be understood as constituting the very beginning of John's discipleship.

In Mt 4¹⁸⁻²², Mk 1¹⁶⁻²⁰ an account is given in almost the same words of the call of four fishermen to follow Jesus. Two of these were John and his elder brother James, who were with their father in a boat on the Lake of Galilee, mending their nets. In Lk 5¹⁻¹¹ a different account of the call is given. Nothing is said of Andrew; Peter is the principal figure in the scene of the miraculous draught of fishes, while James and John are mentioned only incidentally as 'partners with Simon.' Directly or indirectly, however, we are told that to John, whilst engaged in his craft, the summons was given to leave his occupation and become a 'fisher of men.' The call was immediately obeyed, and constitutes an intermediate link between the initial stage of discipleship and the appointment to be one of twelve 'apostles.' In the lists of the Twelve (Mt 10², Mk 3¹⁴, Lk 6¹³), John is always named as one of the first four, and in the course of Christ's ministry he was one of an inner circle of three, who were honoured with special marks of confidence. These alone were permitted to be present on three occasions—the raising of Jairus' daughter, narrated in Mk 5³⁷, Lk 8⁵¹; the Transfiguration, described in three accounts (Mt 17¹, Mk 9², Lk 9²⁸); and the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane, mentioned by two of the Synoptists (Mt 26³⁷ and Mk 14³²). On one or perhaps two occasions Andrew was associated with these three—possibly at the healing of Peter's wife's mother (Mk 12²⁹), and certainly at the interview described in Mk 13³, when Jesus sat on the Mount of Olives and was 'asked privately' concerning His prophecy of the overthrow of the Temple.

On two notable occasions the brothers James and John were associated together. They appear to have been alike in natural temperament. It is in this light that the statement of Mk 3¹⁷ is generally understood—'he surnamed them Boanerges, which is Sons of thunder.' Some uncertainty attaches to the derivation of the word, and the note added by the Evangelist is not perfectly clear. But no better explanation has been given than that the title was bestowed, perhaps by anticipation, in allusion to the zeal and vehemence of character which both the Apostles markedly exhibited on the occasions when they appear together. In Lk 9⁵⁴ they are represented as desirous to call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritan village which had refused hospitality to their Master. In Mk 10³⁸ they come to Christ with an eager request that to them might be allotted the two highest places in His Kingdom, and they profess their complete readiness to share with Him whatever suffering or trying experiences He may be called to pass through. According to Mt 20²⁰, their mother accompanied them and made the request, but v. 24 shows that indignation was roused 'concerning the two brethren,' and that the desire and petition were really their own. Once in the Gospels John is described as associated with Peter, the two being sent by Christ to make ready the Passover (Lk 22⁸). Once he figures by himself alone, as making inquiry concerning a man who cast out demons in the name of Jesus, though he did not belong to the company of the disciples (Mk 9³⁸, Lk 9⁴⁹). As an indication of character this is to be understood as evincing zealous, but mistaken, loyalty. Christ's reply was, 'Forbid him not'; evidently John was disposed to manifest on this occasion the fiery intolerant zeal which he and his brother together displayed in Samaria. Though the words 'ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of' do not form part of the best-attested text in Lk 9, they doubtless describe the kind of rebuke with which on both occasions the Master found it necessary to check the eagerness of a disciple who loved his Master well, but not wisely.

In the early part of the Acts, John is associated by name with Peter on three occasions. One was the healing of the lame man by the Temple gate (3¹). The next was their appearance before the Sanhedrin in ch. 4, when they were found to be men untrained in Rabbinical knowledge, mere private persons with no official standing, and were also recognized by some present as having been personal followers of Jesus, and seen in His immediate company. In 8¹⁴ we read that the two were sent by their brother-Apostles to Samaria, after Philip had exercised his evangelistic ministry there. Many had been admitted into the Church by baptism, and the two Apostles completed the reception by prayer and the laying on of hands, 'that they might receive the Holy Spirit.' These typical instances show that at the outset of the history of the Church Peter and John came together to the front and were recognized as co-leaders, though they were very different in personal character, and Peter appears always to have been the spokesman. This note of personal leadership is confirmed by the incidental reference of Paul in Gal 2⁹, where James (not the son of Zebedee), Cephas, and John are 'reputed to be pillars' in the Church at Jerusalem.

Our knowledge of John's history and character is largely increased, and the interest in his personality is greatly deepened, if he is identified with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' the author of the Fourth Gospel, and the John of the Apocalypse. Both these points are strongly contested in modern times, though the identification is supported by an early, wide-spread, and steadily maintained tradition. An examination of these questions will be found on pp. 479, 483, 797^b; but here it may be pointed out what additional light is shed on John's life and character if his authorship of the Fourth Gospel is admitted. In Jn 13²³ the disciple whom Jesus loved is spoken of as 'reclining in Jesus' bosom' at the Last Supper. The phrase implies that on the chief couch at the meal, holding three persons, Jesus was in the middle and John on His right hand, thus being brought more directly face to face with the Master than Peter, who occupied the left-hand place. This explains the expression of v.²³ 'he, leaning back, as he was, on Jesus' breast'; as well as Peter's 'beckoning' mentioned in v.²⁴. John has been also identified with the 'other disciple' mentioned in Jn 18¹⁵,¹⁶ as known to the high priest and having a right of entrance into the court, which was denied to Peter. Again, the disciple whom Jesus loved is described in Jn 19²⁶ as standing by the cross of Jesus with His mother, as receiving the sacred charge implied by the words, 'Woman, behold thy son!' and 'Behold thy mother!' and as thenceforth providing a home for one who was of his near kindred. In 20³ he accompanies Peter to the tomb of Jesus; and while he reached the sepulchre first, Peter was the first to enter in, but John was apparently the first to 'believe.' In ch. 21 the two sons of Zebedee are among the group of seven disciples to whom our Lord appeared at the Sea of Tiberias, and again the disciple whom Jesus loved and Peter are distinguished: the one as the first to discern the risen Lord upon the shore, the other as the first to plunge into the water to go to Him. The Gospel closes with an account of Peter's inquiry concerning the future of his friend and companion on so many occasions; and in 19²⁵ as well as in 21²⁴ it is noted that the disciple 'who wrote these things' bore witness of that which he himself had seen, and that his witness is true.

It is only necessary to add that the John mentioned in Rev 1¹,⁹ as writing to the Seven Churches in Asia from the island of Patmos was identified by early tradition with the son of Zebedee. If this be correct, much additional light is cast upon the later life of the Apostle John (see REVELATION [BOOK OF]).

2. Early tradition.—Outside the NT only vague tradition enables us to fill up the gap left by Christ's answer to Peter's question, 'Lord, and what shall this man do?' We may gather that he spent several years in Jerusalem. After an indefinite interval he is understood to have settled in Ephesus. Eusebius states (HE iii. 18, 20) that during the persecution of Domitian 'the apostle and evangelist John' was banished to Patmos, and that on the accession of Nerva (A.D. 96) he returned from the island and took up his abode in Ephesus, according to 'an ancient Christian tradition' (lit. 'the word of the ancients among us'). Tertullian mentions a miraculous deliverance from a cauldron of boiling oil to which John had been condemned during a persecution in Rome, presumably under Domitian. Eusebius further states that John was living in Asia and governing the churches there as late as the reign of Trajan. He bases this assertion upon the evidence of Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria. The former says that 'all the elders associated with John the disciple of the Lord in Asia bear witness,' and that he remained in Ephesus until the time of Trajan. Clement recites at length the well-known touching incident concerning St. John and the young disciple who fell into evil ways and became the chief of a band of robbers, as having occurred when 'after the tyrant's death he returned from the isle of Patmos to Ephesus.' Tertullian confirms the tradition of a residence in Ephesus by quoting the evidence of the Church of Smyrna that their bishop Polycarp was appointed by John (de Pr. Hæc 32). Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus towards the end of the 2nd cent., in a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, speaks of one among the 'great lights' in Asia—'John, who was both a witness and a teacher, who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord, and, being a priest, wore the sacerdotal plate,' as having fallen asleep at Ephesus. The Muratorian Fragment, which dates about A.D. 180, records an account of the origin of the Fourth Gospel, to the effect that John wrote it in obedience to a special revelation made to himself and Andrew. This story is somewhat mythical in character and is not elsewhere confirmed, but it proves the early prevalence of the belief in the Apostolic origin of the Gospel. Irenæus states that the Gospel was written specially to confute unbelievers like Cerinthus, and tells, on the authority of those who had heard it from Polycarp, the familiar story that St. John refused to remain under the same roof with the arch-heretic, lest the building should fall down upon him. Ephesus is said to have been the scene of this incident. All traditions agree that he lived to a great age, and it is Jerome (in Gal. vi. 10) who tells of his being carried into the church when unable to walk or preach, and simply repeating the words, 'Little children, love one another.' Christ's enigmatical answer to Peter, 'If I will he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?' led, as Jn 21²² indicates, to the belief that John would not die, but would be translated.

Still, in spite of the record, the legend lingered long in the Church, and is mentioned by Augustine, that though apparently dead the beloved Apostle was only asleep, and that the dust upon his tomb rose and fell with his breathing. The poet Browning, in his Death in the Desert, adopts the ancient tradition concerning the Apostle's great age and lingering death, and imagines him recalled from a deep trance and the very borderland of the grave to deliver a last inspired message.

The universal belief of the early Church that St. John maintained a prolonged ministry in Ephesus has never been challenged till recent years. The arguments adduced against it, though quite inadequate to set aside positive evidence, have been accepted by critics of weight, and at least deserve mention. The chief fact of importance urged is the silence of writers who might well be expected to make some reference to it. Polycarp in his letter to the Philippians, and Ignatius in writing to the Ephesians, refer to Paul and his writings, but not to John or his ministry. Clement of Rome, writing about 93-95 concerning the Apostles and their successors, makes no reference to John as an eminent survivor, but speaks of the Apostolic age as if completely past. If John did labour in Asia for a generation, and was living in the reign of Trajan, it is not unnatural to expect that fuller reference to the fact would be found in the writings of the sub-Apostolic Fathers. But the reply is twofold. First, the argument from silence is always precarious. The literature of the early years of the 2nd cent. is very scanty, and little is known of the circumstances under which the fragmentary documents were written or of the precise objects of the writers. The silence of the Acts of the Apostles in the 1st cent., and of Eusebius in the 4th, is in many respects quite as remarkable as their speech and much more inexplicable. It is quite impossible for the most acute critic in the 20th cent. to reproduce the conditions of an obscure period, and to understand precisely why some subjects of little importance to us are discussed in its literature and others of apparently greater significance ignored.

It is the weight of positive evidence, however, on which the tradition really rests. Irenæus, in a letter to Florinus preserved for us by Eusebius, describes how as a boy he had listened to 'the blessed Polycarp,' and had heard 'the accounts which he gave of his intercourse with John and with the others who had seen the Lord.' And lest his memory should be discredited, he tells his correspondent that he remembers the events of that early time more clearly than those of recent years; 'for what boys learn, growing with their mind, becomes joined with it.' It is incredible that a writer brought so near to the very person of John, and having heard his words through only one intermediary, should have been entirely in error concerning his ministry in Asia. Polycrates, again, a bishop of the city in which St. John had long resided and laboured, wrote of his ministry there after an interval not longer than that which separates our own time from (say) the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832 or the battle of Waterloo. His testimony obviously is not that of himself alone, it must represent that of the whole Ephesian Church; and what Irenæus remembered as a boy others of the same generation must have remembered according to their opportunities of knowledge. The explicit testimony of three writers like Polycrates, Irenæus, and Clement of Alexandria carries with it the implicit testimony of a whole generation of Christians extending over a very wide geographic area. The silence of others notwithstanding, it is hardly credible that these should have been mistaken on a matter of so much importance. The theory that confusion had arisen between John the Apostle and a certain 'John the Elder' is discussed in a subsequent article (see p. 483), but it would seem impossible that a mistake on such a subject could be made in the minds of those who were divided from the events themselves by so narrow an interval as that of two, or at most three, generations.

3. Later traditions.—It is only, however, as regards the main facts of history that the testimony of the 2nd cent. may be thus confidently relied on. Stories of doubtful authenticity would gather round an honoured name in a far shorter period than seventy or eighty years. Some of these legends may well be true, others probably contain an element of truth, whilst others are the result of mistake or the product of pious imagination. They are valuable chiefly as showing the directions in which tradition travelled, and we need not draw on any of the interesting myths of later days in order to form a judgment on the person and character of John the Apostle, especially if he was in addition, as the Church has so long believed, St. John the Evangelist.

A near kinsman of Jesus, a youth in his early discipleship, eager and vehement in his affection and at first full of ill-instructed ambitions and still undisciplined zeal, John: the son of Zebedee was regarded by his Master with a peculiar personal tenderness, and was fashioned by that transforming affection into an Apostle of exceptional insight and spiritual power. Only the disciple whom Jesus loved could become the Apostle of love. Only a minute and delicate personal knowledge of Him who was Son of Man and Son of God, combined with a sensitive and ardent natural temperament and the spiritual maturity attained by long experience and patient brooding meditation on what he had seen and heard long before, could have produced such a picture of the Saviour of the world as is presented in the Fourth Gospel. The very silence of John the Apostle in the narratives of the Gospels and the Acts is significant. He moved in the innermost circle of the disciples, yet seldom opened his lips. His recorded utterances could all be compressed into a few lines. Yet he ardently loved and was beloved by his Master, and after He was gone it was given to the beloved disciple to 'tarry' rather than to speak, or toil, or suffer, so that at the last he might write that which should move a world and live in the hearts of untold generations. The most Christ-like of the Apostles has left this legacy to the Church—that without him it could not have adequately known its Lord.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF

JOHN, GOSPEL OF.—Introductory.—The Fourth Gospel is unique among the books of the NT. In its combination of minute historical detail with lofty spiritual teaching, in its testimony to the Person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the preparation it makes for the foundations of Christian doctrine, it stands alone. Its influence upon the thought and life of the Christian Church has been proportionately deep and far-reaching. It is no disparagement of other inspired Scriptures to say that no other book of the Bible has left such a mark at the same time upon the profoundest Christian thinkers, and upon simple-minded believers at large. A decision as to its character, authenticity, and trustworthiness is cardinal to the Christian religion. In many cases authorship is a matter of comparatively secondary importance in the interpretation of a document, and in the determination of its significance; in this instance it is vital. That statement is quite consistent with two other important considerations. (1) We are not dependent on the Fourth Gospel for the facts on which Christianity is based, or for the fundamental doctrines of the Person and work of Christ. The Synoptic Gospels and St. Paul's Epistles are more than sufficient to establish the basis of the Christian faith, which on any hypothesis must have spread over a large part of the Roman Empire before this book was written. (2) On any theory of authorship, the document in question is of great significance and value in the history of the Church. Those who do not accept it as a 'Gospel' have still to reckon with the fact of its composition, and to take account of its presence in and influence upon the Church of the 2nd century.

But when these allowances have been made, it is clearly a matter of the very first importance whether the Fourth Gospel is, on the one hand, the work of an eye-witness, belonging to the innermost circle of Jesus' disciples, who after a long interval wrote a trustworthy record of what he had heard and seen, interpreted through the mellowing medium of half a century of Christian experience and service; or, on the other, a treatise of speculative theology cast into the form of an imaginative biography of Jesus, dating from the second or third decade of the 2nd cent., and testifying only to the form which the new religion was taking under the widely altered circumstances of a rapidly developing Church. Such a question as this is not of secondary but of primary importance at any time, and the critical controversies of recent years make a decision upon it to be crucial.

It is impossible here to survey the history of criticism, but it is desirable to say a few words upon it. According to a universally accepted tradition, extending from the third quarter of the 2nd cent. to the beginning of the 19th, John the Apostle, the son of Zebedee, was held to be the author of the Gospel, the three Epistles that went by his name, and the Apocalypse. This tradition, so far as the Gospel was concerned, was unbroken and almost unchallenged, the one exception being formed by an obscure and doubtful sect, or class of unbelievers, called Alogi by Epiphanius, who attributed the Gospel and the Apocalypse to Cerinthus! From the beginning of the 19th cent., however, and especially after the publication of Bretschneider's Probabilia in 1820, an almost incessant conflict has been waged between the traditional belief and hypotheses which in more or less modified form attribute the Gospel to an Ephesian elder or an Alexandrian Christian philosopher belonging to the first half of the 2nd century. Baur of Tübingen, in whose theories of doctrinal development this document held an important place, fixed its date about A.D. 170, but this view has long been given up as untenable. Keim, who argued strongly against the Johannine authorship, at first adopted the date A.D. 100-115, but afterwards regarded A.D. 130 as more probable. During the last fifty years the conflict has been waged with great ability on both sides, with the effect of modifying extreme views, and more than once it has seemed as if an agreement between the more moderate critics on either side had become possible. Among the conservatives, Zahn and Weiss in Germany, and Westcott, Sanday, Reynolds, and Drummond in this country, have been conspicuous; whilst, on the other hand, Holtzmann, Jülicher, and Schmiedel have been uncompromising opponents of the historicity of the Gospel on any terms. Schröter, Harnack, and others have taken up a middle position, ascribing the book to a disciple of John the Apostle, who embodied in it his master's teaching; whilst Wendt and some others have advocated partition theories, implying the existence of a genuine Johannine document as the basis of the Gospel, blended with later and less trustworthy matter.

The position taken in this article is that the traditional view which ascribes the authorship of the Gospel to John the Apostle is still by far the most probable account of its origin, the undeniable difficulties attaching to this view being explicable by a reasonable consideration of the circumstances of its composition. Fuller light, however, has been cast upon the whole subject by the discussions of recent years, and much is to be learned from the investigations of eminent scholars and their arguments against the Johannine authorship, especially when these do not rest upon a denial of the supernatural element in Scripture. In the present treatment of the subject, controversy will be avoided as far as possible, and stress will be laid upon the positive and constructive elements in the examination. The method adopted will be to inquire into (1) the External Evidence in favour of St. John's authorship; (2) the Internal Evidence; (3) the scope of the Gospel and its relation to the Synoptics; (4) Objections and suggested alternative Theories; (5) Summary of the Conclusions reached.

1. External Evidence.—It is not questioned that considerably before the close of the 2nd cent. the four Gospels, substantially as we have them, were accepted as authoritative in the Christian Church. This is proved by the testimony of Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, in Gaul, writing about A.D. 180; Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, about A.D. 170; Clement, head of the catechetical school in Alexandria, about 190; and Tertullian, the eloquent African Father, who wrote at the end of the century, and who quotes freely from all the Gospels by name. The full and explicit evidence of the Muratorian Canon may also be dated about A.D. 180. Irenæus assumes the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel as generally accepted and unquestioned. He expressly states that after the publication of the other three Gospels, 'John the disciple of the Lord, who also leaned upon His breast, himself also published the Gospel, while he was dwelling at Ephesus in Asia.' He tells us that he himself when a boy had heard from the lips of Polycarp his reminiscences of 'his familiar intercourse with John and the rest of those that had seen the Lord.' He dwells in mystical fashion upon the significance of the number four, and characterizes the Fourth Gospel as corresponding to the 'flying eagle' among the living creatures of Ezekiel 1¹⁰ and 10¹⁴. Theophilus of Antioch quotes it as follows: 'John says, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God' (Aut. 22). The Muratorian Fragment, which gives a list of the canonical books recognized in the Western Church of the period, ascribes the Fourth Gospel to 'John, one of the disciples,' and whilst recognizing that 'in the single books of the Gospels different principles are taught,' the writer adds that they all alike confirm the faith of believers by their agreement in their teaching about Christ's birth, passion, death, resurrection, and twofold advent. Clement of Alexandria, in handing down 'the tradition of the elders from the first,' says that 'John, last of all, having observed that the bodily things had been exhibited in the Gospels, exhorted by his friends and inspired by the Spirit, produced a spiritual gospel' (Eus. HE vi. 14). Tertullian, among other testimonies, shows his opinion of the authorship and his discrimination of the character of the Gospels by saying, 'Among the Apostles, John and Matthew form the faith within us; among the companions of the Apostles, Luke and Mark renovate it' (adv. Marc. iv. 2).

Was this clearly expressed and wide-spread belief of the Church well based? First of all it must be said that the personal link supplied by Irenæus is of itself so important as to be almost conclusive, unless very strong counter-reasons can be alleged. It was impossible that he should be mistaken as to the general drift of Polycarp's teaching, and Polycarp had learned directly from John himself. On the broad issue of John's ministry in Asia and his composition of a Gospel, this testimony is of the first importance. The suggestion that confusion had arisen in his mind between the Apostle and a certain 'Presbyter John' of Asia will be considered later, but it is exceedingly unlikely that on such a matter either Polycarp or his youthful auditor could have made a mistake. The testimony of churches and of a whole generation of Christians, inheritors of the same tradition at only one remove, corroborates the emphatic and repeated statements of Irenæus.

It is quite true that in the first half of the 2nd cent. the references to the Gospel are neither so direct nor so abundant as might have been expected. The question whether Justin Martyr knew, and recognized, our Gospels as such has been much debated. His references to the Gospel narrative are very numerous, and the coincidences between the form of the records which he quotes and our Gospels are often close and striking, but he mentions no authors' names. In his first Apol. ch. 61 (about A.D. 160), however, we read, 'For Christ also said, Except ye be born again, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven,' which would appear to imply, though it does not prove, an acquaintance with the Fourth Gospel. Other references to Christ as 'only begotten Son' and the 'Word' are suggestive. The recent discovery of Tatian's Diatessaron (c. A.D. 160) makes it certain that that 'harmony' of the Gospels began with the words, 'In the beginning was the Word,' and that the whole of the Fourth Gospel was interwoven into its substance. The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians (before A.D. 120) apparently quotes 1 Jn. in the words, 'For every one who does not acknowledge that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is antichrist,' but no express citation is made. The Epistles of Ignatius (about A.D. 110) apparently show traces of the Fourth Gospel in their references to 'living water,' 'children of light,' Christ as 'the Word' and as 'the door,' but these are not conclusive. Papias may have known and used this Gospel, as Irenæus seems to imply (adv. Hær. 36); and Eusebius distinctly says that he 'used testimonies from the First Epistle of John' (HE iii. 39).

Some of the most noteworthy testimonies to the use of the Gospel in the former part of the 2nd cent. are drawn from heretical writings. It is certain that Heraclion of the Valentinian school of Gnostics knew and quoted the Gospel as a recognized authority, and it would even appear that he wrote an elaborate commentary on the whole Gospel. Origen quotes him as misapprehending the text, 'No one has seen God at any time.' Hippolytus in his Refutation of all Heresies (vi. 30) proves that Valentinus (about A.D. 130) quoted Jn 10⁸, 'The Saviour says, All that came before me are thieves and robbers,' and that Basilides a little earlier made distinct reference to Jn 1⁹: 'As it is said in the Gospels, the true light that enlighteneth every man was coming into the world.' Slighter and more doubtful references are found in the Clementine Homilies and other heretical writings, and these go at least some way to show that the peculiar phraseology of the Fourth Gospel was known and appealed to as authoritative in the middle of the 2nd century.

It is not, however, by explicit references to 'texts' that a question of this kind can be best settled. The chief weight of external evidence lies in the fact that between A.D. 150 and 180 four Gospels were recognized in the Church as authentic records, read in the assemblies, and accepted as authoritative. Also, that the fourth of these was with practical unanimity ascribed to St. John, as written by him in Asia at the very end of the 1st century. This acceptance included districts as far apart as Syria and Gaul, Alexandria, Carthage and Rome. Can the whole Church of A.D. 180 have been utterly mistaken on such a point? True, the early Christians were 'uncritical' in the modern sense of the word criticism. But they were not disposed lightly to accept alleged Apostolic writings as genuine. On the other hand, the inquiry into their authenticity was usually close and careful. A period of fifty years is short when we remember how generations overlap one another, and how carefully traditions on the most sacred subjects are guarded. It is hardly possible to suppose that on such salient questions as the residence of the Apostle John for twenty years in Asia, and the composition of one of the four authoritative Gospels, any serious error or confusion could have arisen so early. At least the prima facie external evidence is so far in favour of Johannine authorship that it must stand accepted, unless very serious objections to it can be sustained, or some more satisfactory account of the origin of the Gospel can be suggested.

2. Internal Evidence.—The first point to be noted under this head is that the book makes a direct claim to have been written by an eye-witness, and indirectly it points to the Apostle John as its author. The phrase 'We beheld his glory' (1¹⁴) is not decisive, though, taken in connexion with 1 Jn 1¹⁻⁴, if the Epistle be genuine, the claim of first-hand knowledge is certainly made. There can be no question concerning the general meaning of 19³⁵, though its detailed exegesis presents difficulties. The verse might be paraphrased, 'He that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is genuine and real; and he knoweth that he speaketh things that are true, so that ye also may believe.' No one reading this can question that the writer of the narrative of the Crucifixion claims to have been present and to be recording what he had seen with his own eyes. A peculiar pronoun is used in 'he knoweth,' and Sanday, E. A. Abbott, and others would interpret the word emphatically, of Christ; but its use is probably due to the fact that the writer is speaking of himself in the third person, and emphasizes his own personal testimony. Parallel instances from classical and modern writers have been adduced. In 21²⁴ further corroboration is given of the accuracy of the disciple who was at the same time an eye-witness of the events and the author of the narrative. It appears, however, to have been added to the Gospel by others. 'We know that his witness is true' is probably intended as an endorsement on the part of certain Ephesian elders, whilst the 'I suppose' of v. 25 may indicate yet another hand. In addition to these more or less explicit testimonies, notes are freely introduced throughout the Gospel which could proceed only from a member of the innermost circle of Christ's disciples, though the writer never mentions his own name. Instead, he alludes to 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' in such a way that by a process of exhaustion it may be proved from chs. 20 and 21 that John was intended. It can hardly be questioned that the writer delicately but unmistakably claims to be that disciple himself. An ordinary pseudonymous writer does not proceed in this fashion. The authority of an honoured name is sometimes claimed by an unknown author, as in the Ascension of Isaiah and the Apocalypse of Baruch, not fraudulently, but as a literary device to give character to his theme. In this case, however, the indirect suggestion of authorship either must indicate that the Apostle wrote the book, modestly velling his own identity, or else it points to an unwarrantable pretence on the part of a later writer, who threw his own ideas into the form of a (largely imaginary) narrative. Some modern critics do not shrink from this last hypothesis; but it surely implies a misleading misrepresentation of facts incredible under the circumstances. A third theory, which would imply collaboration on the part of one of John's own disciples, will be discussed later.

Does the Gospel, then, as a whole bear out this claim, directly or indirectly made? Is it such a book as may well have proceeded from one who ranked amongst the foremost figures in the sacred drama of which Jesus of Nazareth was the august centre? The answer cannot be given in a word. Many features of the Gospel strongly support such a claim. Putting aside for the moment its spiritual teaching, we may say that it displays a minute knowledge of details which could have come only from an eye-witness who was intimately acquainted not only with the places and scenes, but with the persons concerned, their characters and motives. No artistic imagination could have enabled an Ephesian Christian of the 2nd cent. either to insert the minute topographical and other touches which bespeak the eye-witness, or to invent incidents like those recorded in chs. 4 and 9, bearing a verisimilitude which commands them at once to the reader. On the other hand, there is so much in the Gospel which implies a point of view entirely different from that of Christ's immediate contemporaries, and there are so many divergences from the Synoptics in the description of our Lord's ministry—as regards time, place, the manner of Christ's teaching, and particular incidents recorded—as to make it impossible to ascribe it to the son of Zebedee without a full explanation of serious difficulties and discrepancies. But for these two diverse aspects of the same document, there would be no 'Johannine problem.' It will be well to take the two in order, and see if they can be reconciled.

It has been usual to arrange the evidence in narrowing circles; to show that the author must have been a Jew, a Palestinian, an eye-witness, one of the Twelve, and lastly the Apostle John. It is impossible, however, to array here all the proofs available. It must suffice to say that a close familiarity with Jewish customs and observances, such as could not have been possessed by an Ephesian in A.D. 120, is shown in the account of the Feast of Tabernacles (ch. 7), the Dedication (10²²), Jews and Samaritans (41⁹, 20), conversation with women in public (42⁷), ceremonial pollution (18²⁸), and other minute touches, each slight in itself, but taken together of great weight. The numerous references to the Messianic hope in chs. 1, 4, 7, 8, and indeed throughout the Gospel, indicate one who was thoroughly acquainted with Jewish views and expectations from within. Familiarity with the Jewish Scriptures and a free but reverent use of them are apparent throughout. The places mentioned are not such as a stranger would or could have introduced into an imaginary narrative. As examples we may mention Bethany beyond Jordan (12⁹), Aenon (32²), Ephraim (11¹⁴), the treasury (8²⁰), the pool of Siloam (9⁷), Solomon's porch (10²³), the Kidron (18¹). It is true that difficulties have been raised with regard to some of these, e.g. Sychar (4⁴); but recent exploration has in several instances confirmed the writer's accuracy. Again, the habit of the writer is to specify details of time, place, and number which must either indicate exceptional first-hand knowledge, or have been gratuitously inserted by one who wished to convey an impression of 'local colour.' The very hour of the day at which events happened is noted in 13³⁹ 4⁶, 8² 19¹⁴; or 'the early morning' is mentioned, as in 18²⁸ 20¹ 21⁴; or the night, as in 3² 13³⁰. The specification of six water-pots (2⁶), five and twenty furlongs (6¹⁹), two hundred cubits (21⁸), and the hundred and fifty-three fishes (21¹¹), is a further illustration either of an old man's exact reminiscences of events long past or of a late writer's pretended acquaintance with precise details.

The portraiture of persons and incidents characteristic of the Gospel is noteworthy. The picture is so graphic, and the effect is produced by so few strokes, often unexpected, that it must be ascribed either to an eye-witness or to a writer of altogether exceptional genius. The conversations recorded, the scene of the feet-washing, the representation of the Samaritan woman, of the man born blind, the portraiture of Peter, of Pilate, of the priests and the multitude, the questionings of the disciples, the revelation of secret motives and fears, the interpretations of Christ's hidden meanings and difficult sayings—may, as an abstract possibility, have been invented. But if they were not—and it is hard to understand how a writer who lays so much stress upon truth could bring himself to such a perversion of it—then the author of the Gospel must have moved close to the very centre of the sacred events he describes. In many cases it is not fair to present such a dilemma as this. The use of the imagination in literature is often not only permissible, but laudable. It is quite conceivable that a Jew of the 2nd cent. before Christ might use the name of Solomon, or the author of the Clementine Homilies in the 2nd cent. A.D. might write a romance, without any idea of deception in his own mind or in that of his readers. But the kind of narrative contained in the Fourth Gospel, if it be not genuinely and substantially historical, implies such an attempt to produce a false impression of first-hand knowledge as becomes seriously misleading. The impossibility of conceiving a writer possessed of both the power and the will thus deliberately to colour and alter the facts, forms an important link in the chain of argument. Fabulous additions to the canonical Gospels are extant, and their character is well known. They present a marked contrast in almost all respects to the characteristic features of the document before us. The name of John is never once mentioned in the Gospel, though the writer claims to be intimately acquainted with all the chief figures of the Gospel history. As deliberate self-suppression this can be understood, but as an attempt on the part of a writer a century afterwards to pose as 'the beloved disciple,' a prominent figure in elaborate descriptions of entirely imaginary scenes, it is unparalleled in literature and incredible in a religious historian.

A volume might well be filled with an examination of the special features of the Gospel in its portrayal of Christ Himself. Even the most superficial reader must have noticed the remarkable combination of lowliness with sublimity, of superhuman dignity with human infirmities and limitations, which characterizes the Fourth Gospel. It is in it that we read of the Saviour's weariness by the well and His thirst upon the Cross, of the personal affection of Jesus for the family at Bethany, and His tender care of His mother in the very hour of His last agony. But it is in the same record that the characteristic 'glory' of His miracles is most fully brought out; in it the loftiest claims are made not only for the Master by a disciple, but by the Lord for Himself—as the Light of the World, the Bread from Heaven, the only true Shepherd of men, Himself the Resurrection and the Life. He is saluted not only by Mary as Rabboni, but by Thomas as 'my Lord and my God.' The writer claims an exceptional and intimate knowledge of Christ. He tells us what He felt, as in 11th and 13th; the reasons for His actions, as in 6th; and he is bold to describe the Lord's secret thoughts and purposes (8th, 14th, 18th, 19th). More than this, in the Prologue of a Gospel which describes the humanity of the Son of Man, He is set forth as the 'only' Son of God, the Word made flesh, the Word who in the beginning was with God and was God, Creator and Sustainer of 'that is. This marked characteristic of the Gospel has indeed been made a ground of objection to it. We cannot conceive, it is said, that one who had moved in the circle of the immediate companions of Jesus of Nazareth could have spoken of Him in this fashion. The reply is obvious. What kind of a portrait is actually presented? If it be an entirely incredible picture, an extravagant attempt to portray a moral and spiritual prodigy or monstrosity, an impossible combination of the human and the Divine, then we may well suppose that human imagination has been at work. But if a uniquely impressive Image is set forth in these pages, which has commanded the homage of saints and scholars for centuries, and won the hearts of millions of those simple souls to whom the highest spiritual truths are so often revealed, then it may be surmised that the Fourth Gospel is not due to the fancy of an unknown artist of genius in the 2nd cent., but it is due to one who reflected, as in a mirror, from a living reality the splendour of Him who was 'the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.'

3. Scope of the Gospel and its relation to the Synoptics.

—It cannot be denied that there are grave difficulties in the way of our accepting the conclusion to which we are irresistibly led by the above arguments. Some of these were felt as early as the 2nd and 3rd cents., and have always been more or less present to the minds of Christians. Others have been more clearly brought out by the controversy concerning the genuineness of the Gospel which has been waged through the last half-century. In this section it will be convenient to try to answer the questions, How does this Gospel, if written by the Apostle John, stand related to the other three?, how can the obvious discrepancies be reconciled?, and how far do the writer's object and method and point of view account for the unique character of the narrative he has presented?

It is clear, to begin with, that the plan of the Fourth Gospel differs essentially from that of the Synoptics. The writer himself makes this plain in his own account of his book (20th, 31st). He did not undertake to write a biography of Christ, even in the limited sense in which that may be said of Matthew, Mark, and Luke; he selected certain significant parts and aspects of Christ's work, for the purpose of winning or conserving faith in Him, presumably under special difficulties or dangers. We are therefore prepared for a difference in the very framework and structure of the book, and this we assuredly find.

The Fourth Gospel opens with an introduction to which there is no parallel in the NT. The circumstances of Christ's birth and childhood, His baptism and temptation, are entirely passed by. His relation to John the Baptist is dealt with from a later, doctrinal point of view, rather than from that of the chronicler describing events in their historical development. Only typical incidents from the ministry are selected, and only such aspects of these as lend themselves to didactic treatment. It will be convenient here to give a brief outline of the plan and contents of the Gospel.

THE PROLOGUE: 1st-18th. The Word—in Eternity, in Creation, in History and Incarnate.

PART I.: 19th-126th. Christ's manifestation of Himself in a Ministry of Life and Love.

1. The proclamation of His message, the testimony of the Baptist, of His works, and of His disciples. The beginnings of faith and unbelief, 19th-44th.

2. The period of Controversy and Conflict; Christ's vindication of Himself against adversaries, partly in discourse, partly in mighty works, 51st-126th.

PART II.: 131st-201st. Christ's manifestation of Himself in Suffering, in Death, and in Victory over Death.

1. His last acts, discourses, and prayer, 131st-174th.

2. His betrayal, trial, death, and burial, 181st-194th.

3. His Resurrection and Appearances to His disciples, ch. 20.

THE EPILOGUE: 21st-23rd. Further Appearances and Last Words.

Notes appended by other hands: 21st. *

The following are some detailed differences of importance. The exact duration of Christ's ministry cannot be determined either by the Synoptic narratives or by St. John's; but it would appear that in the former it might be compressed within the compass of one year, whilst the latter in its mention of Passovers and Festivals would require more than three. Again, the Synoptic Gospels describe a ministry exercised almost entirely in Galilee up to the closing scenes in Jerusalem; St. John has little to say of Galilee, but he does mention an important visit to Samaria, and narrates at length events and controversies in Jerusalem of which the other Evangelists say nothing. On these points, however, it may be remarked that none of the Gospels professes to be complete; that an exact chronological outline can with difficulty be constructed from any of them; and that each gives passing hints of events of which the writer had cognisance, though it does not come within his purpose to describe them.

Minute difficulties of detail cannot be discussed here. But the difference between the Synoptists and St. John with regard to the date of the Last Supper and Christ's death has a special importance of its own. The first three Gospels represent Jesus as partaking of the regular Passover with His disciples, and as being crucified on the 15th of Nisan; St. John describes the Last Supper as on the day of 'preparation,' and the crucifixion as taking place on the 14th Nisan, the great day of the Passover. Various modes of reconciliation have been proposed, turning upon the meaning of the phrase 'eating the Passover' and on the Jewish mode of reckoning days from sunset to sunset. It has been further suggested that the term 'Passover' was applied to the eating of the sacrifice called Chagizah, which was offered on the first Paschal day immediately after the morning service. The explanations offered of the discrepancy are ingenious, and one or other of them may be correct. But it can hardly be said that any has commanded general acceptance among critics, and meanwhile the difference remains. It must not be supposed, however, that this necessarily implies an error on the part of the Fourth Gospel. Many critics contend earnestly that St. John gives the more consistent and intelligible account of the Last Supper, the trial and the death of Jesus in relation to the Jewish festival, and that the phraseology of the Synoptists may be more easily and satisfactorily explained in terms of St. John's narrative than vice versa. The objection that the writer of the Fourth Gospel had a dogmatic reason for changing the day and representing Christ as the true Passover Sacrifice offered for the sins of the world, is not borne out by facts. The writer nowhere speaks of Christ as the Paschal Lamb (not even in 19th), and his allusion to the date is too slight and casual to warrant the supposition that he wishes to press home the teaching of 1 Co 5⁷. Further, if the Synoptic tradition of the date had been established, it is most unlikely that an anonymous writer of the 2nd cent. would have set himself in opposition to it. If St. John wrote of his own superior knowledge, a discrepancy is intelligible, and the correction of a previous misapprehension may have been intentional. It may be said in passing that the argument drawn from the Quartodeciman controversy—whether Christians ought to keep the Passover at the same time as the Jews, i.e. always on 14th Nisan, whatever day of the week it might be, or always on Sunday as the first day of the week, on whatever day of the month it might fall—cannot legitimately be made to tell against the historicity of the Fourth Gospel. The controversy concerned the relation between Christians and Jews as such, rather than the exact date of Christ's death and its meaning as a Passover sacrifice.

We reach the centre of difficulty, however, when we try to understand the marked difference between the body of the Synoptic narrative on the one hand and St. John's on the other. St. John's omissions are so striking. He never refers to the miraculous birth of Christ; he gives no account of the Transfiguration, the Institution of the Eucharist, or the Agony in the Garden; a large number of miracles are not described, nor is their occurrence hinted at; no parables are recorded, though the Synoptics make them a chief feature of Christ's teaching, and the very word for 'parable' in its strict sense does not occur in the book. On the other hand, his additions are notable. How is it that the Synoptists have nothing to say of the changing of Water into Wine, of the Feet-washing, and especially of the Raising of Lazarus? Is it conceivable that if such a miracle was actually worked it could have had no place in any of the great traditional accounts of His ministry? Are we to understand that the Synoptists are correct when they place the Cleansing of the Temple at the end of Christ's ministry, or St. John when he describes it at the beginning? Other apparent discrepancies are of less importance. They concern the Anointing of Jn 12 as compared with the narratives of Mt 26, Mk 14, and Lk 7; the accounts of the trial of Jesus given in the Synoptics in their relation to that of Jn.; and the appearances of the Lord after His Resurrection as recorded by St. John in the 20th and 21st chapters.

Further, the most superficial reader cannot but be struck by the different representations of Christ's ministry in its main features. The Synoptic Gospels do not contain the long discourses which are reported in St. John, always couched in a peculiar and characteristic diction, nor do they mention the frequent controversies with 'the Jews,' who are represented in the Fourth Gospel as frequently interrupting Christ's addresses with questions and objections to which the Synoptists present no parallel. The very mention of 'the Jews,' so often and so unfavourably referred to, is, it is said, a sign of a later hand. The writer of the Fourth Gospel uses the same somewhat peculiar style, whether he is reporting Christ's words or adding his own comments, and it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between the two. In doctrine also, it is contended, there are irreconcilable differences between the Three Evangelists and the Fourth. Judgment is viewed by the Synoptists as a great eschatological event in the future, but by St. John as a present spiritual fact accomplished even whilst Christ was on earth. It is said, further, that Gnostic and other heresies of various kinds belonging to the 2nd cent. are alluded to in the Gospel, and that the Johannine authorship is therefore untenable. Last, but by no means least, the use of the word Logos to describe the Eternal Word, and the doctrines associated with the name that are found in the Prologue, point, it is said, conclusively to an Alexandrian origin, and are practically irreconcilable with the authorship of the son of Zebedee.

An adequate solution of these acknowledged difficulties can be found only in a full consideration of the circumstances under which, and the objects for which, the Gospel was written. It is an essential part of the hypothesis of Johannine authorship that the book was not composed till a generation after the death of St. Paul, in a community where Christianity had been established for nearly half a century. Such an interval, at such a rapidly advancing period of Christian history, implied changes of a deep and far-reaching kind. An 'advanced Christology'—that is to say, a fuller development of the doctrines implied in the fundamental Christian belief that 'God was in Christ,' and that Christ was 'the Son of the living God'—was to be expected. The bearing of this truth upon current religious ideas among both Jews and Gentiles became more clearly seen in every succeeding decade. No writer, be he aged Apostle or Ephesian elder, could write in A.D. 100 as he would have written fifty years before. The very point of view from which the wonderful life of Jesus was considered and estimated had changed. With it had changed also the proportionate significance of the details of that life and work. The central figure was the same. His words and deeds remained, indelibly imprinted upon the mind of one who had lived 'when there was mid-sea and the mighty things.' But if an artist at the same time knows his work and is true to the realities he paints, his perspective changes, the lights and shadows of his picture alter, and the relative size of objects depicted is altered, when a new point of view is taken up.

If the Apostle John wrote the Fourth Gospel at all, it must have been composed under these conditions, as early tradition asserts that it was. The same tradition declares that it was written under pressure from without, that it presupposed the first three Gospels, and was not intended to cover the ground occupied by them, that it was 'a spiritual Gospel'—which is only another way of saying what the author himself has told us, that he recorded some among the many signs that Jesus did, viewed from the side of a Divine mission and purpose, 'that ye may believe, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye may have life through his name' (Jn 20³¹). Omissions and additions, therefore, such as are obvious in a comparison between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, cannot count as arguments against the authenticity of the latter. Neither can a more completely developed doctrine of the Person of Christ, nor a somewhat altered representation of His ministry and utterances. We have rather to ask whether the modifications observable in the latest narrative of all, written after a long time, under altered conditions, and from a different point of view, imply an incompatibility so marked that it cannot be ascribed to an eye-witness and an Apostle. All the Gospels are confessedly fragmentary, and if one of the Twelve was induced after the lapse of nearly two generations to supplement the records of Christ's life already in existence, and to present a selection of his own reminiscences for the purpose of inducing and maintaining Christian faith, quite as large a measure of difference in the narrative as that sketched in a previous paragraph may justly be expected. Some of those discrepancies have been exaggerated. For example, the mode of speaking of 'the Jews' in the Fourth Gospel is prepared for by the expressions found in Mt 28¹⁴, Mk 7¹, Lk 7³ and 23³⁴. Indeed, such a habit of estimating and describing the members of a nation which had so steadily set itself against Christ and His followers as to have become the very embodiment of virulent opposition to Christianity, was inevitable. Again, it is undeniable that, as St. John from his later point of view discerned not only the glory that should come after the shame and the death of the Saviour, but the glory that was implied in His suffering and death on behalf of the world, so he described not only the final judgment that was to come at the end of all things, but the present judging, searching, sifting power of Christ's words and presence in the earth, as the Synoptists do not. His point of view in this and in other respects is confessedly more 'spiritual.' But he is not unmindful of that aspect of judgment which predominates in the Synoptics. In 5²¹⁻²⁹ the two points of view are harmonized, and a very definite reference is made to a final judgment as an eschatological event. If it is true, as we read in 12³¹, that 'now is the judgment of this world,' the same chapter reminds us (v. 46) that Christ's word will judge men 'in the last day.' There is no contradiction, except for shallow interpreters, between the statements that the Kingdom of God is already come, and that its coming must be waited for with patience, perhaps during a long period. A believer in 'judgment' already accomplished is so far prepared for the confident expectation of a final judgment at the end of the ages.

But the examination of details necessarily lies outside the scope of the present article. The only further point which can be noticed here concerns the style and diction of the Fourth Gospel, and the contrast observable between the discourses of Jesus as reported in it and in the three Synoptics. So marked a difference in this respect does obtain, that an upholder of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel must be prepared to admit that the aged Apostle sees all the objects he describes through a medium of his own, and casts his record into a shape moulded by the habit and working of his own mind. The personal stamp of the writer is very strongly impressed upon his material. Inspiration is quite consistent with marked individuality in the prophet's character and writings, and the highest kind of inspiration is inseparable from this. The accuracy of the chronicler who regards himself as a mere recording pen is one thing, the truth of the artist or historian who passes all that he knows through the alembic of his own vigorous and active mind is another. As regards the form of the narrative, St. John, if he be the writer, must have allowed himself freedom to present his record in a mould determined by the later working of his own mind and the conditions of the times in which he lived. He presents us not with an exact photograph—though traces of the photography of memory are fairly abundant—but with a free and true picture of the life of Him who was and is the Life indeed.

Differences in the mode of presentation do indeed exist, but they need not be exaggerated. For example, as regards the number and length of Christ's discourses recorded, the Fourth Gospel is not separated from the rest by some impassable gulf. Dr. Drummond has calculated that whilst in Mt. Christ speaks 139 times, in Jn. He speaks only 122 times; and that as regards length of speeches, Mt. records 111 utterances not exceeding 3 verses and Jn. 96; of speeches exceeding 3 and not exceeding 10 verses, Mt. gives 16 and Jn. 20; whilst of discourses exceeding 20 verses, Mt. records 4 and Jn. 3 only. Then as regards the character of the sayings of Jesus, it is often represented that those recorded in the Synoptics are pithy, incisive, and telling, whereas in Jn. the style is prolix and monotonous. Dr. Drummond, however, enumerates sixty detached logia taken from the Fourth Gospel quite as aphoristic and memorable as any contained in the other three, whilst it has often been pointed out that in Mt 11¹²⁻¹⁷ is found in germ the substance, both in matter and in form, of teaching which is fully developed by St. John. At the same time it is not denied that the Fourth Evangelist allows himself the liberty of blending text and comment in one narrative marked by the same characteristic diction, so that, as in ch. 3, it is not altogether easy to determine whether Jesus or John the Baptist or the Evangelist is speaking; or, as in 17¹, whether the Evangelist has not expressed in his own words the substance of what fell from the Master's lips. Such freedom, however, is not really misleading. A measure of translation, of re-statement and reproduction, was necessary from the very nature of the case. Harnack says of the NT generally, 'The Greek language lies upon these writings only like a diaphanous veil, and it requires hardly any effort to retranslate their contents into Hebrew or Aramaic.' Such slight, but easily penetrable veils, partly of language, partly of representation, necessarily rest over the four narratives of our Lord's life and ministry which have been handed down through different media and under different conditions. The argument here briefly sketched out goes to show that the Fourth Gospel contains no representation of the Person, words, or works of Christ incompatible or seriously inconsistent with those of the Synoptics, whilst at the same time it bears the indubitable marks of a sacred individuality of its own.

4. Alternative theories.—A considerable number of eminent scholars of the last two generations have not been satisfied by the line of argument indicated above, and they decline to accept not only the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel, but also its historical trustworthiness. It is easy to understand that considerations which would strongly appeal to Christian believers might have small weight with those who reject the supernatural, and cannot admit the evidence of an alleged eye-witness of the raising of Lazarus, and who profess to be able to trace the growth of the legend which transformed the prophet of Nazareth into the Word of God Incarnate. For them the document we are examining is an ideal composition of the 2nd cent., of no greater historical value than the Gospel of Nicdemus or the Clementine Recognitions. Others, who are convinced that the book embodies early and perhaps Apostolical traditions, have adopted mediating theories of different types, pointing to the use by a 2nd cent. writer of earlier 'sources,' much as the Logia document is supposed to have been used by the author of 'Matthew' or the Markan document by St. Luke. The late date assigned by Baur to the composition of the Gospel has long been given up as impossible, and a theory of 'forgery' is no longer advocated by any one whose judgment is worth considering. Few responsible critics now would place the document later than A.D. 110-120, and the good faith of the writer is hardly questioned even among those who most strenuously deny that his facts have any historical basis.

Among partition-theories may be classed that of Renan, who considers that the history of the Fourth Gospel is more accurate than that of the Synoptics, and that it was probably derived from the Apostle John by one of his disciples; but he slights the discourses as tedious and almost entirely fictitious. Wendt, on the other hand, holds that a 'third main original source' of the Gospels—in addition to the Logia of Matthew and the original Mark—is to be found in the groundwork of the discourses of the Fourth Gospel, whilst the historical framework came from another hand and is less trustworthy. Ewald held that St. John composed the Gospel with the aid of friends and disciples whose pens are discernible in the body of the work, whilst the 21st chapter is entirely theirs, though written with the Apostle's sanction and before his death. Dr. E. A. Abbott holds that John the son of Zebedee was the author of the Gospel, but not in its present shape. He says that viewed as history the document must be analyzed so as to 'separate fact from not-fact,' but that it has considerable value in correcting impressions derived from the Synoptic Gospels, whilst the spiritual significance of the Gospel is exceedingly high. Harnack attributes the authorship to 'John the Elder' of Ephesus, a disciple of the Apostle, who has incorporated in his work some of his teacher's reminiscences, so that it might be styled 'Gospel of John the Elder according to John the Son of Zebedee.' He holds that the Gospel, the three Epistles, and the Apocalypse in its latest, i.e. its Christian, form, were all written by John the Elder in Asia about A.D. 100. Bousset ascribes the Gospel to a disciple of this John, who had access to traditional knowledge concerning Christ's Judean ministry which enabled him in some respects to correct and to supplement the Synoptic accounts. Schmiedel, on the other hand, considers that the Gospel cannot be the work of any eye-witness, Apostolic or non-Apostolic, and that it was not meant to record actual history. The author is 'a great and eminent soul,' in whom the tendencies of his time (about A.D. 120) are brought to focus; and he finds in the Gospel 'the ripest fruit of primitive Christianity—at the same time the furthest removed from the original form.'

The mention of 'John the Elder' brings to view the only definite alternative theory of authorship that has gained much support. It is based upon a much discussed passage from Papias, preserved for us by Eusebius (HE iii. 39), of which the following sentence is the most important: 'If, then, any one came who had been a follower of the elders, I questioned him in regard to the words of the elders—what Andrew or what Peter said, or what was said by Philip, or by Thomas, or by John, or by Matthew, or by any other of the disciples of the Lord, and what things Aristion and the presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say.' Upon this foundation the hypothesis has been set up that the John who at the end of the 1st cent. gained such a position of influence in Ephesus was not the Apostle, but a presbyter of the same name. It follows that Irenæus totally misunderstood Polycarp when he claimed to have heard 'John,' imagining that he meant the Apostle; and moreover, that Polycrates was mistaken in his reference to the Apostle's residence in Ephesus; and further, that Clement of Alexandria and the whole Church of the 2nd cent. were similarly misled. 'John the Elder' is at best a shadowy personage. Dr. Salmon contended that he had no real existence, but that Papias in the extract names the Apostle John twice over, though through his 'slovenliness of composition' it might seem as if two distinct persons were intended. It would appear, however, to be fairly established that a second John, known as 'the Presbyter,' was recognized by Papias, and perhaps by Eusebius, but he is an obscure figure; history is almost entirely silent about him, and there is no proof that he was ever in Asia at all. It is hard to believe that such a person was really the author of a book which so boldly challenged and so seriously modified evangelical tradition, and that, by an inexplicable mistake which arose within the living memory of persons actually concerned, his personality was confused with that of one of the inner circle of the twelve Apostles of the Lord.

5. Summary and Conclusion.—It will be seen that some approximation has taken place between the views of those who have defended and those who have assailed the traditional view of the authorship of the Gospel, since the middle of the last century. It is fairly agreed that the date of its composition must be fixed somewhere between A.D. 90 and 110. It is further agreed by a large majority of moderate critics that the Gospel contains historical elements of great value, which must have come from an eye-witness. These are independent of all the sources upon which the Synoptists had drawn, and they enable us in many important particulars to supplement the earlier narratives. It is admitted, further, that the discourses at least contain valuable original material which may have come from John the Apostle, though many contend that this has been so 'worked over' by a later hand that its general complexion has been altered. On the other hand, it is admitted by many who maintain the Johannine authorship, that the Apostle must have written the Gospel in advanced age, that he may have been aided by others, that he has cast his reminiscences into a characteristic form determined by the working of a mind saturated with the teaching of Christ but retaining its own individuality, and that he was of necessity largely influenced by the conditions of the time in which he wrote.

It is not pretended that the measure of approximation thus reached amounts to agreement. The difference in time between A.D. 90 and 110 may appear slight, but the earlier date admits the possibility of Apostolic authorship, and the later does not. The agreement to recognize elements of value in the historical portion of the Gospel is important, but it does not extend to the admission of the possibility that one who had himself witnessed with his own eyes the signs and mighty works that Jesus wrought, did also at the close of his life record with substantial accuracy what he had heard and seen, so that readers of to-day may be assured that they are studying history and not a work of pious imagination. The deep chasm remains practically unbridged which separates those, on the one hand, who hold that the view of the Person and work of Christ taken in the Fourth Gospel can claim the authority of an eye-witness, one of 'the men who companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and went out among us,' and, on the other, those who hold that the document contains a 'developed' and practically unhistorical representation of facts, devised to support a doctrinal position which belongs essentially not to the first, but to the fourth generation of primitive Christians.

This distinction is deep and vital. It need not be exaggerated, as such representative scholars as Harnack and Schürer on one side, and Sanday and Drummond on the other, are fundamentally antagonistic in their views of Christianity. But the distinction should not be minimized, for a deep doctrinal difference is often tacitly implied by it. John the Presbyter may seem to be removed by but a hair's breadth from John the Apostle at whose feet he sat, but it is a question of vital importance to the Christian faith of to-day whether, when we read the first and the eighth and the fourteenth chapters of the Fourth Gospel, we are listening to the voice of an Apostle recalling the memories of years long past and recording them in a form suited to strengthen the belief of his own and succeeding times, or to a developed doctrinal manifesto of the early 2nd cent., in which are included a few reminiscences derived from the lips of an aged Apostle before he passed away from earth. The difference thus indicated can with difficulty be removed, because it depends upon a still deeper difference in the mode of viewing Christian origins. The point really at issue between two classes of scholars and critics is this—Did the facts and events, a selected record of which is contained in the Fourth Gospel, take place substantially as described, or has a reconstruction of the original tradition been effected, in all good faith, for dogmatic purposes? Is the picture of the unique Person here described a faithful reflexion of a Divine Reality, or has the comparatively distant remembrance of a true prophet been sublimated into the portrayal of such a Being as never actually lived and spoke on earth?

A spiritual Gospel must be spiritually discerned. External evidence is most important in its place, and in this instance the testimony which assigns the Gospel to the Apostle John is early, wide-spread, explicit, and practically unchallenged in the early Church. Internal evidences, again, are most valuable, and the claims directly and indirectly made by the writer have been briefly described in this article, and the lines along which a vindication of those claims may be established have been indicated. Also, in determining a disputed question of authorship, alternative theories should be compared and their relative probability estimated. Accordingly, it has here been contended that the balance of probability is decidedly in favour of Johannine authorship, though some difficulties involved in that hypothesis have not been denied, and the possibility of co-operation on the part of John's disciples in Ephesus has not been excluded. But 'evidences' cannot prove spiritual truth, and the ultimate criterion between different views of this Gospel is practically furnished by the writer's own words, 'These are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.' Those who hold such views of God, of Jesus Christ, of history, and of the Christian religion, as to be able to accept the view that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the Son of God, the Word of God Incarnate, who wrought works that never man wrought and spoke words such as mere man never spake, who died for our sins and rose again from the dead and lives now to impart the gift of that Spirit whom He promised—will find little difficulty in accepting the statement that John the Apostle who saw the things recorded in the Gospel 'hath borne witness, and his witness is true.' Those to whom such statements are on other grounds quite incredible, and who ascribe them not to the religion of Jesus and His first disciples, but to the dogma of a period which had advanced beyond the teaching of Paul to a point which is characteristic of the 2nd cent., will naturally adopt any theory of authorship that the case allows rather than admit that the Fourth Gospel was written by the son of Zebedee. Absolute demonstration is from the nature of the case impossible, but it may fairly be said that the external and internal evidences combined are such as would in any ordinary case, and apart from all doctrinal prepossessions, be considered strong, if not conclusive, in favour of the Johannine authorship of the Gospel. It may be said in closing that the conditions of current opinion have made it necessary to devote this article almost entirely to the discussion of the question of authorship. But the contents and nature of the Gospel have incidentally been brought somewhat fully into view, and an outline of its theological teaching will be found in a subsequent article.—JOHN [THEOLOGY OF].

W. T. DAVIDSON.

JOHN, EPISTLES OF.—The three Epistles known by this name have from the beginning been attributed to the Apostle John, and were admitted as canonical in the 3rd century. Some points of obvious similarity in style and diction indicate a connexion between them, but their internal character and the external evidence in their favour are so different that it will be convenient to deal with them separately.

I. FIRST EPISTLE.—1. Authorship, Genuineness, etc.—The Epistle ranked from the first among the Homologoumena, and the testimony in favour of its authenticity is early, varied, and explicit. Its great similarity to the Fourth Gospel in phraseology and general characteristics made it natural to attribute the two documents to the same author; and few questions, or none, were raised upon the subject till comparatively recent years. A very small number of eminent critics at present dispute the identity of authorship.

(1) So far as external evidence is concerned, Polycarp, writing about A.D. 115 to the Philippians, quotes the words, 'For whosoever does not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is antichrist,' with evident allusion to 1 Jn 4³, though the author is not named. Polycarp was a disciple of John, as his own disciple Irenæus informs us. Eusebius several times refers to this Epistle, saying (HE v. 20) that Papias used it and (v. 8) that Irenæus made free use of it. The passages 1 Jn 2¹⁸ and 5¹ are expressly attributed by Irenæus to the Apostle. According to the Muratorian Canon, Epistle and Gospel were closely associated: 'What wonder that John makes so many references to the Fourth Gospel in his Epistle, saying of himself'—and then follows a quotation of 1 Jn 1¹. Clement of Alexandria at the close of the 2nd cent. quotes 5⁶ as the words of 'John in his larger Epistle.' Tertullian quotes the language of 1¹ as that of the Apostle John, and Origen definitely refers the words of 3⁸ to 'John in his catholic Epistle.' All the ancient versions include the Epistle among those canonically recognized, including the Peshitta and the Old Latin. The only exceptions to this practically universal recognition of its genuineness and authenticity are the unbelievers vaguely called Alogi, because they rejected the doctrine of the Logos, and Marcion, who accepted no books of NT except St. Luke's Gospel and St. Paul's Epistles. So far as external testimony is concerned, the early recognition of the Epistle as written by St. John is conclusively established.

(2) The similarity of diction between Gospel and Epistle is so close that it cannot be accidental, and it cannot escape the notice of the most superficial reader. The repeated use, in a characteristic way, of such cardinal words as Life, Love, Truth, Light, and Darkness; the recurrence of phrases which in both documents figure as watchwords,—'to be of the truth,' 'of the devil,' 'of the world'; 'the only begotten Son,' 'the Word,' 'knowing God,' 'walking in the light,' 'overcoming the world,' and the special use of the word 'believe,' speak for themselves. The use of literary parallels always requires care; but in this case the similarity is so close as incontestably to establish a connexion between the two documents, whilst the handling of the same vocabulary is so free as irresistibly to suggest, not that the writer of the Gospel borrowed from the Epistle, or vice versa, but that the two writings proceed from the same hand. If this is so, the genuineness of each is doubly attested.

Jos. Scaliger in the 16th cent. was practically the first to challenge the genuineness of all three Epistles, but not until the time of Baur and the Tübingen school of critics in the last century was a sustained attack made upon them. Since that time there have never been wanting critics who have denied the Johannine authorship of the First Epistle. Some contend that Gospel and Epistle proceed from the same author, who, however, was not the Apostle John, but John the Presbyter or some later writer. The view taken by Holtzmann, Schmiedel, and some others is that the two documents come from different writers who belong to the same general school of thought.

The chief ground of the objections raised against the Johannine authorship of the First Epistle is the alleged presence of references to heretical modes of thought which belong to a later age. Docetism, Gnosticism, and even Montanism are, it is said, directly or indirectly rebuked, and these forms of error do not belong to the Apostolic period. The reply is threefold. (a) Those who ascribe the Epistle to John the Apostle do not date it before the last decade of the 1st cent., when the Apostolic age was passing into the sub-Apostolic. (b) No references to full-grown Gnosticism and other errors as they were known in the middle of the 2nd cent. can here be found. But (c) it can be shown from other sources that the germs of these heresies, the general tendencies which resulted afterwards in fully developed systems, existed in the Church for at least a generation before the period in question, and at the time named were both rife and mischievous.

The points chiefly insisted on are: the doctrine of the Logos; the form of the rebuke given to the antichrists; the references to 'knowledge' and 'anointing'; the insistence upon the coming of Christ in the flesh, in condemnation of Docetic error; the distinction between mortal and venial sins; and some minor objections. In reply, it may be said that none of these is definite or explicit enough to require a later date than A.D. 100. The Epistle is indeed indirectly polemic in its character. While constructive in thought, the passing references made in it to opponents of the truth are strong enough to make it clear that the opposition was active and dangerous. But there is nothing to show that any of those condemned as enemies of Christ had more fully developed tendencies than, for example, Cerinthus is known to have manifested in his Christology at the end of the 1st century. Judaizing Gnosticism had appeared much earlier than this as is evidenced by the Epistles to the Colossians and the Pastoral Epistles. The use of the words 'Paraclete' (2) and 'propitiation' (27), and the way in which the coming of Christ is mentioned in 28, have also been brought forward as proofs of divergence from the teaching of the Gospel, on very slender and unconvincing grounds.

2. Place and Date.—Whilst very little evidence is forthcoming to enable us to fix exactly either of these, the general consensus of testimony points very decidedly to Ephesus during the last few years of the 1st century. Irenæus (adv. Hær. iii. 1) testifies to the production of the Gospel by St. John during his residence in Asia, and the probability is that the Epistle was written after the Gospel, and is, chronologically perhaps the very latest of the books of the NT. If, as some maintain, it was written before the Gospel, it cannot be placed much earlier. The determination of this question is bound up with the authorship and date of the Apocalypse,—a subject which is discussed elsewhere. (See REVELATION [BOOK OF]).

3. Form and Destination.—This document has some of the characteristics of a letter, and in some respects it is more like a theological treatise or homiletical essay. It may best be described as an Encyclical or Pastoral Epistle. It was addressed to a circle of readers as is shown by the words, 'I write unto you,' 'beloved,' and 'little children,' but it was not restricted to any particular church, nor does it contain any specific personal messages. The term 'catholic epistle' was used from very early times to indicate this form of composition, but in all probability the churches of Asia Minor were kept more especially in view by the writer when he penned words which were in many respects suitable for the Church of Christ at large. A reference in Augustine to 3^d as taken from John's 'Epistle to the Parthians' has given rise to much conjecture, but the title has seldom been taken seriously in its literal meaning. It is quite possible that there is some mistake in the text of the passage (Quarst. Evang. ii. 39).

4. Outline and Contents.—Whether Gospel or Epistle was written first, the relation between the two is perfectly clear. In both the Apostle writes for edification, but in the Gospel the foundations of Christian faith and doctrine are shown to lie in history; in the Epistle the effects of belief are traced out in practice. In both the same great central truths are exhibited, in the same form and almost in the same words; but in the Gospel they are traced to their fount and origin; in the Epistle they are followed out to their only legitimate issues in the spirit and conduct of Christians in the world. So far as there is a difference in the presentation of truth, it may perhaps be expressed in Bishop Westcott's words: 'The theme of the Epistle is, the Christ is Jesus; the theme of the Gospel is, Jesus is the Christ.' Or, as he says in another place: 'The substance of the Gospel is a commentary on the Epistle; the Epistle is (so to speak) the condensed moral and practical application of the Gospel.'

The style is simple, but baffling in its very simplicity. The sentences are easy for a child to read, their meaning is difficult for a wise man fully to analyze. So with the sequence of thought. Each statement follows very naturally upon the preceding, but when the relation of paragraphs is to be explained, and the plan or structure of the whole composition is to be described, systematization becomes difficult, if not impossible. Logical analysis is not, however, always the best mode of exposition, and if the writer has not consciously mapped out into exact subdivisions the ground he covers, he follows out to their issues two or three leading thoughts which he keeps consistently in view throughout. The theme is fellowship with the Father and the Son, realized in love of the brethren. Farrar divides the whole into three sections, with the headings, 'God is light,' 'God is righteous,' 'God is love.' Plummer reduces these to two, omitting the second. With some such general clue to guide him, the reader will not go far astray in interpreting the thought of the Epistle, and its outline might be arranged as follows:—

i. God is Light. The believer's walk with God in light (1st–10); sin and its remedy (21–6); the life of obedience (27–47); fidelity amidst defection (21st–39).

ii. God is Righteous Love. True sonship of God manifested in brotherly love (31–12). Brotherhood in Christ a test of allegiance and a ground of assurance (31st–4). The spirits of Truth and Error (41–4). The manifestation of God as Love the source and inspiration of all loving service (47–21). The victory of faith in Love Incarnate (51–12).

Conclusion: The assured enjoyment of Life Eternal (51st–2).

Such an outline is not, however, a sufficient guide to the contents of the Epistle, and a very different arrangement might be justified. The writer does not, however, as has been asserted, 'ramble without method,' nor is the Epistle a 'shapeless mass.' The progress discernible in it is not the straightforward march of the logician who proceeds by ordered steps from premises to a foreseen conclusion: it is rather the ascent by spiral curves of the meditative thinker. St. John is here no dreamer, more practical instruction is not to be found in St. Paul or St. James. But his exhortations do not enter into details: he is concerned with principles of conduct, the minute application of which he leaves to the individual conscience. The enunciation of principles however is uncompromising and very searching. His standpoint is that of the ideal Christian life not of the effort to attain it. One who is born of God 'cannot sin', the 'love of God is perfected' in the believer, and perfect love casts out fear. The assured tone of the Epistle allows no room for doubt or hesitation or conflict: one who is guided by its teaching has no need to pray, 'Help thou my unbelief.' The spirit of truth and the spirit of error are in sharp antagonism, and the touchstone which distinguishes them must be resolutely applied. The 'world,' the 'evil one,' and 'antichrist' are to be repelled absolutely and to the uttermost: the writer and those whom he represents can say, 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one.' Bright light casts deep shadows, and the true Christian of this Epistle walks in the blaze of gospel day. One who knows the true God and has eternal life cannot but 'guard himself from idols.'

The writer of such an Epistle is appropriately called the Apostle of love. Yet the title taken by itself is misleading. He is the Apostle equally of righteousness and of faith. He 'loved well because he hated—hated the wickedness which hinders loving.' There is a stern ring, implying however no harshness, about the very exhortations to love, which shows how indissolubly it is to be identified with immutable and inviolable righteousness. If to this Epistle we owe the great utterance, 'God is Love'—here twice repeated, but found nowhere else in Scripture—to it we owe also the sublime declaration, 'God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all.' And the Epistle, as well as the Gospel, makes it abundantly clear that the spring of Christian love and the secret of Christian victory over evil are alike to be found in 'believing': in the immovable and ineradicable faith that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is come in the flesh, and that in Him the love of God to man is so manifested and assured that those who trust Him already possess eternal life, together with all that it implies of strength and joy, and all that flows from it of obedience and loving service.

Textual questions can hardly be touched upon in this article. But it is perhaps worth pointing out that whilst the corrected text restores the latter half of 2^d, which in AV is printed in italics as doubtful, there can now be no question that the passage (5th v.) referring to the three witnesses in heaven, as read in AV, does not form part of the Epistle. The words are wanting in all Greek MSS except a few of exceedingly late date; nor are they found in the majority of the Greek Fathers, or in any ancient version except the Latin. They undoubtedly form a gloss which found its way into the text from Latin sources; and the insertion really breaks the connexion of thought in the paragraph.

II. THE SECOND EPISTLE.—The Second and Third Epistles of St. John are distinguished from the First by their brevity, the absence of dogmatic teaching, and their private and personal character. They are found among the Antilegomena of the early Church in their relation to the Canon: apparently not because they were unknown, or because their authorship was questioned, but because their nature made them unsuitable for use in the public worship of the Church. The Muratorian Canon (A.D. 180) refers to two Epistles of John as received in the Catholic Church and Irenaeus about the same date specifically quotes 2 Jn¹⁰⁶, as coming from 'John the disciple of the Lord.' He also quotes v. 7 apparently as occurring in the First Epistle. Clement of Alexandria by a mention of John's 'larger Epistle' shows that he was acquainted with at least one other shorter letter. Origen states that the two shorter letters were not accepted by all as genuine, but he adds that 'both together do not contain a hundred lines.' Dionysius of Alexandria appeals to them, adding that John's name was not affixed to them, but that they were signed 'the presbyter.' They are omitted from the Peshitta Version, and Eusebius describes them as disputed by some but in the later 4th cent. they were fully acknowledged and received into the Canon. The Second Epistle, therefore, though not universally accepted from the first, was widely recognized as Apostolic, and so short a letter of so distinctly personal a character could never have been ranked by the Church among her sacred writings except upon the understanding that it bore with it the authority of the Apostle John. The title 'the Elder' does not militate against this, but rather supports it. No ordinary presbyter would assume the style of the elder and write in such a tone of absolute command, whilst an anonymous writer, wishing to claim the sanction of the Apostle, would have inserted his name. But no motive for anything like forgery can in this case be alleged. The similarity in style to the First Epistle is very marked. Jerome among the Fathers, Erasmus at the time of the Reformation, and many modern critics have ascribed the Epistle to 'John the Presbyter' of Ephesus, but there is no early reference to such a person except the statement of Papias quoted by Eusebius and referred to in a previous article.

Much discussion has arisen concerning the person addressed. The two leading opinions are (1) that the words 'elect lady and her children' are to be understood literally of a Christian matron in Ephesus and her family; and (2) that a church personified, with its constituent members, was intended. Jerome in ancient times took the latter view, and in our own day it has been supported by scholars so different from one another as Lightfoot, Wordsworth, Hilgenfeld, and Schmiedel. It is claimed on this side that the exhortations given are more suited to a community, that 'the children of thine elect sister' can be understood only of a sister church, and that this mode of describing a church personified is not unusual, as in 1 P 5¹³, 'She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you.' On the other hand, it is urged that this mystical interpretation destroys the simplicity and natural meaning of the letter (see especially vv. 5¹⁰), that the church being constituted of members, the distinction between the 'lady' and her 'children' would disappear, and that if the lady be a private person of influence the parallel with the form of salutation to another private person in the Third Epistle is complete. This hypothesis still leaves difficulty in the exact interpretation of the words Eklektē Kyria. Some would take both these as the proper names of the person addressed; others take the former as her name, so that she would be 'the lady Eklektē,' others would render 'to the elect Kyria,' whilst the majority accept, in spite of its indefiniteness, the translation of AV and RV. On the whole, this course is to be preferred, though the view that a church is intended not only is tenable but has much in its favour. The fact that the early churches so often gathered in a house, and that there was so strong a personal and individual element in their community-life, makes the analogy between a primitive church and a large and influential family to be very close. Thus an ambiguity may arise which would not be possible to-day.

It remains only to say that, as in style, so in spirit, the similarity to 1 Jn. is very noticeable. The same emphasis is laid on love, on obedience, on fellowship with the Father and the Son, and the inestimable importance of maintaining and abiding in the truth. The same strong resentment is manifested against deceivers and the antichrist, and the same intensity of feeling against unbelievers or false teachers, who are not to be received into the house of a believer, or to have any kindly greeting accorded them. Whether the Epistle was actually addressed to a private person or to a Christian community, it furnishes a most interesting picture of the life, the faith, and the dangers and temptations of the primitive Christians in Asia Minor, and it contains wholesome and uncompromising, not harsh and intolerant, exhortation, such as Christian Churches in all ages may not unprofitably lay to heart.

III. THIRD EPISTLE.—The two shorter Epistles of St. John were called by Jerome 'twin sisters.' They appear to have been recognized together at least from the time of Dionysius of Alexandria, and they are mentioned together by Eusebius (HE iii. 25), who refers to the Epistles 'called the second and third of John, whether they belong to the Evangelist or to another person of the same name.' They are found together in the Old Latin Version, are both omitted from the Pesh., and they were included together in the lists of canonical books at the end of the 4th cent. by the Council of Laodicea and the Third Council of Carthage. References to the Third Epistle and quotations from it are naturally very few. It is short, it was written to a private person, it does not discuss doctrine, and its counsels and messages are almost entirely personal. But its close relationship to the Second Epistle is very obvious, and the two form companion pictures of value from the point of view of history; and St. John's Third Epistle, like St. Paul's personal letter to Philemon, is not without use for general edification.

The person to whom it is addressed is quite unknown. The name Gaius (Lat. Caius) is very common, and three other persons so called are mentioned in NT, viz., Gaius of Corinth (1 Co 1¹⁴; cf. Ro 16²³); Gaius of Derbe (Ac 20⁴); and Gaius of Macedonia (Ac 19²⁹). A bishop of Pergamos, appointed by the Apostle John and mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions, was also called Gaius, and some critics are disposed to identify him with St. John's correspondent. This is, however, a mere conjecture, and the letter is addressed, not to a church official, but to a private layman, apparently of some wealth and influence. It is written in a free and natural style, and deals with the case of some of those travelling evangelists who figured so prominently in the primitive Church, and to whom reference is made in the Didache and elsewhere. Some of these, perhaps commissioned by John himself, had visited the Church to which Gaius belonged, had been hospitably entertained by him, and helped forward on their journey, probably with material assistance. But Diotrephes—an official of the church, perhaps its 'bishop' or a leading elder—who loved power, asserted himself arrogantly, and was disposed to resist the Apostle's authority. He declined to receive these worthy men who at their own charges were preaching the gospel in the district. He also stirred up feeling against them, and at least threatened to excommunicate any members of the church who entertained them. The evil example of Diotrephes is held up for condemnation, whilst in contrast to him, a certain Demetrius is praised, whose reputation in the Church was excellent, who had won the confidence of the Apostle, and—higher commendation still—had 'the witness of the truth itself.' Tried by the strictest and most searching test of all, the sterling metal of Demetrius' character rang true. Full information is not given us as to all the circumstances of the case. Probably Diotrephes was not wholly to be blamed. It was quite necessary, as the Didache shows us, to inquire carefully into the character of these itinerant preachers. Some of them were mercenary in their aims, and the conflict of opinion in this instance may have had some connexion with the current controversies between Jewish and Gentile Christians. But it is the spirit of Diotrephes that is blameworthy, and the little picture here drawn of primitive ecclesiastical communities with their flaws and their excellences, their worthy members and ambitious officers, their generous hosts and kindly helpers, and the absent Apostle who bears the care of all the churches and is about to pay to this one a visit of fatherly and friendly inspection, is full of interest and instruction.

We have no information as to the time at which, or the places from and to which, these brief letters were written. They rank, with the Gospel and the First Epistle of St. John, as among the latest documents in the NT.

JOHN, THEOLOGY OF.—It is the object of this article to give a brief account of St. John's teaching as contained in his Gospel and Epistles. Without prejudging in any way the authorship of the Apocalypse, it will be more convenient that the doctrine of that book should be considered separately. Enough if it be said here that, despite the obvious and very striking difference in the form and style of the book, the underlying similarities between it and those to be now considered are no less remarkable. Careful students, not blinded by the symbolism and other peculiarities of the Revelation, who have concentrated attention upon its main ideas and principles, have come to the conclusion that if it did not proceed from the same pen that wrote the Gospel and Epistles, it belongs to the same school of Christian thought. See REVELATION [BOOK OF].

1. Some general characteristics of the teaching of St. John.—(1) It was not in vain that the designation 'the theologian' was given to him, as in the title of the Apocalypse and elsewhere. The word means in the connexion that it was St. John's habit to consider every subject from the point of view of the Divine. Not only is God to him the most real of all beings—that should be true of every religious man—but all the details of his very practical teaching are traced up to their origin in the nature and will of God. The opening of his Gospel is characteristic. History is viewed from the standpoint of eternity, the life of Jesus is to be narrated not from the point of view of mere human observation, but as a temporal manifestation of eternal realities.—(2) But it must not for a moment be understood that the treatment of human affairs is vague, abstract, unreal. St. John has a firm hold upon the concrete, and his insight into the actual life and needs of men is penetrating and profound. He is not analytical as St. Paul is, nor does he deal with individual virtues and vices as does St. James. But in the unity and simplicity of a few great principles he reaches to the very heart of things. His method is often described as intuitive, contemplative, mystical. The use of these epithets may be justified, but it would be misleading to suppose that a teacher who views life from so high a vantage-ground sees less than others. The higher you climb up the mountain the farther you can see. Those who contrast the spiritual with the practical create a false antithesis. The spiritual teacher, and he alone, can perceive and deal with human nature, not according to its superficial appearances, but as it really is at its very core.—(3) Only it must not be forgotten that the view thus taken of nature and conduct is ideal, absolute, uncompromising. The moral dualism which is characteristic of St. John is in accordance with the sentence from the great Judgment-seat. Light and darkness—good and evil—truth and falsehood—life and death—these are brought into sharp and relentless contrast. Half-tones, delicate distinctions, the subtle and gradual fining down of principles in the complex working of motives in human life, disappear in the blaze of light which St. John causes to stream in from another world. 'He that is begotten of God cannot sin' (1 Jn 3⁹); he that 'denieth the Son hath not the Father' (2²²); 'we are of God, the whole world lieth in the evil one' (5¹⁹). Such a mode of regarding life is not unreal, if only its point of view be borne in mind. In the drama of human society the sudden introduction of these absolute and irreconcilable principles of judgment would be destructive of distinctions which have an importance of their own, but the forces, as St. John describes them, are actually at work, and one day their fundamental and inalienable character will be made plain.—(4) Another feature of St. John's style and method which arrests attention at once is his characteristic use of certain words and phrases—'witness' (47 times), 'truth,' 'signs,' 'world' (78 times), 'eternal life,' 'know' (55), 'believe' (98), 'glory,' 'judgment,' are but specimens of many. They indicate a unity of thought and system in the writer which finds no precise parallel elsewhere in Scripture, the nearest approach, perhaps, being in the characteristic phraseology of Deuteronomy in the OT. St. John is not systematic in the sense of presenting his readers with carefully ordered reasoning—a progressive argument compacted by links of logical demonstration. He sees life whole, and presents it as a whole. But all that belongs to human life falls within categories which, from the outset, are very clear and definite to his own mind. The Gospel is carefully constructed as an artistic whole, the First Epistle is not. But all the thoughts in both are presented in a setting prepared by the definite ideas of the writer. The molten metal of Christian thought and feeling has taken shape in the mould of a strikingly individual mind: the crystallization of the ideas is his work, and there is consequently a unity and system about his presentation of them which may be described as distinctly Johannine. The truth he taught was gained direct from the Master, and its form largely so. But in describing the teaching we shall use the name of the disciple.

2. The doctrine of God which underlies these books is as sublime in its lofty monotheism as it is distinctively 'Christian' in its manifestation and unfolding. No writer of Scripture insists more strongly upon the unity and absoluteness of the only God (Jn 5⁴), 'the only true God' (17³), whom 'no man hath seen at any time' (18¹); yet none more completely recognizes the eternal Sonship of the Son, the fullness of the Godhead seen in Christ, the personality and Divine offices of the Holy Spirit. It is to St. John that we owe the three great utterances, 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4²⁴), 'God is Light' (1 Jn 1⁵), 'God is Love' (1 Jn 4⁸⁻¹⁶).

The deductions drawn from the doctrine of the spirituality of God show the importance of its practical aspects. God as Spirit is not remote from men, but this conception of His essence brings Him, though invisible, nearer to men than ever. God as Light exhibits Himself to us as truth, holiness, and righteousness. Some interpreters understand the phrase as designating the metaphysical being of God, others His self-revelation and self-impartation. The context, however, points rather to the ineffable purity of His nature and the need of holiness in those who profess to hold fellowship with Him. That God is loving unto every man, or at least to Israel, was no new doctrine when John taught; but up to that time none had ever pronounced the words in their profound simplicity—'God is Love.' John himself could never have conceived the thought; he learned it from his Master. But if the form in which he expressed it is accurate—and what Christian can question it?—it 'makes one thing of all theology.' Love is not so much an attribute of God as a name for Himself in the intimate and changeless essence of His being. That there is the slightest inconsistency between the Divine love and the Divine righteousness is incredible; but if God is love, no manifestation of God's justice can ever contradict this quintessential principle of His inmost nature. Again, the words that follow the statement show that in the Apostle's mind the practical aspects of the doctrine were prominent. Contemplation with him does not mean speculation. Abstract a priori deductions from a theologoumenon are not in St. John's thought; his conclusions are, 'He that loveth not knoweth not God' (1 Jn 4⁸), 'We also ought to love one another' (v. 11). Nor does his high teaching exclude careful discrimination. The love of the Father to the Son, His love to the world as the basis of all salvation, the closer sympathy and fellowship which He grants to believers as His own children, are not confused with one another. But the statement that God is love goes behind all these for the moment, and teaches that the principle of self-impartation is essential, energetic, and ever operating in the Divine nature, and that it is in itself the source of all life, all purifying energy, and all that love which constitutes at the same time the binding and the motive power of the whole universe.

3. The Logos.—The object for which the Gospel was written, we are told, was that men might believe that Jesus was not only the Christ, but also the Son of God. The former belief would not necessarily change their views of the Godhead; the latter, if intelligently held and interpreted in the light of Thomas' confession (for instance), would undoubtedly affect in some direction the intense monotheism of one who was born and bred a Jew. Was it possible to believe that in Jesus God Himself was incarnate, and at the same time to believe completely and ardently in the unity of God? The answer of the writer is given substantially in the Prologue, in the doctrine of the Eternal Word. It is unnecessary to discuss in detail whence John derived the word Logos: the doctrine was practically his own. There can be little question that the Memra of the Targums, based on the usage of such passages as Ps 33⁶ 147¹⁶, and Is 55¹, formed the foundation of the idea, and it is tolerably certain that the connotation attaching to the word had been modified by Philo's use of it. It does not follow, however, that St. John uses the word either as the Psalmist did, or as the paraphrast or the Alexandrian philosopher employed it. Taking a word which his hearers and readers understood, he put his own stamp upon it. Philo and St. John both drew from Hebrew sources. Philo employed an expression which suited his philosophy because of its meaning 'reason,' and it was employed by him mainly in a metaphysical sense. St. John, however, availed himself of another meaning of the Greek word Logos, and he emphasizes the Divine 'utterance,' which reveals the mind and will of God Himself, giving a personal and historical interpretation to the phrase. The Word, according to the teaching of the Prologue, is Eternal, Divine, the Mediator of creation, the Light of mankind throughout history; and in the latter days the Word made flesh, tabernacled amongst men, is the Only-begotten from the Father full of grace and truth. This cardinal doctrine once laid down, there is no further reference to it in the Gospel, and in the only other places in NT where a similar expression is used (1 Jn 1¹ and Rev 19¹³) it is employed with a difference. Even in the Prologue the conception of the Word is not abstract and philosophical, but when the introduction to the Gospel is finished, the idea never appears again; the narrative of the only Son, revealing for the first time the Father in all His fullness, proceeds as if no account of the Logos had been given. When the basis of the Gospel story has been laid in a deep doctrine of the Eternal Godhead, the idea has done its work, and in the actual narrative it is discarded accordingly. The Christology of St. John would be quite incomplete without his doctrine of the Logos, but it is not dependent on this. Christ's unique Personality as Son of God may be fully known from His life on earth, but the Prologue gives to the narrative of His ministry in the flesh a background of history and of eternity. In all ages the Logos was the medium of Divine revelation, as He had been of creation itself, and of the Godhead before the world was. Pre-temporal existence and pre-incarnate operation having been described with sublime brevity, the Evangelist proceeds calmly with the story to which this forms an august introduction. See also art. Logos.

4. The Fatherhood of God, and the doctrine of the Holy Spirit.—It is unnecessary to point out how influential the Prologue has been in the history of Christian thought, but it is well to remember also that to St. John more than to any other writer we owe the development of the Christian doctrine of the Godhead, as modified by the above cardinal conceptions. The doctrines of the Fatherhood of God and of the Holy Spirit as a Divine Person do not indeed depend upon the witness of St. John. The Synoptists and St. Paul, not to speak of other NT writers, would furnish a perfectly adequate basis for these vital truths of Christian faith. But neither would have influenced Christian thought so profoundly, and neither would have been so clearly understood, without St. John's teaching and Christ's words as reported by him. The meaning of the term 'Son of God' as applied to Jesus is brought to light by the Fourth Gospel. Without it we might well have failed to gain an adequate conception of Fatherhood and Sonship as eternal elements in the Divine nature, and the unique relationship between the Father and the Son Incarnate is brought out in the fifth and other chapters of the Gospel as nowhere else. So with the Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The whole of Scripture bears its testimony. Even in the OT more is said of the Spirit of God than is often recognized, and the teaching of St. Paul and St. Luke is full of instruction. But without the farewell discourses of Christ to His Apostles as recorded in Jn 14-16, our ideas of His Person and office would be comparatively meagre. The very term 'Paraclete,' not found outside the Gospel and 1 Ep., is itself a revelation. The personality of the Spirit and His distinctness from the Father and the Son, whilst Himself one with them, are elucidated with great clearness in these chapters. On the other hand, in his Epistle, St. John has much less to say than St. Paul of the Spirit in relation to the life of the believer.

5. On the subjects of sin and salvation, St. John's teaching harmonizes fully with that of the NT generally, whilst he maintains an individual note of his own, and brings out certain aspects of Christ's teaching as none of the Synoptists does. To him we owe the definition, 'sin is lawlessness' (1 Jn 3⁴). He describes sin in the singular as a principle, rather than actual sins in the concrete. No dark lists enumerating the Protean forms of sin, such as are found in St. Paul, occur in St. John, but he emphasizes with tremendous power the contrast between flesh and spirit, between light and darkness. The perennial conflict between these is hinted at in the Prologue, and it is terribly manifest alike in the ministry of the Saviour and in the life of the Christian in the world. To St. John's writings chiefly we owe the idea of 'the world as a dark and dire enemy,' vague and shadowy in outline, but most formidable in its opposition to the love of the Father and the light of the life of sonship. The shades of meaning in which 'world' is employed vary (see 8²³ 12³¹ 17¹⁴ 22 18³⁶ and 1 Jn 2¹⁵ 16). The existence of evil spirits and their connexion with the sin of man are dwelt on by St. John in his own way. He does not dwell on the phenomena of demoniacal possession, but he has much to say of 'the devil' or 'the evil one' as a personal embodiment of the principle and power of evil. Upon his doctrine of Antichrist and 'the sin unto death' we cannot now dwell.

Potent as are the forces of evil, perfect conquest over them may be gained. The victory has already been virtually won by Christ as the all-sufficient Saviour, who as Son of God was manifested that He might undo or annul the works of the devil (1 Jn 3⁹). His object was not to condemn the world, but to save it (3¹⁷). That the Cross of Christ was the centre of His work, and His death the means through which eternal life was obtained for men, is made abundantly clear from several different points of view. John the Baptist points to the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world (1²⁹). The Son of Man is to be 'lifted up' like the serpent in the wilderness (3¹⁴), and will draw all men unto Himself (12³²). He gives His flesh for the life of the world (6⁵¹). Only those who 'eat his flesh' and 'drink his blood' have eternal life (6⁵³⁻⁵⁶). He is the propitiation for the sins of the world (1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰), and it is His blood that cleanses from all sin those who walk in the light and have fellowship with the Father and the Son (1 Jn 1⁷). St. John dwells but little on the legal aspects of sin and atonement; his doctrine on these matters is characteristic, confirming, whilst in supplements, the doctrines of St. Paul concerning justification and sanctification. What Paul describes as entire sanctification John eulogizes as perfect love—two names for the same full salvation, two paths to the same consummate goal.

It is most instructive to compare St. Paul and St. John in their references to faith and love. No student of these two great twin brethren in Christ could decide which of them deserves to be called the Apostle of faith, or which the Apostle of love. St. John uses the word 'faith' only once (1 Jn 5⁴), but the verb 'believe' occurs nearly 200 times in his writings, and his usage of it is more plastic and versatile than that of St. Paul or the writer of Hebrews. Again, if the word 'love' occurs much more frequently in St. John, he has composed no such hymn in its honour as is found in 1 Co 13. The light he exhibits as a simple white ray St. Paul disperses into all the colours of the rainbow. The shades of meaning in St. John's use of the word 'believe' and his delicate distinction between two Greek words for 'love' deserve careful study.

6. The true believer in Christ enters upon a new life. The nature of this life is fully unfolded in St. John's writings, in terms which show an essential agreement with other parts of NT, but which are at the same time distinctively his own. The doctrine of the New Birth is one example of this. The Gospel gives a full account of the discourse of Christ with Nicodemus on this subject, but both Gospel and Epistle contain many of the Apostle's own statements, which show no slavish imitation on his part either of the words of the Master or of Paul, but present his own views as a Christian teacher consistently worked out. In the Prologue the contrast between natural birth 'of blood, of the will of the flesh, of the will of man,' and the being spiritually 'born of God,' is very marked. Those whose life has been thus renewed are described as 'having the right to become children of God,' and the condition is the 'receiving' or 'believing on the name' of Him who, as Word of God, had come into the world. The phrase used for the most part in Jn 3 and in 1 Jn, is 'begotten again' or 'anew' or 'from above.' The word 'begotten,' not employed thus by other NT writers, lays stress on the primary origin of the new life, not so much on its changed character. Two participles are employed in Greek, one of which emphasizes the initial act, the other the resulting state. But all the passages, including especially 1 Jn 2²⁹ 3⁹ 5¹⁻¹³, draw a very sharp contrast between the new life which the believer in Christ enjoys and the natural life of the ordinary man. He to whom the new life has been imparted is a new being. He 'doeth righteousness,' he 'does not commit sin,' he 'cannot sin,' because he has been begotten of God and 'his seed abideth in him.' Love and knowledge are marks of this new begetting, and the new life is given to 'whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ.' Some difficulty attaches to the interpretation of one clause in 1 Jn 5¹⁸, but it is clear from that verse that he who enjoys the new life 'doth not sin,' and that 'the evil one toucheth him not.' The change is mysterious, but very real, and the term used by St. John to indicate this relation—'children,' instead of 'sons' as is usual with St. Paul—lays stress upon the close and intimate personal bond thus created, rather than upon the status and privileges of sonship. St. John, as we might expect, emphasizes the vital, not the legal, element; believers are not merely called children, 'such we are' (1 Jn 3¹⁻²) and cannot be otherwise. When new life has actually been infused, it must manifest its characteristic qualities.

The nature of the Christian's vital union with God in Christ is illustrated from different points of view. Our Lord's allegory—not parable—of the Vine and the Branches is full of instruction, but no analogy drawn from vegetable life suffices adequately to describe the fellowship between Christ and His disciples; this is rather to be moulded after the pattern of the spiritual fellowship between the Father and the Son (Jn 15⁹ 17²¹⁻²²); and the terms 'communion' and 'abiding' are strongly characteristic of the First Epistle (1³ 2⁶ 2⁷ 28 3²⁴ 4¹² etc.). The strong phrases of Jn 6, 'eating the flesh' and 'drinking the blood' of Christ, are employed, partly to express the extreme closeness of the appropriation of Christ Himself by the believer, partly to emphasize the benefits of His sacrificial work, as the faithful receive in the Lord's Supper the symbols of His broken body and blood poured out for men.

Lest, however, what might be called the mystical element in John's theology should be exaggerated, it is well to note that the balance is redressed by the stress laid upon love in its most practical forms. Love of the world—that is, the bestowal of supreme regard upon the passing attractions of things outward and visible—is absolutely inconsistent with real love to the Father and real life in Christ (1 Jn 2¹⁵⁻¹⁷). Similarly strong language is used as regards social relationships and the love of others; for the word 'brother' must not be narrowed down to mean exclusively those who belong to the Christian communion. No man whose life in relation to men is not actuated by love can be said to walk in the light (1 Jn 2⁹⁻¹⁰); hatred is murder (3¹²⁻¹⁵); willingness to help another in need is a test of true love, nominal and professed affection will not suffice (3¹⁷⁻¹⁸); a man who professes to love God and does not manifest a spirit of loving helpfulness adds falsehood to his other sins—'he is a liar' (4²⁰). The frequent repetition of some of these phrases and their interchange with others, such as 'doing righteousness', 'walking in the truth', 'being in the light', 'abiding in him', 'God abiding in us', and the like, show that St. John is dealing with the very central core of spiritual life, and that for him, as for St. Paul, it is true that 'he that loveth his neighbour hath fulfilled the law . . . for love is the fulfilment of the law.'

No more comprehensive phrase, however, to describe in brief the blessings of the gospel is to be found in St. John's theology than 'eternal life.' It occurs 17 times in the Gospel and 6 times in the First Epistle, while 'life' with substantially the same meaning is found much more frequently. 'Life' means for St. John that fullness of possession and enjoyment which alone realizes the great ends for which existence has been given to men, and it is to be realized only in the fulfilment of the highest human ideals through union with God in Christ. Eternal 'life' means this rich existence in perpetuity; sometimes it includes immortality, sometimes it distinctly refers to that which may be enjoyed here and now. In the latter case it is not unlike what is called in 1 Ti 6¹⁹ 'the life which is life indeed.' It is defined in Jn 17³ as consisting in the knowledge of God and Christ, where knowledge must certainly imply not a mere intellectual acquaintance, but a practical attainment in experience, including a state of heart and will as well as of mind, which makes God in Christ to be a true possession of the soul—that fellowship with God which constitutes the supreme possession for man upon the earth. But a contrast is drawn, e.g. in 3¹⁶ and 10²⁸, between 'eternal life' and 'perishing' or 'moral ruin'; and in one of St. John's sharp and startling contrasts, the choice open to man is described as including only these two solemn alternatives—'He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life; but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him' (3³⁶). The idea thus broached carries us beyond the boundaries of earthly existence; according to Christ's teaching, whoever keeps His word 'shall never taste of death' (8⁵²), and 'though he die, yet shall he live' (11²⁶). Knowledge of God and union with Christ impart to the believer a type of being which is not subject to the chances and changes of temporal existence, but is in itself unending, imperishable, so that in comparison with it no other kind of life deserves the name.

7. This opens up naturally the question of St. John's Eschatology. It has already been said (see p. 482*) that some critics find an inherent contradiction between St. John's view of judgment and that set forth by the Synoptists, and it has been pointed out in reply that he recognizes 'judgment' not merely as here and now present in history, but as still to be anticipated in its final form in the life beyond the grave. Similar statements have been made in reference to Christ's 'coming' and the 'resurrection.' That each of these three events is recognized as still in the future, to be anticipated as coming to pass at the end of the world, or at 'the last day,' is clear from such passages as the following: 'judgment' in Jn 12⁴⁸ and 1 Jn 4¹⁷; 'coming' in Jn 14² and 1 Jn 2^{18, 28}; 'resurrection' in Jn 5^{28, 29} 6^{39, 40} 11²⁴ etc. But it cannot be questioned that St. John, much more than St. Paul or the Synoptists, uses these words in a spiritual sense to indicate a coming to earth in the course of history, a spiritual visitation which may be called a 'coming' of Christ (see Jn 14^{18, 23, 25} and perhaps 21²²), as well as a judgment which was virtually pronounced in Christ's lifetime (12³¹ etc.). Similarly, in 5²⁸ it is said that 'the Son quickeneth whom he will,' where the reference cannot be to life beyond the grave—a view which is confirmed by vv. 22, 29, where we are told that he who hears Christ's word has passed from death to life, does not come into judgment, and that 'the hour now is' in which the dead shall hear His voice and live. There is nothing in these descriptions of present spiritual blessing to interfere with the explicit statement that after death there shall be a resurrection of life and a resurrection of judgment (5²⁹), any more than our Saviour intended to deny Martha's statement concerning the resurrection at the last day, when He said to her, 'I am the resurrection and the life' (11²⁵).

It may perhaps be fairly said that St. John in the Gospel and Epistles lays emphasis upon the present spiritual blessings of salvation rather than upon future eschatological events described by means of the sensuous and material symbolism characteristic of the Apocalypse. But the two ideas, so far from being inconsistent, confirm one another. The man who believes in the present moral government of God in the world is assured that there must be a great day of consummation hereafter; while he who is assured that God will vindicate Himself by some Great Assize in the future life cannot surely imagine that meantime He has left the history of the world in moral confusion. The spiritual man knows that the future lies hid in the hints and suggestions of the present; he is certain also that such hints and suggestions must find their perfect realization and issue in a consummation yet to come. No Christian teacher has understood the deep-lying unity between the material and the spiritual, the present and the future, the temporal and the eternal, more completely than St. John 'the divine.'

W. T. DAVIDSON.

JOIADA.—1. One of the two who repaired the 'old gate' (Neh 3³). 2. High priest, son of Eliashib (Neh 12^{10, 11, 22}). One of his sons married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 13²⁸).

JOIAKIM.—A high priest, son of Jeshua (Neh 12^{10, 12, 26}).

JOIARIB.—1. Ezr 8¹⁶, one of the two teachers sent by Ezra to Iddo to ask for ministers for the Temple. 2. Neh 11¹⁵, one of the chiefs of the province that dwelt in Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time. See also JEHOIARIB.

JOKDEAM.—A city of Judah (Jos 15²⁴), whose site has not been identified. See JORKEAM.

JOKIM.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4²²).

JOKMEAM.—A town in Ephraim given to the Levites, near Beth-horon (1 Ch 6⁶⁸). In Jos 21² it is called Kibzaim. No site answering to either of these names is known. Jokmeam is mentioned also in 1 K 4¹³, where AV has incorrectly 'Jokneam.'

JOKNEAM.—A royal Canaanite city 'in Carmel' (Jos 13²²), on the boundary of Zebulun (19¹¹), 'the brook' before it being the Kishon. It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Jos 21²⁴). It is probably identical with Cyamon of Jth 7². The Onomasticon places 'Cimona' 6 Roman miles N. of Legio, on the road to Ptolemais. This points definitely to Tell Kaimân, a striking mound about 7 miles N.W. of el-Lejjân, with remains of ancient buildings.

W. EWING.

JOKSEAN.—Son of Abraham and Keturah, and father of Sheba (Saba) and Dedan (Gn 25¹, 1 Ch 1²). The name seems quite unknown, and the suggestion that it is identical with Joktan seems the most plausible.

JOKTAN, according to the genealogical tables in Genesis and 1 Chron., was one of the two sons of Eber, and the father of thirteen sons or races (Gn 10²⁵⁻³⁰, 1 Ch 1¹⁹⁻²³); in the first table it is added that his descendants dwelt from Mesha to Sephar. Though the names of the majority of his sons have not been satisfactorily identified, it is clear that he is represented as the ancestor of the older Arabian tribes. The list of his sons is probably not to be taken as a scientific or geographical classification of the tribes or districts of Arabia, but rather as an attempt on the part of the writer to incorporate in the tables such names of Arabian races as were familiar to him and to his readers. It will be noted that Seba and Havilah occur also as the sons of Cush (Gu 10⁷), the peculiar interest attaching to them having doubtless given rise to a variety of traditions with regard to their origin and racial affinities. The name of Joktan himself, like the names of many of his sons, has not yet been identified or explained. Its identification by the native Arab genealogists with Kahtān, the name of an Arabian tribe or district, is without foundation; there appears to have been no real connexion between the names, their slight similarity in sound having probably suggested their identification. The supposition that Joktan was a purely artificial name devised for the younger son of Eber, in order to serve as a link between the Hebrew and Arab stocks, amounts to little more than a confession that the origin of the name is unknown. L. W. KING.

JOKTHEEL.—1. A city described (Jos 15^{33, 38}) as lying in the Shephelah. It came into possession of the tribe of Judah. Its site has not been recovered. 2. The name (which some have sought to explain from the Arab., 'protection of God') given (2 K 14⁷) to Sela, the ancient capital of the Edomites, after its capture by Amaziah king of Judah.

JONADAB.—See JEHOADAB.

JONAH.—1. The man Jonah.—Jonah ('dove') is found in the Bible as the name of only one person, the Israelitish prophet of 2 K 14²⁵ and the Book of Jonah. All that is really known about him is found in those two sources. According to both, he was the son of Amittai (LXX and Vulg. Amathi), and the former connects him with Gath-hepher, a place named in Jos 19¹³, in the territory of Zebulun, now probably represented by el-Meshhed, 2½ miles to the E. of Sepphoris, and not far from Kefer Kennā and Nazareth, in the neighbourhood of which is a grave of Nebi Yānus or Yānis. If this identification is right, Jonah was not only Israelitish in the narrower sense, but Galilean. He seems to have lived and worked in the latter part of the 9th cent. B.C. or in the earlier part of the 8th. His one prediction, recorded in Kings, of the extension of the kingdom of Samaria from the Orontes to the Dead Sea, is said to have been fulfilled in the reign of Jeroboam II. (B.C. 790 to 740 or 782–741). It has generally been inferred that the prediction was also uttered in that reign, but the inference is uncertain. It may have been delivered under Jehoash (B.C. 802–790 or 798–782), or even under Jehoahaz (815–802 or 798). Still, Jonah may be reasonably regarded as to some extent a contemporary of Jeroboam II. There is no mention in Kings of any connexion of Jonah with Assyria, but it is quite possible that the memory of a visit to Nineveh was preserved by tradition or in some lost historical work. From B.C. 782–745, Assyria was comparatively weak, and was governed by relatively insignificant kings.

That the Jonah of Kings is identical with the Jonah of the book was questioned by Winckler in 1900, but the objection was withdrawn in 1903. The identification of Jonah with the son of the widow of Zarephath, which is mentioned by Jerome, and other assertions of Jewish origin, have no historical value.

2. Book of Jonah.—(1) Analysis.

Jonah, the son of Amittai, is commanded by Jahweh to go to Nineveh and announce there impending judgment (1^{1, 2}). For a reason not mentioned until near the end of the book (4^{2, 3})—the fear that Jahweh will repent of His purpose, and spare the Ninevites—he refuses to obey, and in order to escape from Jahweh's immediate jurisdiction goes down to Joppa, and books himself in a ship manned by heathen, almost certainly Phœnicians, for Tarshish, probably the Phœnician colony in the S. W. of Spain, called by the Greeks Tartessus, and now represented by Cadiz and the country round (1^{3, 4}). When a violent storm comes on, and the prayers of the mariners to their gods are of no avail, they conclude that there is some one on board who has offended some deity, and cast lots to discover the culprit. The lot falls on Jonah (1⁷), who acknowledges his guilt and advises them to cast him overboard (1^{8, 12}). After making futile efforts to bring the vessel to land (1¹³), the sailors reluctantly cast him into the sea, with the result that the storm at once subsides and the wondering heathen adore the God of the Hebrews (1^{4–16}). Jonah is swallowed by a fish appointed for the purpose by J¹, and remains in its belly 3 days and 3 nights (1¹⁷), during which time he prays (2¹). His prayer, which fills the greater part of the chapter, is rather a psalm of praise (2^{2–9}). He is then cast by the fish on the land at a place not specified (2¹⁰), is commanded to discharge the neglected duty, goes to Nineveh and delivers his message over a third of the city (3^{1–4}). King and people repent, and show their repentance in a public fast (which includes even the domestic animals), and pray (3^{5–9}). Their penitence and prayer are accepted, to the prophet's disgust (3^{10–41}). As he sulks in a booth outside the city, waiting to see the issue, a remarkable series of experiences is arranged for his instruction (4^{1–3}): the shooting up of a castor-oil plant (or, as some think, a bottle-gourd) appointed by Jahweh, which delights him by its welcomeshade; the killing of the plant by a worm, also appointed by Jahweh; and the springing up of a hot wind which also blows by Divine appointment, so that the now unshaded prophet is so tormented by the heat, that, like Elijah (1 K 19⁴), he longs for death. When he still sulks, it is pointed out to him that if he, a man, cares for the plant which sprang up and perished so quickly, and which was in no way the product of his toil, how much more must God care for the great city, which has in it so many thousands of little children and much cattle (4^{2–11}).

(2) Integrity.—Most recent critics ascribe 1. 2^{1, 10, 3} and 4, with the exception of a few glosses, to one writer. About the hymn or psalm in 2^{2–9} there is diversity of opinion. There are three views: (1) that it is by the same writer (G. A. Smith); (2) that it was used by him but not written by him (Baudissin); (3) that it was inserted by an editor who missed the prayer referred to in 2¹ (Nowack, Marti, Cheyne, Kautzsch, and perhaps Horton). The last view is on the whole the most probable, for the following among other reasons. (a) The psalm fits in with the experience of a shipwrecked mariner who has reached the shore, rather than with the situation ascribed to Jonah (2^{3–5}); (b) it has been aptly described as 'a cento of passages from the psalms' (there are echoes of passages in Ps 3, 18, 30, 31, 42, 50, 116, 120, 142), which implies that the writer had a considerable part of our present Psalter before him, and so points to the study rather than the belly of a fish.

(3) Date and Authorship.—The book used to be regarded as Jonah's composition, but that belief is now generally abandoned except in the Roman Catholic Church. Since Nineveh is clearly referred to as no longer standing: 'Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city' (3³), the terminus a quo cannot be placed earlier than about B.C. 600 (fall of Nineveh B.C. 606). The terminus ad quem is fixed by the mention of the Twelve Prophets in Sirach (49¹⁰), c. B.C. 200. The date therefore lies between 600 and 200. For closer definition the following facts are helpful. The anonymous reference to the Assyrian king, and perhaps the description of him as 'the king of Nineveh' (3⁶), suggests a considerable interval between Assyrian times and the composition of the book. The Heb. is distinctly late. There are several indications of Aramaic influence: scphndāh 'ship'—a word common to Aramaic and Arabic, found here only in the OT; shāhaq 'be calm'; ta'am 'decree'; hith'ashshēth in the sense of 'think'; minndāh 'prepare,' 'appoint,' etc. Had it been possible to assign the book to the 8th or the 9th cent. B.C., these phenomena might have been accounted for on the assumption of Aramaic influence on a Galilean dialect, but as that date is out of the question, they point to a much later period, the 4th or 5th cent. (König, Driver, E. Kautzsch, Budde, Cheyne), c. B.C. 300 (Marti). Cheyne puts the psalm as late as the prayer in the appendix to Sirach. It has been suggested that the book is an extract from a larger work, e.g. the 'commentary of the book of the kings' referred to in 2 Ch 24²⁷, as it begins: 'Now (Heb. wa-) the word of the Lord came to Jonah'; but other historical Heb. writings begin in the same abrupt manner.

(4) Interpretation.—The ancient Jews seem to have regarded the book as historical (3 Mac 6^o, To 14^o 4; Jos. Ant. ix. x. 2), and were followed by Christian interpreters. Modern scholars are greatly divided. Archdeacon Perowne, J. Kennedy, and Clay Trumbull have defended the old view. Kleinert, König, C. H. H. Wright, G. A. Smith, and Cheyne treat the book as an allegory of the fortunes of the people. Jonah, 'the dove,' represents Israel. Jonah the prophet stands for Israel, which was to prophesy amongst the nations. The sea figures the destruction which repeatedly fell on Israel. Cheyne supplements the symbolical key by the mythological. The fish (that is the dragon, the subterranean sea) refers to Babylon, which swallowed Israel, not to destroy it but to give room for repentance; and the link between Jonah and the original myth is found in Jer 51³⁴. "E. Kautzsch, Driver, Nowack, and Marti see in the story a didactic narrative founded on an ancient tradition.

(5) Teaching.—The prominence given by Christian expositors to the incident of the fish has tended to obscure the chief aim of the writing—to protest against the narrowness of thought and sympathy which prevailed among the Jews of the time, and was daily growing in intensity. Whoever the author was, he had higher thoughts about God than most of his contemporaries, perhaps it may even be said than any other of the writers of the OT, and entertained more charitable feelings towards the Gentile world than most of his people. The God of Israel, he believed, cared for all men. Penitent Gentiles, and many in Gentile circles, were ready to repent if only they were taught; could obtain pardon as readily as penitent Jews. Nay, Jahweh sought their repentance. Nowhere in pre-Christian literature can be found a broader, purer, loftier, tenderer conception of God than in this little anonymous Heb. tract. Cornill describes it as 'one of the deepest and grandest things ever written.' 'I should like,' he adds, 'to exclaim to any one who approaches it: "Put thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground."' How high the teaching of the book rose above later Judaism, say the Judaism of the time of Christ, and the following generation, is strikingly shown by the way in which it is summarized by Josephus (Ant. ix. x. 2). There is not a word there about the penitence of the Ninevites, or God's remonstrance with Jonah. The main lesson of the book is absolutely ignored by the proud Pharisaic priest. Another leading thought of the book is the duty of Israel to make its God known to the Gentiles.

(6) The book in the Synagogue and the Church.—It is said in the Mishna (Ta'anith, ii. 1) that the ritual of a public fast in time of drought included reference by the leader of the congregation to the Book of Jonah, and it has been used from ancient times to the present day in the ceremonial of the Day of Atonement. Christians were early attracted to it by the remarkable allusions in the Gospels: Mt 12²⁹, 16¹⁷, Lk 11²⁹, 22. The reference to the entombment in the fish is in Mt. only. The allusion to the repentance of the Ninevites is in both Mt. and Lk. The significance of the former has been much debated, and some have regarded it as a proof of the historicity of the OT narrative. That in no way follows. Our Lord found the story in the Scriptures, and appealed to it as something generally known to His hearers. His use of it fastened on the imagination of the early Christians, and led them to take great interest in the whole Book of Jonah. The remains of early Christian art in catacomb paintings, on sarcophagi, lamps, glasses, etc., include a very large number of pictures which have some part of the story of Jonah for their theme. Dr. Otto Mitius, who published a monograph on the subject in 1897, has noted 177 examples. The oldest, in the Catacomb of S. Callisto, may date from the 1st century.

(7) Parallels to Jonah.—Attention has often been called to the classical myths of Andromeda and Hesione, the scene of the former of which is laid in the neighbourhood of Joppa, but reference to them, even indirectly, is improbable. Nor is it likely that the Heb. writer had in mind a dragon myth of Babylonia. A really striking parallel to part of the first chapter (17-45) was noted by a German scholar in 1896 in Buddhist literature. A young man of Benares named Mittavindaka, the son of a merchant, went to sea in defiance of his mother's objection. When after a time the vessel was unable to proceed on its course, owing to some mysterious impediment, the sailors concluded that it must be through the sin of some one on board, and therefore cast lots to discover the offender. The lots were cast three times, and each time the lot fell to Mittavindaka. As he was clearly the culprit, they turned him out of the ship, and placed him on a raft. Their ship was then able to continue the voyage. The close correspondence of this Indian story with the part of the Biblical story referred to is very remarkable, but need not point to any connexion between the two beyond community of feeling and action, under similar circumstances, of Indian and Phœnician mariners.

JONAS.—1. 1 Es 9¹ = Ezr 10⁶ Jehohanan, Neh 12²⁴ Johanah. 2. 1 Es 9²³ = Ezr 10²³ Eliezer. 3. 2 Es 1¹⁷ the prophet Jonah. 4. See JOHN, No. 6.

JONATHAN ('J" hath given').—1. A Levite, the 'son' of Gershom (wh. see); according to Jg 18³⁰ he and his sons were priests to the tribe of Dan up to the Captivity. Jonathan was taken into the service of Micah as 'father and priest' (Jg 17¹⁰); but, not long after he had taken up his abode there, six hundred Danites came that way and induced Jonathan to leave Micah and join them as their priest (18¹¹⁻³¹). 2. The eldest son of Saul; he appears, in the first instance, as a brave and successful leader in battle. 1 S 13. 14 contain a graphic account of the way in which the Israelites threw off the Philistine yoke; in this campaign Jonathan took a leading part. He first of all, at the head of a thousand men, smote the Philistine garrison in Geba; this was the signal for the outbreak of war. The Philistine army gathered together and encamped in Michmash. Jonathan, accompanied only by his armour-bearer, at great risk surprised an advanced post of the Philistines, and slew about twenty men; the suddenness and success of this coup so terrified the Philistines that the whole host of them fled in panic. The popularity of Jonathan is well illustrated by the fact that the people prevented Saul from carrying out a vow which would have cost Jonathan his life (1 S 14²¹⁻⁴⁵). The implicit trust which Saul placed in Jonathan is seen in the words of the latter in 1 S 20²: 'Behold my father doeth nothing either great or small, but that he discloseth it unto me.' The faithfulness and trustworthiness of Jonathan as here shown gives an insight into what must have been that friendship for David which has become proverbial. All the characteristics of truest friendship are seen in Jonathan in their full beauty—love (1 S 18¹), faithfulness (20²⁰), disinterestedness (20²), and self-sacrifice (20²⁴⁻³⁴). The last we hear of Jonathan is his death upon the battlefield, fighting the foes of his country. In David's lament the spirit of the departed hero speaks in unison with his friend: 'Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women' (2 S 1²⁶).

3. The son of the priest Mattathias; the youngest of the four Maccabean brothers (2 Mac 8²²), who played an important part during the Maccabean revolt (see MACCABEES). 4. A nephew of David (2 S 21²¹; cf. prob. 1 Ch 27³²). 5. A son of Abiathar the priest (2 S 15²⁷; 17¹⁷, 20, 1 K 1²). 6. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer 37¹⁵, 20 38²⁶). 7. A high priest (Neh 12¹¹); called in v. 21. Johanan. 8. One of David's heroes (2 S 23²¹, 1 Ch 11³¹). 9. A Levite (Neh 12²⁴). 10. The son of Kareah (Jer 40⁹). 11. The father of Peleth and Zaza (1 Ch 22¹¹). 12. One of David's treasurers (1 Ch 27²²). 13. Father of Ebed (Ezr 8⁴). 14. One of those who opposed (RV) or assisted (AV) Ezra in the matter of the foreign marriages (Ezr 10¹⁴). 15. A priest (Neh 12¹⁴). 16. Son of Absalom, in the time of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 13¹¹). 17. A priest who led the prayer at the first sacrifice after the Return (2 Mac 12²). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

JOPPA.—The principal seaport of S. Palestine; a place of high antiquity, being mentioned in the tribute lists of Thothmes III., but never before the Exile in Israelite hands, being in Philistine territory. It was theoretically assigned to the tribe of Dan (Jos 19⁴⁶), and is spoken of as a seaport in 2 Ch 2¹⁶ and Ezr 3⁷ [where RV reads 'to the sea, unto Joppa' in place of AV 'to the sea of Joppa']; these, and its well-known connexion with the story of Jonah (1²), are the only references to the city to be found in the OT. The Maccabees wrested it more than once from the hands of their Syrian oppressors (1 Mac 10⁷⁵ 12³³ 13¹¹); it was restored to the latter by Pompey (Jos. Ant. xiv. iv. 4), but again given back to the Jews (ib. xiv. x. 6) some years later. Here St. Peter for a while lodged, restored Tabitha to life, and had his famous vision of the sheet (Ac 9. 10). The traditional sites of Tabitha's tomb, and Simon the tanner's house are shown to tourists and to pilgrims, but are of course without authority. The city was destroyed by Vespasian (A.D. 68). In the Crusader period the city passed from the Saracens to the Franks and back more than once: it was captured first in 1126, retaken by Saladin 1187, again conquered by Richard Cœur de Lion in 1191, and lost finally in 1196. In recent years it is remarkable for Napoleon's successful storming of its walls in 1799. It is now a flourishing seaport, though its harbour—little more than a breakwater of reefs—is notoriously bad and dangerous. A railway connects it with Jerusalem. It is also one of the chief centres of the fruit-growing industry in Palestine, and its orange gardens are world-famed. Tradition places here the story of Andromeda and the sea-monster.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JORAH.—The name of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2³⁶); called in Neh 7²⁴ Hariph, which is probably the true form. 1 Es 5¹⁶ reads Arsaphurith.

JORAI.—A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5³⁴).

JORAM.—1. 2. See JEHORAM (1 and 2). 3. Son of Tol (2 S 8¹⁰) (in 1 Ch 18¹⁰ called Hadoram). 4. A Levite (1 Ch 26²⁸). 5. 1 Es 1²—2 Ch 35⁵ Jozabad.

JORDAN.—The longest and most important river in Palestine. 1. Name.—The name 'Jordan' is best derived from Heb. yārad 'to descend,' the noun yārad formed from it signifying 'the descender'; it is used almost invariably with the article. In Arabic the name is esh-Sheri'ah, or 'the watering-place,' though Arabic writers before the Crusades called it el-Urdun. Quite fanciful is Jerome's derivation of the name from Jor and Dan, the two main sources of the river, as no source by the name of Jor is known.

2. Geology.—The geology of the Jordan is unique. Rising high up among the foothills of Mt. Hermon, it flows almost due south by a most tortuous course, through the two lakes of Huleh and Galilee, following the bottom of a rapidly descending and most remarkable geological fissure, and finally emptying itself into the Dead Sea, which is 1292 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. In its short course of a little more than 100 miles it falls about 3000 feet, and for the greater portion of the journey runs below the level of the ocean. No other part of the earth's surface, uncovered by water, sinks to a depth of even 300 feet below sea-level, except the great Sahara. Professor Hull, the eminent Irish geologist, accounts for this great natural cleft by supposing that towards the end of the Eocene period a great 'fault' or fracture was caused by the contraction from east to west of the limestone crust of the earth. Later, during the Pliocene period, the whole Jordan valley probably formed an inland lake more than 200 miles long, but at the close of the Glacial period the waters decreased until they reached their present state. Traces of water, at heights 1180 feet above the Dead Sea's present level, are found on the lateral slopes of the Jordan valley.

3. Sources.—The principal sources of the Jordan are three: (1) the river Hasbani, which rises in a large fountain on the western slopes of Mt. Hermon, near Hasbeiya, at an altitude of 1700 feet; (2) the Leddān, which gushes forth from the celebrated fountain under Tell el-Qadi, or Dan, at an altitude of 500 feet—the most copious source of the Jordan; and (3) the river Banias, which issues from an immense cavern below Banias or Cæsarea Philippi, having an altitude of 1200 feet. These last two meet about five miles below their fountain-heads at an altitude of 148 feet, and are joined about a half-mile farther on by the Hasbani. Their commingled waters flow on across a dismal marsh of papyrus, and, after seven miles, empty into Lake Huleh, which is identified by some with 'the waters of Merom' (Jos 11²⁻⁷). The lake is four miles long, its surface being but 7 feet above sea-level.

4. The Upper Jordan is a convenient designation for that portion of the river between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee. Emerging from Lake Huleh, the river flows placidly for a space of two miles, and then dashes down over a rocky and tortuous bed until it enters the Sea of Galilee, whose altitude is 682 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. It falls, in this short stretch of 10½ miles, 689 feet. At certain seasons its turbid waters can be traced for quite a considerable distance into the sea, which is 12½ miles long.

5. The Lower Jordan is an appropriate designation for that portion of the river between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. The distance in a straight line between these two seas is but 65 miles, yet it is estimated that the river's actual course covers not less than 200, due to its sinuosity. In this stretch it falls 610 feet, the rate at first being 40 feet per mile. Its width varies from 90 to 200 feet. Along its banks grow thickets of tamarisks, poplars, oleanders, and bushes of different varieties, which are described by the prophets of the (1 Es 49¹⁹ 50⁴, Zec 11²). Numerous rapids, whirlpools, and islets characterize this portion of the Jordan. The river's entire length from Banias to the Dead Sea is 104 miles, measured in a straight line.

6. Tributaries.—Its most important tributaries flow into the Lower Jordan and from the East. The largest is the Yarmuk of the Rabbits, the Hicromax of the Greeks, and the Sheri'at el-Manadireh of the Arabs, which drains Gilead and Bashan in part. It enters the Jordan 5 miles south of the Sea of Galilee. The Bible never mentions it. The only other tributary of considerable importance is the Jabbok of the OT, called by the natives Nahr ez-Zerka or Wady el-Arab. It rises near 'Ammān (Philadelphia), describes a semicircle, and flows into the Jordan at a point about equidistant from the two seas. On the west are the Nahr el-Jalūd, which rises in the spring of Harod at the base of Mt. Gilboa and drains the valley of Jezreel; Wady Fārah, which rises near Mt. Ebal and drains the district east of Shechem; and the Wady el-Kelt, by Jericho, which is sometimes identified with the brook Cherith.

7. Fords.—The fords of the Jordan are numerous. The most celebrated is that opposite Jericho known as Makhadd el-Hajlah, where modern pilgrims are accustomed to bathe. There is another called el-Ghōrawtyeh near the mouth of Wady Nimrin. North of the Jabbok there are at least a score. In ancient times the Jordan seems to have been crossed almost exclusively by fords (1 S 13⁷, 2 S 10¹⁷); but David and his household were possibly conveyed across in a 'ferry-boat' (2 S 19¹⁸; the rendering is doubtful).

8. Bridges are not mentioned in the Bible. Those which once spanned the Jordan were built by the Romans, or by their successors. The ruins of one, with a single arch, may be seen at Jisr ed-Damieh near the mouth of the Jabbok. Since its construction the river bed has changed so that it no longer spans the real channel. This bridge is on the direct route from Shechem to Ramoth-gilead. There is another called Jisr el-Mujamtyeh, close by that of the new railroad from Haifa to Damascus, or about 7 miles south of the Sea of Galilee. A third, built of black basalt and having three arches, is known as the Jisr Benat-Yāqub, or 'bridge of the daughters of Jacob,' situated about two miles south of Lake Huleh on the direct caravan route from Acre to Damascus. A temporary wooden bridge, erected by the Arabs, stands opposite Jericho.

9. The Jordan valley.—The broad and ever-descending valley through which the Jordan flows is called by the Arabs the Ghōr or 'bottom'; to the Hebrews it was known as the 'Arabah'. It is a long plain, sloping uniformly at the rate of 9 feet to the mile, being at the northern end 3, and at the southern end 12 miles broad. For the most part the valley is fertile, especially in the vicinity of Beisan, where the grass and grain grow freely. Near the Dead Sea, however, the soil is saline and barren. The ruins of ancient aqueducts here and there all over the plain give evidence of its having been at one time highly cultivated. By irrigation the entire region could easily be brought under cultivation once more and converted into a veritable garden. In the vicinity of Jericho, once the 'city of palms,' a large variety of fruits, vegetables, and other products is grown. The most fertile portion under cultivation at the present time is the comparatively narrow floor-bed of the river known as the Zōr, varying from a quarter to two miles in width, and from 20 to 200 feet in depth below the Ghōr proper. This is the area which was overflowed every year 'all the time of harvest' (Jos 3¹⁵). It has been formed, doubtless, by the changing of the river bed from one side of the valley to the other.

10. The climate of the Jordan valley is hot. The Lower Jordan in particular, being shut in by two great walls of mountain, the one on the east, and the other on the west, is decidedly tropical. Even in winter the days are uncomfortably warm, though the nights are cool; in summer both days and nights are torrid, especially at Jericho, where the thermometer has been known to register 130 Fahr. by day, and 110 after sunset. This accounts largely for the unpeopled condition of the Lower Jordan valley both to-day and in former times.

11. Flora and fauna.—The trees and shrubs of the Jordan valley are both numerous and varied. The retem or broom plant, thorns, oleanders, flowering bamboos, castor-oil plants, tamarisks, poplars, acacias, Dead Sea 'apples of Sodom,' and many other species of bush, all grow in the valley. The papyrus is especially luxuriant about Lake Huleh.

Animals such as the leopard, jackal, boar, hyæna, ibex, porcupine, and fox live in the thickets which border the banks. The lion has completely disappeared. The river abounds in fish of numerous species, many of them resembling those found in the Nile and the lakes of tropical Africa. Of the 35 species, however, known to exist, 16 are peculiar to the Jordan.

12. The Jordan as a boundary.—In view of what has been said, it is obvious that the Jordan forms a natural boundary to Palestine proper. In the earlier books of the OT we frequently meet with the expressions 'on this side Jordan,' and 'on the other side of the Jordan,' which suggest that the Jordan was a dividing line and a natural boundary. In Nu 34², indeed, it is treated as the original eastern boundary of the Promised Land (cf. Jos 22³). Yet, as Lucien Gautier suggests (art. 'Jordan' in Hastings' DCG), it was not so much the Jordan that constituted the boundary as the depressed Ghōr valley as a whole.

13. Scripture references.—The Jordan is frequently mentioned in both the OT and the NT. Lot, for example, is said to have chosen 'all the circle of the Jordan' because 'it was well watered everywhere' (Gn 13¹⁰); Jeshua and all Israel crossed over the Jordan on dry ground (Jos 3¹⁷); Ehud seized the fords of the Jordan against the Moabites, cutting off their retreat (Jg 3²⁸); Gideon, Jephthah, David, Elijah, and Elisha were all well acquainted with the Jordan; Naaman the Syrian was directed to go wash in the Jordan seven times, that his leprosy might depart from him (2 K 5¹⁰). And it was at the Jordan that John the Baptist preached and baptized, our Lord being among those who were here sacramentally consecrated (Mt 3 and parallels). To-day thousands of pilgrims from all parts of the civilized world visit the Jordan; so that, as G. A. Smith (HGHL, p. 496) reminds us, 'what was never a great Jewish river has become a very great Christian one.'

JOSEDEK.—See JEHOZADAK.

JOSEPH (in OT and Apoc.).—1. The patriarch. See next article. 2. A man of Issachar (Nu 13⁷). 3. A son of Asaph (1 Ch 25²). 4. One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10⁴²); called in 1 Es 9⁴ Josephus. 5. A priest (Neh 12⁴). 6. An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8⁷). 7. An officer of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5¹⁸, 6⁶⁰). 8. In 2 Mac. 8²², and probably also 10¹⁸, Joseph is read by mistake for John, one of the brothers of Judas Maccabæus.

JOSEPH.—Jacob's eleventh son, the elder of the two sons of Rachel; born in Haran. The name is probably contracted from Jehoseph (Ps 81⁵), 'May God add' (cf. Gn 30²⁶), where etymologies from two sources are given). Joseph is the principal hero of the later chapters of Genesis, which are composed mainly of extracts from three documents. J and E supply the bulk of the narrative, and as a rule are cited alternately, the compiler often modifying a quotation from one document with notes derived from the other. From P some six or seven short excerpts are made, the longest being Gn 46⁶⁻²⁷, where the object and the parenthetic quality are evident. For the details of analysis, see Driver *LOT*², 17 ff. The occasional differences of tradition are an evidence of original independence, and their imperfect harmonization in the joint narrative is favourable to its substantial historicity.

At present the date of Joseph can be only provisionally fixed, as the account of his life neither mentions the name of the ruling Pharaoh nor refers to distinctive Egyptian manners or customs in such a way as to yield a clue to the exact period. The Pharaoh of the oppression is now generally taken to be Rameses II. of the 19th dynasty (c. B.C. 1275-1208); and if this be correct, the addition of the years of residence in Egypt (Ex 12⁴¹) would bring Joseph's term of office into the reign of the later Hyksos kings (c. B.C. 2098-1587; for dates and particulars, see Petrie, History of Egypt).

With the return of Jacob to Hebron (Gn 35⁷) he ceases to be the central figure of the story, and Joseph takes his place. Of his life to the age of 17 (Gn 37⁷) nothing is told, except that he was his father's favourite, and rather too free in carrying complaints of his brothers and telling them of his boyish dreams. Sent to Shechem, he found that his brothers had taken their flocks northwards fifteen miles, to the richer pasturage of Dothan. As soon as he came within sight, their resentment perceived its opportunity, and they arranged to get rid of him and his dreams; but the two traditions are not completely harmonized. J represents Judah as inducing his brothers to sell Joseph to a company of Ishmaelites; but E makes Reuben a mediator, whose plans were frustrated by a band of Midianites, who had in the interval kidnapped Joseph and stolen him away (40^b). The phraseology is against the identification of the two companies; and the divergent traditions point to a natural absence of real agreement among the brothers, with a frustration of their purposes by means of which they were ignorant. What became of Joseph they did not really know; and to protect themselves they manufactured the evidence of the blood-stained coat.

In Egypt, Joseph was bought by Potiphar, a court official, whose title makes him chief of the royal butchers and hence of the body-guard; and the alertness and trustworthiness of the slave led quickly to his appointment as major domo (Egyp. mer-per), a functionary often mentioned on the monuments (Erman, Life in Anc. Egypt, 187 f.). Everything prospered under Joseph's management; but his comeliness and courtesy attracted the notice of his master's wife, whose advances, being repelled, were transformed into a resentment that knew no scruples. By means of an entirely false charge she secured the removal of Joseph to the State prison, which was under the control of Potiphar (40^b), and where again he was soon raised to the position of overseer or under-keeper. Under his charge were placed in due course the chief of the Pharaoh's butlers and the chief of his bakers, who had for some unstated reason incurred the royal displeasure. Both were perplexed with dreams, which Joseph interpreted to them correctly. Two years later the Pharaoh himself had his duplicated dream of the fat and lean kine and of the full and thin ears; and as much significance was attached in Egypt to dreams, the king was distressed by his inability to find an interpreter, and 'his spirit was troubled.' Thereupon the chief butler recalled Joseph's skill and his own indebtedness to him, and mentioned him to the Pharaoh, who sent for him, and was so impressed by his sagacity and foresight that exaltation to the rank of keeper of the royal seal followed, with a decree of authority that was second only to that of the throne. The Egyptian name of Zaphenath-paneah (of which the meaning is perhaps 'The God spake and he came into life,' suggesting that the bearer of the name owed his promotion to the Divine use of him as revealer of the Divine will) was conferred upon him, and he married Asenath, daughter of one of the most important dignitaries in the realm, the priest of the great national temple of the sun at On or Heliopolis, seven miles north-east of the modern Cairo.

So far as Egypt was concerned, Joseph's policy was to store the surplus corn of the years of plenty in granaries, and afterwards so to dispose of it as to change the system of land-tenure. Famines in that country are due generally to failure or deficiency in the annual inundation of the Nile, and several of long endurance have been recorded. Brugsch (Hist. i. 304) reports an inscription, coinciding in age approximately with that of Joseph, and referring to a famine lasting 'many years,' during which a distribution of corn was made. This has been doubtfully identified with Joseph's famine. Other inscriptions of the kind occur, and are sufficient to authenticate the fact of prolonged famines, though not to yield further particulars of the one with which Joseph had to deal. His method was to sell corn first for money (rings of gold, whose weight was certified by special officials), and when all this was exhausted (47^b), corn was given in exchange for cattle of every kind, and finally for the land. The morality of appropriating the surplus produce and then compelling the people to buy it back, must not be judged by modern standards of justice, but is defensible, if at all, only in an economic condition where the central government was responsible for the control of a system of irrigation upon which the fertility of the soil and the produce of its cultivation directly depended, and where the private benefit of the individual had to be ignored in view of a peril threatening the community. Instead of regarding the arrangement as a precedent to be followed in different states of civilization, ground has been found in it for charging Joseph with turning the needs of the people into an occasion for oppressing them; and certainly the effect upon the character and subsequent condition of the people was not favourable. The system of tenure in existence before, by which large landed estates were held by private proprietors, was changed into one by which all the land became the property of the crown, the actual cultivators paying a rental of one-fifth of the produce (47^a). That some such change took place is clear from the monuments (cf. Erman, Life in Anc. Egypt, 102), though they have not yielded the name of the author or the exact date of the change. An exception was made in favour of the priests (47^a), who were supported by a fixed income in kind from the Pharaoh, and therefore had no need to part with their land. In later times (cf. Diodorus Siculus, i. 73 f.) the land was owned by the kings, the priests, and the members of a military caste; and it is not likely that the system introduced by Joseph lasted long after his death. The need of rewarding the services of successful generals or partisans would be a strong temptation to the expropriation of some of the royal lands.

The peculiarity of the famine was that it extended over the neighbouring countries (41^a); and that is the fact of significance in regard to the history of Israel, with which the narrative in consequence resumes contact. The severity of the famine in Canaan led Jacob to send all his sons except Benjamin (42^a) to buy corn in Egypt. On their arrival they secured an interview with Joseph, and prostrated themselves before him (37^a 42^a); but in the grown man, with his shaven face [on the monuments only foreigners and natives of inferior rank are represented as wearing beards] and Egyptian dress, they entirely failed to recognize their brother. The rough accusation that they were spies in search of undefended ways by which the country might be invaded from the east, on which side lines of posts and garrisons were maintained under two at least of the dynasties, aroused their fears, and an attempt was made to allay Joseph's suspicions by detailed information. Joseph catches at the opportunity of discovering the truth concerning Benjamin, and, after further confirming in several ways the apprehensions of his brothers, retains one as a hostage in ward and sends the others home. On their return (42^b E), or at the first lodging-place (42^c J) on the way, the discovery of their money in their sacks increased their anxiety, and for a time their father positively refused to consent to further dealings with Egypt. At length his resolution broke down under the pressure of the famine (43^a). In Egypt the sons were received courteously, and invited to a feast in Joseph's house, where they were seated according to their age (43^a), and Benjamin was singled out for the honour of a special 'mess' (cf. 2 S 11^b) as a mark of distinction. They set out homewards in high spirits, unaware that Joseph had directed that each man's money should be placed in his sack, and his own divining-cup of silver (44^b): the method of divination was hydromancy—an article was thrown into a vessel of water, and the movements of the water were thought to reveal the unknown) in that of Benjamin. Overtaken at almost their first halting-place, they were charged with theft, and returned in a body to Joseph's house. His reproaches elicited a frank and pathetic speech from Judah, after which Joseph could no longer maintain his incognito. He allayed the fears of his conscience-stricken brothers by the assurance that they had been the agents of Providence 'to preserve life' (45^a; cf. Ps 105¹⁷); and in the name of the Pharaoh he invited them with their father to settle in Egypt, with the promise of support during the five years of famine that remained.

Goshen, a pastoral district in the Delta about forty miles north-east of Cairo, was selected for the new home of Jacob. The district was long afterwards known as 'the land of Rameses' (47¹¹) from the care spent upon it by the second king of that name, who often resided there, and founded several cities in the neighbourhood. In Egypt swine-herds and cow-herds were 'an abomination' to the people (46²⁴; cf. Hdt. ii. 47, and Erman, op. cit. 439f.), but there is no independent evidence that shepherds were, and the contempt must be regarded as confined to those whose duties brought them into close contact with cattle, for the rearing of cattle received much attention, the superintendent of the royal herds being frequently mentioned in the inscriptions. Joseph's household and brothers flourished during the seventeen years (47²¹.) Jacob lived in Egypt. Before his death he blessed Joseph's two sons, giving preference to the younger in view of the greatness of the tribe to be derived from him, and leaving to Joseph himself one portion above his brethren, viz. Shechem (48²² RVm). After mourning for the royal period of seventy days (50³; cf. Diod. Sic. i. 72), Joseph buried his father with great pomp in the cave of Machpelah, and cheered his brothers by a renewed promise to nourish and help them. He is said to have survived to the age of 110 (50²²), and to have left injunctions that his body should be conveyed to Canaan when Israel was restored. The body was carefully embalmed (50²⁶), and enclosed in a mummy-case or sarcophagus. In due course it was taken charge of by Moses (Ex 13¹⁹), and eventually buried at Shechem (Jos 24²⁹).

Of the general historicity of the story of Joseph there need be no doubt. Allowance may be made for the play of imagination in the long period that elapsed before the traditions were reduced to writing in their present form, and for the tendency to project the characteristics of a tribe backwards upon some legendary hero. But the incidents are too natural and too closely related to be entirely a product of fiction; and the Egyptian colouring, which is common to both of the principal documents, is fatal to any theory that resolves the account into a mere elaboration in a distant land of racial pride. Joseph's own character, as depicted, shows no traces of constructive art, but is consistent and singularly attractive. Dutifulness (1 Mac 2⁵³) is perhaps its keynote, manifested alike in the resistance of temptation, in uncomplaining patience in misfortune, and in the modesty with which he bore his elevation to rank and power. Instead of using opportunities for the indulgence of resentment, he recognizes the action of Providence, and nourishes the brothers (Sir 49¹⁵) who had lost all brotherly affection for him. On the other hand, there are blemishes which should be neither exaggerated nor overlooked. In his youth there was a degree of vanity that made him rather unpleasant company. That his father was left so long in ignorance of his safety in Egypt may have been unavoidable, but leaves a suspicion of inconsiderateness. When invested with authority he treated the people in a way that would now be pronounced tyrannical and unjust, enriching and strengthening the throne at the expense of their woe; though, judged by the standards of his own day, the charge may not equally lie. On the whole, a very high place must be given him among the early founders of his race. In strength of right purpose he was second to none, whilst in the graces of reverence and kindness, of insight and assurance, he became the type of a faith that is at once personal and national (He 11²²), and allows neither misery nor a career of triumph to eclipse the sense of Divine destiny.

JOSEPH (in NT).—1. 2. Two ancestors of our Lord, Lk 3^{24, 30}.

3. The husband of Mary and 'father' of Jesus.—Every Jew kept a record of his lineage, and was very proud if he could claim royal or priestly descent; and Joseph could boast himself 'a son of David' (Mt 1²⁰). His family belonged to Bethlehem, David's city, but he had migrated to Nazareth (Lk 2⁴), where he followed the trade of carpenter (Mt 13⁵⁵). He was betrothed to Mary, a maiden of Nazareth, being probably much her senior, though the tradition of the apocryphal History of Joseph that he was in his ninety-third year and she in her fifteenth is a mere fable. The tradition that he was a widower and had children by his former wife probably arose in the interest of the dogma of Mary's perpetual virginity. The Evangelists tell us little about him, but what they do tell redounds to his credit. (1) He was a pious Israelite, faithful in his observance of the Jewish ordinances (Lk 2²¹⁻²⁴) and feasts (Lk 2⁴¹⁻⁴²). (2) He was a kindly man. When he discovered the condition of his betrothed, he drew the natural inference and decided to disown her, but he would do it as quietly as possible, and, so far as he might, spare her disgrace. And, when he was apprised of the truth, he was very kind to Mary. On being summoned to Bethlehem for the requirements of the census, he would not leave her at home to suffer the slanders of misjudging neighbours, but took her with him and treated her very gently in her time of need (Lk 2¹⁻⁷). (3) He exhibited this disposition also in his nurture of the Child so wondrously entrusted to his care, taking Him to his heart and well deserving to be called His 'father' (Lk 2^{33, 41, 48}, Mt 13⁵⁵, Jn 1⁶ 6⁴²). Joseph never appears in the Gospel story after the visit to Jerusalem when Jesus had attained the age of twelve years and become 'a son of the Law' (Lk 2⁴¹⁻⁴²); and since Mary always appears alone in the narratives of the public ministry, it is a reasonable inference that he had died during the interval. Tradition says that he died at the age of one hundred and eleven years, when Jesus was eighteen.

4. One of the Lord's brethren, Mt 13⁵⁵, where AV reads Joses, the Greek form of the name. Cf. Mk 6³.

5. Joseph of Arimathea.—A wealthy and devout Israelite and a member of the Sanhedrin. He was a disciple of Jesus, but, dreading the hostility of his colleagues, he kept his faith secret. He took no part in the condemnation of Jesus, but neither did he protest against it; and the likelihood is that he prudently absented himself from the meeting. When all was over, he realized how cowardly a part he had played, and, stricken with shame and remorse, plucked up courage and 'went in unto Pilate and asked for the body of Jesus' (Mk 15⁴³). It was common for friends of the crucified to purchase their bodies, which would else have been cast out as refuse, a prey to carrion birds and beasts, and give them decent burial; and Joseph would offer Pilate his price; in any case he obtained the body (Mk 15⁴³). Joseph had a garden close to Calvary, where he had hewn a sepulchre in the rock for his own last resting-place; and there, aided by Nicodemus, he laid the body swathed in clean linen (Mt 27⁶⁷⁻⁶¹ = Mk 15⁴²⁻⁴⁷ = Lk 23⁵⁰⁻⁵⁶ = Jn 19³⁸⁻⁴²).

6. Joseph Barsabbas, the disciple who was nominated against Matthias as successor to Judas in the Apostolate. He was surnamed, like James the Lord's brother, Justus (Ac 1²³). Tradition says that he was one of the Seventy (Lk 10¹). 7. See BARNABAS. DAVID SMITH.

JOSEPHUS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Joseph, Ezr 10².

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS.—Jewish historian and general, born about A.D. 37 or 38, and died in the first years of the 2nd century.

1. Life.—According to his Life, Josephus was descended from a Maccabean house, and was thus of both royal and priestly lineage. He states that he showed great precocity, and that the learned men of his race used to consult him when he was fourteen years of age. He studied successively with the Essenes and the Pharisees, as well as with the Sadducees. For three years he was a student with a hermit named Banus—very probably one of the Essenes—although Josephus does not seem to have been admitted to the higher grades of the order. At the age of 28 he went to Rome to bring about the acquittal of certain priests who had been arrested and sent to Rome for trial by Felix. In this he was successful, and even gained the favour of the Empress Poppea.

Not long after his return from Rome the revolution of A.D. 66 broke out, and he was at once swept into its current. Of the events which follow he has given us two accounts, the earlier in the Jewish War [BJ], the later in his Life, written shortly before his death. These accounts are not always consistent, the latter showing more subservience to the Romans. In particular, he attempts to justify himself, and the Pharisees with whom he was associated, for participation in the revolt, by declaring that they judged it better for moderate men than for radicals to direct the course of events. The BJ, however, does not suggest this questionable proceeding on the part of the Jewish authorities.

The course of the war in Galilee, and particularly his own relations therewith, are minutely narrated by Josephus. His position was one of great difficulty. The Galileans were grouped in various parties, ranging from those who opposed war with Rome to radicals like those who followed John of Giscala. The plans of Josephus and his fellow-commissioners from Jerusalem were further complicated by jealousies between the various cities, particularly Sepphoris, Tiberias, and Tarichee. None the less, Josephus seems to have gone about the work of organizing the revolution energetically. He fortified the cities as well as he could, and attempted to introduce Roman military methods among the troops he was gathering. Whether he was, as he claims, too strict in the matter of booty, or, as his enemies claimed, too lukewarm in the cause of the revolution, complaints were lodged against him at Jerusalem, and an investigating committee was sent into Galilee. Various adventures then followed, but in the end Josephus seems to have been acquitted and to have gained a complete ascendancy over his local enemies. John of Giscala, however, subsequently went to Jerusalem, and proved a persistent enemy, while the Zealot party as a whole seems never to have been satisfied with the attitude of Josephus.

The approach of Vespasian from the north at once showed how half-hearted had been the revolutionary sympathies of many of the Galilean cities. Several of them surrendered without serious fighting, and Vespasian, after one or two desperate battles, was soon in possession of all Galilee excepting Jotapata on the east of the Sea of Galilee, where Josephus and his surviving troops were entrenched. Reinforcements the Sanhedrin could not send, and for forty-seven days the Romans besieged the city. During that time Josephus, if his own account is to be believed, performed marvellous deeds of strategy and valour. But all to no purpose. The city fell, and was razed to the ground. Josephus was taken prisoner, after having by a trick escaped being killed by his own soldiers. On being brought to Vespasian he claimed prophetic ability, and saluted the general as Emperor. For this and other reasons he won favour with Vespasian, was given his freedom, and took his benefactor's family name, Flavius.

When Titus undertook the siege of Jerusalem, Josephus accompanied him as interpreter or herald. By this time, however, he had become hateful to the Jews, and could accomplish nothing in the way of inducing them to make terms with the Romans. When the city was captured, he was able to render some service to the unfortunate Jews because of the favour in which he stood with Titus. He was subsequently given estates in Judaea, and was thus enabled to live during the remainder of his long life as a gentleman of leisure, devoted to the pursuit of literature. He enjoyed the friendship of Titus and of king Agrippa II. He was several times married, and left several children.

2. Writings.—The chief importance of Josephus lies not in his career as a leader of the Jewish revolution, but in the works which have come down to us. Generally speaking, his writings are intended to disabuse his Greek and Roman contemporaries of some of the misconceptions that then existed concerning the Jews. To that end he does not hesitate to employ various ingenious interpretations of historical events, as well as legends, and even to hint that the Jewish records which he quotes have certain allegorical meanings to be disclosed in a subsequent work, which, however, he never wrote.

(1) The earliest of these writings is that Concerning the Jewish War, a work in seven books. It covers briefly the period from the time of Antiochus Epiphanes to the outbreak of the war of A.D. 66–70, and then narrates the events of the war in detail. It was originally written in Aramaic, but was re-written by Josephus in Greek. It was probably issued before 79, as it was presented to Vespasian. Because of the reference to the Temple of Peace as finished (BJ vii. v. 7), it must have been written after 75. The work, while inaccurate at many points, and full of a tendency to present the actions of the Jews in as favourable a light as possible, is of inestimable value so far as its record of facts is concerned, and particularly for the light it throws on the state of society in the midst of which Jesus laboured. The book found favour with Vespasian and Titus and Agrippa II.

(2) The Antiquities of the Jews.—This great work in twenty books is one of the most important monuments which have come down to us from antiquity. It was published in the year 93. It covers the history of the Jews from the earliest Biblical times to the outbreak of the revolution of A.D. 66. It is particularly interesting as an illustration of the method by which the facts of Hebrew history could be re-written for the edification of the Greeks and Romans. It abounds in legends and curious interpretations. Josephus was by no means dependent upon the OT exclusively. He constantly refers to non-Biblical writers, mentioning by name most of the Greek and Roman historians. He used constantly the works of Alexander Polyhistor, Nicholas of Damascus, and Strabo. He probably also used Herodotus. The work abounds in collections of decrees and inscriptions which make it of great value to secular as well as to Biblical historians. The later books give very full accounts of the life of Herod I., for which Josephus is largely dependent upon Nicholas of Damascus, the historiographer of Herod. In his treatment of the Maccabees he is largely dependent upon First Maccabees. His account of the successors of Herod is hardly more than a sketch, but that of the events leading up to the revolution is more complete.

(3) The Life.—This work was written in reply to Justus of Tiberias, by whom Josephus was accused of causing the revolt. In his Life Josephus represents himself as a friend of the Romans, but many statements are disproved by his earlier work, the BJ. This Life appeared after the death of Agrippa II., that is, in the beginning of the 2nd century.

(4) Against Apion.—This is a defence of the Jewish people against the attacks of their enemies and calumniators, chief among whom was Apion, a grammarian of Alexandria, who wrote during the first half of the 1st cent. A.D. It was written probably about the same time as the Life, and is particularly valuable as a narrative of the charges brought against the Jewish religion by the Greeks. It also serves as an exposition of the customs and views of the Jews of the 1st century, not only in Judaea but throughout the Dispersion.

3. The importance of Josephus to the Biblical student.—As a contemporary of the NT writers, Josephus describes the Jewish background of Christian history as does no other writer of antiquity. The Book of Acts is particularly illuminated by his writings, while the chronology of the Apostolic period is given its fixed dates by his references to Jewish and Roman rulers. Josephus, it is true, does not add to our knowledge of the life of Christ. While his reference to John the Baptist is possibly authentic, and while it is not impossible that he mentions Jesus, the entire passage (Ant. xviii. iii. 3) can hardly have come from Josephus in its present form. At the same time, his narrative of the events of the Gospel period and his description of the character of the various rulers of Judæa serve to corroborate the accuracy of both the Gospels and Acts. As furnishing data for our knowledge of Jewish legends, parties, practices, and literature, his importance is exceptional. Even if we did not have the Mishna, it would be possible from his passages to reconstruct a satisfactory picture of the Jewish life of NT times. His few references to the current Messianic expectations of his day are particularly valuable. On the other hand, his comments upon and explanations of the OT are of comparatively small value.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

JOSES.—1. One of the 'brethren of the Lord' (Mk 6³ 15⁴⁰, Mt 27³⁶). In Mt 13⁵⁵ AV has Joses, but RV correctly Joseph. 2. The natal name (Ac 4³⁶ AV) of Barnabas; RV correctly has Joseph.

JOSHAH.—A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4³⁴).

JOSHAPHAT.—1. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴¹). 2. A priest in David's time (1 Ch 15²⁴).

JOSHAVIAH.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴⁶).

JOSHBEKASHAH.—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25²⁴). There is reason to believe that this and five of the names associated with it are really a fragment of a hymn or prayer.

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH occurs in RV of 2 S 23³⁴ as a proper name in place of the meaningless 'that sat in the seat' of the AV. But the text is corrupt, and the original name Jashobeam must be restored from the parallel passage, 2 Ch 11¹¹, just as the 'Hachmonite' must be substituted for the 'Tahchemonite.'

JOSHIBIAH.—A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4³⁵).

JOSHUA (on forms and meaning of the name see next art.).—1. The successor of Moses. See next article. 2. The Bethsemiter in whose field was the stone on which the ark was set, on its return from the land of the Philistines (1 S 6^{14, 15}). 3. The governor of Jerusalem in the time of Josiah (2 K 23³⁵). 4. The high priest who along with Zerub. directed affairs at Jerusalem after the restoration (Hag 1^{1, 12, 14} etc., Zec 3^{1, 4, 6} etc.). In the books of Hag. and Zec. he is called Joshua, in Ezr. and Neh Jeshua (wh. see). See also Jesus, 2.

JOSHUA (cf. Jesus, 1).—The successor of Moses as leader of Israel. He is called Hoshea in Dt 32⁴, Nu 13³; and in Nu 13¹⁶ this is represented as his original name. But Nu 13 is late, and the versions in Dt. show that 'Joshua' was probably the original reading. The most likely rendering of the name is 'Jahweh is salvation.' The son of Nun and of the tribe of Ephraim, he commanded the army in the battle with Amalek (Ex 17⁹⁻¹⁰), attended on Moses at Mt. Sinai (32¹⁷⁻¹⁸), and at the Tent of Meeting (33¹¹; all these passages are from E); acted as one of the twelve spies (Nu 13^{8 14⁶⁻⁹}), was spared along with Caleb (14^{30, 38}; all P). His subsequent history belongs to the story of the conquest of Canaan (see following article). He was buried in Timnath-serah (Jos 19^{50 24³⁰}) or Timnath-heres (Jg 2⁹), in the hill-country of Ephraim.

The view is widely held that Joshua has no historical reality as a person, that his name is merely the name of a clan in Ephraim, and that his leadership in Israel represents, and puts back into the period of the conquest, the commanding position which Ephraim had come to hold in the Israelite confederation. And the effort is made to show that he makes his appearance first in E, the N. Israelite or Ephraimite source. But the old poetic fragment Jos 10^{12f.} represents him as speaking in the name of united Israel, and Jos 17¹⁴⁻¹⁸ brings him into view in his dealings with his own tribe as having more than their interests in his mind, as being in some sense the arbiter of the confederacy. And while it is difficult on any reading of the history to understand why all our sources say nothing about the conquest of Central Palestine, this becomes doubly difficult if originally this was the scene of Joshua's first activity and influence. The historical foundation for making the hero of Ephraim into the conqueror of all Canaan is absent.

It seems more probable that Joshua led the nation in their first assault on Palestine, that under his leadership the entry by Jericho was won, and a wedge thrust into the land by the capture of Bethel and Ai. After this early and united victory, the tribes may have divided for their future settlements, and the separate conquests may have been carried out, as the traditions in Jg. represent them, in a more piecemeal and imperfect fashion. But this is not incompatible with the fact that Joshua may have retained such a position of arbiter as, e.g., Jos 17 gives him. The loose confederacy, which still recognized its unity against its enemies, may have turned naturally for guidance to one who led its early efforts. In our later sources the conquest was conceived in a different fashion. It was represented as thorough, and as carried out by a united people. The writers naturally grouped all this round the name of one who had been able, though only for a short time, to give the tribes a sense of unity and to begin their assault on their new land. They idealized both his person and his work. But only on the supposition that there was something to idealize is it possible to understand why a man, who belongs to a clan in Ephraim which is otherwise unknown, came to be set up as the hero under whom they won their foothold among the nations, and passed from wandering tribes into a people.

A. C. WELCH.

JOSHUA.—1. Place in the Canon.—The book was placed by the Jews among the Early Prophets, i.e. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings. The reason generally accepted for this is that Joshua, unlike Exodus or Leviticus, does not contain Torah or law. But Genesis, which recounts only the origins of the nation to which the Torah was delivered, was included in the Pentateuch; Joshua, which relates the conquest of the land where the Torah was to be practised, was excluded. Jewish tradition worked with criteria of which we are ignorant, but in separating Joshua from the Pentateuch it may have recognized the presence of different documents.

Modern criticism has insisted on connecting the book more closely with the Pentateuch, on the ground that, since all the Pentateuch documents look forward to the fulfilment of Jahweh's promise of Palestine, Joshua, which relates the conquest, is a necessary sequel. This, however, forgets (a) that all Hebrew history is a unity in which the conquest of Palestine is merely an incident; (b) that Deuteronomy looks forward beyond the conquest to the erection of a national sanctuary, for which Joshua provides no more than the foundation. And there are other evidences that Joshua formed part of a history which extended through the period of the Judges to the establishment of the kingdom in Jerusalem. It is possible that a wider recognition of this fact may help to clear up some of the difficult questions as to the composition of the book.

2. Structure and contents.—The book falls into three parts: (a) the conquest, chs. 1-12; (b) the division of the land, chs. 13-21; (c) a conclusion, chs. 22-24. It is convenient to discuss these separately.

(a) In chs. 1-12, an account, closely akin to JE, supplies the foundation. It relates the mission of the spies to Jericho (2¹⁻⁹, 12²⁴), and the consequent passage of Jordan (3^{1, 5, 10-17}, 4^{1-11a}, 15-18, 20). In the latter story a difference in substance proves the presence of two accounts, but every effort to identify one of these with J, the other with E, fails from insufficient criteria. It recounts the circumcision at Gilgal, which it views as a novelty ('the second time' of 5² is absent from the LXX), since by this means the reproach of the circumcised Egyptians is removed from the people (5^{2f.}, 8^{1f.}). The story of the capture of Jericho and Ai (in both of which the presence of two accounts is clear) follows (5^{12-6²⁷}, 7¹⁻²⁴, 8¹⁻²⁹), with the trespass of Achan. Joshua then makes a compact with the Gibeonites (9³⁻¹⁰, 11-16a, 16, 22f., 28, 27a), and advances to the victory at Beth-horon (10¹⁻⁷, 9-11, 12b-14a), to the execution at Makkedah (10¹⁵⁻²⁴, 28^f), and to the victory at the Waters of Merom (11¹⁻⁹ [In part]).

This account has been thoroughly revised by an editor who is closely akin in spirit and language to the author of the framework of Deuteronomy. He added an introduction into which he has fused earlier material (ch. 1). He brought out certain features in connexion with the passage of Jordan—the fear inspired in the Canaanites, the presence of the 2½ tribes, the exaltation of Joshua by Jahweh (21^{6f}, 32-4, 6-9 41^{1b}, 12, 14, 21-24 51). He gave a different reason for the circumcision at Gilgal (54-7), and added some details to the fraud of the Gibeonites (9^{1f}, 9b, 10, 24^f, 27b.), and to the story of Beth-horon (9⁸, 12a, 14b, 28). He concluded the conquest of the South (10²⁸⁻⁴²) and the victory at Merom (11¹⁰⁻²³), with a summary of the result; and he added a review of the entire conquest in ch. 12. In his work he does not add independent material to his original, but by his arrangement and omissions gives a new aspect to the account. Thus several indications point to his having omitted much from his documents. It is sufficient to mention one—the absence of any account of the conquest of Central Palestine. This is the more remarkable since at 8³⁰⁻³⁶ we have a statement of how Joshua built an altar at Ebal, before the country between Gilgal and Mount Ephraim was subdued. Probably this formed the conclusion to JE's narrative of the conquest of Central Palestine; possibly it was derived from E, a source which was specially interested in North Israelite sanctuaries, and which (see DEUTERONOMY) was a favourite source with D. Further, the conquest of South Palestine in its present form does not agree with Jos 15¹⁴⁻¹⁹ = Jg 10¹⁰⁻¹⁶. The latter passages represent South Palestine as conquered, not in one sweeping rush, but gradually; not by the action of the united tribes under one head, but by the effort of one tribe or of several in combination. Again, 11^{21^f} assigns to Joshua the victory over the Anakim, which in 14¹² 15^{14^f} and Jg 10¹⁰⁻¹⁶ is attributed to Judah, and especially to Caleb. Evidently the editor has sought to group round one representative figure, and assign to a specific period, the conquest which covered a considerable time and engaged many leaders. His chief interest in the details of history centres round their capacity to be used to point a moral. Thus it is noteworthy how few chronological data appear in the chapters in comparison with earlier books. He gives prominence to the motives which governed Joshua, and to the Divine support promised to and received by him. He magnifies the leader's successes, and considers him the representative of the nation and the successor of Moses.

A few verses in this section, 41³, 19 51¹⁰⁻¹² 71 91^{1b}, 17-21, are generally assigned to P, but they are so isolated and so vague that nothing can be done with them except catalogue them, and express the doubt whether they ever belonged to a separate work.

(b) In chs. 13-21 the situation is different, and the critical results more uncertain. The same three sources can be traced as in the earlier section; but, on the one hand, the portions assigned to P take a character and range wholly unlike those which characterize this document throughout the Pentateuch; on the other, it is still a subject of debate whether the section owes its final form to a Deuteronomist or a Priestly editor, D or P. The present writer's view is that D edited this section also, using as his sources JE and what is called P. (The other view is held, e.g., by Driver.)

(1) P (so called), as the more complete, is given first. It began with the assembly of the tribes at Shiloh for the division (18¹), and a statement as to the lot assigned to the 2½ tribes (13¹⁵⁻²²). It then proceeded to the division (14¹⁻⁵). The lot of Judah is first described (15¹⁻¹³, 20-44, 48-52). Then follows the lot of the children of Joseph (16¹⁻⁸ 17^{1a}, 3^f, 7, 9a, 3c, 10a), who are counted as two, and of whom Manasseh, as first-born, is named first. The lots of Benjamin (18¹¹⁻²⁶),

Simeon (19¹⁻⁸), Zebulun (vv. 10-16), Issachar (vv. 17-22), Asher (vv. 23-31), Naphtali (vv. 32-39), Dan (vv. 40-46, 48) are described, and then comes a conclusion (v. 51) corresponding with the opening (18¹). On this followed the law and list of the cities of refuge (20¹⁻³, 9a, 7-9), and a list of the Levitical cities (21¹⁻⁴²).

(2) D incorporated with this, material drawn from JE. He introduced the division of the land with a review of the undivided land, and a statement of the lot assigned to the 2½ tribes (13¹⁻¹⁴). He therefore dislodged the introduction (18¹). Into the lot of Judah he inserted the account of Caleb's settlement there (14⁶⁻¹⁶ 15¹⁴⁻¹⁹), and of Jerusalem (v. 62). [Vv. 46-47 may be a late addition, written, after the Philistines had disappeared, to conform Judah's boundary to the ideal of v. 12]. Into the lot of the children of Joseph he inserted material from the older source (16¹⁻³, 9^f, 17^{1b}, 2, 5, 8, 9b, 10b-18), which represented the lot of the sons as one (17¹⁴⁻¹⁸). Before the lot of Benjamin he placed the statement of a survey made for the seven remaining tribes (18²⁻⁴, 8-10 [from JE; v. 7 is from D]). This may represent the historical fact that the two strong clans of Judah and Ephraim were the first to be settled. But the break at this point in the original source gave occasion to insert 18¹ here. In the description of the remaining seven lots only a few verses (19⁹, 47, 49) come from JE, but the list of Naphtali's cities (vv. 32-39), which is entirely different in character from the description of the other lots, may be from JE, according to which (18⁹) the country was distributed by cities. This is one of the facts which support those who hold that P edited JE.

It deserves notice that the account of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon—the districts which were inhabited after the Exile—is more exhaustive than that of the others. The fact suggests that the editor, who gave the book its final form, wrote at a late date, or at least that late hands re-touched the book.

In the account of the cities of refuge (ch. 20), vv. 4^f, 9b, which have been added to the earlier source, are absent from the LXX. They must have been added at a late date to bring the section into agreement with the Deuteronomist law.

(3) D concluded the section on the division of the land with his formal close, 21⁴³⁻⁴⁵.

(c) In chs. 22-24 D took the account of the dismissal of the 2½ tribes (22⁹⁻³⁴) from P, providing it with his own introduction (vv. 1-4). The account is late, since it views the conquest as simultaneous, complete, and national. He took ch. 24—the renewal of the covenant—from JE (probably E), and added only a few verses (11b, 13, 21). To these he attached Joshua's parting counsels (ch. 23).

The source named P takes much the same position about the conquest as the final editor. The chief difference lies in the fact that it associates Eleazar with Joshua, but these two formally divide the conquered territory.

It seems probable that the Book of Joshua once formed part of a greater whole—a history written in the Deuteronomist spirit and based on earlier sources, which covered the period from the conquest to the kingdom. This view is tenable along with the opinion that P was the final editor, who, adding some sections on the division which he extracted from older sources, brought the book to its present form.

JOSIAH.—1. King of Judah, who succeeded his father Amon when only eight years old (2 K 22¹). The religious condition of the people, which was bad under Amon, continued without essential improvement, so far as we know, until the eighteenth year of Josiah. The sudden change then made resulted from the finding of the Book of Instruction in the Temple (v. 2^{2f}); but it is possible that the minds of king and people were prepared for it by the Scythian invasion. The demand of the book for a thorough reformation powerfully affected the king and his officers. The book was read publicly, and king and people entered into a solemn covenant to act according to its injunctions. Its central demand was the removal of all altars in the country except the one at Jerusalem. This was henceforth to be the only sanctuary in Judah. The carrying out of this programme is related in detail, and we learn that the conclusion of the work was marked by the celebration of the Passover in a new manner and with unusual solemnity (23²⁴).

Josiah's reign was characterized by justice, as we learn from Jeremiah, but we know no more of it until the end of the king's life. The Assyrian empire was tottering to its fall, and Pharaoh-necho thought to seize the provinces nearest him and attach them to Egypt. He therefore invaded Palestine with an army. Josiah was ill-advised enough to attempt resistance. In the battle which ensued he was slain (23²⁹). His motive in undertaking this expedition has been much discussed. Probably he hoped to restore the real independence of Judah. That he was beloved by his people is indicated by their deep and long-continued mourning.

2. Son of Zephaniah (Zec 6¹⁰). H. P. SMITH.

JOSIAS—Josiah, king of Judah (1 Es 1¹. 7. 18. 21. 23. 25. 28. 29. 32-34, Bar 1⁸); in 1 Es 8³⁶ Josaphias.

JOSIPHIAH.—The father of one of Ezra's companions (Ezr 8¹⁰); in 1 Es 8³⁶ Josaphias.

JOT AND TITTLE.—In Mt 5¹⁸ Jesus says, 'Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled' (||Lk 16¹⁷). The Greek words iōta and keratia (WH keren) were translated by Tindale 'iott' and 'tittle,' and these forms were retained in all the versions. The 1611 ed. of AV has 'iote' (one syllable) and 'tittle,' but modern printers have turned iote into 'jot,' and 'tittle' into 'tittle.' The iōta is the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet, as is the yod in the later Hebrew. The keratia (literally 'little horn') is any small mark distinguishing one letter from another, like the stroke of a t.

JOTBAH.—Named only in 2 K 21¹⁹. It was probably in Judah, but the site is unknown.

JOTBATHAH.—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites (Nu 33³¹, Dt 10⁷), described as 'a land of brooks of waters.' Its position is unknown.

JOTHAM (judge).—The youngest son of Jerubbaal, who, by hiding himself, escaped the massacre of his brethren by Abimelech (Jg 9⁵). When Abimelech had been proclaimed king by the Shechemites, Jotham appeared, close to where they were assembled, on Mt. Gerizim, and addressed to them the 'Parable of the Trees' (9⁸⁻²⁰). The parable, which is somewhat incongruous in parts, is intended as an appeal to the conscience of the Shechemites; in case the appeal should turn out to be fruitless (which indeed proved to be the case), Jotham utters a curse (v. 20) against both Abimelech and the Shechemites; this curse is shortly afterwards fulfilled. After his address, Jotham flees to Beer, fearing the vengeance of Abimelech, and we hear of him no more.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

JOTHAM.—1. A king of Judah in the time of Isaiah. His father was afflicted with leprosy, and Jotham had some sort of regency before becoming sole ruler (2 K 15⁵). We know nothing of him except that he rebuilt or ornamented one of the gates of the Temple (v. 35), and that the hostilities which later culminated in the invasion of Judah began before his death (vv. 37. 38).

2. A Calebite (1 Ch 27⁷). H. P. SMITH.

JOY.—

The noun joy and its synonyms, rejoicing, gladness, mirth, the verb joy—more usually rejoice, also be (and make) joyful, be (and make) glad or merry—with the corresponding adjectives, represent in the OT a rich variety of Heb. synonyms not easily distinguishable. NT Greek expresses the emotion by three leading words: (a) the ordinary chara (vb. chairō; cf. charis, 'grace'); (b) a term signifying excited, demonstrative joy, exultation—as noun rendered 'gladness' (Lk 14 Ac 26⁶. He 1⁹, 'exceeding joy' in Jude 4), as vb., 'be exceeding glad' (Mt 5¹², Rev 19⁷), or 'rejoice greatly' (Ac 16³⁴, 1 P 1⁸ 14¹³)—never found in Paul; (c) almost peculiar to Paul (who uses noun and vb. 34 times in 1 and 2 Cor., 8 times in Ro., and 8 times elsewhere), denoting joy over some personal distinction or possession, and mostly rendered 'glorying' or 'boasting' by AV, by RV uniformly 'glorying,' except in Ro 5⁴ where it appears twice as 'rejoicing.' (d) In Lk 12¹⁰ 15²² etc., 2 Co 2², we find a familiar Gr. word for festive, social joy; (e) in Ac 27²⁸ etc., Ja 5⁸, a similar term signifying cheerfulness or high spirits. The Beatitudes of OT (under the formula 'Blessed,' or 'Happy,' is the man,' etc., as in Ps 1¹ 127⁵) and of the NT (Mt 5³ etc.) come under this head, as they set forth the objective conditions, spiritual or material, of religious happiness; while 'peace' designates the corresponding inward state forming the substratum of joy, which is happiness in its livelier but fluctuating emotional moods. Joy is to peace as the sunshine and bright colours are to the calm light and sweet air of a summer day; on the relations of the two, see Jn 14²⁷. 15¹¹⁻¹³, Ro 14¹⁷ 15¹³. 21¹, Gal 5²², Ph 4¹⁻⁷ etc.).

Joy is more conspicuous in Christianity than in any other religion, and in the Bible than in any other literature. Psychologically, joy is the index of health, resulting from the adequate engagement of the affections and the vigorous and harmonious exercise of the powers; it is the sign that the soul has found its object. In the OT, as between Jⁿ and Israel, joy is mutual. Its ascription to Jⁿ indicates the realism of the Heb. conception of the Divine personality; Jⁿ 'rejoices in his works' (Gn 1³¹ etc., Ps 104³¹), and 'rejoices over' His people 'for good' (Dt 30⁹, Zeph 3¹⁷ etc.; cf. Lk 15⁷ 10). 'The righteous' in turn 'rejoice in Jⁿ' (Ps 97¹² 149⁵ etc.), in the fact that they have such a God and know Him (Ps 49⁶. 161¹. 100 etc.)—this is the supreme happiness of life, it is 'life' in the full sense (Ps 36⁹ 63⁷ etc.)—particularly in His 'mercy' and 'faithfulness' and 'salvation' (Ps 21⁷ 51⁷⁻¹⁷ 85. 89¹⁻⁸, Is 25⁹, Hab 3⁷), in His wise and holy 'statutes' (Dt 4¹, Ps 119); they 'rejoice before Jⁿ', expressing their joy by sacrifice and feast (Dt 12¹⁰⁻¹² etc.), they rejoice in the natural boons of life, in the guidance of Providence (Ps 103. 116. 118 etc.), in national blessings and success (Ex 15. 1 K 8⁴⁶, Is 55, Neh 12⁴³ etc.), in Jⁿ's 'judgments' on wrong-doers (1 S 21¹⁰, Ps 48⁶. 68¹⁻⁶ etc.), and in His 'promises,' which bring hope and lead into the darkest days (Ps 27¹⁻⁴. Jer 15¹⁶, Zec 2¹⁰ 9⁹ etc.).

The OT joy in God breaks out again in the Canticles of the NT (Lk 1^{40ff}. 6^{4ff}. 22^{42ff}), being all the while sustained on 'the hope of Israel,' and gathering in the hidden reservoir of pious Jewish hearts. This 'joy in God' was strong in Jesus; the intimations given by Mk 2¹⁸⁻²², Mt 5¹⁰⁻¹² 6^{10ff}. 23-34 11¹⁶⁻¹⁹, Lk 10²¹ and 15 (the whole ch.), Jn 2¹⁻¹¹ 15¹¹ 17¹³, should correct the one-sided impression that in His ordinary temper our Lord was the 'man of sorrows'; the glow of happiness felt in His company formed an element in the charm of Jesus. Christian joy is associated with the 'finding' of life's 'treasure' in true religion (Mt 13⁴⁴ etc.), with the receiving of salvation through Christ (Ac 26¹⁶, 1 Th 1¹⁰), with the influence of the Holy Spirit on the soul (Ro 14¹⁷, Gal 5²², Eph 5¹⁸⁻²⁰), with success in work for God and man, and hope of heavenly reward (Lk 10²⁰, Jn 4³⁶, Ro 12¹², Ph 1¹⁸, 1 P 4¹³; cf. Ps 17¹⁴ 126⁵), and with spiritual fellowship and friendship (Ro 12¹⁰, 2 Co 7¹⁻¹⁶, Ph 2¹, 2 Jn 4 etc.)—the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, etc., an inseparable pair (see Jn 15⁹⁻¹¹). The adversities which destroy earthly happiness, like obstructions crossing a stream that rises from some deep spring, go to swell the tide of joy in the breast of the children of God; see, e.g., Mt 5^{10ff}, Jn 16³³, As 5¹¹, Ro 5³⁻¹¹ 8³¹⁻³⁹, 1 P 1³⁻¹², Rev 7¹⁴⁻¹⁷, Is 35.

G. G. FINDLAY.

JOZABAD.—1. 2. 3. Three of David's heroes (1 Ch 12¹. 20¹²). 4. The eponym of a Levitical family (2 Ch 31¹³ 35⁹ [1 Es 1⁹ Joram]). 5. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10² [1 Es 9²² Ocideius]). 6. A Levite (Ezr 8²³ [1 Es 8²³ Josabud]) 10²³ [1 Es 9²³ Josabud]).

†. An expounder of the Law (Neh 8⁷ [1 Es 9⁴³ Jozabdu]).
 8. An inhabitant of Jerusalem (Neh 11¹⁶).

JOZABDUS.—1. 1 Es 9²² = Ezr 10²³ Jozabad. 2. 1 Es 9²² = Ezr 10²³ Zabbai. 3. 1 Es 9²² = Neh 8⁷ Jozabad.

JOZACAR.—In 2 K 12²¹ it is said that Jozacar ben-Shimeath and Jehozabad ben-Shomer murdered Joash. The parallel 2 Ch 24²⁶ makes it clear that there was but one murderer named, and that his name has been duplicated. Jozacar and Zechariah have the same meaning, 'Jahweh remembers.' W. F. COBB.

JOZADAK.—See JEHOZADAK.

JUBAL.—A son of Lamech by Adah, and inventor of musical instruments, Gn 4²¹ (J). The name prob. contains an allusion to yōbēl, 'ram's horn.'

JUBILEE.—See SABBATICAL YEAR.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF.—See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 2.

JUCAL.—See JEHUCAL.

JUDĀA.—A name first appearing in To 1¹⁸ as applied to the old kingdom of Judah (of which Judaea is merely the Græco-Roman equivalent),—as it was re-occupied after the Captivity by the returned descendants of subjects of the Southern Kingdom. Though sometimes (as in Lk 23⁶, and more definitely in Ac 10²⁷ 26¹⁰) loosely employed to denote the whole of Western Palestine, the name was properly confined to the southernmost of the three districts into which the Roman province of Western Palestine was divided—the other two being Galilee and Samaria. It lay between Samaria on the north and the desert of Arabia Petraea on the south; but its exact boundaries cannot be stated more definitely. After the death of Herod, Archelaus became ethnarch of Judaea, and after his deposition it was added to the province of Syria, and governed by a procurator with his headquarters in Caesarea.

It was in the wilderness of Judaea that John the Baptist came forward as the forerunner of Christ (Mt 3¹; cf. Mk 1⁴ and Lk 3¹, 'the wilderness'). It is probably the same as the 'wilderness of Judah' (Jg 1⁸, Ps 63¹ [title], the desert tract to the W. of the Dead Sea. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

JUDAH ('he is to be praised'; the popular etymologies seem to regard the name as an abbreviated Hoph. impf. of yōdāh, 'to praise').—Judah is represented as the fourth son of Leah by Jacob (Gn 29²⁶ [J] 35²³ [P]). Though he was of late birth, the Judaean document (J) nevertheless gives him precedence over Reuben, the firstborn, who is favoured by the later Ephraimite document E. According to J, it was Judah who proposed to sell Joseph in order to avert the danger which threatened him at the hands of his brethren (Gn 37²⁶). Similarly, when they return to Joseph's house with the silver cup, J gives the pre-eminence to Judah, and makes him spokesman for all in his pathetic appeal to Joseph (44¹⁻⁴⁰). Reuben, because of his lust towards Bilhah (Gn 49⁴, cf. 35²²), and Simeon and Levi, because of their barbarous conduct towards the Shechemites, fall before their enemies and into disfavour with their brethren, and Judah succeeds to the primogeniture.

A tradition is preserved in Gn 38 which is generally supposed to be of great value as bearing upon the early development of the tribe. Judah is there said to have withdrawn himself from his brethren and to have gone down to a certain Adullamite whose name was Hiram. There he met with Bath-shua, a Canaanitess, whom he took to wife. She bore him three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er and Onan were slain by Jahweh for their wickedness. Er's widow, Tamar, a Canaanitess also, it seems, posing by the wayside as a hierodule, enticed Judah to intercourse with her, and of her the twin sons Perez and Zerah were born to Judah. This story is usually held to be based upon facts of tribal history, though cast in the form of personal narrative, and also to prove clearly that Judah, like other tribal names, is but the eponymous head of the tribe. It points to the settlement of Judah in the region of Adullam and its union with foreign stock. Hiram is a Canaanite clan; Er and Onan stand for two other clans which became united to Judah, but early disappeared; the other three continued to exist as constituents of Judah. Besides these it would appear that in the time of David the Calebite and Jerahmeelite tribes, mentioned in 1 Ch 2 as descendants of Perez, were incorporated into the tribe. In 1 S 27¹⁰ 30¹⁴ they still appear to be independent, though the Chronicler makes both Caleb and Jerahmeel descendants of Judah through Perez and Hezron, to whom also he traces David. In Nu 13 (P) Caleb, who is sent by Moses as one of the spies, belongs to Judah; but in Nu 32⁷, Jos 14⁶. 14 (R), Jg 3 etc., he is a Kenizzite, the son of Kenaz. From the last passage we see that Othniel, whose chief centre was Kiriath-sepher (Debir), was another closely related tribe, and both appear from Gn 36¹⁶. 42 (P) to have been Edomites. Kenites, commonly supposed to be of Midianite origin, we are told in Jg 1¹⁶, also went up from Jericho with Judah into the Wilderness.

Of all these foreign elements by which the tribe of Judah was increased, the Calebite was the most important. In fact the Chronicler makes the Judahite stock consist largely of the descendants of Hezron. It was the Calebite capital, Hebron, that under David (himself said to be Hezronite) became the capital of Judah. After this time the history of the tribe becomes the history of the Southern Kingdom.

P's Sinai census (Nu 12⁷) gives 74,600, and that of the Wilderness 76,500 (Nu 26²).

The territory of the tribe is described in Jos 15¹⁶. (P); but this is late and an ideal apportionment. In the Song of Deborah Judah is not even mentioned, because 'it was not yet made up by the fusion of Israelite, Canaanite, Edomite, and Arabic elements,' as Stade (GVI 113) puts it. The Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49¹⁰) and that of Moses (Dt 33⁷) reflect conditions during the monarchy. How the tribe entered W. Canaan and obtained its early seat around Bethlehem it is impossible to say. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

JUDAH.—1. See preced. article. 2. Ezr 3⁹ (cf. Neh 12²) = 1 Es 5⁵⁸ Joda. 3. A Levite, Ezr 10²³ = 1 Es 9²² Judas. 4. An overseer, Neh 11⁸. 5. A priest's son, Neh 12⁸. 6. Lk 19⁹; see Jutah. 7. See next article.

JUDAH 'upon (AV) or at (RV) Jordan' (Jos 19³⁴) is a very doubtful site. It is the general opinion that the text of this passage must be corrupt, and that the name of some place near Jordan, perhaps Chinneroth, may have been lost. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

JUDAISM.—See ISRAEL, II. §§ 5. 6.

JUDAS (in Apocr.), the Gr. equivalent of the Heb. name Judah. 1. The third son of Mattathias, called Maccabæus (1 Mac 2⁴ etc.). See MACCABEES, § 2. 2. One of two captains who stood by Jonathan at Hazor (1 Mac 11⁷⁰). 3. A Jew holding some important position at Jerusalem; he is named in the title of a letter sent from the Jews of Jerusalem and Judaea and the Jewish Senate to their brethren in Egypt, and to a certain Aristobolus (2 Mac 11⁹). 4. A son, probably the eldest, of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16²). In a.c. 135, he, with his father and another brother named Mattathias, was murdered at Dok by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (16¹¹⁻¹⁷). 5. 1 Es 9²² = Judah of Ezr 10²³.

JUDAS (in NT).—1. Judas Iscariot.—See following article.

2. Judas, the son of James (see JAMES, 4), one of the twelve Apostles (Lk 6¹⁶), called by Mt. (10³) Lebbæus and by Mk. (3¹⁸) Thaddæus. The only thing recorded of him is that, when Jesus promised in the Upper Room to manifest Himself to the man that loved Him, he inquired: 'Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?' (Jn 14²² RV); showing that he shared the common ideal of the Messianic Kingdom. He pictured it as a worldly kingdom, and was expecting that Jesus would presently flash forth in majesty before an astonished world and ascend the throne of David; and he wondered what could have happened to prevent this consummation.

3. Judas, the Lord's brother (Mt 13³⁵—Mk 6³).—See BRETHREN OF THE LORD. He was the author of the Short Epistle of Jude (i.e. Judas), where he styles himself 'the servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James' (v.¹), and, like James, exhibits a stern zeal for morality.

4. Judas, the Galilean.—He is so called both in the NT (Ac 5³⁷) and in Josephus, though he belonged to Gamala in Gaulanitis on the eastern side of the Lake of Galilee; perhaps because Galilee was the scene of his patriotic enterprise. At the enrolment or census under Quirinius in A.D. 7, Judas raised an insurrection. He perished, and his followers were scattered, but their spirit did not die. They banded themselves into a patriotic fraternity under the significant name of the Zealots, pledged to undying hostility against the Roman tyranny and ever eager for an opportunity to throw off its yoke.
